Some time after this they came again to know if he had talked with me. He told them he had; that he found me not so averse to an accommodation as some of my friends were, who resented the disgrace offered me, and set me on; that they blowed the coals in secret, prompting me to revenge, or to do myself revenge, as they called it; so that he could not tell what to say to it. He told them he would do his endeavour to persuade me, but he ought to be able to tell me what proposal they made. They pretended they could not make any proposal, because it might be made use of against them: and he told them that by the same rule he could not make any offer, for that might be pleaded in abatement of what damages a jury might be inclined to give. However, after some discourse and mutual promises that no advantage should be taken on either side of what was transacted then, or at any other of those meetings, they came to a kind of treaty, but so remote and so wide from one another, that nothing could be expected from it, for my attorney demanded five hundred pounds and charges, and they offered fifty pounds without charges; so they broke off, and the mercer proposed to have a meeting with me myself, and my attorney agreed to that very readily.

My attorney gave me notice to come to this meeting in good clothes, and with some state, that the mercer might see I was something more than I seemed to be at the time they used me so ill. I came in a new suit of second mourning, according to what I had said at the justice's. I set myself out, too, as well as a widow's dress in second mourning would admit. My governess also furnished me with a good pearl necklace, that shut in behind with a locket of diamonds, which she had in pawn; and I had a very good gold watch by my side; so that, in a word, I made a very good figure, and as I stayed till I was sure they were come, I came to the door in a coach with my maid with me.

When I came into the room the mercer was surprised. He stood up and made his bow, which I took little notice of, and but a little, and went and sat down where my own attorney had pointed to me to sit, for it was his house. After a little while the mercer said he did not know me again, and began to make some compliments in his way. I told him I believed he did not know me at first, and that if he had, I believed he would not have treated me as he did.

He told me he was very sorry for what had happened, and that it was to testify the willingness he had to make all possible reparation that he had appointed this meeting; that he hoped I would not carry things to extremity, which might not only be too great loss to him, but might be the ruin of his business and shop, in which case I might have the satisfaction of repaying an injury with an injury ten times greater; but that I should then get nothing, whereas he was willing to do me any justice that was in his power, without putting himself or me to the trouble or charge of a suit of law.

I told him I was glad to hear him talk so much more like a man of sense than he did before; that it was true an acknowledgment in most cases of affronts was counted reparation sufficient, but this had gone too far to be made up so; that I was not revengeful, nor did I seek his ruin, nor any man's else, but that all my friends were unanimous not to let me so far neglect my character as to adjust a thing of this kind without a sufficient reparation of honour. That to be taken up for a thief was such an indignity as could not be put up; that my character was above being treated so by any that knew me; but because, in my condition of a widow, I had been for some time careless of myself and negligent of myself, I might be taken for such a creature; but that for the particular usage I had from him afterwards, and then I repeated all as before, I had scarce patience to repeat it.

Well, he acknowledged all, and was mighty humble indeed: he made proposals very handsome, and he came up to a hundred pounds, and to pay all law charges, and added, that he would make me a present of a very good suit of clothes. I came down to three hundred pounds, and I demanded that I should publish an advertisement of the particulars in the common newspapers.

This was the clause he never could comply with; however, at last he came up, by good management of my attorney, to one hundred and fifty pounds, and a suit of black silk clothes, and there I agreed, and, as it were at my attorney's request, complied with it, he having my attorney's bill and charges, and gave us a good supper into the bargain.

When I came to receive the money I brought my governess with me; dressed like an old duchess, and a gentleman very well dressed, who we pretended courted me, but I called him cousin, and the lawyer was only to hint privately to him that this gentleman courted the widow.

He treated us very handsomely, and paid the money cheerfully enough; so that it cost him two hundred pounds in all, or rather more. At our last meeting, when all was agreed, the case of the journeyman came up, and the mercer begged very hard for him, told me he was a man that had kept a shop of his own, and been in good business; had a wife and several children, and was very poor; that he had nothing to make satisfaction with, but he should come to beg my pardon on his knees, if I desired it, as openly as I pleased. I had no spleen at the saucy rogue, nor were his submissions anything to me, since there was nothing to be got by him; so I thought it was as good to throw that in generously as not; so I told him I did not desire the ruin of any man, and therefore at his request I would forgive the wretch, it was below me to seek any revenge.

When we were at supper he might be brought in to make acknowledgement, which he would have done with as much mean humility as his offence was with insulting haughtiness and pride; in which was an instance of a complete baseness of spirit and impious cruelty; relentless when uppermost and in prosperity, abject and low-spirited when down in affliction. However, I abated his cringes, told him I forgave him, and desired he might withdraw, as if I did not care for the sight of him though I had forgiven him.

I was now in good circumstances, indeed, if I could have known my time for leaving off, and my governess often said I was the richest of the trade in England; so I believe I was, for I had seven hundred pounds by me in money, besides clothes, rings, some plate, and two gold watches, and all of them stolen, for I had innumerable jobs besides those I have mentioned. O! had I even now the grace of repentance, I had still leisure to have looked back upon my follies, and have made some reparation; but the satisfaction I have to make for the public mischiefs I had done were yet left behind; and I could not forbear going abroad again, as I called it, now, any more than I could when my extremity really drove me out for bread.

It was not long after the affair with the mercer was made up, that I went out in an equipage quite different from any I had ever appeared in before. I dressed myself like a beggar-woman, in the coarsest and most despicable rags I could get, and I walked about, peering and peeping into every door and window I came near; and indeed I was in such a plight now, that I knew as ill how to behave in as ever I did in any. I naturally abhorred dirt and rags; I had been bred up tight and cleanly, and could be no other, whatever condition I was in; so that this was the most uneasy disguise to me that ever I put on. I said presently to myself that this would not do, for this was a dress that everybody was shy and afraid of; and I thought everybody looked at me, as if they were afraid I should come near them, lest I should take something from them, or afraid to come near me, lest they should get something from me. I wandered about all the evening, the first time I went out, and made nothing of it, but came home again wet, draggled, and tired. However, I went out again the next night, and then I met with a little adventure, which had like to have cost me dear. As I was standing near a tavern door, there comes a gentleman on horseback, and lights at the door; and wanting to go into the tavern, he calls one of the drawers to hold his horse. He stayed pretty long in the tavern, and the drawer heard his master call, and thought he would be angry with him. Seeing me stand by him, when he called to me, "Here woman," says he, "hold this horse awhile till I go in, if the gentleman comes, he will give you something."—"Yes," says I, and takes the horse and walks off with him very soberly, and carried him to my governess.

This had been a booty to those that had understood it; but never was poor thief more at a loss to know what to do with anything that was stolen; for when I came home my governess was quite confounded, and what to do with the creature we neither of us knew; to send him to stable was doing nothing, for it was certain that public notice would be given in the Gazette, and the horse described, so that we durst not go to fetch it again.

All the remedy we had for this unlucky adventure was to go and set up the horse at an inn, and send a note by a porter to the tavern, that the gentleman's horse that was lost such a time, was left at such an inn, and that he might be had there; that the poor woman that held him, having led him about the street, not being able to lead him back again, had left him there. We might have waited till the owner had published and offered a reward, but we did not care to venture the receiving the reward.

So this was a robbery and no robbery, for little was lost by it, and nothing was got by it, and I was quite sick of going out in a beggar's dress, it did not answer at all; and besides, I thought it was ominous and threatening.

While I was in this disguise, I fell in with a parcel of folks of a worse kind than any I ever sorted with, and I saw a little into their ways too; these were coiners of money, and they made some very good offers to me as to profit. But the part they would have had me embark in was the most dangerous part; I mean that of the very working the dye, as they call it, which, had I been taken, had been certain death, and that at a stake, I say, to be burnt to death at a stake. So that though I was to appearance but a beggar, and they promised mountains of gold and silver to me to engage, yet it would not do. It is true, if I had been really a beggar, or had been desperate as when I began, I might, perhaps, have closed with it; for what care they to die that cannot tell how to live? But at present this was not my condition; at least I was for no such terrible risks as those; besides, the very thoughts of being burnt at a stake struck terror into my very soul, chilled my blood, and gave me the vapours to such a degree as I could not think of it without trembling.

This put an end to my disguise too, for as I did not like the proposal, so I did not tell them so; but seemed to relish it, and promised to meet again. But I durst see them no more; for if I had seen them, and not complied, though I had declined it with the greatest assurance of secrecy in the world, they would have gone near to have murdered me to make sure work, and make themselves easy as they call it. What kind of easiness that is, they may best judge that understand how easy men are that can murder people to prevent danger. However, in a short time after two of the men were hanged, and a woman burnt at a stake.

This and horse stealing were things quite out of my way, and I might easily resolve I would have no more to say to them. My business seemed to lie another way, and though it had hazard enough in it too, yet it was more suitable to me; and what had more of art in it, more room to escape and more chances for a coming off, if a surprise should happen.

I had several proposals made also to me about that time, to come into a gang of house-breakers. But that was a thing I had no mind to venture at neither, any more than I had at the coining trade. I offered to go along with two men and a woman, that made it their business to get into houses by stratagem, and with them I was willing enough to venture; but there was three of them already, and they did not care to part, nor I to have too many in a gang, so I did not close with them, but declined them, and they paid dear for their next attempt.

But at length I met with a woman that had often told me what adventures she had made, and with success, at the water-side, and I closed with her, and we drove on our business pretty well. One day we came among some Dutch people at St Catherine's, where we went on pretence to buy goods that were privately got on shore. It was two or three times in a house where we saw a good quantity of prohibited goods, and my companion once brought away three pieces of Dutch black silk that turned to good account, and I had my share of it. But in all the journeys I made by myself, I could not get an opportunity to do any thing, so I laid it aside; for I had been so often, that they began to suspect something, and were so shy that I saw nothing was to be done.

This balked me a little, and I resolved to push at something or other, for I was not used to come back so often without purchase. So the next day I dressed myself up fine, and took a walk to the other end of the town. I passed through the Exchange in the Strand, but had no notion of finding anything to do there, when on a sudden I saw a great clutter in the place, and all the people, shopkeepers as well as others, standing up and staring; and what should it be but some great duchess coming into the Exchange; and they said the queen was coming. I set myself close up to a shop side, with my back to the counter, as if to let the crowd pass by, when keeping my eye upon a parcel of lace, which the shopkeeper was showing to some ladies that stood by me. The shopkeeper and her maid were so taken up with looking to see who was coming, and what shop they would go to, that I found means to slip a paper of lace into my pocket, and come clear off with it, so the lady milliner paid dear enough for her gaping after the queen.

I went off from the shop as if driven along by the throng, and mingling myself with the crowd went out at the other door of the Exchange, and so got away before they missed their lace; and because I would not be followed I called a coach and shut myself up in it. I had scarce shut the coach doors up but I saw the milliner's maid and five or six more come running out into the street, crying out as if they were frightened. They did not cry "stop thief," because nobody ran away, but I could hear the words "robbed" and "lace" two or three times, and saw the wench wringing her hands and run staring too and again like one scared. The coachman that had taken me up was getting up into the box, but was not quite up, so that the horses had not begun to move, so that I was terrible uneasy, and I took the packet of lace and laid it ready to have dropt it out of the flap of the coach which opens before, just behind the coachman; but to my great satisfaction in less than a minute the coach began to move, that is to say, as soon as the coachman had got up and spoken to his horses. So he drove away without any interruption, and I brought off my purchase, which was worth near twenty pounds.

The next day I dressed me up again, but in quite different clothes, and walked the same way again, but nothing offered till I came into St James's Park, where I saw abundance of fine ladies in the Park walking in the Mall, and among the rest there was a little miss, a young lady of about twelve or thirteen years old, and she had a sister, as I suppose it was, with her, that might be about nine years old. I observed the biggest had a fine gold watch on, and a good necklace of pearl, and they had a footman in livery with them. But as it is not usual for the footmen to go behind the ladies in the Mall, so I observed the footman stopped at their going into the Mall, and the biggest of the sisters spoke to him, which I perceived was to bid him be just there when they came back.

When I heard her dismiss the footman I stepped up to him, and asked him what little lady that was, and held a little chat with him about what a pretty child it was with her, and how genteel and well carriaged a lady the eldest would be,—how womanish and how grave; and the fool of a fellow told me presently who she was, that she was Sir Thomas ———'s eldest daughter, of Essex, and that she was a great fortune; that her mother was not come to town yet, but she was with Sir William ———'s lady, of Suffolk, at her lodgings in Suffolk street, and a great deal more; that they had a maid and a woman to wait on them, besides Sir

Thomas's coach, the coachman and himself; and that young lady was governess to the whole family as well here as at home to; and, in short, told me abundance of things enough for my business.

I was very well dressed indeed, and had my gold watch as well as she; so I left the footman, and I put myself in a rank with this young lady, and having stayed till she had taken one double turn in the Mall and was going forward again, by and by I saluted her by her name with the title of Lady Betty. I asked her when she heard from her father, when my lady her mother would be in town, and how she did?

I talked so familiarly to her of her whole family, that she could not suspect but that I knew them all intimately. I asked her why she would come abroad without Mrs Chime with her (that was the name of her woman) to take care of Mrs Judith (that was her sister). Then I entered into a long chat with her about her sister, what a fine little lady she was, and asked if she had learned French, and a thousand other little things to entertain her, when on a sudden we see the guards come, and the crowd run to see the king go by to the parliament-house.

The ladies ran all to the side of the Mall, and I helped my lady to stand upon the edge of the boards on the side of the Mall, that she might be high enough to see, and took the little one and lifted her quite up; during which I took care to convey the gold watch so clean away from the Lady Betty that she never felt it nor missed it till all the crowd was gone, and she was gotten into the middle of the Mall among the other ladies.

I took my leave of her in the very crowd, and said to her as if in haste, "Dear Lady Betty, take care of your little sister;" and so the crowd did as it were thrust me away from her, and on that I was obliged unwillingly to take my leave.

The hurry in such cases is immediately over, and the place clear, as soon as the king is gone by; but as there is always a great running and clattering just as the king passes, so having dropped the two little ladies, and done my business with them without any miscarriage, I kept hurrying on among the crowd as if I ran to see the king, and so I got before the crowd and kept so till I came to the end of the Mall, when the king going on towards the Horse-guards, I went forward to the passage which went then through against the lower end of the Haymarket, and there I bestowed a coach upon myself, and made off; and I confess I have not yet been so good as my word, viz., to go and visit my Lady Betty.

I was once of the mind to venture staying with Lady Betty till she missed the watch, and so have made a great outcry about it with her, and have got her into her coach and put myself in the coach with her, and have gone home with her; for she appeared so fond of me, and so perfectly deceived by my so readily talking to her of all her relations and family, that I thought it was very easy to push the thing farther, and to have got at least the necklace of pearl. But when I considered though the child would not perhaps have suspected me, other people might, and that if I was searched I should be discovered, I thought it was best to go off with what I had got, and be satisfied.

I came accidentally afterwards to hear that when the young lady missed her watch she made a great outcry in the park, and sent her footman up and down, to see if he could find me out, she having described me so perfectly that he knew presently that it was the same person that had stood and talked so long with him, and asked him so many questions about them. But I was gone far enough out of their reach before she could come at her footman to tell him the story.

I made another adventure after this, of another nature, different from all I had been concerned in yet, and this was at a gaming-house near Covent-Garden.

I saw several people go in and out, and I stood in the passage a good while with another woman with me, and seeing a gentleman go up that seemed to be of more than ordinary fashion, I said to him, "Sir, pray don't they give women leave to go up?"—"Yes, madam," says he, "and to play if they please."—"I mean so, sir," says I; and with that he said he would introduce me if I had a mind; so I followed him to the door, and he looking in, "There, madam," says he, "are the gamesters, if you have a mind to venture." I looked in and said to my comrade aloud, "Here's nothing but men, I won't venture among them;" at which one of the gentlemen cried out, "You need not be afraid, madam; here's none but fair gamesters; you are very welcome to come and set what you please." So I went a little nearer and looked on, and some of them brought me a chair, and I sat down and saw the box and dice go round a-pace; then I said to my comrade, "The gentlemen play too high for us; come, let us go."

The people were all very civil, and one gentleman in particular encouraged me, and said, "Come, madam, if you please, venture; if you dare to trust me, I'll answer for it: you shall have nothing put upon you here."—"No, sir," said I, smiling; "I hope the gentlemen would not cheat a woman;" but still I declined venturing, though I pulled out a purse with money in it, that they might see I did not want money. After I had sat awhile, one gentleman said to me, jeering, "Come, madam, I see you are afraid to venture yourself; I always had good luck with the ladies; you shall set for me, if you won't set for yourself. I told him, "Sir, I should be very loath to lose your money; though," added I, "I am pretty lucky too; but the gentlemen play so high, that I dare not indeed venture my own."

"Well, well," says he, "there's ten guineas, madam, set them for me;" so I took his money and set, himself looking on. I ran out nine of the guineas by one and two at a time, and then the box coming to the next man to me, my gentleman gave me ten guineas more, and made me set five of them at once, and the gentleman who had the box threw out, so there was five guineas of his money again. He was encouraged at this, and made me take the box, which was a bold venture. However, I held the box so long that I had gained him his whole money, and had a good handful of guineas in my lap; and which was the better luck, when I threw out, I threw but at one or two of those that had set me, and so went off easy.

When I was come this length, I offered the gentleman all the gold, for it was his own, and so would have had him play for himself, pretending I did not understand the game well enough. He laughed, and said if I had but good luck, it was no matter whether I understood the game or no; but I should not leave off. However, he took out the fifteen guineas that he had put in at first, and bid me play with the rest. I would have told them to see how much I had got, but he said, "No, no, don't tell them; I believe you are very honest, and 'tis bad luck to tell them;" so I played on.

I played the game well enough, though I pretended I did not, and played cautiously; it was to keep a good stock in my lap, out of which I every now and then conveyed some into my pocket; but in such a manner, and at such convenient times, as I was sure he could not see it.

I played a great while, and had very good luck for him; but the last time I held the box, they set me high, and I threw boldly at all. I held the box till I gained near fourscore guineas, but lost above half of it back at the last throw; so I got up, for I was afraid I should lose it all back again, and said to him, "Pray come, sir, now, and take it, and play for yourself; I think I have done pretty well for you." He would have had me play on, but it grew late, and I desired to be excused. When I gave it up to him, I told him I hoped he would give me leave to tell it now, that I might see what I had gained, and how lucky I had been for him. When I told them, there was threescore and three guineas. "Aye," says I, "if it had not been for that unlucky throw, I had got you a hundred guineas." So I gave him all the money, but he would not take it till I had put my hand into it and taken for myself, and bid me please myself. I refused it, and was positive I would not take it myself; if he had a mind to anything of that kind, it should be all his own doings.

The rest of the gentlemen seeing us striving, cried, "Give it her all;" but I absolutely refused that. Then one of them said, "Damn you, Jack, halve it with her; don't you know you should always be on even terms with the ladies?" So, in short, he divided it with me, and I brought away thirty guineas, besides about forty-three which I had stolen privately, which I was sorry for afterwards, because he was so generous.

Thus I brought home seventy-three guineas, and let my old governess see what good luck I had at play. However, it was her advice that I should not venture again, and I took her counsel, for I never went there any more; for I knew as well as she, if the itch of play came in, I might soon lose that and all the rest of what I had got.

Fortune had smiled upon me to that degree, and I had thriven so much, and my governess too—for she always had a share with me—that really the old gentlewoman began to talk of leaving off while we were well, and being satisfied with what we had got; but, I know not what fate guided me, I was as backward to it now as she was when I proposed it to her before, and so in an ill hour we gave over the thoughts of it for the present; and, in a word, I grew more hardened and audacious than ever; and the success I had made my name as famous as any thief of my sort ever had been at Newgate and in the Old Bailey.

I had sometimes taken the liberty to play the same game over again, which is not according to practice, which, however, succeeded not amiss; but, generally, I took up new figures, and contrived to appear in new shapes every time I went abroad.

It was now a rumbling time of the year, and the gentlemen being most of them gone out of town, Tonbridge and Epsom, and such places, were full of people, but the city was thin, and I thought our trade felt it a little as well as others; so that at the latter end of the year I joined myself with a gang who usually go every year to Stourbridge fair, and from thence to Bury fair, in Suffolk. We promised ourselves great things here, but when I came to see how things were, I was weary of it presently; for except mere picking of pockets, there was little worth meddling with. Neither, if a booty had been made, was it so easy carrying it off, nor was there such a variety of occasion for business in our way as in London. All that I made of the whole journey, was a gold watch at Bury fair, and a small parcel of linen at Cambridge, which gave me occasion to take leave of the place. It was an old bite, and I thought might do with a country shop-keeper, though in London it would not.

I bought at a linendraper's shop, not in the fair, but in the town of Cambridge, as much fine Holland and other things as came to about seven pounds; when I had done I bade them be sent to such an inn, where I had taken up my abode the same morning, as if I were to lodge there that night.

I ordered the draper to send them home to me about such an hour, to the inn where I lay, and I would pay him his money. At the time appointed the draper sends the goods, and I placed one of our gang at the chamber door, and when the inn-keeper's maid brought the messenger to the door, who was a young fellow, an apprentice, almost a man, she tells him her mistress was asleep, but if he would leave the things, and call in about an hour, I should be awake, and he might have the money. He left the parcel very readily, and goes his way, and in about half an hour my maid and I walked off, and that very evening I hired a horse, and a man to ride before me, and went to Newmarket, and from thence got my passage in a coach that was not quite full to St Edmund's Bury; where, as I told you, I could make but little of my trade; only at a little country opera house I got a gold watch from a lady's side, who was not only intolerably merry, but a little fuddled, which made my work much easier.

I made off with this little booty to Ipswich, and from thence to Harwich, where I went into an inn, as if I had newly arrived from Holland, not doubting that I should make some purchase among the foreigners that came on shore there; but I found them generally empty of things of value, except what was in their portmanteau and Dutch hampers, which were generally guarded by footmen; however, I fairly got one of their portmanteaus one evening out of the chamber where the gentleman lay, the footman being fast asleep on the bed, and I suppose very drunk.

The room in which I lodged lay next to the Dutchman's, and having dragged the heavy thing with much ado out of the chamber into mine, I went out into the street, to see if I could find any possibility of carrying it off. I walked about a great while, but could see no probability either of getting out the things, or of conveying away the goods that were in it if I had opened it, the town being so small, and I a perfect stranger; so I was returning with a resolution to carry it back again, and leave it where I found it. Just in that very moment I heard a man make a noise to some people to make haste, for the boat was going to put off, and the tide would be spent. I called to the fellow: "What boat is it, friend," said I, "that you belong to?"—"Ipswich wherry, madam," says he.—"When do you go off?" says I.—"This moment, madam," says he; "do you want to go thither?"—"Yes," said I; "if you can stay till I fetch my things."—"Where are your things, madam," says he.—"At such an inn," said I.—"Well, I will go with you, madam," says he very civilly, "and carry them for you."—"Come away, then," says I, and takes him with me.

The people of the inn were in a great hurry, the packet-boat from Holland being just come in, and two coaches also with passengers from London for another packet-boat that was going off for Holland, which coaches were to go back next day with the passengers that were just landed. In this hurry, it was not much minded that I came to the bar and paid my reckoning, telling my landlady I had gotten my passage by sea in a wherry.

These wherries are large vessels, with good accommodation for carrying passengers from Harwich to London, and, though they are called wherries, which is a word used in the Thames for a small boat rowed with one or two men, yet these are vessels able to carry twenty passengers, and ten or fifteen tons of goods, and fitted to bear the sea. All this I had found out by inquiring the night before into the several ways of going to London.

My landlady was very courteous, took my money for my reckonings, but was called away, all the house being in a hurry, so I left her, took the fellow up to my chamber, gave him the trunk or portmanteau, for it was like a trunk, and wrapped it about with an old apron, and he went directly to his boat with it, and I after him, nobody asking us the least question about it; for as the drunken Dutch footman was fast asleep, and his master, with other foreign gentlemen, below at supper and very merry, so I went clean off with it to Ipswich, and going in the night, the people of the house knew nothing but that I was gone to London by the Harwich wherry, as I had told my landlady.

I was plagued at Ipswich, with the custom-house officers, who stopped my trunk, as I called it, and would open and search it. I was willing, I told them, they should search it, but my husband had the key, and he was not yet come from Harwich. This I said that if, upon searching it, they should find all the things to be such as properly belonged to a man rather than a woman, it should not seem strange to them. However, they being positive to open the trunk, I consented to have it broke open, that is to say, to have the lock taken off, which was not difficult.

They found nothing for their turn, for the trunk had been searched before, but they discovered several things very much to my satisfaction, as particularly a parcel of money in French pistoles, and some Dutch ducatoons or rix-dollars, and the rest were chiefly two perrywigs, wearing linen and razors, wash-balls, perfumes, and other useful things necessary for a gentleman, which all passed for my husband's, and so I was quit of them.

It was now very early in the morning, and not light, and I knew not well what course to take; for I made no doubt at all but I should be pursued in the morning, and perhaps be taken with the things about me, so I resolved upon taking new measures. I went publicly to an inn in the town with my trunk, as I called it, and having taken the substance out, I did not think the lumber of it worth my concern; however, I gave it to the landlady of the house, with a charge to take great care of it and lay it up safe till I should come again, and away I walked into the street.

When I was got into the town, a great way from the inn, I met with an ancient woman who had just opened her door, and I fell into chat with her and asked her a great many wild questions of things, all remote to my purpose and design; but in my discourse I found by her how the town was situated, that I was in a street that went out towards Hadleigh; but that such a street went towards the water-side, such a street went into the heart of the town, and, at last, such a street went towards Colchester, and so the London road lay there.

I had soon my ends of this old woman, for I only wanted to know which was the London road, and away I walked as fast as I could; not that I intended to go on foot either to London or to Colchester, but I wanted to get quietly away from Ipswich.

I walked about two or three miles, and then I met a plain countryman, who was busy about some husbandry work, I did not know what, and I asked him a great many questions first, not much to the purpose, but at last told him I was going for London; and the coach was full, and I did not get a passage, and asked him if he could not tell me where to hire a horse that would carry double, and an honest man to ride before me to Colchester, so that I might get a place there in the coaches. The honest clown looked earnestly at me, and said nothing for above half a minute; then scratching his poll, "A horse, say you, and to Colchester, to carry double? Why, yes, mistress—a-lack-a-day, you may have horses enough for money."

"Well, friend," said I, "that I take for granted; I don't expect it without money."

"Why, but mistress," says he, "how much are you willing to give?"

"Nay," says I again, "friend, I don't know what your rates are in the country here, for I am a stranger; but if you can get one for me, get it as cheap as you can, and I'll give you something for your pains."

"Why, that's honestly said, too," says the countryman.

"Not so honest neither," said I to myself, "if thou knewest all."

"Why, mistress," says he, "I have a horse that will carry double, and I don't much care if I go myself with you an you like."

"Will you?" says I; "well, I believe you are an honest man; if you will, I shall be glad of it; I'll pay you in reason."

"Why, look ye, mistress," says he; "I won't be out of reason with you then; if I carry you to Colchester, it will be worth five shillings for myself and my horse, for I shall hardly come back to-night."

In short, I hired the honest man and his horse; but when we came to a town upon the road, (I do not remember the name of it, but it stands upon a river,) I pretended myself very ill; but if he would stay there with me because I was a stranger, I would pay him for himself and his horse with all my heart. This I did because I knew the Dutch gentlemen and their servants would be upon the road that day, either in the stage-coaches or riding post, and I did not know but the drunken fellow, or somebody else that might have seen me at Harwich, might see me again; and so I thought that in one day's stop they would be all gone by.

We lay all that night there, and the next morning it was not very early when I set out, so that it was near ten o'clock by the time I got to Colchester. It was with no little pleasure that I saw the town where I had spent so many pleasant days, and I made many inquiries after the good old friends I had once had there, but could make little out: they were all dead or removed. The young ladies had been all married or gone to London; the old gentleman, and the old lady that had been my early benefactress, all dead; and, which troubled me most, the young gentleman, my first lover, and afterwards my brother-in-law, was dead; but two sons, men grown, were left of him, but they too were transplanted to London.

I dismissed my old man here, and stayed incognito for three or four days in Colchester, and then took a passage in a waggon, because I would not venture being seen in the Harwich coaches; but I need not have used so much caution, for there was nobody in Harwich but the woman of the house could have known me: nor was it rational to think that she, who saw me but once, and that by candle-light, should have ever discovered me.

I was now returned to London, and though by the accident of my last adventure I got something considerable, yet I was not fond of any more country rambles; nor should I have ventured abroad again if I had carried the trade on to the end of my days. I gave my governess a history of my travels; she liked the Harwich journey well enough, and in discussing of these things between ourselves she observed, that a thief being a creature that watches the advantages of other people's mistakes, it is impossible but that to one that is vigilant and industrious many opportunities must happen, and therefore she thought that one so exquisitely keen in the trade as I was would scarce fail of something wherever I went.

On the other hand, every branch of my story, if duly considered, may be useful to honest people, and afford a due caution to people of some sort or other, to guard against the like surprises, and to have their eyes about them when they have to do with strangers of any kind, for 'tis very seldom that some snare or other is not in their way. The moral, indeed, of all my history, is left to be gathered by the senses and judgment of the reader. I am not qualified to preach to them; let the experience of one creature completely wicked, and completely miserable, be a storehouse of useful warning to those that read.

I am drawing now towards a new variety of the scenes of life. Upon my return, being hardened by a long race of crime and success unparalleled, at least in the reach of my own knowledge, I had, as I have said, no thoughts of laying down a trade which, if I was to judge by the example of others, must, however, end at last in misery and sorrow.

It was on the Christmas day following, in the evening, that, to finish a long train of wickedness, I went abroad to see what might offer in my way, when, going by a working silversmith's in Foster lane, I saw a tempting bait indeed, and not to be resisted by one of my occupation; for the shop had nobody in it that I could see, and a great deal of loose plate lay in the window, and at the seat of the man who usually, as I supposed, worked at one side of the shop.

I went boldly in, and was just going to lay my hand upon a piece of plate, and might have done it and carried it clear off, for any care that the men who belonged to the shop had taken of it; but an officious fellow in a house, not a shop, on the other side of the way, seeing me go in, and observing that there was nobody in the shop, comes running over the street and into the shop, and without asking me what I was, or who, seizes upon me and cries out for the people of the house.

I had not, as I said above, touched anything in the shop, and seeing a glimpse of somebody running over to the shop, I had so much presence of mind as to knock very hard with my foot on the floor of the house, and was just calling out too, when the fellow laid hands on me.

However, as I had always most courage when I was most in danger, so when the fellow laid hands on me, I stood very high upon it that I came in to buy half a dozen of silver spoons, and to my good fortune it was a silversmith's that sold plate as well as worked plate for other shops. The fellow laughed at that part, and put such a value upon the service that he had done his neighbour, that he would have it be that I came not to buy, but to steal; and raising a great crowd, I said to the master of the shop, who by this time was fetched home from some neighbouring place, that it, was in vain to make a noise, and enter into talk there of the case. The fellow had insisted that I came to steal, and he must prove it, and I desired we might go before a magistrate without any more words; for I began to see I should be too hard for the man that had seized me. The master and mistress of the shop were really not so violent as the man from t'other side of the way; and the man said, "Mistress, you might come into the shop with a good design for aught I know, but it seemed a dangerous thing for you to come into such a shop as mine is when you see nobody there, and I cannot do so little justice to my neighbour, who was so kind to me, as not to acknowledge he had reason on his side; though, upon the whole, I do not find you attempted to take anything, and I really know not what to do in it." I pressed him to go before a magistrate with me, and if anything could be proved on me that was like a design of robbery, I should willingly submit, but if not, I expected reparation.

Just while we were in this debate, and a crowd of people gathered about the door, came by Sir T. B., an alderman of the city and justice of the peace, and the goldsmith hearing of it, goes out, and entreated his worship to come in and decide the case.

Give the goldsmith his due, he told his story with a great deal of justice and moderation, and the fellow that had come over and seized upon me, told his with as much heat and foolish passion, which did me good still, rather than harm.

It came then to my turn to speak, and I told his worship that I was a stranger in London, being newly come out of the north, that I lodged in such a place, that I was passing this street, and went into the goldsmith's shop to buy half a dozen of spoons (by good luck I had an old silver spoon in my pocket, which I pulled out), and told him I had carried that spoon to match it with half a dozen of new ones, that they might match some I had in the country.

That seeing nobody in the shop, I knocked with my foot very hard to make the people hear, and had also called aloud with my voice. 'Tis true, there was loose plate in the shop, but that nobody could say I had touched any of it, or gone near it; that a fellow came running into the shop out of the street, and laid hands on me in a furious manner, in the very moment while I was calling for the people in the house; that if he had really had a mind to have done his neighbour any service, he should have stood at a distance, and silently watched to see whether I had touched anything or no, and then have clapped in upon me, and taken me in the fact.

"That is very true," says Mr Alderman, and turning to the fellow that stopped me, he asked if it was true that I knocked with my foot. He said, "Yes, I had knocked, but that might be because of his coming."—"Nay," says the alderman, taking him short, "now you contradict yourself, for just now you said she was in the shop with her back to you, and did not see you till you came upon her." Now it was true that my back was partly to the street, but yet as my business was of a kind that required me to have my eyes every way, so I really had a glance of him running over, as I said before, though he did not perceive it.

After a full hearing, the alderman gave it as his opinion that his neighbour was under a mistake, and that I was innocent, and the goldsmith acquiesced in it too, and his wife, and so I was dismissed; but as I was going to depart, Mr Alderman said, "But hold, madam, "if you were designing to buy spoons, I hope you will not let my friend here lose his customer by the mistake." I readily answered, "No, sir, I'll buy the spoons still if he can match my odd spoon, which I brought for a pattern;" and the goldsmith showed me some of the very same fashion; so he weighed the spoons, and they came to thirty-five shillings; so I pulled out my purse to pay him, in which I had near twenty guineas, for I never went without such a sum about me, whatever might happen, and I found it of use at other times as well as now.

When Mr Alderman saw my money, he said, "Well, madam, now I am satisfied you were wronged, and it was for this reason that I moved that you should buy the spoons, and stayed till you had bought them, for if you had not had the money to pay for them, I should have suspected that you did not come into the shop to buy, for indeed the sort of people who come upon those designs that you have been charged with, are seldom troubled with much gold in their pockets, as I see you are."

I smiled, and told his worship, that then I owed something of his favour to my money, but I hoped he saw reason also in the justice he had done me before. He said, "Yes, he had, but this had confirmed his opinion, and he was fully satisfied now of my having been injured." So I came off with flying colours, though from an affair in which I was at the very brink of destruction.

It was but three days after this, that not at all made cautious by my former danger, as I used to be, and still pursuing the art which I had so long been employed in, I ventured into a house where I saw the doors open, and furnished myself, as I thought verily without being perceived, with two pieces of flowered silks, such as they call brocaded silk, very rich. It was not a mercer's shop, nor a warehouse of a mercer, but looked like a private dwelling-house, and was, it seems, inhabited by a man that sold goods for the weavers to the mercers, like a broker or factor.

That I may make short of the black part of this story, I was attacked by two wenches that came open-mouthed at me just as I was going out at the door, and one of them pulled me back into the room, while the other shut the door upon me. I would have given them good words, but there was no room for it; two fiery dragons could not have been more furious than they were. They tore my clothes, bullied and roared as if they would have murdered me; the mistress of the house came next, and then the master, and all outrageous, for a while especially.

I gave the master very good words, told him the door was open, and things were a temptation to me, that I was poor and distressed, and poverty was what many could not resist, and begged him with tears to have pity on me. The mistress of the house was moved with compassion, and inclined to have let me go, and had almost persuaded her husband to it also, but the saucy wenches were run even before they were sent; and had fetched a constable, and then the master said he could not go back, I must go before a justice, and answered his wife that he might come into trouble himself if he should let me go.

The sight of the constable, indeed, struck me with terror, and I thought I should have sunk into the ground. I fell into faintings, and indeed the people themselves thought I would have died; when the woman argued again for me, and entreated her husband, seeing they had lost nothing, to let me go. I offered him to pay for the two pieces, whatever the value was, though I had not got them, and argued that as he had his goods, and had really lost nothing, it would be cruel to pursue me to death, and have my blood for the bare attempt of taking them. I put the constable in mind that I broke no doors, nor carried any thing away; and when I came to the justice, and pleaded there that I had neither broken anything to get in, nor carried anything out, the justice was inclined to have released me; but the first saucy jade that stopped me, affirming that I was going out with the goods, but that she stopped me, and pulled me back as I was upon the threshold, the justice upon that point committed me, and I was carried to Newgate. That horrid place! My very blood chills at the mention of its name; the place where so many of my comrades had been locked up, and from whence they went to the fatal tree; the place where my mother suffered so deeply; where I was brought into the world, and from whence I expected no redemption but by an infamous death: to conclude, the place that had so long expected me, and which with so much art and success I had so long avoided.

I was now fixed indeed. It is impossible to describe the terror of my mind when I was first brought in, and when I looked round upon all the horrors of that dismal place. I looked on myself as lost, and that I had nothing to think of but of going out of the world, and that with the utmost infamy; the hellish noise, the roaring, swearing, and clamour, the stench and nastiness, and all the dreadful crowd of afflicting things that I saw there, joined together to make the place seem an emblem of hell itself, and a kind of an entrance into it.

Now I reproached myself with the many hints I had had, as I have mentioned above, from my own reason, from the sense of my good circumstances, and of the many dangers I had escaped, to leave off while I was well, and how I had withstood them all, and hardened my thoughts against all fear. It seemed to me that I was hurried on by an inevitable and unseen fate to this day of misery, and that now I was to expiate all my offences at the gallows, that I was now to give satisfaction to justice with my blood, and that I was come to the last hour of my life, and of my wickedness together. These things poured themselves in upon my thoughts in a confused manner, and left me overwhelmed with melancholy and despair.

Then I repented heartily of all my life past, but that repentance yielded me no satisfaction, no peace, no not in the least; because as I said to myself, it was repenting after the power of farther sinning was taken away. I seemed not to mourn that I had committed such crimes, and for the fact as it was an offence against God and my neighbour, but I mourned that I was to be punished for it. I was a penitent, as I thought, not that I had sinned, but that I was to suffer, and this took away all the comfort, and even the hope of my repentance in my own thoughts.

I got no sleep for several nights or days after I came into that wretched place, and glad I would have been for some time to have died there, though I did not consider dying as it ought to be considered neither. Indeed nothing could be filled with more horror to my imagination than the company that was there. O! if I had been sent to any place in the world, and not to Newgate, I should have thought myself happy.

In the next place, how did the hardened wretches that were there before me triumph over me? "What! Mrs Flanders come to Newgate at last?" "What! Mrs Mary, Mrs Molly!" and after that plain "Moll Flanders!" They thought the devil had helped me, they said, that I had reigned so long; they expected me there many years ago, and was I come at last? Then they flouted me with my dejections, welcomed me to the place, wished me joy, bid me have a good heart, not to be cast down; things might not be so bad as I feared, and the like; then called for brandy, and drank to me; but put it all up to my score, for they told me I was but just come to the college, as they called it, and sure I had money in my pocket, though they had none.

I asked one of this crew how long she had been there? She said four months. I asked her how the place looked to her when she first came into it?—"Just as it did now to me," says she, "dreadful and frightful; that she thought she was in hell, and believes so still;" adds she, "but it is natural to me now, I don't disturb myself about it."—"I suppose," says I, "you are in no danger of what is to follow."—"Nay," says she, "for you are mistaken there I assure you, for I am under sentence, only I pleaded my belly; but I am no more with child than the judge that tried me, and I expect to be called down next sessions."

This calling down is calling down to their former judgment, when a woman has been respited for her belly, but proves not to be with child, or if she has been with child, and has been brought to bed.

"Well," says I, "and are you thus easy?"—"Ay," says she; "I cannot help myself; what signifies being sad? If I am hanged there's an end of me," says she, and away she turns dancing, and sings as she goes, the following piece of Newgate wit:

"If I swing by the string,
I shall hear the bell ring."

And then there's an end to poor Jenny."

I mention this because it would be worth the observation of any prisoner who shall hereafter fall into the same misfortune, and come to that dreadful place (Newgate), how time, necessity, and conversing with the wretches that are there, familiarises the place to them; how at last they become reconciled to that which at first was the greatest dread upon their spirits in the world, and are as impudently cheerful and merry in their misery as they were when out of it.

I cannot say, as some do, this devil is not so black as he is painted; for indeed no colours can represent the place to the life, nor any soul conceive aright of it but those who have been sufferers there. But how hell should become by degrees so natural, and not only tolerable, but even agreeable, is a thing unintelligible but by those who have experienced it as I have.

The same night that I was sent to Newgate, I sent the news of it to my old governess, who was surprised at it, you may be sure, and spent the night almost as ill out of Newgate as I did in it.

The next morning she came to see me, she did what she could to comfort me, but she saw that was to no purpose. However, as she said, to sink under the weight was but to increase the weight. She immediately applied herself to all the proper methods to prevent the effects of it, which we feared; and first she found out the two fiery jades that had surprised me. She tampered with them, persuaded them, offered them money, and, in a word, tried all imaginable ways to prevent a prosecution. She offered one of the wenches one hundred pounds to get away from her mistress and not to appear against me; but she was resolute, that though she was but a servant maid at three pounds a year wages or thereabouts, she refused it, and would have refused it, as my governess said she believed, if she had offered her five hundred pounds. Then she attacked the other maid; she was not so hard-hearted in appearance as the other, and sometimes seemed inclined to be merciful; but the first wench kept her up and changed her mind, and would not so much as let my governess talk with her, but threatened to have her up for tampering with the evidence.

Then she applied to the master, that is to say, the man whose goods had been stolen, and particularly to his wife, who, as I told you, was inclined at first to have some compassion for me. She found the woman the same still; but the man alleged he was bound by the justice that committed me to prosecute, and that he should forfeit his recognizance.

My governess offered to find friends that should get his recognizances off the file, as they call it, and that he should not suffer; but it was not possible to convince him that could be done, or that he could be safe any way in the world but by appearing against me. So I was to have three witnesses of the fact against me, the master and his two maids; that is to say, I was as certain to be cast for my life as I was certain that I was alive, and I had nothing to do but to think of dying and prepare for it. I had but a sad foundation to build upon, as I said before, for all my repentance appeared to me to be only the effect of my fear of death, not a sincere regret for the wicked life that I had lived, and which had brought this misery upon me, or for the offending my creator, who was now suddenly to be my judge.

I lived many days here under the utmost horror of soul. I had death as it were in view, and thought of nothing night and day but of gibbets and halters, evil spirits and devils. It is not to be expressed by words how I was harassed, between the dreadful apprehensions of death and the terror of my conscience reproaching me with my past horrible life.

The ordinary of Newgate came to me, and talked a little in his way, but all his divinity ran upon confessing my crime, as he called it (though he knew not what I was in for), making a full discovery and the like, without which he told me God would never forgive me; and he said so little to the purpose, that I had no manner of consolation from him. And then to observe the poor creature preaching confession and repentance to me in the morning, and find him drunk with brandy and spirits by noon. This had something in it so shocking, that I began to nauseate the man more than his work, and his work too by degrees for the sake of the man, so that I desired him to trouble me no more.

I know not how it was, but by the indefatigable application of my diligent governess, I had no bill preferred against me the first sessions, I mean to the grand jury at Guildhall; so I had another month or five weeks before me, and without doubt this ought to have been accepted by me as so much time given me for reflection upon what was past, and preparation for what was to come; or, in a word, I ought to have esteemed it as a space given me for repentance, and have employed it as such; but it was not in me; I was sorry, as before, for being in Newgate, but had very few signs of repentance about me.

On the contrary, like the waters in the hollows of the mountains, which petrify and turn into stone whatever they are suffered to drop upon, so the continual conversing with such a crew of hell-hounds had the same common operation upon me as upon other people. I degenerated into stone; I turned first stupid and senseless, and then brutish and thoughtless, and, at last, raving mad as any of them were. In short, I became as naturally pleased and easy with the place as if, indeed, I had been bred up all my life-time there.

It is scarce possible to imagine that our natures should be capable of so much degeneracy as to make that pleasant and agreeable that in itself is the most complete misery. Here was a circumstance that I think it is scarce possible to mention a worse. I was as exquisitely miserable as it were possible for any one to be that had life, and health, and money to help them, as I had.

I had a weight of guilt upon me enough to sink any creature who had the least power of reflection left, and had any sense upon them of the happiness of this life, or the misery of another. I had at first some remorse indeed, but no repentance; I had now neither remorse or repentance; I had a crime charged on me, the punishment of which was death by our law; the proof so evident that there was no room for me so much as to plead not guilty. I had the name of an old offender, so that I had nothing to expect but death in a few weeks' time; neither had I myself any thoughts of escaping, and yet a strange lethargy of soul possessed me. I had no trouble, no apprehensions, no sorrow about me; the first surprise was gone; I was, I may well say I know not how; my senses, my reason, nay, my conscience were all asleep; my course of life for forty years had been a horrid complication of wickedness; whoredom and adultery, incest, lying, theft; and, in a word, everything but murder and treason had been my practice since the age of eighteen, or thereabouts, to threescore; and now I was ingulphed in the misery of punishment, and had an infamous death just at the door, and yet I had no sense of my condition, no thoughts of heaven or hell, at least that went any farther than a bare flying touch, like the stitch or pain that gives a hint and goes off; I neither had the heart to ask God's mercy or indeed to think of it, and in this

I think I have given a brief description of the completest misery on earth.

All my terrifying thoughts were past, the horrors of the place were become familiar, and I felt no more uneasinesses at the noise and clamours of the prison than they did who made that noise; in a word, I was become a mere Newgate-bird, as wicked and as outrageous as any of them; nay, I scarce retained the habit and custom of good breeding and manners, which all along till now ran through my conversation; so thorough a degeneracy possessed me, I was no more the same thing that I had been than if I had never been otherwise than what I was now.

In the middle of this hardened part of my life I had another sudden surprise, which called me back a little to that thing called sorrow, which indeed I began to be past the sense of before. They told me one night that there was brought into the prison late the night before three highwaymen, who had committed a robbery somewhere on the road to Windsor (Hounslow Heath, I think it was), and were pursued to Uxbridge by the country, and were taken there after a gallant resistance, in which I know not how many of the country people were wounded, and some killed.

It is not to be wondered that we prisoners were all desirous enough to see these brave topping gentlemen, that were talked up to be such as their fellows had not been known, and especially because it was said they would in the morning be removed into the press-yard, having given money to the head master of the prison to be allowed the liberty of that better part of the prison. So we that were women placed ourselves in the way that we would be sure to see them; but nothing could equal the amazement and surprise I was in, when the very first man that came out I knew to be my Lancashire husband, the same who lived so well at Dunstable, and the same who I afterwards saw at Brickill, when I was married to my last husband, as has been related.

I was struck dumb at the sight, and knew neither what to say or what to do. He did not know me, and that was all the present relief I had. I quitted my company, and retired as much as that dreadful place suffers anybody to retire, and cried vehemently for a great while. "Dreadful creature that I am," said I; "how many poor people have I made miserable! how many desperate wretches have I sent to the devil!" This gentleman's misfortunes I placed all to my own account. He had told me at Chester he was ruined by that match, and that his fortunes were made desperate on that account; for that, thinking I had been a fortune, he was run into debt more than he was able to pay, and that he knew not what course to take; that he would go into the army and carry a musket, or buy a horse and take a tour, as he called it; and though I never told him that I was a fortune, and so did not actually deceive him myself, yet I did encourage the having it thought that I was so, and by that means I was the occasion originally of his mischief.

The surprise of this thing only struck deeper into my thoughts, and gave me stronger reflections than all that had befallen me before. I grieved day and night for him, and the more, or that they told me he was the captain of the gang, and that he had committed so many robberies that Hind or Whitney, or the Golden Farmer, were fools to him; that he would surely be hanged if there were no more men left in the country he was born in, and that there would be abundance of people come in against him.

I was overwhelmed with grief for him; my own case gave me no disturbance compared to this, and I loaded myself with reproaches on his account. I bewailed his misfortunes, and the ruin he was now come to, at such a rate, that I relished nothing now as I did before, and the first reflections I made upon the horrid, detestable life I had lived began to return upon me; and as these things returned, my abhorrence of the place I was in, and of the way of living in it, returned also; in a word, I was perfectly changed, and became another body.

While I was under these influences of sorrow for him came notice to me that the next sessions approaching there would be a bill preferred to the grand jury against me, and that I should certainly be tried for my life at the Old Bailey. My temper was touched before; the hardened wretched boldness of spirit which I had acquired in the prison abated, and conscious guilt began to flow in upon my mind. In short, I began to think (and to think, indeed, is one real advance from hell to heaven) all that hardened state and temper of soul, which I have said so much of before, is but a deprivation of thought; he that is restored to his power of thinking, is restored to himself.

As soon as I began, I say, to think, the first thing that occurred to me broke out thus: "Lord! what will become of me? I shall certainly die! I shall be cast to be sure, and there is nothing beyond that but death! I have no friends! what shall I do? I shall be certainly cast! Lord, have mercy upon me! what will become of me?" This was a sad thought, you will say, to be the first, after so long time that had started into my soul of that kind, and yet even this was nothing but fright at what was to come; there was not a word of sincere repentance in it all. However, I was indeed dreadfully dejected, and disconsolate to the last degree; and as I had no friend in the world to communicate my distressed thoughts to, it lay so heavy upon me, that it threw me into fits and swoonings several times a day. I sent for my old governess, and she, give her her due, acted the part of a true friend. She left me no stone unturned to pervert the grand jury; finding out one or two of the jurymen, talking with them, and endeavoured to possess them with favourable dispositions, on account that nothing was taken away, and no house broken, &c.; but all would not do—they were overruled by the rest. The two wenches swore home to the fact, and the jury found the bill against me for robbery and house-breaking; that is, for felony and burglary.

I sunk down when they brought me news of it, and after I came to myself again, I thought I should have died with the weight of it. My governess acted a true mother to me; she pitied me, she cried with me, and for me; but she could not help me; and to add to the terror of it, it was the discourse all over the house that I should die for it; I could hear them talk it among themselves very often, and see them shake their heads, and say they were sorry for it, and the like, as is usual in the place; but still nobody came to tell me their thoughts; till at last one of the keepers came to me privately, and said with a sigh, "Well, Mrs Flanders, you will be tried on Friday (this was on Wednesday); what do you intend to do?"

I turned as white as a clout, and said, "God knows what I shall do, for my part I know not what to do."

"Why," says he, "I will not flatter you; I would have you prepare for death, for I doubt not you will be cast, and as they say you are an old offender, I doubt not you will find but little mercy. They say," added he, "your case is very plain, and that the witnesses swear so home against you, there will be no standing it."

This was a stab into the very vitals of one under such a burthen as I was oppressed with before, and I could not speak a word to him, good or bad, for a great while; but at last I burst out into tears, and I said to him, "Lord! Mr — what must I do?"

"Do!" says he; "send for the ordinary—send for a minister, and talk with him; for indeed Mrs Flanders, unless you have very good friends, you are no woman for this world."

This was plain dealing indeed, but it was very harsh to me, at least I thought it so. He left me in the greatest confusion imaginable, and all that night I lay awake; and now I began to say my prayers, which I had scarce done before since my last husband's death, or from a little while after; and truly I may well call it saying my prayers, for I was in such a confusion, and had such horror upon my mind, that though I cried and repeated several times the ordinary expression of "Lord have mercy upon me," I never brought myself to any sense of my being a miserable sinner, as indeed I was, and of confessing my sins to God, and begging pardon for the sake of Jesus Christ. I was overwhelmed with the sense of my condition, being tried for my life, and being sure to be condemned, and then I was as sure to be executed, and on this account I cried out all night, "Lord! what will become of me? Lord! what shall I do? Lord! I shall be hanged! Lord! have mercy upon me!" and the like.

My poor afflicted governess was now as much concerned as I, and a great deal more truly penitent, though she had no prospect of being brought to trial and sentence, not but that she deserved it as much as I, and so she said herself; but she had not done anything herself for many years, other than receiving what I and others stole, and encouraging us to steal it. But she cried and took on like a distracted body, wringing her hands, and crying out that she was undone; that she believed there was a curse from heaven upon her; that she should be damned; that she had been the destruction of all her friends; that she had brought such a one, and such one, and such one to the gallows; and there she reckoned up ten or eleven people, some of whom I have given an account of, that came to untimely ends; and that now she was the occasion of my ruin, for she had persuaded me to go on when I would have left off. I interrupted her there. "No, mother, no," said I, "don't speak of that, for you would have had me left off when I got the mercer's money, and when I came home from Harwich, and I would not hearken to you; therefore you have not been to blame; it is I only have ruined myself; I have brought myself to this misery;" and thus we spent many hours together.

Well, there was no remedy; the prosecution went on, and on the Thursday I was carried down to the sessions house, where I was arraigned, as they called it, and the next day I was appointed to be tried. At the arraignment I pleaded "Not guilty," and well I might, for I was indicted for felony and burglary; that is for feloniously stealing two pieces of brocaded silk, value forty-six pounds, the goods of Anthony Johnson, and for breaking open his doors; whereas I knew very well that they could not pretend to prove I had broken the doors, or so much as lifted up the latch.

On the Friday I was brought to my trial. I had exhausted my spirits with crying for two or three days before, that I slept better the Thursday night than I expected, and had more courage for my trial than indeed I thought possible for me to have.

When the trial began, and the indictment was read, I would have spoke, but they told me the witnesses must be heard first, and then I should have time to be heard. The witnesses were the two wenches, a couple of hard-mouthed jades indeed; for the thing was truth in the main, yet they aggravated it to the utmost extremity, and swore I had the goods wholly in my possession; that I had hid them among my clothes; that I was going off with them; that I had one foot over the threshold when they discovered themselves, and then I put the other over; so that I was quite out of the house in the street with the goods before they took hold of me, and then they seized me, and brought me back again, and they took the goods upon me. The fact in general was all true, but I believe, and insisted upon it, that they stopped me before I had set my foot clear of the threshold of the house; but that did not argue much, for certain it was that I had taken the goods, and that I was bringing them away if I had not been taken.

But I had pleaded that I had stole nothing, they had lost nothing, that the door was open, and I went in, seeing the goods lie there, and with design to buy. If, seeing nobody in the house, I had taken any of them up in my hand, it could not be concluded that I intended to steal them, for that I never carried them farther than the door to look on them with the better light.

The court would not allow that by any means, and made a kind of jest of my intending to buy the goods, that being no shop for the selling of anything; and as to carrying them to the door to look at them, the maids made their impudent mocks upon that, and spent their wit upon it very much; told the court I had looked at them sufficiently, and approved them very well, for I had packed them up under my clothes, and was a going off with them.

In short, I was found guilty of felony, but acquitted of the burglary, which was but small comfort to me, the first bringing me to a sentence of death, and the last would have done no more. The next day I was carried down to receive the dreadful sentence, and when they came to ask me what I had to say why sentence should not pass, I stood mute awhile; but somebody that stood behind me prompted me aloud to speak to the judges, for that they could represent things favourably for me. This encouraged me to speak, and I told them I had nothing to say to stop the sentence; but that I had much to say to bespeak the mercy of the court; that I hoped they would allow something in such a case, for the circumstances of it; that I had broken no doors, had carried nothing off, that nobody had lost anything; that the person whose goods they were pleased to say he desired mercy might be shown, which indeed he very honestly did; that at the worst it was the first offence, and that I had never been before any court of justice before; and, in a word, I spoke with more courage than I thought I could have done, and in such a moving tone, and though with tears, yet not with so many tears as to obstruct my speech, that I could see it moved others to tears that heard me.

The judges sat grave and mute, gave me an easy hearing, and time to say all that I would, but saying neither yes nor no to it, pronounced the sentence of death upon me; a sentence that was to me like death itself, which, after it was read, confounded me; I had no more spirits left in me, I had no tongue to speak, or eyes to look up either to God or man.

My poor governess was utterly disconsolate, and she that was my comforter before wanted comfort now herself, and sometimes mourning, sometimes raging, was as much out of herself (as to all outward appearance) as any mad woman in Bedlam. Nor was she only disconsolate as to me, but she was struck with horror at the sense of her own wicked life, and began to look back upon it with a taste quite different from mine, for she was penitent to the highest degree for her sins, as well as sorrowful for the misfortune; she sent for a minister too, a serious, pious, good man, and applied herself with such earnestness, by his assistance, to the work of a sincere repentance, that I believe, and so did the minister too, that she was a true penitent, and which is still more, she was not only so for the occasion, and at that juncture, but she continued so, as I was informed, to the day of her death.

It is rather to be thought of than expressed what was now my condition; I had nothing before me but present death; and as I had no friends to assist me, or to stir for me, I expected nothing but to find my name in the dead warrant which was to come down for the execution the Friday afterwards of five more and myself.

In the meantime my poor distressed governess sent me a minister, who at her request first, and at my own afterwards, came to visit me. He exhorted me seriously to repent of all my sins, and to dally no longer with my soul; not flattering myself with hopes of life, which, he said, he was informed there was no room to expect, but unfeignedly to look up to God with my whole soul, and to cry for pardon in the name of Jesus Christ. He backed his discourses with proper quotations of scripture, encouraging the greatest sinner to repent, and turn from their evil way, and when he had done, he kneeled down and prayed with me.

It was now that for the first time I felt any real signs of repentance; I now began to look back upon my past life with abhorrence, and having a kind of view into the other side of time, the things of life, as I believe they do with everybody at such a time, began to look with a different aspect, and quite another shape, than they did before. The greatest and best things, the views of felicity, the joy, the griefs of life, were quite other things; and I had nothing in my thought but what was so infinitely superior to what I had known in life, that it appeared to me to be the greatest stupidity in nature to lay any weight upon anything, though the most valuable in this world.

The word "eternity" represented itself with all its incomprehensible additions, and I had such extended notions of it, that I know not how to express them. Among the rest, how vile, how gross, how absurd did every pleasant thing look; I mean, that we had accounted pleasant before; especially when I reflected that these sordid trifles were the things for which we forfeited eternal felicity.

With these reflections came in, of mere course, severe reproaches of my own mind for my wretched behaviour in my past life; that I had forfeited all hope of happiness in the eternity that I was just going to enter into, and, on the contrary, was entitled to all that was miserable, or had been conceived of misery; and all this with the frightful addition of its being also eternal.

I am not capable of reading lectures of instruction to anybody, but I relate this in the very manner in which things then appeared to me, as far as I am able, but infinitely short of the lively impressions which they made on my soul at that time; indeed, those impressions are not to be explained by words, or if they are, I am not mistress of words enough to express them. It must be the work of every sober reader to make just reflections on them, as their own circumstances may direct; and, without question, this is what every one, at some time or other, may feel something of; I mean a clearer sight into things to come than they had here, and a dark view of their own concern in them.

But I go back to my own case. The minister pressed me to tell him, as far as I thought convenient, in what state I found myself as to the sight I had of things beyond life; he told me he did not come as ordinary of the place, whose business is to extort confession from prisoners for private ends, or for the farther detecting of other offenders; that his business was to move me to such freedom of discourse as might serve me to disburthen my own mind, and furnish him to administer comfort to me, as far as was in his power; and assured me, that whatever I said to him should remain with him, and be as much a secret as if it was known only to God and myself; and that he desired to know nothing of me but as above, to qualify him to apply proper advice and assistance to me, and to pray to God for me.

This honest, friendly way of treating me unlocked all the sluices of my passions. He broke into my very soul by it, and I unravelled all the wickedness of my life to him. In a word, I gave him an abridgment of this whole history; I gave him the picture of my conduct for fifty years in miniature.

I had nothing from him, and he in return exhorted me to a sincere repentance, explained to me what he meant by repentance; and then drew out such a scheme of infinite mercy, proclaimed from heaven to sinners of the greatest magnitude, that he left me nothing to say that looked like despair or doubting of being accepted, and in this condition he left me the first night.

He visited me again the next morning, and went on with his method of explaining the terms of divine mercy, which, according to him, consisted of nothing more, or more difficult, than that of being sincerely desirous of it, and willing to accept it; only a sincere regret for and hatred of those things I had done, which rendered me so just an object of divine vengeance. I am not able to repeat the excellent discourses of this extraordinary man. It is all I am able to do or say, that he revived my heart, and brought me into such a condition that I never knew anything of in my life before: I was covered with shame and tears for things past, and yet had at the same time a secret surprising joy at the prospect of being a true penitent, and obtaining the comfort of being a true penitent, I mean the hope of being forgiven; and so swift did such thoughts circulate, and so high did the impressions they had made upon me run, that I thought I could freely have gone out that minute to execution without any uneasiness at all, casting my soul entirely into the arms of infinite mercy as a penitent.

The good man was so moved also in my behalf, with a view of the influence which he saw these things had on me, that he blessed God he had come to visit me, and resolved not to leave me till the last moment, that is, not to leave visiting me.

It was no less than twelve days after our receiving sentence before any were ordered for execution, and then upon a Wednesday the dead warrant, as they call it, came down, and I found my name was among them. A terrible blow this was to my new resolutions, indeed my heart sunk within me, and I swooned away twice, one after another, but spoke not a word. The good minister was sorely afflicted for me, and did what he could to comfort me with the same arguments and the same moving eloquence that he did before, and left me not that evening so long as the prison-keepers would suffer him to stay in the prison, unless he would be locked up with me all night, which he was not willing to be.

I wondered much that I did not see him all the next day, it being but the day before the time appointed for execution, and I was greatly discouraged and dejected in my mind, and indeed almost sunk for want of that comfort which he had so often and with such success yielded me on his former visits. I waited with great impatience, and under the greatest oppression of spirits imaginable; till about four o'clock he came to my apartment, for I had obtained the favour by the help of money, nothing being to be done in that place without it, not to be kept in the condemned hole, as they call it, among the rest of the prisoners who were to die, but to have a little dirty chamber to myself.

My heart leaped within me for joy when I heard his voice at the door, even before I saw him; but let any one judge what kind of emotion I found in my soul when, after having made a short excuse for his not coming, he showed me that his time had been employed on my account; that he had obtained a favourable report from the Recorder to the Secretary of State in my particular case, and, in short, that he had brought me a reprieve.

He used all the caution that he was able in letting me know a thing, which it would have been a double cruelty to have concealed, and yet it was too much for me; for as grief had overset me before, so did joy overset me now; and I fell into a much more dangerous swooning than I did at first, and it was not without great difficulty that I was recovered at all.

The good man having made a very christian exhortation to me not to let the joy of my reprieve put the remembrance of my past sorrow out of my mind, and having told me that he must leave me to go and enter the reprieve in the books and show it to the sheriffs, stood up just before his going away and in a very earnest manner prayed to God for me, that my repentance might be made unfeigned and sincere, and that my coming to back, as it were, into life again, might not be a returning to the follies of life, which I had made such solemn resolutions to forsake and to repent of them. I joined heartily in the petition, and must needs say I had deeper impressions upon my mind all that night for the mercy of God in sparing my life, and a greater detestation of my past sins, from a sense of that goodness which I had tasted in this case, than I had in all my sorrow before.

This may be thought inconsistent in itself, and wide from the business of this book particularly. I reflect that many of those who may be pleased and diverted with the relation of the wild and wicked part of my story may not relish this, which is really the best part of my life, the most advantageous to myself, and the most instructive to others; such, however will, I hope, allow me the liberty to make my story complete. It would be a severe satire on such to say they do not relish the repentance as much as they do the crime, and that they had rather the history were a complete tragedy, as it was very likely to have been.

But I will go on with my relation. The next morning there was a sad scene truly in the prison. The first thing I was saluted with in the morning was the tolling of the great bell at St Sepulchre's, as they call it, which ushered in the day. As soon as it began to toll a dismal groaning and crying was heard from the condemned hole, where there lay six poor souls who were to be executed that day, some for one crime, some for another, and two of them for murder.

This was followed by a confused clamour in the house among the several sorts of prisoners, expressing their awkward sorrows for the poor creatures that were to die, but in a manner extremely differing one from another; some cried for them, some huzzaed and wished them a good journey,—some damned and curst those that had brought them to it, that is, meaning the evidence or prosecutors,—many pitying them, and some few, but very few, praying for them.

There was hardly room for so much composition of mind as was required for me to bless the merciful providence that had, as it were, snatched me out of the jaws of this destruction; I remained as it were dumb and silent, overcome with the sense of it, and not able to express what I had in my heart; for the passions on such occasions as these are certainly so agitated as not to be able presently to regulate their own motions.

All the while the poor condemned creatures were preparing to their death, and the Ordinary, as they call him, was busy with them, disposing them to submit to their sentence; I say, all this while I was seized with a fit of trembling as much as I could have been if I had been in the same condition, as to be sure the day before I expected to be. I was so violently agitated by this surprising fit that I shook as if it had been in the cold fit of an ague, so that I could not speak or look but like one distracted. As soon as they were all put into the carts and gone, which, however, I had not courage enough to see,—I say, as soon as they were gone I fell into a fit of crying involuntarily and without design, but as a mere distemper, and yet so violently, and it held me so long, that I knew not what course to take, nor could I stop or put a check to it, no, not with all the strength and courage I had.

This fit of crying held me near two hours, and as I believe, till they were all out of this world, and then a most humble, penitent, serious kind of joy succeeded; a real transport it was, or passion of joy and thankfulness, but still unable to give vent to it by words, and in this I continued most part of the day.

In the evening the good minister visited me again, and then fell to his usual good discourses. He congratulated my having a space yet allowed me for repentance, whereas the state of those six poor creatures was determined, and they were now past the offers of salvation; he earnestly pressed me to retain the same sentiments of the things of life that I had when I had a view of eternity; and at the end of all told me I should not conclude that all was over—that a reprieve was not a pardon—that he could not yet answer for the effects of it; however, I had this mercy, that I had more time given me, and that it was my business to improve that time.

This discourse, though very seasonable, left a kind of sadness on my heart, as if I might expect the affair would have a tragical issue still, which, however, he had no certainty of, and I did not, indeed, at that time question him about it, he having said that he would do his utmost to bring it to a good end, and that he hoped he might, but he would not have me secure; and the consequence proved that he had reason for what he said.

It was about a fortnight after this that I had some just apprehensions that I should be included in the next dead warrant at the ensuing sessions; and it was not without great difficulty, and last an humble petition for transportation, that I avoided it, so ill was I beholding to fame, and so prevailing was the fatal report of being an old offender, though in that they did not do me strict justice, for I was not in the sense of the law an old offender, whatever I was in the eye of the judge; for I had never been before them in a judicial way before, so the judges could not charge me with being an old offender, but the recorder was pleased to represent my case as he thought fit.

I had now a certainty of life indeed; but with the hard conditions of being ordered for transportation, which indeed was a hard condition in itself, but not when comparatively considered; and therefore I shall make no comments upon the sentence, nor upon the choice I was put to; we shall all choose anything rather than death, especially when it is attended with an uncomfortable prospect beyond it, which was my case.

The good minister whose interest, though a stranger to me, had obtained me the reprieve, mourned sincerely for this part; he was in hopes, he said, that I should have ended my days under the influence of good instruction, that I might not have forgot my former distresses, and that I should not have been turned loose again among such a wretched crew as they generally are who are thus sent abroad; where, as he said, I must have more than ordinary secret assistance from the grace of God, if I did not turn as wicked again as ever.

I had not for a good while mentioned my governess, who had been dangerously sick, and being in as near a view of death by her disease as I was by my sentence, was a very great penitent. I say I have not mentioned her, nor, indeed, did I see her in all this time; but being now recovering, and just able to come abroad, she came to see me.

I told her my condition, and what a different flux and reflux of fears and hopes I had been agitated with. I told her what I had escaped, and upon what terms, and she was present when the minister expressed his fears of my relapsing again into wickedness; upon my falling into the wretched company that are generally transported. Indeed, I had a melancholy reflection upon it in my own mind, for I knew what a dreadful gang was always sent away together, and said to my governess that the good minister's fears were not without cause. "Well, well," says she, "but I hope you will not be tempted with so horrid example as that;" and as soon as the minister was gone she told me she would not have me discovered, for, perhaps, ways and means might be found to dispose of me in a particular way by myself, of which she would talk to me afterwards.

I looked earnestly at her, and thought she looked more cheerful than she usually had done, and I entertained immediately a thousand notions of being delivered, but could not, for my life, imagine the methods, or think of one that was feasible. But I was too much concerned in it to let her go from me without explaining herself, which, though she was very loath to do, yet, as I was still pressing, she answered me in a few words thus:—"Why, you have money, have you not? Did you ever know one in your life that was transported, and had a hundred pound in his pocket? I'll warrant ye, child," says she—

I understood her presently, but told her I saw no room to hope for anything but a strict execution of the order; and as it was a severity that was esteemed a mercy, there was no doubt but it would be strictly observed. She said no more than this—"We will try what can be done," and so we parted.

I lay in the prison for fifteen weeks after this order for transportation was signed. What the reason of it was I know not; but at the end of this time I was put on board of a ship in the Thames, and with me a gang of thirteen as hardened vile creatures as ever Newgate produced in my time; and it would really well take up a history longer than mine to describe the degrees of impudence and audacious villainy that those thirteen were arrived to, and the manner of their behaviour on the voyage, of which I have a very diverting account by me, which the captain of the ship who carried them over gave me the minutes of, and which he caused his mate to write down at large.

It may, perhaps, be thought trifling to enter here into a relation of all the little incidents which attended me in this interval of my circumstances; I mean between the final order for my transportation and the time of my going on board the ship, and I am too near the end of my story to allow room for it; but something relating to me and my Lancashire husband I must not omit.

He had, as I have observed already, been carried from the master's side of the ordinary prison into the press-yard with three of his comrades, for they found another to add to them after some time. Here, for what reason I know not, they were kept in custody without being brought to trial almost three months. It seems they found means to bribe or buy off some of those who were expected to come in against them, and they wanted evidence some time to convict them. After some puzzle on this account, at first they made shift to get proof enough against two of them to carry them off; but the other two, of which my Lancashire husband was one, lay still in suspense. They had, I think, one positive evidence against each of them; but the law strictly obliging them to have two witnesses, they could make nothing of it; yet it seems they were resolved not to part with the men neither, not doubting but a farther evidence would at last come in; and in order to this, I believe publication was made that such prisoners being taken, any one who had been robbed by them might come to the prison and see them.

I took this opportunity to satisfy my curiosity, pretending that I had been robbed in the Dunstable coach, and that I would go to see the two highwaymen; but when I came into the press-yard I so disguised myself, and muffled my face up so, that he could see little of me, and consequently knew nothing of who I was; and when I came back I said publicly that I knew them very well.

Immediately it was rumoured all over the prison that Moll Flanders would turn evidence against one of the highwaymen, and that I was to come off by it from the sentence of transportation.

They heard of it, and immediately my husband desired to see this Mrs Flanders, that knew him so well and was to be an evidence against him, and accordingly I had leave given to go to him

I dressed myself up as well as the best clothes that I suffered myself ever to appear in there would allow me, and went to the press-yard, but had for some time a hood over my face. He said little to me at first, but asked me if I knew him. I told him, "Yes, very well;" but as I concealed my face, so I counterfeited my voice, that he had not the least guess at who I was.

He asked me where I had seen him; I told him between Dunstable and Brickill; but turning to the keeper that stood by, I asked him if I might be admitted to talk with him alone. "Yes, yes, as much as I pleased," and so very civilly withdrew.

As soon as he was gone, and I had shut the door, I threw off my hood, and bursting out into tears, "My dear," says I, "do you not know me?"

He turned pale and stood speechless, like one thunder-struck, and not able to conquer the surprise, said no more but this, "Let me sit down;" and sitting down by a table, he laid his elbow upon it, and leaning his head on his hand, fixed his eyes on the ground as one stupid.

I cried so vehemently on the other hand, that it was a good while ere I could speak any more; but after I had given some vent to my passion by tears, I repeated the same words, "My dear, do you not know me?"

At which he answered "Yes," and said no more a good while.

After some time continuing in the surprise, as above, he cast up his eyes towards me and said, "How could you be so cruel?"

I did not readily understand what he meant: and I answered, "How can you call me cruel? What have I been cruel to you in?"

"To come to me," says he, "in such a place as this, is it not to insult me? I have not robbed you, at least not on the highway."

I perceived by this that he knew nothing of the miserable circumstances I was in, and thought that, having got some intelligence of his being there, I had come to upbraid him with his leaving me; but I had too much to say to him to be affronted, and told him in a few words, that I was far from coming to insult him, but at best I came to condole mutually; that he would be easily satisfied that I had no such view, when I should tell him that my condition was worse than his, and that many ways.

He looked a little concerned at the general expression of my condition being worse than his; but with a kind of smile, looked a little wildly, and said, "How can that be? When you see me fettered, and in Newgate, and two of my companions executed already, can you say your condition is worse than mine?"

"Come, my dear," says I; "we have a long piece of work to do, if I should begin to relate, or you to hear, my unfortunate history: but if you are disposed to hear it, you will soon conclude with me that my condition is worse than yours."

"How is that possible," says he again, "when expect to be cast for my life the very next sessions?"

"Yes," says I, "it is very possible; when I shall tell you that I have been cast for my life three sessions ago, and am now under sentence of death, is not my case worse than yours?"

Then indeed he stood silent again, like one struck dumb, and after a little while he starts up. "Unhappy couple!" says he, "how can this be possible?"

I took him by the hand. "Come, my dear," said I, "sit down, and let us compare our sorrows: I am a prisoner in this very house, and in a much worse circumstance than you, and you will be satisfied I do not come to insult you, when I tell you the particulars." And with this we sat down together, and I told him so much of my story as I thought was convenient, bringing it at last to my being reduced to great poverty, and representing myself as fallen into some company that led me to relieve my distresses by a way that I had been utterly unacquainted with, and that they making an attempt at a tradesman's house, I was seized upon for having been but just at the door, the maid-servant pulling me in; that I neither had broke any lock, or taken anything away, and notwithstanding that, I was brought in guilty and sentenced to die; but that the judges having been made sensible of the hardship of my circumstances, had obtained leave to remit the sentence, upon my consenting to be transported.

I told him I fared worse for being taken in the prison for one Moll Flanders, who was a famous successful thief, that all of them had heard of, but none of them had ever seen. But that, as he knew well, was none of my name; but I placed all to the account of my ill-fortune, and that under this name I was dealt with as an old offender, though this was the first thing they had ever known of me. I gave him a long particular account of things that had befallen me since I saw him; but I told him I had seen him since he might think I had, and then gave him an account how I had seen him at Brickill; how furiously he was pursued, and how by giving an account that I knew him, and that he was a very honest gentleman, one Mr —, the hue-and-cry was stopped, and the high constable went back again.

He listened most attentively to all my story, and smiled at most of the particulars, being all of them petty matters, and infinitely below what he had been at the head of; but when I came to the story of Little Brickill, he was surprised. "And was it you, my dear," said he, "that gave the check to the mob that was at our heels there at Brickill?" — "Yes," said I, "it was I indeed; and then I told him the particulars which I had observed of him there." — "Why, then," said he, "it was you that saved my life at that time, and I am glad I owe my life to you, for I will pay the debt to you now, and I'll deliver you from the present condition you are in, or I will die in the attempt."

I told him by no means; it was a risk too great, not worth his running the hazard of, and for a life not worth his saving. — "It was no matter for that," he said; "it was a life worth all the world to him; a life that had given him a new life; for," says he, "I was never in real danger of being taken, but that time, till the last minute when I was taken." Indeed he told me his danger then lay in his believing he had not been pursued that way; for they had gone off from Hockly quite another way, and had come over the inclosed country into Brickill, not by the road, and were sure they had not been seen by anybody.

Here he gave a long history of his life, which indeed would make a very strange history, and be infinitely diverting. He told me he took to the road about twelve years before he married me; that the woman which called him brother was not really his sister, or any kin to him, but one that belonged to their gang, and who, keeping correspondence with them, lived always in town, having good store of acquaintance; that she gave them perfect intelligence of persons going out of town, and that they had made several good booties by her correspondence; that she thought she had fixed a fortune for him when she brought me to him, but happened to be disappointed, which he really could not blame her for. That if it had been his good luck that I had had the estate, which she was informed I had, he had resolved to leave off the road, and live a retired sober life, but never to appear in public till some general pardon had been passed, or till he could for money have got his name into some particular pardon, that so he might have been perfectly easy, but that as it had proved otherwise he was obliged to put off his equipage, and take up the old trade again.

He gave me a long account of some of his adventures, and particularly one when he robbed the West Chester coaches, near Lichfield, when he got a very great booty; and after that, how he robbed five graziers in the West, going to Burford fair, in Wiltshire, to buy sheep; he told me he got so much money on those two occasions that if he had known where to have found me he would certainly have embraced my proposal of going with me to Virginia, or to have settled in a plantation on some other parts of the English colonies in America.

He told me he wrote two or three letters to me, directed according to my order, but heard nothing from me. This I indeed knew to be true; but the letters coming to my hand in the time of my latter husband, I could do nothing in it, and therefore chose to give no answer, that so he might rather believe they had miscarried.

Being thus disappointed, he said, he carried on the whole trade ever since; though when he had gotten so much money, he said, he did not run such desperate risks as he did before. Then he gave me some account of several hard and desperate encounters which he had with gentlemen on the road, who parted too hardly with their money, and showed me some wounds he had received; and he had one or two terrible wounds indeed, particularly one by a pistol bullet, which broke his arm, and another with a sword, which run him quite through the body, but that missing his vitals he was cured again. One of his comrades having kept with him so faithfully and so friendly as that he assisted him in riding near eighty miles before his arm was set, and then got a surgeon in a considerable city, remote from the place where it was done, pretending they were gentlemen travelling towards Carlisle; that they had been attacked on the road by highwaymen, and that one of them had shot him in the arm.

This he said his friend managed so well that they were not suspected, but lay still till he was cured. He gave me also so many distinct accounts of his adventures that it is with great reluctance that I decline the relating them. But this is my own story, not his.

I then inquired into the circumstances of his present case at that time, and what it was he expected when he came to be tried; he told me that they had no evidence against him, or but very little, for that of the three robberies which they were all charged with it was his good fortune that he was but in one of them, and that there was but one witness to be had for that fact, which was not sufficient; but that it was expected some other would come in against him; that he thought, indeed, when he first saw me, I had been one that came of that errand; but that if nobody came in against him he hoped he should be cleared; that he had had some intimation that if he would submit to transport himself he might be admitted to it without a trial, but that he could not think of it with any temper, and thought he could much easier submit to be hanged.

I blamed him for that, and told him I blamed him on two accounts; first, because, if he was transported, there might be an hundred ways for him, that was a gentleman, and a bold enterprising man, to find his way back again, and perhaps some ways and means to come back before he went. He smiled at that part, and said he should like the last the best of the two, for he had a kind of horror upon his mind at his being sent over to the plantations, as the Romans sent condemned slaves to work in the mines; that he thought the passage into another state, let it be what it would, much more tolerable at the gallows, and that this was the general notion of all the gentlemen who were driven by the exigence of their fortunes to take the road; that at the place of execution there was at least an end of all the miseries of the present state; and, as for what was to follow, a man was, in his opinion, as likely to repent sincerely in the last fortnight of his life under the pressures and agonies of a jail, and the condemned hole, as he would ever be in the woods and wilderness of America; that servitude and hard labour were things gentlemen could never stoop to; that it was but the way to force them to be their own executioners afterwards, which was much worse; and that therefore he could not have any patience when he did but think of being transported.

I used the utmost of my endeavour to persuade him, and joined that known woman's rhetoric to it—I mean that of tears. I told him the infamy of a public execution was certainly a greater pressure upon the spirits of a gentleman than all the mortifications that he could meet with abroad could be; that he had at least in the other a chance for his life, whereas here he had none at all; that it was the easiest thing in the world for him to manage the captain of the ship, who were, generally speaking, men of good humour, and some gallantry; and a small matter of conduct, especially if there was any money to be had, would make way for him to buy himself off, when he came to Virginia.

He looked wishfully at me, and I thought I guessed at what he meant, that is to say, that he had no money; but I was mistaken, his meaning was another way.

"You hinted just now, my dear," said he, "that there might be a way of coming back before I went; by which I understand you, that it might be possible to buy it off here. I had rather give 200*l.* to prevent going, than 100*l.* to be set at liberty when I came there."

"That is, my dear," said I, "because you do not know the place as I do."

"That may be," said he, "and yet I believe, as well as you know it, you would do the same, unless it is because, as you told me, you have a mother there."

I told him as to my mother she must be dead many years before; and as for my other relations that I might have there, I knew them not. That since my misfortunes had reduced me to the condition I had been in for some years, I had not kept up any correspondence with them, and that he would easily believe I should find but a cold reception from them if I should be put to make my first visit in the condition of a transported felon; that, therefore, if I went thither, I resolved not to see them, but that I had many views in going there, which took off all the uneasy part of it; and if he found himself obliged to go also, I should easily instruct him how to manage himself so as never to go a servant at all, especially since I found he was not destitute of money, which was the only friend in such a condition. He smiled, and said he did not tell me he had money. I took him up short, and told him I hoped he did not understand by my speaking that I should expect any supply from him if he had money; that on the other hand, though I had not a great deal, yet I did not want, and while I had any I would rather add to him than weaken him, seeing whatever he had I knew in the case of transportation he would have occasion for it all.

He expressed himself in a most tender manner upon that head. He told me what money he had was not a great deal, but that he would never hide any of it from me if I wanted it, and assured me he did not speak with any such apprehensions; that he was only intent upon what I had hinted to him; that here he knew what to do, but there he should be the most helpless wretch alive.

I told him he frightened and terrified himself with that which had no terror in it; that if he had money, as I was glad to hear he had, he might not only avoid the servitude supposed to be the consequence of transportation, but begin the world upon a new foundation, and that such a one as he could not fail of success in, with but the common application usual in such cases; that he could not but call to mind that it was what I had recommended to him many years before, and had proposed it for our mutual subsistence, and restoring our fortunes in the world; and I would tell him now, that to convince him both of the certainty of it, and of being fully acquainted of the method, and also fully satisfied in the probability of success, he should first see me deliver myself from the necessity of going over at all, and then that I would go with him freely and of my own choice, and perhaps carry enough with me to satisfy him that I did not offer it for want of being able to live without assistance from him; but that I thought our mutual misfortunes had been such as were sufficient to reconcile us both to quitting this part of the world, and living where nobody could upbraid us with what was past, or we being in any dread of a prison, and without the agonies of a condemned hole to drive us to it; where we should look back on all our past disasters with infinite satisfaction, when we should consider that our enemies should entirely forget us, and that we should live as new people in a new world, nobody having anything to say to us, or we to them.

I pressed this home to him with so many arguments, and answered all his own passionate objections so effectually, that he embraced me, and told me that I treated him with such sincerity and affection as overcame him; that he would take my advice, and would strive to submit to his fate, in hope of having the comfort of my assistance, and of so faithful a counsellor, and such a companion in his misery; but still he put me in mind of what I had mentioned before, namely, that there might be some way to get off before he went, and that it might be possible to avoid going at all, which he said would be much better. I told him he should see, and be fully satisfied that I would do my utmost in that part too, and if it did not succeed, yet that I would make good the rest.

We parted, after this long conference, with such testimonies of kindness and affection as I thought were equal if not superior to that at our parting at Dunstable. And now I saw more plainly than before the reason why he declined coming at that time any farther with me towards London than Dunstable, and why when we parted there he told me it was not convenient for him to come any farther towards London, as he would otherwise have done.

I have observed that the account of his life, would have been made a much more pleasing history than this of mine; and indeed nothing in it was more strange than this part, viz. that he had carried on that desperate trade full-five-and-twenty years, and had never been taken; the success he had met with had been so very uncommon, and such, that sometimes he had lived handsomely and retired in one place for a year or two at a time, keeping himself and a man-servant to wait on him, and has often sat in the coffee houses, and heard the very people whom he had robbed give accounts of their being robbed, and of the places and circumstances, so that he could easily remember that it was the same.

In this manner it seems he lived near Liverpool at the time he unluckily married me for a fortune. Had I been the fortune he expected, I verily believe, as he said, that he would have taken up and lived honestly all his days.

He had, with the rest of his misfortunes, the good luck not to be actually upon the spot, when the robbery was done which they were committed for; and so none of the persons robbed could swear to him, or had anything to charge upon him; but it seems, as he was taken with the gang, one hard-mouthed countryman swore home to him; and they were like to have others come in according to the publication they had made, so that they expected more evidence against him, and for that reason he was kept in hold.

However, the offer which was made to him of admitting him to transportation was made, as I understood, upon the intercession of some great person who pressed him hard to accept of it before a trial; and indeed, as he knew there were several that might come in against him, I thought his friend was in the right, and I lay at him night and day to delay it no longer.

At last, with much difficulty, he gave his consent, and as he was not therefore admitted to transportation in court, and on his petition as I was, so he found himself under a difficulty to avoid embarking himself, as I had said he might have done; his great friend, who was his intercessor for the favour of that grant, having given security for him that he should transport himself, and not return within the term.

This hardship broke all my measures, for the steps I took afterwards for my own deliverance were hereby rendered wholly ineffectual, unless I would abandon him, and let him go to America by himself; than which he protested he would much rather venture, although he was certain to go directly to the gallows.

I must now return to my own case. The time of my being transported according to my sentence was near at hand. My governess, who continued my fast friend, had tried to obtain a pardon, but it could not be done unless with an expense too heavy for my purse; considering that to be left naked and empty, unless I had resolved to return to my old trade again, had been worse than my transportation, because there I knew I could live, here I could not. The good minister stood very hard on another account to prevent my being transported also; but he was answered, that indeed my life had been given me at his first solicitations, and therefore he ought to ask no more. He was sensibly grieved at my going, because, as he said, he feared I should lose the good impressions which a prospect of death had at first made on me, and which were since increased by his instructions; and the pious gentleman was exceedingly concerned about me on that account.

On the other hand, I really was not so solicitous about it, as I was before, but I industriously concealed my reasons for it from the minister, and to the last he did not know but that I went with the utmost reluctance and affliction.

It was in the month of February that I was, with seven other convicts, as they called us, delivered to a merchant that traded to Virginia, on board a ship, riding, as they called it, in Deptford reach. The officer of the prison delivered us on board, and the master of the vessel gave a discharge for us.

We were for that night clapped under hatches, and kept so close, that I thought I should have been suffocated for want of air, and the next morning the ship weighed, and fell down the river to a place they call Bugby's Hole; which was done, as they told us, by the agreement of the merchant, that all opportunity of escape should be taken from us. However, when the ship came thither, and cast anchor, we were allowed more liberty, and particularly were permitted to come upon the deck, but not upon the quarter deck, that being kept particularly for the captain, and for passengers.

When by the noise of the men over my head, and the motion of the ship, I perceived that they were under sail, I was at first greatly surprised, fearing we should go away directly, and that our friends would not be admitted to see us anymore; but I was easy soon after when I found they had come to anchor again, and soon after that we had notice given by some of the men where we were, that the next morning we should have the liberty to come upon deck, and to have our friends come and see us, if we had any.

All that night I lay upon the hard boards of the deck, as the other prisoners did, but we afterwards had the liberty of little cabins for such of us as had any bedding to lay in them; and room to stow any box or trunk for clothes and linen, if we had it, (which might well be put in) for some of them had neither shirt or shift, or a rag of linen or woollen, but what was on their backs, or a farthing of money to help themselves; and yet I did not find but they fared well enough in the ship, especially the women, who got money of the seamen for washing their clothes sufficient to purchase any common things that they wanted.

When the next morning we had liberty to come upon the deck, I asked one of the officers of the ship whether I might not have the liberty to send a letter on shore, to let my friends know where the ship lay, and to get some necessary things sent to me. This was, it seems, the boatswain, a very civil, courteous sort of a man, who told me I should have that or any other liberty that I desired, that he could allow me with safety. I told him I desired no other; and he answered that the ship's boat would go up to London the next tide, and he would order my letter to be carried.

Accordingly, when the boat went off, the boatswain came to me, and told me the boat was going off, and that he went in it himself, and asked me if my letter was ready; he would take care of it. I had prepared myself, you may be sure, pen, ink, and paper beforehand, and I had gotten a letter ready directed to my governess, and enclosed another for my fellow-prisoner, which, however, I did not let her know was my husband, not to the last. In that to my governess I let her know where the ship lay, and pressed her earnestly to send me what things I knew she had got ready for me for my voyage.

When I gave the boatswain the letter I gave him a shilling with it, which I told him was for the charge of a messenger or porter, which I entreated him to send with the letter as soon as he came on shore, that if possible I might have an answer brought back by the same hand, that I might know what was become of my things, "For, sir," says I, "if the ship should go away before I have them on board, I am undone."

I took care, when I gave him the shilling, to let him see that I had a little better furniture about me than the ordinary prisoners, for he saw that I had a purse, and in it a pretty deal of money, and I found that the very sight of it immediately furnished me with very different treatment from what I should otherwise have met with in the ship; for though he was very courteous indeed before, in a kind of natural compassion to me, as a woman in distress, yet he was more than ordinarily so afterwards, and procured me to be better treated in the ship than, I say, I might otherwise have been, as shall appear in its place.

He very honestly had my letter delivered to my governess's own hands, and brought me back an answer from her in writing, and when he gave me the answer gave me the shilling again, "There," says he, "there's your shilling again too, for I delivered the letter myself."

I could not tell what to say, I was so surprised at the thing; but after some pause I said, "Sir, you are too kind; it had been but reasonable that you had paid yourself coach-hire then."

"No, no," says he, "I am overpaid. What, is the gentlewoman your sister?"

"No sir," said I, "she is no relation to me, but she is a dear friend, and the only friend I have in the world."

"Well," says he, "there are few such friends in the world. Why, she cries after you like a child."

"Aye," says I again, "she would give a hundred pounds, I believe, to deliver me from this dreadful condition I am in."

"Would she so?" says he; "for half the money, I believe, I could put you in a way how to deliver yourself." But this he spoke softly that nobody could hear.

"Alas! sir," said I, "but then that must be such a deliverance as, if I should be taken again, would cost me my life."

"Nay," said he, "if you were once out of the ship you must look to yourself afterwards, that I can say nothing to;" so we dropped the discourse for that time.

In the mean time my governess, faithful to the last moment, conveyed my letter to the prison to my husband, and got an answer to it, and the next day came down herself to the ship, bringing me in the first place a sea-bed, as they call it, and all its furniture, such as was convenient, but not to let the people think it was extraordinary. She brought with her a sea-chest; that is a chest such as are made for seamen, with all the conveniences in it, and filled with everything almost that I could want; and in one of the corners of the chest, where there was a private drawer, was my bank of money, that is to say, so much of it as I had resolved to carry with me; for I ordered a part of my stock to be left behind me to be sent afterwards in such goods as I should want when I came to settle; for money in that country is not of much use where all things are bought for tobacco, much more it is a great loss to carry it from hence.

But my case was particular; it was by no means proper to me to go thither without money or goods, and for a poor convict that was to be sold as soon as I came on shore, to carry with me a cargo of goods would be to have notice taken of it, and perhaps to have them seized by the public; so I took part of my stock with me thus, and left the other part with my governess.

My governess now brought me a great many other things, but it was not proper for me to look too well provided in the ship till I knew what kind of a captain we should have. When she came into the ship, I thought she would have died indeed, her heart sunk at the sight of me, and at the thoughts of parting with me in that condition, and she cried so intolerably I could not for a long time have any talk with her.

I took that time to read my fellow-prisoner's letter, which however greatly perplexed me. He told me he was determined to go, but found it would be impossible for him to be discharged time enough for going in the same ship, and which was more than all, he began to question whether they would give him leave to go in what ship he pleased, though he did voluntarily transport himself; but that they would see him put on board such a ship as they should direct, and, that he would be charged upon the captain as other convict prisoners were; so that he began to be in despair of seeing me till he came to Virginia, which made him almost desperate, seeing that, on the other hand, if I should be there, if any accident of the sea, or of mortality should take me away, he should be the most undone creature there in the world.

This was very perplexing, and I knew not what course to take. I told my governess the story of the boatswain, and she was mighty eager with me to treat with him; but I had no mind to it, till I heard whether my husband, or fellow-prisoner, so she called him, could be at liberty to go with me or no. At last I was forced to let her into the whole matter, except only that of his being my husband. I told her I had made a positive bargain or agreement with him to go if he could get the liberty of going in the same ship, and that I found he had money.

Then I read a long lecture to her of what I proposed to do when I came there; how we could plant, settle, and in short, grow rich without any more adventures; and, as a great secret, I told her that we were to marry as soon as he came on board.

She soon agreed cheerfully to my going when she heard this, and she made it her business from that time to get him out of the prison in time so that he might go in the same ship with me, which at last was brought to pass, though with great difficulty, and not without all the forms of a transported prisoner convict, which he really was not yet, for he had not been tried, and which was a great mortification to him. As our fate was now determined, and we were both on board, actually bound to Virginia, in the despicable quality of transported convicts, destined to be sold for slaves, I for five years, and he under bonds and security not to return to England any more as long as he lived, he was very much dejected and cast down; the mortification of being brought on board, as he was, like a prisoner, piqued him very much, since it was first told him he should transport himself, and so that he might go as a gentleman at liberty. It is true, he was not ordered to be sold when he came there, as we were, and for that reason he was obliged to pay for his passage to the captain, which we were not; as to the rest he was as much at a loss as a child what to do with himself, or with what he had, but by directions.

In this condition I lay for three weeks in the ship, not knowing whether I should have my husband with me or no; and therefore not resolving how, or in what manner, to receive the honest boatswain's proposal, which indeed he thought a little strange at first. At the end of this time behold my husband came on board; he looked with a dejected, angry, countenance; his great heart was swelled with rage and disdain; to be dragged along with three keepers of Newgate, and put on board like a convict, when he had not so much as been brought to a trial. He made loud complaints of it by his friends, for it seems he had some interest; but his friends got some check in their application, and were told he had had favour enough, and that they had received such accounts of him since the last grant of his transportation, that he ought to think himself very well treated that he was not prosecuted anew. This answer quieted him at once, for he knew too much what might have happened, and what he had room to expect. And now he saw the goodness of the advice to him, which prevailed with him to accept of the offer of a voluntary transportation; and after his chagrin at these hell-hounds, as he called them, was a little over, he looked a little composed, began to be cheerful, and as I was telling him how glad I was to have him once more out of their hands, took me in his arms, and acknowledged with great tenderness that I had given him the best advice possible. "My dear," says he, "thou hast twice saved my life, from henceforward it shall be all employed for you, and I will always take your advice."

Our first business was to compare our stock. He was very honest to me, and told me his stock was pretty good when he came to the prison, but the living there as he did in a figure like a gentleman, and which was ten times as much, the making of friends, and soliciting his case, had been very expensive; and in a word, all his stock that he had left was an hundred and eight pounds, which he had about him all in gold.

I gave him an account of my stock as faithfully, that is to say, of what I had taken to carry with me; for I was resolved, whatever should happen, to keep what I had left with my governess in reserve, that in case I should die what I had with me was enough to give him, and that which was left in my governess's hands would be her own, which she had well deserved of me indeed.

My stock which I had with me was two hundred and forty-six pounds, some odd shillings; so that we had three hundred and fifty-four pounds between us. But a worse gotten estate was scarce ever put together to begin the world with.

Our greatest misfortune as to our stock was that it was all in money, which every one knows is an unprofitable cargo to be carried to the plantations. I believe his was really all he had left in the world; as he told me it was; but I, who had between seven and eight hundred pounds in the bank when this disaster befel me, and who had one of the faithfulest friends in the world to manage it for me, considering she was a woman of no manner of religious principles, had still three hundred pounds left in her hand, which I reserved, as above. Besides, I had some very valuable things with me, as particularly two gold watches, some small pieces of plate, and some rings—all stolen goods. With this fortune, and in the sixty-first year of my age, I launched out into a new world, as I may call it, in the condition (as to what appeared) only of a poor naked convict, ordered to be transported in respite from the gallows; my clothes were poor and mean, but not ragged or dirty, and none knew in the whole ship that I had anything of value about me.

However, as I had a great many good clothes, and linen in abundance, which I had ordered to be packed up in two great boxes, I had them shipped on board, not as my goods, but as consigned to my real name in Virginia; and had the bills of lading signed by a captain in my pocket, and in these boxes was my plate and watches, and everything of value, except my money, which I kept by itself in a private drawer in my chest, and which could not be found, or opened if found, without splitting the chest to pieces.

The ship began now to fill, several passengers came on board, who were embarked on no criminal account, and these had accommodations assigned them in the great cabin, and other parts of the ship, whereas we, as convicts, were thrust down below I know not where. But when my husband came on board I spoke to the boatswain who had so early given me hints of his friendship in carrying my letter; I told him he had befriended me in many things, and I had not made any suitable return to him, and with that I put a guinea into his hand. I told him that my husband was now come on board, that though we were both under the present misfortunes, yet we had been persons of a different character from that wretched crew that we came with, and desired to know of him whether the captain might not be moved to admit us to some conveniences in the ship, for which we would make him what satisfaction he pleased, and that we would gratify him for his pains in procuring this for us. He took the guinea, as I could see, with great satisfaction, and assured me of his assistance.

Then he told us he did not doubt but that the captain, who was one of the best humoured gentlemen in the world, would be easily brought to accommodate us as well as we could desire, and to make me easy told me he would go up the next tide on purpose to speak to the captain about it.

The next morning, happening to sleep a little longer than ordinary, when I got up and began to look abroad, I saw the boatswain among the men in his ordinary business. I was a little melancholy at seeing him there, and going forwards to speak to him he saw me, and came towards me, but not giving him time to speak first, I said, smiling, "I doubt, sir, you have forgotten us, for I see you are very busy."

He returned presently, "Come along with me, and you shall see;" so he took me into the great cabin, and there sat a good sort of a gentleman writing, and with a great many papers before him.

"Here," says the boatswain to him that was writing, "is the gentlewoman that the captain spoke to you of," and turning to me he said, "I have been so far from forgetting your business that I have been up at the captain's house, and have represented faithfully to the captain what you said relating to your being furnished with better convenience for yourself and your husband; and the captain has sent this gentleman, who is mate of the ship, down with me, on purpose to show you everything, and to accommodate you fully to your content, and bid me assure you that you shall not be treated like what you were at first expected to be, but with the same respect as other passengers are treated."

The mate then spoke to me, and not giving me time to thank the boatswain for his kindness, confirmed what the boatswain had said, and added that it was the captain's delight to show himself kind and charitable, especially to those who were under any misfortunes, and with that he showed me several cabins built up, some in the great cabin, and some partitioned off, out of the steerage, but opening into the great cabin on purpose for the accommodation of passengers, and gave me leave to choose where I would. However, I chose a cabin which opened into the steerage, in which were very good conveniences to set our chest and boxes, and a table to eat on.

The mate then told me that the boatswain had given so good a character of me and of my husband, as to our civil behaviour, that he had orders to tell me that we should eat with him, if we thought fit, during the whole voyage, on the common terms of passengers; that we might lay in some fresh provisions if we pleased; or if not, he should lay in his usual store, and we should have share with him.

This was very reviving news to me, after so many hardships and afflictions as I had gone through of late. I thanked him, and told him the captain should make his own terms with us, and asked his leave to go and tell my husband of it, who was not very well, and was not yet out of his cabin. Accordingly I went, and my husband, whose spirits were still so much sunk with the indignity (as he understood it) offered him, that he was scarce yet himself, was so revived with the account I gave him of the reception we were likely to have in the ship, that he was quite another man, and new vigour and courage appeared in his very countenance. So true is it that the greatest of spirits, when overwhelmed by their afflictions, are subject to the greatest dejections, and are the most apt to despair and give themselves up.

After some little pause to recover himself, my husband came up with me, and gave the mate thanks for the kindness which he had expressed to us, and sent suitable acknowledgment by him to the captain, offering to pay him by advance whatever he demanded for our passage, and for the conveniences he had helped us to.

The mate told him the captain would be on board in the afternoon, and that he would leave all that till he came. Accordingly, in the afternoon, the captain came, and we found him the same courteous, obliging man, that the boatswain had represented him to be; and he was so well pleased with my husband's conversation, that in short he would not let us keep the cabin we had chosen, but gave us one that, as I said before, opened into the great cabin.

Nor were his conditions exorbitant, or the man craving and eager to make a prey of us, but for fifteen guineas we had our whole passage and provisions, and cabin, eat at the captain's table, and were very handsomely entertained.

The captain lay himself in the other part of the great cabin, having let his round house, as they call it, to a rich planter, who went over, with his wife and three children, who eat by themselves. He had some other ordinary passengers, who quartered in the steerage; and as for the old fraternity, they were kept under the hatches while the ship lay there, and came very little on the deck.

I could not refrain acquainting my governess with what had happened; it was but just that she, who was so really concerned for me, should have part of my good fortune. Besides, I wanted her assistance to supply me with several necessities, which, before, I was shy of letting any body see me have, that it might not be public; but now I had a cabin, and room to set things in, I ordered abundance of good things for our comfort in the voyage, as brandy, sugar, lemons, &c. to make punch, and treat our benefactor the captain; and abundance of things for eating and drinking on the voyage; also a larger bed, and bedding proportioned to it; so that, in a word, we resolved to want nothing on the voyage.

All this while I had provided nothing for our assistance when she should come to the place, and begin to call ourselves planters, and I was far from being ignorant of what was needful on that occasion; particularly all sorts of tools for the planter's work, and for building, and all kind of furniture for our dwelling, which, if it be bought in the country, must necessarily cost there double the price.

So I discoursed that point with my governess, and she went and waited upon the captain, and told him that she hoped ways might be found out for her two unfortunate cousins, as she called us, to obtain our freedom, when we came into the country, and so entered into a discourse with him about the means and terms also, of which I shall say more in its place; and after thus sounding the captain, she let him know, though we were unhappy in the circumstances that occasioned our going, yet that we were not unfurnished to set ourselves to work in the country; and we resolved to settle and live there as planters, if we might be put in a way how to do it. The captain readily offered his assistance, told her the method of entering upon such a business, and how easy, nay, how certain it was for industrious people to recover their fortunes in such a manner. "Madam," says he, "'tis no reproach to any man in that country to have been sent over in worse circumstances than I perceive your cousins are in, provided they do but apply with diligence and good judgment to the business of that place when they come there."

She then inquired of him what things it was necessary we should carry over with us, and he, like a very honest as well as knowing man, told her thus: "Madam, your cousins must in the first place procure somebody to buy them as servants, in conformity to the conditions of their transportation, and then in the name of that person they may go about what they will. They may either purchase some plantations already begun, or they may purchase land of the government of the country, and begin where they please, and both will be done reasonably." She bespoke his favour in the first article, which he promised to her to take upon himself; and indeed, faithfully performed it; and as to the rest, he promised to recommend us to such as should give us the best advice, and not impose upon us, which was as much as could be desired.

She then asked him if it would not be necessary to furnish us with a stock of tools, and materials for the business of planting, and he said, "Yes, by all means," and then she begged his assistance in it. She told him she would furnish us with everything that was convenient, whatever it cost her. He accordingly gave her a long particular of things necessary for a planter, which, by his account, came to about fourscore or a hundred pounds; and in short, she went about as dexterously to buy them as if she had been an old Virginia merchant; only that she bought, by my direction, above twice as much of everything as he had given her a list of.

These she put on board in her own name, took his bills of lading for them, and endorsed those bills of lading to my husband, insuring the cargo afterwards in her own name, by her order; so that we were provided for all events and for all disasters.

I should have told you that my husband gave her all his whole stock of one hundred and eighty pounds, which, as I have said, he had about him in gold, to lay out thus, and gave her a good sum besides; so that I did not break into the stock which I had left in her hands at all, but after we had sorted out our whole cargo, we had yet near two hundred pounds in money, which was more than enough for our purpose.

In this condition, very cheerful, and indeed joyful at being so happily accommodated as we were, we set sail from Bugby's-Hole to Gravesend, where the ship lay about ten days more, and where the captain came on board for good and all.

Here the captain offered us a civility which, indeed, we had no reason to expect; namely, to let us go on shore, and refresh ourselves, upon giving our words in a solemn manner that we would not go from him, and that we would return peaceably on board again. This was such an evidence of his confidence in us, that it overcame my husband, who, in a mere principle of gratitude, told him, as he could not be in any capacity to make a suitable return for such a favour, so he could not think of accepting of it; nor could he be easy that the captain should run such a risk. After some mutual civilities, I gave my husband a purse, in which were eighty guineas, and he put it into the captain's hand: "There, captain," says he, "there is part of a pledge for our fidelity; if we deal dishonestly with you on any account, it is your own," and on this we went on shore.

Indeed the captain had assurance enough of our resolution to go, for that, having made such provision to settle there, it did not seem rational that we would chose to remain here, at the expense and peril of life, for such it must have been, if we had been taken again. In a word, we went all on shore with the captain, and supped together in Gravesend, where we were very merry, stayed all night, lay at the house where we supped, and came all very honestly on board again with him in the morning. Here we bought ten dozen bottles of good beer, some wine, some fowls, and such things as we thought might be acceptable on board.

My governess was with us all this while, and went with us round into the Downs, as did also the captain's wife, with whom she went back. I was never so sorrowful at parting with my own mother as I was at parting with her, and I never saw her more. We had a fair easterly wind sprung up the third day after we came to the Downs, and we sailed from thence the 10th of April; nor did we touch any more at any place till, being driven on the coast of Ireland by a very hard gale of wind, the ship came to an anchor in a little bay near the mouth of a river, whose name I remember not, but they said the river came down from Limerick, and that it was the largest river in Ireland.

Here being detained by bad weather for some time, the captain, who continued the same kind, good-humoured man as at first, took us both on shore with him again: he did it now in kindness to my husband, who bore the sea very ill, and was very sick, especially when it blew so hard. Here we again bought in a store of fresh provisions, especially beef, pork, mutton and fowls, and the captain stayed to pickle up five or six barrels of beef, to lengthen out the ship's store. We were here not above five days, when the weather turning mild, and a fair wind, we set sail again, and in two and forty days came safe to the coast of Virginia.

When we drew near to the shore the captain called me to him, and told me that he found by my discourse, I had some relations in the place, and that I had been there before, and so he supposed I understood the custom in their disposing of the convict prisoners when they arrived.

I told him I did not, and that as to what relations I had in the place, he might be sure I would make myself known to none of them while I was in the circumstances of a prisoner, and that as to the rest, we left ourselves entirely to him to assist us, as he was pleased to promise he would do.

He told me I must get somebody in the place to come and buy us as servants, and who must answer for us to the governor of the country, if he demanded us.

I told him we should do as he should direct; so he brought a planter to treat with him, as it were, for the purchase of these two servants, my husband and me, and there we were formally sold to him, and went ashore with him. The captain went with us, and carried us to a certain house, whether it was to be called a tavern or not I know not, but we had a bowl of punch there made of rum, &c., and were very merry.

After some time the planter gave us a certificate of discharge, and acknowledgment of having served him faithfully, and we were free from him the next morning to go whither we would.

For this piece of service the captain demanded of us six thousand weight of tobacco, which he said he was accountable for to his freighter, and which we immediately bought for him, and made him a present of twenty guineas besides, with which he was abundantly satisfied.

It is not proper to enter here into the particulars of what part of the colony of Virginia we settled in, for divers reasons. It may suffice to mention that we went into the great river of Potomac, the ship being bound thither; and there we intended to have settled at first, though afterwards we altered our minds.

The first thing I did of moment, after having gotten all our goods on shore, and placed them in a storehouse, or warehouse, which, with a lodging, we hired at the small place or village where we landed; I say, the first thing was to inquire after my mother, and after my brother (that fatal person whom I married as a husband, as I have related at large). A little inquiry furnished me with information that Mrs ———, that is, my mother, was dead; that my brother, or husband, was alive, which I confess I was not very glad to hear; but which was worse, I found he was removed from the plantation where he lived formerly, and where I lived with him, and lived with one of his sons in a plantation just by the place where we landed, and where we had hired a warehouse.

I was a little surprised at first, but as I ventured to satisfy myself that he could not know me, I was not only perfectly easy, but had a great mind to see him, if it was possible to do so without his seeing me. In order to that, I found out by inquiry a plantation where he lived, and with a woman of that place, whom I got to help me, like what we call a charwoman, I rambled about towards the place as if I had only a mind to see the country and look about me. At last I came so near that I saw the dwelling-house. I asked the woman whose plantation that was? She said it belonged to such a man, and looking out a little to our right hands, "There," says she, "is the gentleman that owns the plantation, and his father with him."

"What are their Christian names?" said I.

"I know not," said she, "what the old gentleman's name is, but his son's name is Humphry, and I believe," says she, "the father's is so too."

"You may guess, if you can, what a confused mixture of joy and fright possessed my thoughts upon this occasion, for I immediately knew that this was nobody else but my own son, by that father she showed me, who was my own brother.

I had no mask, but I ruffled my hood so about my face that I depended upon it, that after above twenty years' absence, and withal not expecting anything of me in that part of the world, he would not be able to know anything of me; but I need not have used all that caution, for the old gentleman was grown dim-sighted by some distemper which had fallen upon his eyes, and could but just see well enough to walk about, and not run against a tree, or into a ditch. The woman that was with me had told me that by a mere accident, knowing nothing of what importance it was to me.

As they drew near to us I said, "Does he know you, Mrs Owen?" so they called the woman.

"Yes," said she, "if he hears me speak he will know me; but he can't see well enough to know me or anybody else;" and so she told me the story of his sight as I have related.

This made me secure, and so I threw open my hood again, and let them pass by me. It was a wretched thing for a mother thus to see her own son, a handsome, comely young gentleman, in flourishing circumstances, and durst not make herself known to him, and durst not take any notice of him. Let any mother of children that reads this consider it, and but think with what anguish of mind I restrained myself; what yearnings of soul I had in me to embrace him, and weep over him; and how I thought all my entrails turned within me, that my very bowels moved, and I knew not what to do; as I now know not how to express those agonies. When they went from me I stood gazing and trembling, and looking after him as long as I could see him; then sitting down on the grass, just at a place I had marked, I made as if I lay down to rest me, but turned me from her, and lying on my face, wept, and kissed the ground he had set his foot on.

I could not conceal my disorder so much from the woman but that she perceived it, and thought I was not well, which I was obliged to pretend was true; upon which she pressed me to rise, the ground being damp and dangerous, which I did accordingly, and walked away.

As I was going back again, and still talking of this gentleman and his son, a new occasion of melancholy offered itself thus. The woman began, as if she would tell me a story to divert me: "There goes," says she, "a very odd tale among the neighbours where this gentleman formerly lived."

"What was that?" said I.

"Why," says she, "that old gentleman going to England when he was a young man, fell in love with a young lady there, one of the finest women that ever was seen here, and married her, and brought her over hither to his mother, who was then living. He lived here several years with her," continued she, "and had several children by her, of which the young gentleman that was with him now was one; but after some time the old gentlewoman (his mother) talking to her of something relating to herself when she was in England, and of her circumstances there, which were bad enough, the daughter-in-law began to be very much surprised and uneasy; and in short, examining farther into things, it appeared past all contradiction that she (the old gentlewoman) was her own mother; and that consequently that son was his wife's own brother, which struck the whole family with horror, and put them into such a state of confusion that it had almost ruined them all. The young woman would not live with him (the son); her brother and husband for a time went distracted, and at last the young woman went away for England, and has never been heard of since."

It is easy to believe that I was strangely affected with this story; but it is impossible to describe the nature of my disturbance. I seemed astonished at the story, and asked her a thousand questions about the particulars, which I found she was thoroughly acquainted with. At last I began to inquire into the circumstances of the family; how the old gentlewoman (I mean my mother) died, and how she had left what she had; for my mother had promised me very solemnly, that when she died, she would do something for me, and leave it so as that, if I was living, I should one way or other come at it, without its being in the power of her son (my brother and my husband) to prevent it.

She told me she did not know exactly how it was ordered; but she had been told that my mother had left a sum of money, and had tied her plantation for the payment of it, to be made good to the daughter, if ever she could be heard of, either in England or elsewhere; and that the trust was left with this son, who was the person that we saw with his father.

This was news too good for me to make light of, and you may be sure filled my heart with a thousand thoughts, what course I should take, how, and when, and in what manner I should make myself known, or whether I should ever make myself known or no.

Here was a perplexity that I had not indeed skill to manage myself in, neither knew I what course to take. It lay heavy upon my mind night and day, I could neither sleep or converse, so that my husband perceived it, and wondered what ailed me, strove to divert me, but it was all to no purpose. He pressed me to tell him what it was troubled me, but I put it off, till at last importuning me continually, I was forced to form a story, which yet had a plain truth to lay it upon too. I told him I was troubled because I found we must shift our quarters, and alter our scheme of settling, for that I found I should be known, if I staid in that part of the country; for that my mother being dead, several of my relations were come into that part where we then were, and that I must either discover myself to them, which in our present circumstances was not proper on many accounts, or remove; and which to do I knew not; and that this it was that made me so melancholy and so thoughtful.

He joined me in this, that it was by no means proper for me to make myself known to anybody in the circumstances in which we then were; and he told me he would be willing to remove to any other part of the country, or even into any other country, if I thought fit. But now I had another difficulty, which was, that if I removed to any other colony, I might put myself out of the way of ever making a due search after those effects which my mother had left. Again, I could never so much as think of breaking the secret of my former marriage to my new husband. It was not a story, as I thought that would bear telling, nor could I tell what might be the consequence of it; and it was impossible to search into the bottom of the thing without making it public all over the country, as well who I was as what I now was also.

In this perplexity I continued a great while, and this made my spouse very uneasy; for he found me perplexed, and yet thought I was not open with him, and did not let him into every part of my grievances; and he would often say he wondered what he had done that I would not trust him with whatever it was, especially if it was grievous and afflicting. The truth is, he ought to have been trusted with everything, for no man in the world could deserve better of a wife; but this was a thing I knew not how to open to him, and yet having no one to disclose any part of it to, the burthen was too heavy for my mind; for let them say what they please of our sex not being able to keep a secret, my life is a plain conviction to me of the contrary. But, be it our sex or the man's sex, a secret of moment should always have a confidant, a bosom friend, to whom we may communicate the joy of it or the grief of it, be it which it will, or it will be a double weight upon the spirits, and perhaps become even insupportable in itself; and this I appeal to all human testimony for the truth of.

This was the cause why many times, men as well as women, and men of the greatest and best qualities otherwise, yet have found themselves weak in this part, and have not been able to bear the weight of a secret joy or of a secret sorrow, but have been obliged to disclose it, even for the mere giving vent to themselves, and to unbend the mind, oppressed with the load and weight which attended it. Nor was this any token of folly and thoughtlessness at all, but a natural consequence of the thing; and such people, had they struggled longer with the oppression, would certainly have told it in their sleep, and disclosed the secret, let it have been of what fatal nature soever, without regard to the person to whom it might be exposed. This necessity of nature is a thing which works sometimes with such vehemence in the minds of those who are guilty of any atrocious villany, such as secret murder in particular, that they had been obliged to discover it, though the consequences would necessarily be their own destruction. Now, though it may be true that the divine justice ought to have the glory of these discoveries and confessions, yet it is as certain that Providence, which ordinarily works by the hands of nature, makes use here of the same natural causes to produce those extraordinary effects.

I could give several remarkable instances of this in my long conversation with crimes and with criminals. I knew one fellow, that, while I was a prisoner in Newgate, was one of those they called then Night-Flyers. I know not what other word they may have understood it by since, but he was one who, by connivance, was permitted to go abroad every evening, when he played his pranks, and furnished those honest people they call thief-catchers with business to find out next day, and restore for a reward what they stole the evening before. This fellow was as sure to talk in his sleep all that he had done, and every step he had taken, and what he had stolen, and where, as sure as if he had been engaged to tell it waking, and as if there was no harm or danger in it; and therefore he was obliged, after he had been out, to lock himself up, or be locked up by some of the keepers that had him in fee, that nobody should hear him; but, on the other hand, if he had told all the particulars, and given a full account of his rambles and success to any comrade, any brother thief, or to his employers, as I may fairly call them, then all was well with him, and he slept as quietly as other people.

As the publishing this account of my life, is for the sake of the just moral of every part of it, and for instruction, caution, warning, and improvement to every reader, so this will not pass, I hope, for an unnecessary digression concerning some people being obliged to disclose the greatest secrets either of their own or other people's affairs.

Under the certain oppression of this weight upon my mind, I laboured in the case I have been naming; and the only relief I found for it, was to let my husband into so much of it as I thought would convince him of the necessity there was for us to think of settling in some other part of the world, and the next consideration before us was, which part of the English settlements we should go to.

My husband was a perfect stranger to the country, and had not yet so much as a geographical knowledge of the situation of the several places; and I, that, till I wrote this, did not know what the word geographical signified, had only a general knowledge from long conversation with people that came from or went to several places; but this I knew, that Maryland, Pennsylvania, East and West Jersey, New York, and New England, lay all north of Virginia, and that they were consequently all colder climates, to which, for that very reason, I had an aversion; for that as I naturally loved warm weather, so now I grew into years, I had a stronger inclination to shun a cold climate. I therefore considered of going to Carolina, which is the only southern colony of the English on the continent of America; and hither I proposed to go; and the rather, because I might with great ease come from thence at any time, when it might be proper to inquire after my mother's effects, and to make myself known enough to demand them.

With this resolution, I proposed to my husband our going away from where we were, and carrying all our effects with us to Carolina, where we resolved to settle, for my husband readily agreed to the first part, viz. :—that it was not at all proper to stay where we were, since I had assured him we should be known there, and the rest I effectually concealed from him.

But now I found a new difficulty upon me. The main affair grew heavy upon my mind still. I could not think of going out of the country, without somehow or other making inquiry into the grand affair of what my mother had done for me, nor could I with any patience bear the thought of going away and not making myself known to my old husband (brother), or to my child, his son, only I would fain have had this done without my new husband having any knowledge of it, or they having any knowledge of him, or that I had such a thing as a husband.

I cast about innumerable ways in my thoughts how this might be done. I would gladly have sent my husband away to Carolina, with all our goods, and have come after myself, but this was impracticable. He would never stir without me, being himself perfectly unacquainted with the country, and with the methods of settling there, or anywhere else.

Then I thought we would both go first with part of our goods, and that when we were settled, I should come back to Virginia and fetch the remainder; but even then I knew he would never part with me, and be left there to go alone. The case was plain: he was bred a gentleman, and of consequence was not only unacquainted, but indolent, and when we did settle would rather go out into the woods with his gun, which they call there hunting, and which is the ordinary work of the Indians, and which they do as servants; I said he would much rather do this, than attend to the natural business of his plantation.

These were, therefore, difficulties insurmountable, and such as I knew not what to do in. I had such strong impressions on my mind about discovering myself to my brother, formerly my husband, that I could not withstand them; and the rather, because it ran constantly in my thoughts, that if I did not do it while he lived, I might in vain endeavour to convince my son afterward that I was really the same person, and that I was his mother, and so might both lose the assistance and comfort of the relation, and the benefit of whatever it was my mother had left me; and yet, on the other hand, I could never think it proper to discover myself to them in the circumstances I was in; as well relating to the having a husband with me, as to my being brought over by a legal transportation as a criminal; on both which accounts it was absolutely necessary for me to remove from the place where I was, and come again to him, as from another place, and in another figure.

Upon these considerations I went on with telling my husband the absolute necessity there was of our not settling in Potowmac river, at least that we should be presently made public there, whereas if we went to any other place in the world, we should come in with as much reputation as any family that came to plant. That as it was always agreeable to the inhabitants to have families come among them to plant who brought substance with them, either to purchase plantations or begin new ones, so we should be sure of a kind, agreeable reception, and that without any possibility of a discovery of our circumstances.

I told him, too, that as I had several relations in the place where he was, and that I durst not now let myself be known to them, because they would soon come to know the occasion of my coming over, which would be to expose myself to the last degree; so I had reason to believe that my mother who died here had left me something, and perhaps something considerable, which it might be very well worth my while to inquire after; but that this too could not be done without exposing us publicly, unless we went from hence; and then, wherever we settled, I might come, as it were, to visit and to see my brother and nephews, make myself known, inquire after what was my due, be received with respect, and at the same time have justice done me; whereas, if I did it now, I could expect nothing but with trouble, such as exacting it by force, receiving it with curses and reluctance, and with all kinds of affronts, which he would perhaps not bear to see. That in case of being obliged to produce legal proofs of being really her daughter, I might be at a loss, be obliged to have recourse to England, and, it might be, to fail at last, and so lose it.

With these arguments, and having thus acquainted my husband with the whole secret so far as was needful to him, we resolved to go and seek a settlement in some other colony; and at first thoughts, Carolina was the place we pitched upon.

In order to this we began to make inquiry for vessels going to Carolina, and in a very little while got information, that on the other side the bay, as they call it, namely, in Maryland, there was a ship which came from Carolina, laden with rice and other goods, and was going back again thither, and from thence to Jamaica, with provisions. On this news we hired a sloop to take in our goods, and taking, as it were, a final farewell of Potowmac river, we went with all our cargo over to Maryland.

This was a long and unpleasant voyage, and my spouse said it was worse to him than all the voyage from England, because the weather was but indifferent, the water rough, and the vessel small and inconvenient; in the next place, we were full a hundred miles up Potowmac river, in a part which they call Westmoreland county; and as the river is by far the greatest in Virginia, and I have heard say it is the greatest river in the world that falls into another river, and not directly into the sea, so we had bad weather in it, and were frequently in great danger; for though they call it but a river, it is frequently so broad, that when we were in the middle we could not see land on either side for many leagues together. Then we had the great river, or bay of Chesapeake, to cross, which is, where the river Potowmac falls into it, near thirty miles broad, and we entered more great vast waters, whose names I know not, so that our voyage was full two hundred miles, in a poor sorry sloop, with all our treasure; and if any accident had happened to us, we might have been very miserable, supposing we had lost our goods and saved our lives only, and had been then left naked and destitute, and in a wild strange place, not having one friend or acquaintance in that part of the world. The very thought of it gives me some horror, even since the danger is past.

Well, we came to the place in five days sailing, I think they call it Philips's Point; and behold, when we came thither, the ship bound to Carolina was loaded and gone away but three days before. This was a disappointment; but, however, I, that was to be discouraged with nothing, told my husband that since we could not get a passage to Carolina, and that the country we were in was very fertile and good, we would, if he liked it, see if we could find out anything for our turn where we were; and that, if he liked things, we would settle here.

We immediately went on shore, but found no convenience, just at that place, either for our being on shore or preserving our goods on shore, but were directed by a very honest Quaker, who we found there, to go to a place about sixty miles east, that is to say, nearer the mouth of the Bay, where he said he lived, and where we should be accommodated, either to plant, or to wait for any other place to plant in that might be more convenient; and he invited us with so much kindness and simple honesty, that we agreed to go, and the Quaker himself went with us.

Here we bought two servants, viz. an English woman servant just come on shore from a ship of Liverpool, and a negro man servant, things absolutely necessary for all people that pretended to settle in that country. This honest Quaker was very helpful to us, and when we came to the place that he proposed to us found us out a convenient storehouse for our goods, and lodging for ourselves and our servants; and about two months or thereabouts afterwards by his direction we took a large piece of land from the governor of that country, in order to form our plantation, and so we laid the thoughts of going to Carolina wholly aside, having been very well received here, and accommodated with a convenient lodging, till we could prepare things and have land enough cured, and timber and materials provided for building us a house, all which we managed by the direction of the Quaker; so that in one year's time we had near fifty acres of land cleared, part of it enclosed, and some of it planted with tobacco, though not much; besides, we had garden ground, and corn sufficient to help to supply our servants with roots, and herbs, and bread.

And now I persuaded my husband to let me go over the Bay again, and inquire after my friends; he was the willinger to consent to it now because he had business upon his hands sufficient to employ him, besides his gun to divert him, which they call hunting there, and which he greatly delighted in; and indeed we used to look at one another, sometimes with a great deal of pleasure, reflecting how much better that was, not than Newgate only, but than the most prosperous of our circumstances in the wicked trade that we had both been carrying on.

Our affairs were in a very good posture; we purchased of the proprietors of the colony as much land for thirty-five pounds, paid in ready money, as would make a sufficient plantation to employ between fifty and sixty servants, and which, being well improved, would be sufficient to us as long as we could either of us live; and as for children I was past the prospect of anything of that kind.

But our good fortune did not end here; I went, as I have said, over the Bay, to the place where my brother (once a husband) lived; but I did not go to the same village where I was before, but went up another great river, on the east side of the river Potowmack, called Rapahannock river, and by this means came on the back of his plantation, which was large, and by the help of a navigable creek, or little river, that run into Rapahannock, I came very near it.

I was now fully resolved to go up, point blank, to my brother (husband), and to tell him who I was; but not knowing what temper I might find him in, or how much out of temper rather, I might make him by such a rash visit. I resolved to write a letter to him first, to let him know who I was, and that I was come not to give him any trouble upon the old relation, which I hoped was entirely forgot, but that I applied to him as a sister to a brother, desiring his assistance in the case of that provision which our mother at her decease had left for my support, and which I did not doubt but he would do me justice in; especially considering that I was come thus far to look after it.

I said some very tender kind things in the letter about his son, which I told him he knew to be my own child, and that as I was guilty of nothing in marrying him any more than he was in marrying me, neither of us having then known our being at all related to one another, so I hoped he would allow me the most passionate desire of once seeing my one and only child, and of showing something of the infirmities of a mother in preserving a violent affection for him who had never been able to retain any thought of me one way or other.

I did believe that, having received this letter, he would immediately give it to his son to read, I having understood his eyes being so dim that he could not see to read it. But it fell out better than so, for as his sight was dim, so he did allow his son to open all letters that came to his hand for him; and the old gentleman being from home, or out of the way, when my messenger came, my letter came directly to my son's hand, and he opened and read it.

He called the messenger in after some little stay, and asked him where the person was who gave him the letter. The messenger told him the place, which was about seven miles off; so he bid him stay, and ordering a horse to be got ready and two servants, away he came to me with the messenger.

Let any one judge the consternation I was in when my messenger came back, and told me the old gentleman was not at home, but his son was come along with him, and was just coming up to me. I was perfectly confounded, for I knew not whether it was peace or war, nor could I tell how to behave. However, I had but a very few moments to think, for my son was at the heels of the messenger, and coming up into my lodgings, asked the fellow at the door something, I suppose it was, for I did not hear it so as to understand it, which was the gentlewoman that sent for him, for the messenger said, "There she is, sir;" at which he comes directly up to me, kisses me, took me in his arms, and embraced me with so much passion, that he could not speak; but I could feel his breast heave and throb like a child that cries, but sobs, and cannot cry it out.

I can neither express or describe the joy that touched my very soul when I found, for it was easy to discover that part, that he came not as a stranger, but as a son to a mother, and indeed as a son who had never before known what a mother of his own was; in short, we cried over one another a considerable while, when at last he broke out first; "My dear mother," says he, "are you still alive? I never expected to have seen your face!" As for me, I could say nothing a great while.

After we had both recovered ourselves a little, and were able to talk, he told me how things stood as to what I had written to his father. He told me he had not shown my letter to his father, or told him anything about it; that what his grandmother left me was in his hands, and that he would do me justice to my full satisfaction; that as to his father, he was old and infirm both in body and mind; but he was very fretful and passionate, almost blind, and capable of nothing; and he questioned whether he would know how to act in an affair which was of so nice a nature as this; and therefore he had come himself, as well to satisfy himself in seeing me, which he could not restrain himself from, as also to put it in my power to make a judgment, after I had seen how things were, whether I would discover myself to his father or no.

This was really so prudently and wisely managed that I found my son was a man of sense, and needed no direction from me. I told him I did not wonder that his father was as he had described him, for that his head was a little touched before I went away; and principally his disturbance was because I could not be persuaded to conceal our relation, and to live with him as my husband after I knew that he was my brother. That as he knew better than I what his father's present condition was, I should readily join with him in such measures as he should direct; that I was indifferent as to seeing his father since I had seen him first, and he could not have told me better news than to tell me that what his grandmother had left me was entrusted in his hands, who I doubted not, now he knew who I was, would, as he said, do me justice. I inquired then how long my mother had been dead, and where she died, and told some more particulars of the family, that I left him no room to doubt of my being really and truly his mother.

My son then inquired where I was, and how I disposed of myself. I told him I was on the Maryland side of the bay, at the plantation of a particular friend, who came from England in the same ship with me; and that, at the farthest side of the bay where he was, I had no habitation. He told me, I should go home with him and live with him if I pleased, as long as I lived. That as to his father, he knew nobody, and would not as much as guess at me. I considered of that a little, and told him, though it was really a concern for me to live at a distance from him, yet I did not say it would be the comfortablest thing in the world for me to live in the same house with him, and to have that unhappy object always before me which had been such a blow to my peace before; that though I should be glad to have his company (my son's), or to be as near him as possible while I stayed, yet I could not think of being in the house, where I should be also under constant restraint, for fear of betraying myself in my discourse, nor should I be able to refrain some expressions in my conversing with him as my son, that might discover the whole affair, which would by no means be convenient.

He acknowledged that I was right in all this, but then "dear mother," says he, "you shall be as near me as you can. So he took me with him on horseback to a plantation next to his own, where I was as well entertained as I could have been in his own. Having left me there he went away home, telling me he would talk of the main business the next day, and having first called me his aunt, and giving a charge to the people, who it seems were his tenants, to treat me with all possible respect. About two hours after he was gone, he sent me a maid servant and a negro boy to wait on me, and provisions ready dressed for my supper; and thus I was as if I had been in a new world, and began almost to wish that I had not brought my Lancashire husband from England at all.

However, that wish was not hearty neither, for I loved my Lancashire husband entirely, as I had ever done from the beginning; and he merited it as much as possible for a man to do, but that by the way.

The next morning my son came to visit me again almost as soon as I was up. After a little discourse, he first of all pulled out a deer skin bag, and gave it me, with five and fifty Spanish pistoles in it, and told me that was to supply my expenses from England; for though it was not his business to inquire, yet he ought to think I did not bring a great deal of money out with me, it not being usual to bring much money into that country. Then he pulled out his grandmother's will, and read it over to me, whereby it appeared that she left a plantation on York River to me, with the stock of servants and cattle upon it, and had given it in trust to this son of mine for my use, whenever he should hear of me, and to my heirs, if I had any children, and in default of heirs, to whomsoever I should by will dispose of it; but gave the income of it, till I should be heard of, to my said son; and if I should not be living, then it was to him and his heirs.

This plantation, though remote from him, he said he did not let out, but managed it by a head clerk, as he did another that was his father's that lay hard by it, and went over himself three or four times a year to look after it. I asked him what he thought the plantation might be worth. He said if I would let it out, he would give me about sixty pounds a year for it; but if I would live on it, then it would be worth much more, and he believed would bring me in about one hundred and fifty pounds a year; but seeing I was likely either to settle on the other side the bay, or might, perhaps, have a mind to go back to England, if I would let him be my steward he would manage it for me, as he had done for himself; and that he believed he should be able to send me as much tobacco from it as would yield me about one hundred pounds a-year, sometimes more.

This was all strange news to me, and things I had not been used to; and really my heart began to look up more seriously than I think it ever did before, and to look with great thankfulness to the hand of Providence, which had done such wonders for me, who had been myself the greatest wonder of wickedness, perhaps, that had been suffered to live in the world; and I must again observe, that not on this occasion only, but even on all other occasions of thankfulness, my past wickedness and abominable life never looked so monstrous to me, and I never so completely abhorred it, and reproached myself with it, as when I had a sense upon me of Providence doing good to me, while I had been making those vile returns on my part.

But I leave the reader to improve these thoughts, as, no doubt, he will see cause, and I go on to the fact. My son's tender carriage and kind offers fetched tears from me, almost all the while he talked with me; indeed, I could scarce discourse with him but in the intervals of my passion. However, at length I began, and expressed myself with wonder at my being so happy to have the trust of what I had left put into the hands of my own child. I told him that as to the inheritance of it, I had no child but him in the world, and was now past having any if I should marry, and therefore would desire him to get a writing drawn, which I was ready to execute, by which I would, after me, give it wholly to him and to his heirs; and in the meantime, smiling, I asked him what made him continue a bachelor so long. His answer was kind and ready, that Virginia did not yield any great plenty of wives; and that, since I talked of going back to England, I should send him a wife from London.

This was the substance of our first day's conversation, the pleasantest day that ever passed over my head in my life, and which gave me the truest satisfaction. He came every day after this, and spent great part of his time with me, and carried me about to several of his friends' houses, where I was entertained with great respect. Also I dined several times at his own house, where he always took care to see his half-dead father sent out of the way that I never saw him or he me. I made him one present, and it was all I had of value, and that was one of the gold watches, of which, I said, I had two in my chest, and this I happened to have with me, and gave it him at his third visit. I told him I had nothing of any value to bestow but that, and I desired he would now and then kiss it for my sake. I did not, indeed, tell him that I stole it from a gentlewoman's side at a meeting-house in London; that's by the way.

He stood a little while hesitating, as if doubtful whether to take it or no; but I pressed it on him, and made him accept it, and it was not much less worth than his leather pouch full of Spanish gold. no, though it were to be reckoned as if at London, whereas it was worth twice as much there. At length he took it, kissed it, told me the watch should be a debt upon him that he would be paying as long as I lived.

A few days after he brought the writings of gift and the scrivener with him, and I signed them very freely, and delivered them to him with a hundred kisses, for sure nothing ever passed between a mother and a tender dutiful child with more affection. The next day he brings me an obligation under his hand and seal, whereby he engaged himself to manage and improve the plantation for my account, and with his utmost skill, and to remit the produce to my order wherever I should be, and withal he obliged himself to make up the produce, a hundred pounds a-year, to me. When he had done so, he told me that, as I came to demand it before the crop was off, I had a right to the produce of the current year, and so he paid me an hundred pounds in Spanish pieces of eight, and desired a receipt for it as in full for that year, ending at Christmas following, this being about the latter end of August.

I stayed here about five weeks, and indeed had much ado to get away then. Nay, he would have come over the bay with me, but I would by no means allow him to do it; however, he would send me over in a sloop of his own, which was built like a yacht, and served him as well for pleasure as business. This I accepted of, and so, after the utmost expressions both of duty and affection, he let me come away, and I arrived safe in two days at my friend, the Quaker's.

I brought over with me, for the use of our plantation, three horses with harness and saddles, some hogs, two cows, and a thousand other things, the gift of the kindest and tenderest child that ever woman had.

I related to my husband all the particulars of this voyage, except that I called my son my cousin. And first I told him that I had lost my watch, which he seemed to take as a misfortune; but then I told him how kind my cousin had been; that my mother had left me such a plantation, and that he had preserved it for me, in hopes some time or other he should hear from me. Then I told him I had left it to his management, and that he would render me a faithful account of its produce, and then I pulled out the hundred pounds in silver as the first year's produce; and then pulling out the deer-skin purse, with the pistoles: "And here, my dear," says I, "is the gold watch." My husband, so is Heaven's goodness sure to work the same effects in all sensible minds where mercies touch the heart, lifted up his hands, and with an ecstasy of joy, "What is God a-doing," says he, "for such an ungrateful dog as I am!" Then I let him know what I had brought over in the sloop besides all this, I mean the horses, hogs, and cows, and other stores for our plantation; all which added to his surprise, and filled his heart with thankfulness; and from this time forward I believe he was as sincere a penitent, and as thoroughly a reformed man, as ever God's goodness brought back from a profligate, a highwayman, and a robber.

I could fill a larger history than this with the evidences of this truth, but that I doubt that part of the story will not be equally diverting as the wicked part.

But this is to be my own story, not my husband's; I return, therefore, to my own part. We went on with our own plantation, and managed it with the help and direction of such friends as we got there, and especially the honest Quaker, who proved a faithful, generous, and steady friend to us, and we had very good success; for having a flourishing stock to begin with, as I have said, and this being now increased by the addition of an hundred and fifty pounds sterling in money, we enlarged our number of servants, built us a very good house, and cured every year a great deal of land. The second year I wrote to my old governess, giving her part with us of the joy of our success, and ordered her how to lay out the money I had left with her, which was two hundred and fifty pounds, as above, and to send it to us in goods, which she performed with her usual kindness and fidelity, and all this arrived safe to us.

Here we had a supply of all sorts of clothes, as well for my husband as myself; and I had taken especial care to have bought for him all those things that I knew he delighted to have; as two good long wigs, two silver-hilted swords, three or four fowling pieces, a fine saddle with holsters and pistols, very handsome, with a scarlet cloak, and, in a word, everything I could think of to oblige him, and to make him appear, as he really was, a very fine gentleman. I had ordered a good quantity of household stuff as we wanted, with linen for us both. As for myself, I wanted very little of clothes and linen, being very well furnished before. The rest of my cargo consisted of iron work of all sorts, harness for horses, tools, clothes for servants, and woollen cloth; stuffs, serges, stockings, shoes, hats, and the like, such as servants wear, and whole pieces also to make up for servants, all by direction of the Quaker; and all this cargo arrived safe and in good condition, with three women servants, lusty wenches, which my governess had picked up for me, suitable enough to the place, and to the work we had for them to do; and one of whom happened to come double, having been got with child by one of the seamen in the ship, as she owned afterwards, before the ship got so far as Gravesend; so she brought us a stout boy about seven months after her landing.

My husband, you may suppose, was a little surprised at the arriving of this cargo from England, and talking with me one day after he saw the particulars: "My dear," says he, "what is the meaning of all this? I fear you will run us too deep in debt. When shall we be able to make returns for it all?" I smiled, and told him it was all paid for; and then I told him, that not knowing what might befall us in the voyage, and considering what our circumstances might expose us to, I had not taken my whole stock with me; that I had reserved so much in my friend's hands, which, now we were come over safe, and settled in a way to live, I had sent for as he might see.

He was amazed, and stood awhile, telling upon his fingers, but said nothing. At last he began thus: "Hold—let's see," says he, telling upon his fingers still; and first upon his thumb: "There's 246*l.* in money, first; then two gold watches, diamond rings, and plate," says he, upon the fore finger; then upon the next finger: "There's a plantation on York River of 100*l.* a year; then 150*l.* in money; then a sloop load of horses, cows, hogs, and stores," and so on to the thumb again; "and now," says he, "a cargo that cost 250*l.* in England, and worth here twice the money."—"Well," says I, "what do you make of all that?"—"Make of it!" says he, "Why, who says I was deceived when I married a wife in Lancashire? I think I have married a fortune, and a very good fortune too," says he.

After I had been a year at home again, I went over the bay to see my son, and to receive another year's income of my plantation; and I was surprised to learn, just at my landing there, that my old husband was dead, and had not been buried above a fortnight. This, I confess, was not disagreeable news, because now I could appear as I was, in a married condition. So I told my son, before I came from him, that I believed I should marry a gentleman that had a plantation near mine; and though I was legally free to marry as to any obligation that was on me before, yet that I was shy of it, lest the blot should some time or other be revived, and it might make a husband uneasy. My son, the same kind, dutiful, and obliging creature as ever, treated me now at his own house, paid me my hundred pounds, and sent me home again loaded with presents.

Some time after this I let my son know I was married, and invited him over to see us; and my husband wrote a very obliging letter to him also, inviting him to come and see him; and he came accordingly some months after.

It must be observed, that when the old wretch, my brother (husband), was dead, I then freely gave my husband an account of all that affair, and of this cousin, as I called him before, being my son, by that mistaken, unhappy match. He was perfectly easy in the account, and told me he should have been as easy if the old man, as we called him, had been alive; "For," said he, "it was no fault of yours, nor of his; it was a mistake impossible to be prevented." He only reproached him with desiring me to conceal it, and to live with him as a wife after I knew that he was my brother; that, he said, was a vile part. Thus all these little difficulties were made easy, and we lived together with the greatest kindness and comfort imaginable.

We are now grown old. I am come back to England, being almost seventy years of age, my husband sixty-eight, having performed much more than the limited time of my transportation. And now, notwithstanding all the fatigues and all the miseries we have gone through, we are both of us in good heart and health. My husband remained there some time after me to settle our affairs; and, at first, I had intended to go back to him, but at his desire I altered that resolution, and he is come over to England also, where we resolve to spend the remainder of our years in sincere penitence for the wicked lives we have lived.

From the character of the incidents that compose the present narrative, De Foe was fully aware of the objections that would be urged against it by the scrupulous. To conceal a sin, and to make a man as much from the liberty of the pen; all that he could do, therefore, was to neutralize the poison by furnishing the strongest antidotes. Accordingly, whilst he paints the course of an every-day prodigy in their natural colours, he shows us with the same fidelity, near their natural tendency; and that, first or last, vice is sure to bring down its own punishment. His villains never prosper, but either come to an untimely end, or are brought to be penitents. In dressing up the present story, he tells us he had taken care to exclude everything that might be offensive; but conscious that he had a bad subject to work upon, he endeavours to interest the reader in the reflections arising out of it, that the moral might be more engaging than the tale.

The story of Moll Flanders must be allowed to be executed in strict conformity with the writer's intention. The events of her life are indeed coarse and disgusting, but they are exactly those of a person in her situation, led on from one degree of crime to another, and participating in all the miseries that may be expected to accompany such courses. If the sale of a book were any criterion of its merit, De Foe had every reason to be satisfied with the work. Two editions were printed in 1721, and a third edition was published by the same booksellers in 1722, and another in the following year. There were two editions by J. Broome, the second in 1741. There is also one with wood-cuts, by C. Simpson, in Stone-Cutter street, Fleet market, without a date. These were all in octavo, and there are many in a smaller size. An edition of the work, with many additions and alterations, was published in 1776, by Francis Noble, who kept a circulating library in Holborn, and republished several of De Foe's pieces, which he professes to be taken from a corrected manuscript of De Foe's, dated September 20, 1730, in which he omitted some parts as unfit for perusal, and gave the whole a new dress. But this is a mere description. There is no reason for supposing that De Foe left any papers, nor that he intended his work to be mutilated in the manner performed by his successors. Besides abridging other parts of his story, the editor of her practices as a thief, and omitted, and consequently, those that suggested her mental conflicts in the silent hour of reflection. She is no coarcted person, but accompanies her husband to Virginia, from whence they both return to Ireland, purchase an estate, and pass a sober and religious life. The survivors of this life a great penitent, the 10th of December, 1722, in the 55th year of her age. The name concluding in this happy manner is entitled "The history of a virtuous Abject, vulgarly called Moll Flanders." Published by Sir Daniel the Poet. And from papers found since his decease, it appears greatly altered by himself, and from the said papers the present work is produced. London, printed for the editor, and sold by R. Noble, Holborn, and T. Lowndes, in Fleet street, 1776. It contains little more than half the quantity of the original work. The second volume of it by the editor is as follows: "My father was an intimate acquaintance of Mr. Daniel De Foe. I had frequently heard him speak of his friend highly to his advantage as a moral writer in many of his publications, and wondered much, after my reading his 'Robinson Crusoe', to find help in his 'Roxana', and in his 'Moll Flanders', expressions so much beneath him; but upon a perusal, when I came into possession of the manuscript of his alterations of both these histories, I acquiesced in the opinion of my father, and in that opinion, have thought it proper in their new dress, to introduce them for the entertainment of those who are admirers of nature."

APPENDIX.

THE misfortunes of De Foe, at a former period, observes Mr Wilson, had thrown him into circumstances which subjected him to the sight of human nature in its lowest and most degraded forms. Whilst immured in prison, he was necessarily brought into contact with persons who were competent to let him into those scenes of crime and misery of which his fertile genius availed itself in this and similar publications. The various incidents in the eventful life of Moll Flanders, from the time of her seduction to that of her becoming a convict and a quiet settler in Maryland, are those of real life, as exemplified by multitudes of individuals who have run the career of their vicious propensities. The artless disposition of the narrative, the lively interest excited by unlooked for coincidences, the rich natural painting, the moral reflections, are all so many proofs of the knowledge and invention of the writer; but the facts were furnished him by the annals of Newgate.

From the character of the incidents that compose the present narrative, De Foe was fully aware of the objections that would be urged against it by the scrupulous. To conceal a single fact would have taken so much from the fidelity of the portrait; all that he could do, therefore, was to neutralize the poison by furnishing the strongest antidotes. Accordingly, whilst he paints the courses of an every-day profligate in their natural colours, he shows us with the same faithfulness their natural tendency; and that, first or last, vice is sure to bring down its own punishment. His villains never prosper, but either come to an untimely end, or are brought to be penitents. In dressing up the present story, he tells us he had taken care to exclude everything that might be offensive; but conscious that he had a bad subject to work upon, he endeavours to interest the reader in the reflections arising out of it, that the moral might be more enticing than the fable.

The story of Moll Flanders must be allowed to be executed in strict conformity with the writer's intentions. The events of her life are indeed coarse and disgusting, but they are exactly those of a person in her situation, led on from one degree of crime to another, and participating in all the miseries that may be expected to accompany such courses.

If the sale of a book were any criterion of its merit, De Foe had every reason to be satisfied with the work. Two editions were printed in 1721, and a third edition was published by the same booksellers in 1722, and another in the following year. There were two editions by J. Brotherton; the second in 1741. There is also one with wood-cuts, by C. Simpson, in Stone Cutter street, Fleet market, without a date. These were all in octavo, and there are many in a smaller size. An edition of the work, with many omissions and alterations, was published in 1776, by Francis Noble, who kept a circulating library in Holborn, and reprinted several of De Foe's pieces, with castrations. It professes to be taken from a corrected manuscript of De Foe's, dated Islington, December 20, 1730, in which he omitted some parts as unfit for perusal, and gave the whole a new dress. But this is a mere deception. There is no reason for supposing that De Foe left any such papers, nor that he intended his work to be mutilated in the manner performed by his anonymous editor. Besides abridging other parts of her story, the whole of her practices as a thief are omitted, and, consequently, those fine passages that describe her mental conflicts in the silent hour of reflection. She is no convict herself, but accompanies her husband to Virginia, from whence they both return to Ireland, purchase an estate, and pass a sober and religious life. She survives her husband, makes her will, leaving the whole of her property to her brother-in-law, and departs this life a great penitent, the 10th of December, 1722, in the 75th year of her age. The work concluding in this happy manner is entitled "The history of Lætitia Atkins, vulgarly called Moll Flanders. Published by Mr Daniel De Foe. And from papers found since his decease, it appears greatly altered by himself; and from the said papers the present work is produced. London: printed for the editor, and sold by F. Noble, Holborn, and T. Lowndes, in Fleet street. 1776. 12mo." It contains little more than half the quantity of the original work. The account given of it by the editor is as follows:—"My father was an intimate acquaintance of Mr Daniel De Foe. I had frequently heard him speak of his friend highly to his advantage as a moral writer in many of his publications, and wondered much, after my reading his 'Robinson Crusoe,' to find both in his 'Roxana' and in his 'Moll Flanders' expressions so much beneath him; but upon a perusal, when I came into possession of the manuscripts of his alterations of both those histories, I acquiesced in the opinion of my father, and, in that opinion, have thought it proper, in their new dress, to introduce them for the entertainment of those who are admirers of nature."

THE PRESENT EDITION.

WHETHER this interesting work is considered as a romance, or as a series of authentic memoirs, in which the only fabulous circumstance is the existence of the hero, it must undoubtedly be allowed to be of the best description of either species of composition, and to reflect additional lustre, even on the Author of Robinson Crusoe.

There is so much simplicity and apparent fidelity of statement throughout the narrative, that the feelings are little indebted to those who would remove the veil; and the former editors, perhaps, have acted not unwisely in leaving the circumstances of its authenticity in their original obscurity. The Memoirs of a Cavalier have long, however, been ascertained to be the production of Daniel De Foe. Both the first and second editions were published without date; but, from other evidence, the work appears to have been written shortly after Robinson Crusoe, in 1720-1.

A few Notes have been added to the present edition, collected from the periodical publications of the time (now rare and curious), to exhibit the exact coincidence of the facts themselves, with the transactions narrated in these Memoirs.

THE PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

As an evidence that it is very probable these memorials were written many years ago, the persons now concerned in the publication assure the reader that they have had them in their possession finished, as they now appear, above twenty years. That they were so long ago found by great accident, among other valuable papers, in the closet of an eminent public minister, of no less figure than one of King William's secretaries of state.

As it is not proper to trace them any farther, so neither is there any need to trace them at all, to give reputation to the story related, seeing the actions here mentioned have a sufficient sanction from all the histories of the times to which they relate, with this addition, that the admirable manner of relating them, and the wonderful variety of incidents with which they are beautified in the course of a private gentleman's story, add such delight in the reading, and give such a lustre, as well to the accounts themselves as to the person who was the actor, that no story, we believe, extant in the world, ever came abroad with such advantage.

It must naturally give some concern in the reading, that the name of a person of so much gallantry and honour, and so many ways valuable to the world, should be lost to the reader. We assure them no small labour has been thrown away upon the inquiry; and all we have been able to arrive to of discovery in this affair is, that a memorandum was found with this manuscript in these words, but not signed by any name, only the two letters of a name, which gives us no light into the matter; which memoir was as follows:—

MEMORANDUM.—I found this manuscript among my father's writings, and I understand that he got them as plunder at, or after, the fight at Worcester, where he served as Major of ———'s regiment of horse on the side of the parliament. I. K.

N. B.—The manuscript contains an account of the Restoration.

As this has been of no use but to terminate the inquiry after the person, so, however, it seems most naturally to give an authority to the original of the work, viz.—That it was born of a soldier; and indeed it is, through every part, related with so soldierly a style, and in the very language of the field, that it seems impossible anything but the very person who was present in every action here related, could be the relator of them.

The accounts of battles, the sieges, and the several actions of which this work is so full, are all recorded in the histories of those times; such as the great battle of Leipsick, the sacking of Magdeburg, the siege of Nuremberg, the passing the river Leck in Bavaria; such also as the battles of Keynton, or Edge-Hill; the battles of Newbury, Marston-Moor, and Naseby, and the like. They are all, we say, recorded in other histories, and written by those who lived in those times; and, perhaps, had good authority for what they wrote. But do those relations give any of the beautiful ideas of things formed in this account? Have they one half of the circumstances and incidents of the actions themselves that this man's eyes were witness to, and which his memory has thus preserved? He that has read the best accounts of those battles will be surprised to see the particulars of the story so preserved, so nicely, and so agreeably described; and will confess what we allege, that the story is inimitably told; and even the great actions of the glorious King Gustavus Adolphus receive a lustre from this man's relations, which the world was never made sensible of before, and which the present age has much wanted of late, in order to give their affections a turn in favour of his late glorious successor.

In the story of our own country's unnatural wars he carries on the same spirit. How effectually does he record the virtues and glorious actions of King Charles I, at the same time that he frequently enters upon the mistakes of his Majesty's conduct, and of his friends, which gave his enemies all those fatal advantages against him; which ended in the overthrow of his armies, the loss of his crown and life, and the ruin of the constitution.

In all his accounts he does justice to his enemies, and honours the merits of those whose cause he fought against; and many accounts recorded in his story are not to be found even in the best histories of those times.

What applause does he give to the gallantry of Sir Thomas Fairfax, to his modesty, to his conduct, under which he himself was subdued, and to the justice he did the King's troops when they laid down their arms.

His description of the Scots troops in the beginning of the war, and the behaviour of the party under the Earl of Holland, who went over against them, are admirable; and his censure of their conduct, who pushed the King upon the quarrel, and then would not let him fight, is no more than what many of the King's friends (though less knowing as soldiers) have often complained of.

In a word, this work is a confutation of many errors in all the writers upon the subject of our wars in England, and even in that extraordinary history written by the Earl of Clarendon; but the editors were so just, that when, near twenty years ago, a person who had written a whole volume in folio, by way of answer to, and confutation of, Clarendon's history of the rebellion, would have borrowed the clauses in this account, which clash with that history, and confront it, we say, the editors were so just as to refuse them.

There can be nothing objected against the general credit of this work, seeing its truth is established upon universal history; and almost all the facts, especially those of moment, are confirmed for their general part by all the writers of those times. If they are here embellished with particulars, which are nowhere else to be found, that is the beauty we boast of; and that it is that must recommend this work to all the men of sense and judgment that read.

The only objection we find possible to make against this work is, that it is not carried on farther; or, as we may say, finished with the finishing the war of the time; and this we complain of also. But then we complain of it as a misfortune to the world, not as a fault in the author; for how do we know but that this author might carry it on, and have another part finished which might not fall into the same hands, or may still remain with some of his family, and which they cannot indeed publish to make it seem anything perfect, for want of the other parts which we have, and which we have now made public. Nor is it very improbable but that, if any such farther part is in being, the publishing these two parts may occasion the proprietors of the third to let the world see it; and that, by such a discovery, the name of the person may also come to be known, which would, no doubt, be a great satisfaction to the reader as well as to us.

This, however, must be said, that if the same author should have written another part of this work, and carried it on to the end of those times; yes, as the residue of those melancholy days, to the Restoration, were filled with the intrigues of government, the political management of illegal power, and the dissensions and factions of a people, who were then even in themselves but a faction, and that there was very little action in the field, it is more than probable that our author, who was a man of arms, had little share in those things, and might not care to trouble himself with looking at them.

But, besides all this, it might happen that he might go abroad again at that time, as most of the gentlemen of quality, and who had an abhorrence for the power that then governed here, did. Nor are we certain that he might live to the end of that time, so we can give no account whether he had any share in the subsequent actions of that time.

It is enough that we have the authorities above to recommend this part to us that is now published; the relation, we are persuaded, will recommend itself, and nothing more can be needful, because nothing more can invite than the story itself, which, when the reader enters into, he will find it very hard to get out of, until he has gone through it.

THE PUBLISHER OF THE SECOND EDITION TO THE READER.*

THE following historical memoirs are writ with so much spirit and good sense, that there is no doubt of their pleasing all such as can form any just pretensions to either. However, as, upon reading of a book, it is a question that naturally occurs, "Who is the author?" and as it is too much the custom in these days to form our sentiments of a performance, not from its intrinsic merit, but from the sentiments we form of the writer, the present re-publication of these memoirs will renew an inquiry which has been often made—"Who wrote them?" Some have imagined the whole to be a romance; if it be, it is a romance the likeliest to truth that I ever read. It has all the features of truth, it is clothed with her simplicity, and adorned with her charms. Without hazard I may venture to say, were all romance writers to follow this author's example, their works would yield entertainment to philosophers, as well as serve for the amusement of beaux-esprits. But I am fully persuaded our author, whoever he was, had been early concerned in the actions he relates. It is certain, no man could have given a description of his retreat from Marston-Moor to Rochdale, and from thence over the moors to the north, in so apt and proper terms, and in so exact a manner, unless he had really travelled over the very ground he describes. I could point out many other instances in the course of the memoirs, which evidence that the author must have been well acquainted with the towns, battles, sieges, &c., and a party in the actions he relates. But, as it is needless to do this, all that remains is, to trace our author to his name.

He says he was second son to a Shropshire gentleman, who was made a peer in the reign of King Charles I, whose seat lay eight miles from Shrewsbury. This account suits no one so well as Andrew Newport, Esq., second son to Richard Newport, of High Ercoll, Esq.; which Richard was created Lord Newport, October 14, 1642. This Andrew Newport, Esq., whom we suppose our author to be, was, after the Restoration, made a commissioner of the customs, probably in reward of his zeal and good services for the royal cause.†

The several illustrations these memoirs furnish to the history of those times they refer to, the variety of adventures they contain, and the elegant account given herein of the wars in Germany and England, will abundantly recommend them to the curious.

MEMOIRS OF A CAVALIER.

It may suffice the reader, without being very inquisitive after my name, that I was born in the county of Salop, in the year 1608, under the government of what star I was never astrologer enough to examine; but the consequences of my life may allow me to suppose some extraordinary influence affected my birth.

If there be anything in dreams also, my mother, who was mighty observant that way, took minutes, which I have since seen in the first leaf of her prayer-book, of several strange dreams she had while she was with child of her second son, which was myself.

Once she noted that she dreamed she was carried away by a regiment of horse, and delivered in the fields of a son that, as soon as it was born, had two wings came out of its back, and in half an hour's time flew away from her; and the very evening before I was born she dreamed she was brought to-bed of a son, and that all the while she was in labour a man stood under her window beating on a kettle-drum, which very much discomposed her.

My father was a gentleman of a very plentiful fortune, having an estate of above 5,000*l.* per annum, of a family nearly allied to several of the principal nobility, and lived about six miles from the town of High Ercol; and my mother being at——, on some particular occasion, was surprised there at a friend's house, and brought me very safe into the world.

I was my father's second son, and therefore was not altogether so much slighted as younger sons of good families generally are; but my father saw something in my genius also which particularly pleased him, and so made him take extraordinary care of my education.

I was taught, therefore, by the best masters that could be had, everything that was needful to accomplish a young gentleman for the world; and at seventeen years old my tutor told my father an academic education was very proper for a person of quality, and he thought me very fit for it; so my father entered me of Wadham College, in Oxford, where I continued three years.

A collegiate life did not suit me at all, though I loved books well enough. It was never designed that I should be either a lawyer, physician, or divine; and I wrote to my father that I thought I had stayed there long enough for a gentleman, and with his leave I desired to give him a visit.

During my stay at Oxford, though I passed through the proper exercises of the house, yet my chief reading was upon history and geography, as those pleased my mind best, and supplied me with ideas most suitable to my genius; by the former I understood what great actions had been done in the world; and by the latter I understood where they had been done.

My father readily complied with my desire of coming home; for, besides that he thought, as I did, that three years at the university was enough; he also most passionately loved me, and began to think of my settling near him.

At my arrival I found myself extraordinarily caressed by my father, and he seemed to take a particular delight in my conversation. My mother, who lived in perfect union with him both in desires and affection, received me very passionately; apartments were provided for me by myself, and horses and servants allowed me in particular.

My father never went a-hunting, an exercise he was exceedingly fond of, but he would have me with him; and it pleased him when he found I liked the sport. I lived thus, in all the pleasures it was possible for me to enjoy, for about a year more; when going out one morning with him to hunt a stag, and having had a very hard chase, and gotten a great way off from home, we had leisure enough to ride gently back; and as we returned took occasion to enter into a discourse with me concerning my manner of settling in the world.

He told me, with a great deal of tenderness, that he loved me above all the rest of his children, and that therefore he intended to do well for me; that my eldest brother being already married and settled, he had designed the same for me, and proposed a very advantageous match with a young lady of very extraordinary fortune and merit, and offered to make me a settlement of two thousand pounds per annum, which he said he could purchase for me without diminishing his paternal estate.

There was too much kindness and affection in this discourse not to affect me exceedingly; I told him I would perfectly resign myself to his will. But as my father had, together with his love for me, a very nice judgment in his discourse, he fixed his eyes very attentively on mine and though my answers were without the least reserve, yet he thought he saw some uneasiness in me at the proposal, and from thence concluded that my compliance was rather an act of discretion than inclination; and though I seemed so absolutely given up to what he had proposed, yet my answers were really an effect of my obedience, rather than my choice; so he returned very quick upon me—

“Look you, son; though I give you my own thoughts on the matter, yet I would have you be very plain with me; for if your sentiments do not agree with mine, I will be your adviser, but will never impose upon you; and therefore let me know your mind freely.”

“I don’t reckon myself capable, sir,” said I, with a great deal of respect, “to make so good a choice for myself as you can for me; and though my opinion differed from yours, its being your opinion would reform mine, and my judgment would as readily comply as my duty.”

“I gather, at least, from thence,” said my father, “that your designs lay another way before, however they may now comply with mine; and therefore I would know what it was you would have asked of me, if I had not offered this to you; and you must not deny me your obedience in this, if you expect I should believe your readiness in the other.”

“Sir,” said I, “it was impossible I should lay out for myself just what you have proposed; but if my inclinations were never so contrary, at your command they shall be made known, yet I declare them to be wholly subject to your order. I confess my thoughts did not tend towards marriage, or a settlement; for though I had no reason to question your care of me, yet I thought a gentleman ought always to see something of the world before he confined himself to any particular part of it; and if I had asked your consent to anything, it should have been to give me leave to travel for a short time, in order to qualify myself that I may appear at home like a son to so good a father.”

“In what capacity would you travel?” replied my father: “you must go abroad either as a private gentleman, as a scholar, or as a soldier.”

“If it were in the latter capacity, sir,” said I, returning pretty quick, “I hope I should not dishonour myself; but I am not so determined as not to be ruled by your judgment.”

“Truly,” replied my father, “I see no war abroad at this time worth a man’s appearing in, whether we talk of the cause or the encouragement; and indeed, son, I am afraid you need not go far for adventures of that nature, for things seem to look as if this part of Europe would find us work enough.”

My father then spoke relating to the quarrel likely to happen between the King of England and the Spaniard,* for I believe he had no notion of a civil war in his head.

In short, my father, perceiving my inclinations very forward for travelling, gave me leave, upon condition I would promise to return in two years at furthest, or sooner, if he sent for me.

While I was at Oxford I happened to fall into the society of a young gentleman of a good family, but of low fortune, being a younger brother; and who had indeed instilled into me the first desire of going abroad, and who I knew passionately longed to travel, but had not sufficient allowance to defray his expenses as a gentleman.

We had contracted a very close friendship, and our tempers being very agreeable to one another, we daily enjoyed the conversation of letters. He was of a generous, free disposition, without the least affectation or deceit, a handsome proper person, strong body, very good mien, and brave to the last degree.

His name was Fielding, and we called him captain, though a very unusual title in a college; but fate had some hand in the appellation, for he had certainly the lines of a soldier drawn in his countenance.

I imparted to him the resolutions I had taken, and that I had my father’s consent to go abroad; and would gladly know his mind whether he would accompany me. He wrote me word he would with all his heart.

My father, when he saw him (for I sent for him immediately to come to me) very much approved my choice; so we got our equipage ready, and came away for London.

It was on the 22d of April, 1630, when we embarked at Dover, landed in a few hours at Calais, and immediately took post for Paris.

I shall not trouble the reader with a journal of my travels, nor with the description of places, which every geographer can do better than I; but these memoirs being only a relation of what happened to ourselves, or in our own knowledge, I shall confine myself to that part only.

We had indeed some diverting passages in our journey to Paris; first, the horse my comrade rode upon fell so very lame with a slip, that he could not go, and hardly stand; and the fellow that rode with us express pretended to ride away to a town five miles distant to get a fresh horse, and so left us on the road with one horse betwixt us. We followed as well as we could, but being strangers, missed the way, and wandered much out of the road. Whether the man performed in reasonable time, or not, we could not be sure; but if it had not been for an old priest, we had never found him.

We met this good man by accident, near a little village whereof he was curate: we spoke Latin enough just to make him understand us, and he did not speak it much better himself; but he took us into the village to his house, gave us wine and bread, and entertained us with wonderful courtesy. After this he sent into the village, hired a peasant, and a horse for my captain, and sent him to guide us into the road.

At parting, he made a great many compliments to us in French, which we could just understand; but the sum was, to excuse him for a question he was inclined to ask. After leave to interrogate what he pleased, it was, if we wanted any money for the pursuance of our journey, and pulled out two pistoles, which he offered either to give or lend us.

I mention this exceeding courtesy of the curate, because, though civility is very much in force in France, and especially to strangers, yet ’tis a very unusual thing to have them part with their money

We let the priest know, first, that we did not want money, and, next, that we were very sensible of the obligation he offered us; and I told him in particular, if I lived to see him again I would acknowledge it.

This accident of our horse was, as we afterwards found, of some use to us. We had left our two servants behind at Calais to bring our baggage after us, by reason of some dispute between the captain of the packet and the custom-house officer, which could not be adjusted, and we were wishing to be at Paris: the fellows followed as fast as they could; and let us know, as near as we could learn, in the time we lost our way, they were robbed, and our portmanteaus opened. The villains took what they pleased; but as there was no money, only linen and necessities, the loss was not great.

Our guide conveyed us to Amiens, where we found the express and our two servants, whom the express met on the road, and having a spare horse, had brought back with him hither.

We took this for a good omen of our successful journey, having escaped a danger which might have been greater to us than it was to our servants; for the highwaymen in France do not always give a traveller the civility of bidding him stand and deliver his money, but frequently fire upon him first, and then take his money.

We stayed one day at Amiens to adjust this little disorder, and walked about the town, and into the great church, but saw nothing very remarkable there; but going across a broad street near the great church, we saw a crowd of people gazing at a mountebank doctor, who made a long harangue to them with a thousand antic postures, and gave out bills this way, and boxes of physic that way, and had a great trade; when on a sudden the people raised a cry of Larron! larron! (in English, thief! thief!) on the other side the street, and all the auditors ran away from the doctor to see what the matter was. Among the rest we went to see, and the case was short and plain enough.

Two English gentlemen and a Scotchman, travellers, as we were, stood looking at this prating empiric, and one of them caught a fellow picking his pocket: he had got some of the gentleman's money, for he dropt two or three pieces just by him, and had got hold of his watch, but being surprised, let it slip again. My reason for telling this story is for the agility of its management.

The thief had his seconds so ready, that as soon as the Englishman had seized him, they fell in, pretended to be mighty zealous for the stranger, taking the fellow by the throat, and making a great bustle. The gentleman, not doubting but the man was secured, let go his own hold of him, and left him to them. The hubbub was great, and 'twas these men cried Larron! larron! but with a dexterity peculiar to themselves had let the right fellow go, and pretended to be all upon one of their own gang.

At last they bring the fellow to the gentleman, to ask him what he had done; who, when he saw the person they had seized, presently told them that was not the man: they then seemed to be in more consternation than before, and spread themselves all over the street, crying

Larron! larron! pretending to search for the thief,—and so one one way, and one another—they were all gone—the noise went over—the gentlemen stood looking one at another, and the bawling doctor began to have the crowd about him again.

This was the first French trick I had the opportunity of seeing; but I was told they have a great many more as dexterous as this.

We soon got acquainted with these gentlemen, who were going to Paris as well as us; so the next day we made up our company with them, and were a pretty troop of five gentlemen and four servants.

We had no design to stay long at Paris; indeed, excepting the city itself, there was not much to be seen. Cardinal Richelieu, who was not only a supreme minister of the church, but prime minister of the state, was now made also general of the king's forces, with a title never known in France before nor since, viz. Lieutenant-general au Place du Roy, in the king's stead, or, as some have since translated it, representing the person of the king.

Under this character he pretended to execute the royal powers in the army without appeal to the king, or without waiting for orders; and having departed from Paris the winter before, had now actually begun the war against the Duke of Savoy, in the process of which he restored the Duke of Mantua; and having taken Pignerol from the duke, put it into such a state of defence as he could never force it out of his hands. The cardinal reduced the duke rather by good conduct and management than by force, to make peace without it; and annexing it to the crown of France, has ever since been a thorn in his foot, and has always made the peace of Savoy lame and precarious. France has since made Pignerol one of the strongest fortresses in the world.

The cardinal, with all the military part of the court, was in the field, and the king, to be near him, was gone with the Queen and all the court, just before I reached Paris, to reside at Lyons. All these considered, there was nothing to do at Paris: the court looked like a citizen's house when the family are gone into the country; and I thought the whole city looked very melancholy, compared to the fine things I had heard of it.

The queen-mother and her party were chagrined at the cardinal, who, though he owed his grandeur to her immediate favour, was now grown too great any longer to be at the command of her majesty, or indeed in her interest; and therefore the queen was dissatisfied, and her party looked very much down.

The Protestants were everywhere disconsolate; for the losses they had received at Rochelle, Nismes, and Montpellier, had reduced them to an absolute dependence on the king's will, without possible hopes of ever recovering themselves, or being so much as in a condition to take arms for their religion; and therefore the wisest of them plainly foresaw their own entire reduction, as it since came to pass: and I remember very well, that a Protestant gentleman told me once, as we were passing from Orleans to Lyons, that the English had ruined them; "and therefore," says he, "I think the next occasion the king takes to use us ill, as I know 'twill not be long before he does, we must all fly over to England, where you are bound to maintain us for having helped to turn us out of our own country."

I asked him what he meant by saying the English had done it?

He returned short upon me—"I do not mean," says he, "by not relieving Rochelle, but by helping to ruin Rochelle, when you and the Dutch lent ships to beat our fleet, which all the ships in France could not have done without you."

I was too young in the world to be very sensible of this before, and therefore was something startled at the charge; but when I came to discourse with this gentleman, I soon saw the truth of what he said was undeniable, and have since reflected on it with regret, that the naval power of the Protestants, which was then superior to the royal, would certainly have been the recovery of all their fortunes, had it not been unhappily broken by their brethren of England and Holland, the former lending seven men-of-war, and the latter twenty, for the destruction of the Rochellers' fleet; and by those very ships the fleet were actually beat and destroyed, and they never afterward recovered their force at sea, and by consequence sunk under the siege, which the English afterwards in vain attempted to prevent.

These things made the Protestants look very dull, and expected the ruin of all their party; which had certainly happened, had the cardinal lived a few years longer.

We stayed in Paris about three weeks, as well to see the court, and what rarities the place afforded, in which time an incident happened which had like to have put a short period to our ramble.

Walking one morning before the gate of the Louvre, with a design to see the Swiss drawn up, which they always did, and exercised just before they relieved the guards, a page came up to me, and, speaking English, "Sir," says he, "the captain must needs have your immediate assistance."

I had not the knowledge of any person in Paris but my own companion, whom I called captain; had no room to question but it was he that sent for me; and crying out hastily to him, "Where?" followed the fellow as fast as possible. He led me through several passages which I knew not, and at last through a tennis-court and into a large room, where three men, like gentlemen, were engaged very briskly, two against one. The room was very dark, so that I could not easily know them; but being fully possessed with an opinion before of my captain's danger, I ran into the room with my sword in my hand: I had not particularly engaged any of them, nor so much as made a pass at any, when I received a very dangerous thrust in my thigh, rather occasioned by my hasty running in than a real design of the person; but enraged at the hurt, without examining who it was hurt me, I threw myself upon him, and run my sword quite through his body.

The novelty of the adventure, and the unexpected fall of the man, by a stranger come in, nobody knew how, had becalmed the other two, that they really stood gazing at me. By this time I had discovered my captain was not there, and that it was some strange accident brought me thither.

I could speak but little French, and supposed they could speak no English; so I stepped to the door to see for the page that brought me thither; but seeing nobody there, and the passage clear, I made off as fast as I could, without speaking a word; nor did the other two gentlemen offer to stop me.

But I was in a strange confusion when, coming into those entries and passages which the page led me through, I could by no means find my way out: at last seeing a door open that looked through a house into the street, I went in, and out at the other door; but then I was at as great a loss to know where I was, and which was the way to my lodging. The wound in my thigh bled apace, and I could feel the blood in my breeches.

In this interval came by a chair; I called and went into it, and bid them, as well as I could, go to the Louvre; for though I knew not the name of the street where I lodged, I knew I could find the way to it when I was at the Bastile.

The chairmen went on their own way; and being stopped by a company of the guards as they went, set me down till the soldiers were marched by; when, looking out, I found I was just at my own lodging, and the captain standing at the door looking for me: I beckoned to him, and, whispering, told him I was very much hurt; but bid him pay the chairmen, and ask no questions, but come to me.

I made the best of my way up stairs; but had lost so much blood that I had scarcely spirits enough to keep me from swooning till he came in.

He was equally concerned with me to see me in such a bloody condition, and presently called up our landlord, and he as quickly called in his neighbours, that I had a room full of people about me in a quarter of an hour.

But this had like to have been of worse consequence to me than the other; for by this time there were great inquiries after the person who had killed a man at the tennis-court.

My landlord was then sensible of his mistake, and came to me and told me the danger I was in, and very honestly offered to convey me to a friend's of his, where I should be very secure.

I thanked him, and suffered myself to be carried at midnight whither he pleased: he visited me very often till I was well enough to walk about, which was not in less than ten days, when we thought it best to be missing, so took post for Orleans; but when I came upon the road I found myself in another error, for my wound opened again with riding, and I was in a worse condition than before, being forced to take up at a little village on the road, a few miles from Orleans, where there was no surgeon to be had, but a sorry country barber, who nevertheless dressed me as well as he could, and in about a week more I was able to walk to Orleans at three times. Here I stayed till I was quite well, and then took coach for Lyons, and so through Savoy into Italy.

I spent near two years after this bad beginning in travelling through Italy, and to the several courts of Rome, Naples, Venice, and Vienna.

When I came to Lyons, the king was gone from thence to Grenoble to meet the cardinal, but the queens were both at Lyons.

The French affairs seemed just at this time to have but an indifferent aspect; there was no life in anything but where the cardinal was, and he pushed on everything with extraordinary conduct, and generally with success. He had taken Suza and Pignerol from the Duke of Savoy, and was preparing to push the duke even out of all his dominions.

But, at the same time, everywhere else things looked ill; the troops were badly paid, the magazines empty, the people mutinous, and a general disorder seized the minds of the court; and the cardinal, who was the soul of everything, desired an interview at Grenoble, in order to put affairs into some better method.

This politic minister always ordered matters so, that if there was success in anything, the glory was his; but if things miscarried, it was all laid upon the king.

This conduct was so much the more nice, as it is the direct contrary to the custom in like cases, where kings assume the glory of all the success in an action, and when it miscarries make themselves easy by sacrificing their ministers and favourites to the complaints and resentments of the people; but this accurate, refined statesman got over this point.

While we were at Lyons, and, as I remember, the third day after our coming thither, we had like to have been involved in a state broil, without knowing where we were.

It was on a Sunday evening: the people of Lyons, who had been sorely oppressed with taxes, and the war in Italy pinching their trade, began to be very tumultuous. We found the day before the mob got together in great crowds, and talked oddly: the king was everywhere reviled, and spoken disrespectfully of, and the magistrates of the city either winked at, or durst not attempt to meddle, lest they should provoke the people.

But on Sunday, about midnight, we were waked by a prodigious noise in the street. I jumped out of bed, and running to the window, I saw the street as full as it could hold; some, armed with muskets and halberds, marching in good order; others in disorderly crowds; all shouting and crying out, "Du bain, le Roi!" and the like.

One that led a great party of this rabble carried a loaf of bread on the top of a pike, and other lesser loaves, signifying the smallness of their bread, occasioned by the very high price of corn.

In the morning the crowd was gathered to a great height: they ran over the whole city, shut up all the shops, and forced all the people to join with them; from thence they went up to the castle, and, renewing the clamour, a strange consternation seized all the princes.

They broke open the doors of the officers, collectors of the new taxes, and plundered their houses; and had not the persons themselves fled in time, they would have been very ill treated.

The queen-mother, as she was very much displeased to see such consequences of the government, in whose management she had no share, so I suppose she had the less concern upon her.

However, she came into the court of the castle, and showed herself to the people, gave money amongst them, and spoke in a courtly manner; and, by her endearing behaviour, pacified the mob, gradually sent them home with promises of redress, and the like; and so appeased this great tumult in two days by her prudence, which the guards in the castle had no mind to meddle with, and, if they had, would in all probability have made the better side the worse.

There had been several seditions of the like nature in sundry other parts of France; and the very army began to murmur, though not to be mutinous, for want of provisions.

This sedition at Lyons was not quite over when we left the place; for, finding the city all in uproar, we thought we had no business there; and what the consequence of a popular tumult might be we did not see, so we prepared to be gone.

We had not rode above three miles out of the city, but we were taken and brought as prisoners of war by a party of mutineers, who had been sent upon the scout, and were charged with being messengers sent to the cardinal for forces to reduce the citizens: with these pretences they brought us back in triumph, and the queen-mother being by this time grown something familiar to them, they carried us before her.

When they inquired of us who we were, we called ourselves Scots; for as the English were very much out of favour in France at this time, the peace not having been made many months, and not supposed to be very durable, because particularly displeasing to the people of England, so the Scots were on the other extreme with the French. Nothing was so much caressed as they; and a man had no more to do in France, if he would be well received there, than to say he was a Scotchman.

When we came before the queen-mother, she seemed to receive us with some stiffness at first, and caused her guards to take us into custody; but as she was a lady of most exquisite politics, she did this to amuse the mob, and we were immediately after dismissed; and the queen herself made a handsome excuse to us for the rudeness we had suffered, alleging the troubles of the times; and the next morning we had three dragoons of the guards to convov us out of the jurisdiction of Lyons.

I confess this little adventure gave me an aversion to popular tumults all my life after; and if nothing else had been in the cause, would have biassed me to espouse the king's party in England, when our popular heats carried all before them at home.

But I must say, that, when I called to mind since the address, the management, the compliance in show, and, in general, the whole conduct of the queen-mother with the mutinous people of Lyons, and compared it with the conduct of my unhappy master the King of England, I could not but think that the queen understood much better than King Charles the management of politics and the clamours of the people.

Had this princess been at the helm in England, she would have prevented all the calamities of the civil war here, and yet not have parted with what that good prince yielded in order to peace neither: she would have yielded gradually, and then gained upon them in the same manner: she would have managed them to the point she had designed them, as she did all parties in France; neither could any effectually subject her but the very man she had raised to be her principal support—I mean the cardinal.

We went from hence to Grenoble, and arrived there the same day that the king and the cardinal, with the whole court, went out to view a body of six thousand Swiss foot, which the cardinal had wheedled the cantons to grant to the king, to help to ruin their neighbour the Duke of Savoy.

The troops were exceedingly fine, well accoutred, brave, clean limbed, stout fellows indeed.

Here I saw the cardinal: he had an air of church gravity in his habit, but all the vigour of a general, and the sprightliness in his face of a vast genius; he affected a little stiffness in his behaviour, but managed all his affairs with such clearness, such steadiness, and such application, that it was no wonder he had such success in every undertaking.

Here I saw also the king, whose figure was mean, his countenance was hollow, and always seemed dejected, and every way discovered that weakness in his countenance that appeared in his actions.

If he was ever sprightly and vigorous, it was when the cardinal was with him; for he depended so much on everything he did, that he was at the utmost dilemma when he was absent, being always timorous, jealous, and irresolute.

After the review the cardinal was absent for some days, having been to wait on the queen-mother at Lyons, where, as it was discoursed, they were at least seemingly reconciled.

I observed, while the cardinal was gone, there was no court, the king was seldom to be seen, very small attendance given, and no bustle at the castle; but as soon as the cardinal returned, the great councils were assembled, the coaches of the ambassadors went every day to the castle, and a face of business appeared upon the whole court.

Here the measures of the Duke of Savoy's ruin were concerted; and, in order to it, the king and the cardinal put themselves at the head of the army, with which they immediately reduced all Savoy, took Chamberry, and the whole duchy, except Montmelian.

The army that did this was not above twenty-two thousand men, including the Swiss, and but indifferent troops neither, especially the French foot, who, compared to the infantry I have since seen in the German and Swedish armies, were not fit to be called soldiers. On the other hand, considering the Savoyards and Italian troops, they were good; but the cardinal's conduct made amends for all these deficiencies.

From hence I went to Pignerol, which was then little more than a single fortification on the hill near the town called St Bride's; but the situation of that was very strong. I mention this, because of the prodigious works since added to it, by which it has obtained the name of the right hand of France: they had begun a new line below the hill, and some works were marked out on the side of the town next the fort; but the cardinal afterwards drew the plan of the works with his own hand, by which it was made one of the strongest fortresses in Europe.

While I was at Pignerol, the governor of Milan, for the Spaniards, came with an army and sat down before Casal. The grand quarrel, for which the war in this part of Italy was begun, was this:—the Spaniards and Germans claimed the duchy of Mantua; the Duke of Nevers, a Frenchman, had not only a title to it, but had got possession; but, being ill supported by the French, was beat out by the Imperialists, and after a long siege the Germans took Mantua itself, and drove the poor duke quite out of the country.

The taking of Mantua elevated the spirits of the Duke of Savoy; and the Germans and Spaniards being now at more leisure, with a complete army came to his assistance, and formed the siege of Montferrat.

For as the Spaniards pushed the Duke of Mantua, so the French, by way of diversion, lay hard upon the Duke of Savoy: they had seized Montferrat, and held it for the Duke of Mantua, and had a strong French garrison under Thoiras, a brave and experienced commander; and thus affairs stood when we came into the French army.

I had no business there as a soldier; but having passed as a Scotch gentleman with the mob at Lyons, and after with her Majesty the queen-mother when we obtained the guard of her dragoons, we had also her Majesty's pass, with which we came and went where we pleased; and the cardinal, who was then not on very good terms with the queen, but willing to keep smooth water there, when two or three times our passes came to be examined, showed a more than ordinary respect to us on that very account, our passes being from the queen.

Casal being besieged, as I have observed, began to be in danger, for the cardinal, who, it was thought, had formed a design to ruin Savoy, was more intent upon that than upon the succour of the Duke of Mantua; but necessity calling upon him to relieve so great a captain as Thoiras, and not to let such a place as Casal fall into the hands of the enemy, the king, or rather cardinal, ordered the Duke of Montmorency and the Mareschal d'Effiat, with ten thousand foot and two thousand horse, to march and join the Mareschals de la Force and Schomberg, who lay already with an army on the frontiers of Genoa, but too weak to attempt the raising the siege of Casal.

As all men thought there would be a battle between the French and the Spaniards, I could not prevail with myself to lose the opportunity, and therefore, by the help of the passes above mentioned, I came to the French army under the Duke of Montmorency. We marched through the enemy's country with great boldness and no small hazard, for the Duke of Savoy appeared frequently with great bodies of horse on the rear of the army, and frequently skirmished with our troops; in one of which I had the folly—I can call it no better, for I had no business there—to go out and see the sport, as the French gentlemen called it.

I was but a raw soldier, and did not like the sport at all; for this party was surrounded by the Duke of Savoy, and almost all killed, for they neither asked nor gave quarter.

I ran away very fairly one of the first, and my companion with me, and by the swiftness of our horses got out of the fray; and not being much known in the army, we came into the camp an hour or two after, as if we had been only riding about for the air.

This little rout made the general very cautious; for the Savoyards were stronger in horse by three or four thousand, and the army always marched in a body, and kept their parties in or very near hand.

I escaped another rub in this French army about five days after, which had like to have made me pay dear for my curiosity.

The Duke de Montmorency and the Mareschal Schomberg joined their army about four or five days after, and immediately, according to the cardinal's instructions, put themselves on the march for the relief of Casal.

The army had marched over a great plain, with some marshy grounds on the right, and the Po on the left; and as the country was so well discovered that it was thought impossible any mischief should happen, the generals observed the less caution. At the end of this plain was a long wood, and a lane or narrow defile through the middle of it.

Through this pass the army was to march, and the van began to file through it about four o'clock; in three hours all the army was got through, or into the pass, and the artillery was just entered, when the Duke of Savoy appeared, with four thousand horse and fifteen hundred dragoons, with every horseman a footman behind him; whether he had swam the Po, or passed it above at a bridge, and made a long march after, was not examined; but he came boldly up the plain, and charged our rear with a great deal of fury.

Our artillery was in the lane, and as it was impossible to turn them about, and make way for the army, the rear were obliged to support themselves, and maintain the fight for above an hour and a half.

In this time we lost abundance of men, and had it not been for two accidents, all that line would certainly have been cut off: one was, that the wood was so near, that those regiments which were disordered presently sheltered themselves therein; the other was, that by this time Marshal Schomberg, with the horse of the van, began to get back through the lane, and to make good the ground from whence the other had been beat, till at last, by this means, it came to almost a pitched battle.

There were two regiments of French dragoons who did excellent service in this action, and maintained their ground till they were nearly all killed.

Had the Duke of Savoy contented himself with the defeat of five regiments on the right, which he quite broke and drove into the wood, and with the slaughter and havoc which he had made among the rest, he would have come off with honour, and might have called it a victory; but endeavouring to break the whole party, and carry off some cannon, the obstinate resistance of these few dragoons lost him his advantages, and held him in play till so many fresh troops got through the pass again as made us too strong for him; and had not night parted them, he had been entirely defeated.

At last, finding our troops increase and spread themselves on his flank, he retired and gave over: we had no great mind to pursue him, though some horse were ordered to follow a little way.

The duke lost above a thousand men, and we almost twice as many; and, but for those dragoons, should have lost the whole rear-guard and half our cannon.

I was in a very sorry case in this action too, being with the rear in the regiment of horse of Perigoort, with a captain of which regiment I had contracted some acquaintance. I would have rode off at first, as the captain desired me, but there was no doing it, for the cannon was in the lane, and the horse and dragoons of the van, eagerly pressing back through it, must have run me down, or carried me with them. The wood was a good shelter for saving one's life, but was so thick there was no passing it on horseback.

Our regiment was one of the first that was broke; and being all in confusion, with the Duke of Savoy's men at our heels, away we ran into the wood. Never was there so much disorder among a parcel of runaways; as the wood was so exceeding bushy and thick at the bottom, there was no entering it; and a volley of small shot from a regiment of Savoy's dragoons, pouring in upon us at our breaking into the wood, made terrible work among our horses.

For my part, I was got into the wood, but was forced to quit my horse, and by that means, with a great deal of difficulty, got a little further in, where there was a little open place, and, being quite spent with labouring among the bushes, I sat down, resolving to take my fate there, let it be what it would, for I was not able to go any further. I had twenty or thirty more, in the same condition, came to me in less than half an hour; and here we waited very securely the success of the battle, which was as before.

It was no small relief to those with me to hear the Savoyards were beaten, for otherwise they had all been lost: and for myself, I confess I was glad as it was, because of the danger; but otherwise I cared not much which had the better, for I designed no service among them.

One kindness it did me; I began to consider what I had to do here; and as I could give but a very slender account for what it was I ran all these risks, I resolved they should fight it out themselves, for I would come among them no more.

The captain, with whom, as I noted above, I had contracted some acquaintance in this regiment, was killed in the action, and the French had really a great blow here, though they took care to conceal it all they could; and I cannot, without smiling, read some of the histories of this action, which they are not ashamed to call a victory.

We marched on to Saluces, and the next day the Duke of Savoy presented himself in battalia on the other side of a small river, giving us a fair challenge to pass and engage him. We always said in our camp that the orders were to fight the Duke of Savoy wherever we met him; but though he braved us in our view, we did not care to engage him, but we brought Saluces to surrender upon articles, which the duke could not relieve without attacking our camp, and that he did not care to do.

The next morning we had news of the surrender of Mantua to the Imperial army: we heard of it first from the Duke of Savoy's cannon, which he fired by way of rejoicing, and which seemed to make him amends for the loss of Saluces.

As this was a mortification to the French, it quite damped the success of the campaign, for the Duke de Montmorency imagining that the Imperial general would send immediate assistance to the Marquis Spinola, who besieged Casal, they called frequent councils of war what course to take, and at last resolved to halt in Piedmont.

A few days after their resolutions were changed again by the news of the death of the Duke of Savoy, Charles Emanuel, who died, as some say, agitated with the extremes of joy and grief.

This put our generals upon considering again whether they should march to the relief of Casal; but the chimera of the Germans put them by, and so they took up quarters in Piedmont: they took several small places from the Duke of Savoy, taking advantage of the consternation the duke's subjects were in on the death of their prince, and spread themselves from the sea-side to the banks of the Po.

But here an enemy did that for them which the Savoyards could not, for the plague got into their quarters, and destroyed abundance of people, both of the army and of the country.

I thought then it was time for me to be gone, for I had no manner of courage for that attack; and I think verily I was more afraid of being taken sick in a strange country than ever I was of being killed in battle.

Upon this resolution I procured a pass to go for Genoa, and accordingly began my journey, but was arrested at Villa Franca by a slow lingering fever, which held me about five days, and then turned to a burning malignancy, and at last to the plague. My friend, the captain, never left me night or day; and though for four days more I knew nobody, nor was capable of so much as thinking for myself, yet it pleased God that the distemper gathered in my neck, swelled, and broke. During the swelling I was raging mad with the violence of pain, which, being so near my head, swelled that also in proportion, that my eyes were swelled up, and for twenty hours my tongue and mouth: then, as my servant since told me, all the physicians gave me over as past all remedy, but by the good providence of God the swelling broke.

The prodigious collection of matter which this swelling discharged gave me immediate relief, and I became sensible in less than an hour's time; and in two hours, or thereabouts, fell into a little slumber, which recovered my spirits, and sensibly revived me.

Here I lay by till the middle of September. My captain fell sick after me, but recovered quickly: his man had the plague also, and died in two days: my man held it out well.

At this time we heard of a truce concluded between all parties; and being unwilling to winter at Villa Franca, I got passes, and, though we were both but weak, began to travel in litters for Milan.

And here I experienced the truth of the old English proverb, "That standers-by see more than the gamesters."

The French, Savoyards, and Spaniards, made this peace or truce all for separate and several grounds, and every one as mistaken.

The French yielded to it because they had given over the relief of Casal, and were very much afraid it would fall into the hands of the Marquis Spinola.

The Savoyards yielded to it because they were afraid the French would winter in Piedmont.

The Spaniards yielded to it because the duke being dead, and the Count de Colalto, the Imperial general, giving no assistance, and his army weakened by sickness and the fatigues of the siege, he foresaw he should never take the town, and wanted but to come off with honour.

The French were mistaken, because really Spinola was so weak, that, had they marched on into Montferrat, the Spaniards must have raised the siege.

The Duke of Savoy was mistaken, because the plague had so weakened the French, that they durst not have stayed to winter in Piedmont; and Spinola was mistaken; for though he was very slow, if he had stayed before the town one fortnight longer, Thoiras, the governor, must have surrendered, being brought to the last extremity.

Of all these mistakes the French had the advantage, for Casal was relieved, the army had time to be recruited, and the French had the best of it by an early campaign.

I passed through Montferrat in my way to Milan just as the truce was declared, and saw the miserable remains of the Spanish army, who by sickness, fatigue, hard duty, the sallies of the garrison, and such like consequences, were reduced to less than two thousand men, and of them above one thousand lay wounded and sick in the camp.

Here were several regiments which I saw drawn out to their arms that could not muster above seventy or eighty men, officers and all, and those half starved with hunger, almost naked, and in a lamentable condition.

From thence I went into the town, and there things were still in a worse condition; the houses beat down; the walls and works ruined; the garrison, by continual duty, reduced from four thousand five hundred men to less than eight hundred, without clothes, money, or provisions; the brave governor weak with continual fatigue, and the whole face of things in a miserable case.

The French generals had just sent them thirty thousand crowns for present supply, which heartened them a little; but had not the truce been made as it was, they must have surrendered upon what terms the Spaniards had pleased to make.

Never were two armies in such fear of one another with so little cause; the Spaniards afraid of the French whom the plague had devoured, and the French afraid of the Spaniards whom the siege had almost ruined.

The grief of this mistake, together with the sense of his master, the Spaniard, leaving him without supplies to complete the siege of Casal, so affected the Marquis Spinola, that he died of grief, and in him fell the last of that rare breed of Low-Country soldiers who gave the world so great and just a character of the Spanish infantry as the best soldiers in the world; a character which we see now so very much degenerated, that they hardly deserve the name of soldiers.

I remained at Milan the rest of the winter for the recovery of my health, and also for supplies from England.

Here it was I first heard the name of Gustavus Adolphus, the King of Sweden, who now began his war with the Emperor: and while the King of France was at Lyons the league with Sweden was made, in which the French contributed one million two hundred thousand crowns in money, and six hundred thousand per annum, to the attempt of Gustavus Adolphus. About this time he landed in Pomerania, took the towns of Stettin and Stralsund, and from thence proceeded in that prodigious manner, of which I shall have occasion to be very particular in the prosecution of this work.

I had indeed no intention of seeing that king or his armies, having been so roughly handled already, that I had given over all thoughts of appearing among the fighting people, and resolved in the spring to pursue my journey to Venice, and so for the rest of Italy.

Yet I cannot deny that as every Gazette gave us some accounts of the conquests and victories of this glorious prince, it prepossessed me with secret wishes of seeing him; but these were so young and unsettled, that I drew no resolutions from them for a long while.

About the middle of January I left Milan and came to Genoa, from thence by sea to Leghorn; then to Naples, Rome, and Venice; but saw nothing in Italy that afforded me any diversion.

As for their manners, I saw nothing but lewdness, private murders, stabbing men at the corner of a street or in the dark, hiring of bravoës, and the like; all the diversions here ended in whoring, gaming, and debauchery; these were to me the modern excellencies of Italy, and I had no gust for antiquities.

It was pleasant indeed, when I was at Rome, to say, here stood the Capitol; there the colossus of Nero; here the amphitheatre of Titus; there the aqueduct; here the forum; there the catacombs; here the Temple of Venus; there of Jupiter; here the Pantheon, &c.; but as I never designed to write this book, what was useful I kept in my head, and everything else I left to others.

I observed the people were degenerated from the ancient glorious inhabitants, who were generous, brave, and the most valiant of all nations, to a vicious baseness of soul, barbarous, treacherous, jealous, and revengeful; lewd and cowardly; intolerably proud and haughty; bigoted to blind, incoherent devotion, and the grossest of idolatry.

Indeed, I think the unsuitableness of the people made the place unpleasant to me; for there is so little to recommend a country when the people disgrace it, that all the beauties of the creation cannot make up for the want of those excellencies which agreeable society affords, and this made Italy a very unpleasant country to me. The people were the foil to the place, all manner of hateful vices reigning in their general way of living.

I confess I was not very religious myself, and, being come abroad into the world young enough, might easily have been drawn into evils that had recommended themselves with any tolerable agreeableness to nature and common manners; but when wickedness presents itself full grown in its grossest freedoms and liberties, it quite took all away that agreeableness to vice that the devil had furnished me with; and illustrative to this I cannot but relate a scene which passed betwixt that infernal spirit and myself.

At a certain town in Italy, which shall be nameless, because I will not celebrate the proficiency of one place more than another when I believe the whole country equally wicked, I was prevailed upon, rather than tempted, à la courtesan. If I should describe the women, I must give a very mean character of my own virtue, to say I was allured by any but an extraordinary figure; her face, shape, mien, and dress I may, without vanity, say were the finest that ever I saw. When I had admittance into her apartments, the riches and magnificence of them astonished me; the cupboard, or cabinet of plate, the jewels, the tapestry, and everything in proportion, made me question whether I was not in the chamber of some lady of the best quality; but when, after some conversation, I found that she was really nothing but a courtesan,—in English, a common street whore, a punk of the trace,—I was amazed, and my inclination to her person began to cool. Her conversation exceeded, if possible, the best of quality, and was, I must own, exceeding agreeable; she sang to her lute, and danced as fine as ever I saw, and thus diverted me two hours before anything else was discoursed of; but when the vicious part came upon the stage, I blush to relate the confusion I was in; and when she made a certain motion, by which I understood she might be made use of, either as a lady or as ———, I was quite thunderstruck; all the vicious parts of my thoughts vanished, the place filled me with horror, and I was all over disorder and distraction.

I began, however, to recollect where I was, and that in this country there were people not to be affronted. She easily perceived the disorder I was in, and turned it off with admirable dexterity, began to talk again à la gallant, received me as a visitant, and offered me sweetmeats and some wine.

Here I was in more confusion than before, for I concluded she would neither offer me to eat or drink now without poison, and I was very shy of tasting her treat; but she scattered this fear immediately by readily, and of her own accord, not only tasting, but eating freely of everything she gave me. Whether she perceived my wariness, or the reason of it, I know not, I could not help banishing my suspicion; the obliging carriage and strange charm of her conversation had so much power of me, that I both ate and drank with her at all hazards.

When I offered to go, and at parting presented her five pistoles, I could not prevail with her to take them; when she spoke some Italian proverb which I could not readily understand, but by my guess it seemed to imply, that "She would not take the pay, having not obliged me otherwise." At last I laid the pieces on her toilet, and would not receive them again; upon which she obliged me to pass my word to visit her again, else she would by no means accept my present.

I confess I had a strong inclination to visit her again, and besides thought myself obliged to it in honour to my parole; but after some strife in my thoughts about it I resolved to break my word to her, when, going at vespers one evening to see their devotions, I happened to meet this lady very devoutly going to her prayers.

At her coming out of the church I spoke to her; she paid me her respects with a Signor Inglese, and some words she said in Spanish smiling, which I did not understand. I cannot say here so clearly as I would be glad I might, that I broke my word with her; but if I saw her any more, I saw nothing of what gave me so much offence before.

The end of my relating this story is answered in describing the manner of their address, without bringing myself to confession. If I did anything I have some reason to be ashamed of, it may be a less crime to conceal than expose it. The particulars related, however, may lead the reader of these sheets to a view of what gave me a particular disgust at this pleasant part of the world, as they pretend to call it, and made me quit the place sooner than travellers use to do that go thither to satisfy their curiosity.

The prodigious stupid bigotry of the people also was irksome to me: I thought there was something in it very sordid; the entire empire the priests have over both the souls and bodies of the people, gave me a specimen of that meanness of spirit which is nowhere else to be seen but in Italy, especially in the city of Rome.

At Venice I perceived it quite different; the civil authority having a visible superiority over the ecclesiastic, and the church more subject there to the state than in any other part of Italy.

For these reasons I took no pleasure in filling my history of Italy with remarks of places or things; all the antiquities and valuable remains of the Roman nation are done better than I can pretend to by people who made it more their business: I went to see, and not to write, and as little thought then of these memoirs as I ill-furnished myself to write them.

I left Italy in April, and taking the tour of Bavaria, though very much out of the way, passed through Munich, Passaw, Lints, and at last to Vienna.

I came there the 10th of April, 1631, intending to have gone from thence down the Danube into Hungary, and by means of a pass, which I had obtained from the English ambassador at Constantinople, I designed to have seen all those great towns on the Danube which were then in the hands of the Turks, and which I had read much of in the history of the war between the Turks and the Germans; but I was diverted from my design by the following occasion.

There had been a long bloody war in the empire of Germany for twelve years, between the Emperor, the Duke of Bavaria, the King of Spain, and the Popish princes and electors, on the one side, and the Protestant princes on the other; and both sides having been exhausted by the war, and even the Catholics themselves beginning to dislike the growing power of the house of Austria, it was thought all parties were willing to make peace. Nay, things were brought to that pass, that some of the Popish princes and electors began to talk of making alliances with Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden.

Here it is necessary to observe, that the two Dukes of Mecklenburg having been dispossessed of most of their dominions by the tyranny of the Emperor Ferdinand, and being in danger of losing the rest, earnestly solicited the King of Sweden to come to their assistance; and that prince, as he was related to the house of Mecklenburg, and especially as he was willing to lay hold of any opportunity to break with the Emperor, against whom he had laid up an implacable prejudice, was very ready and forward to come to their assistance.

The reasons of his quarrel with the Emperor were grounded upon the Imperialists concerning themselves in the war of Poland, where the Emperor had sent eight thousand foot and two thousand horse to join the Polish army against the King, and had thereby given some check to his arms in that war.

In pursuance, therefore, of his resolution to quarrel with the Emperor, but more particularly at the instance of the princes above named, his Swedish Majesty had landed the year before at Stralsund with about twelve thousand men, and having joined with some forces which he had left in Polish Prussia, all which did not make thirty thousand, he began a war with the Emperor, the greatest in event, filled with the most famous battles, sieges, and extraordinary actions, including its wonderful success and happy conclusion, of any war ever maintained in the world.

The King of Sweden had already taken Stettin, Stralsund, Rostock, Wismar, and all the strong places on the Baltic, and began to spread himself into Germany; he had made a league with the French, as I observed in my story of Saxony, and had now made a treaty with the Duke of Brandenburg.

In this conjuncture the Emperor called the general diet of the empire to be held at Ratisbon, and by a most exquisite management brought the affairs of the diet to a conclusion exceedingly to his own advantage, and to the further oppression of the Protestants; and, in particular, in the war against the King of Sweden, which was to be carried on in such manner as that the whole burden and charge would lie on the Protestants themselves, and they be made the instruments to oppose their best friends. Other matters also ended equally to their disadvantage, as the methods resolved on to recover the church lands, and to prevent the education of the Protestant clergy; and what remained was referred to another general diet to be held at Frankfort au Main in August, 1631.

I will not pretend to say the other Protestant princes of Germany had never made any overtures to the King of Sweden to come to their assistance; but it is plain they had entered into no league with him; that appears from the difficulties which retarded the fixing the treaties afterwards, both with the Dukes of Brandenburg and Saxony, which unhappily occasioned the ruin of Magdeburg.

But it is plain the Swedes were resolved on a war with the emperor; his Swedish Majesty might, and indeed could not but foresee, that if he once showed himself with a sufficient force on the frontiers of the empire, all the Protestant princes would be obliged, by their interest, or by his arms, to fall in with him, and this the consequence made appear to be a just conclusion, for the electors of Brandenburg and Saxony were both forced to join with him.

First, they were willing to join with him—at least they could not find in their hearts to join with the emperor, of whose power they had such just apprehensions; they wished the Swedes success, and would have been very glad to have had the work done at another man's charge; but, like true Germans, they were more willing to be saved than to save themselves, and therefore hung back and stood upon terms.

Secondly, they were at last forced to it; the first was forced to join by the King of Sweden himself, who, being come so far, was not to be dallied with; and had not the Duke of Brandenburg complied as he did, he had been ruined by the Swede—the Saxon was driven into the arms of the Swede by force; for Count Tilly, ravaging his country, made him comply with any terms to be saved from destruction.

Thus matters stood at the end of the diet at Ratisbon; the King of Sweden began to see himself leagued against at the diet both by Protestant and Papist; and, as I have often heard his majesty say since, he had resolved to try to force them off from the Emperor, and to treat them as enemies equally with the rest, if they did not.

But the Protestants convinced him soon after, that though they were tricked into the outward appearance of a league against him at Ratisbon, they had no such intentions; and by their ambassadors let him know, that they only wanted his powerful assistance to defend their councils, when they would soon convince him that they had a due sense of the emperor's designs, and would do their utmost for their liberty; and these I take to be the first invitations the King of Sweden had to undertake the Protestant cause as such, and which entitled him to say he fought for the liberty and religion of the German nation.

I have had some particular opportunities to hear these things from the lips of some of the very princes themselves, and therefore am the more forward to relate them; and I place them here, because, previous to the part I acted in this bloody scene, it is necessary to let the reader into some part of the story, and to show him in what manner, and on what occasions, this terrible war began.

The Protestants, alarmed at the usage they had met with at the former diet, had secretly proposed among themselves to form a general union or confederacy for preventing that ruin which they saw, unless some speedy remedies were applied, would be inevitable. The Elector of Saxony, the head of the Protestants, a vigorous and politic prince, was the first that moved it; and the Landgrave of Hesse, a zealous and gallant prince, being consulted with, it rested a great while between those two, no method being found practicable to bring it to pass; the Emperor being so powerful in all parts, that they foresaw the petty princes would not dare to negotiate an affair of such a nature, being surrounded with the Imperial forces, who, by their two generals, Wallenstein and Tilly, kept them in continual subjection and terror. This dilemma had like to have stifled the thoughts of the union, as a thing impracticable, when one Seigensius, a Lutheran minister, a person of great abilities, and one whom the Elector of Saxony made great use of in matters of policy as well as religion, contrived for them this excellent expedient.

I had the honour to be acquainted with this gentleman while I was at Leipsic. It pleased him exceedingly to have been the contriver of so fine a structure as the conclusions of Leipsic, and he was glad to be entertained on that subject. I had the relation from his own mouth, when, but very modestly, he told me he thought it was an inspiration darted on a sudden into his mind, when the Duke of Saxony, calling him into his closet one morning with a countenance full of concern, shaking his head, and looking earnestly,

"What will become of us, doctor?" said the duke: "we shall all be undone at Frankfort au Main."

"Why so, please your highness?" says the doctor.

"They will fight the King of Sweden with our armies and money," says the duke, "and entirely devour us and our friends."

"But what is become of our confederacy then," said the doctor, "which your highness had so happily framed, and which the Landgrave of Hesse was so pleased with?"

"Become of it?" said the duke; "it's a good thought enough, but it is impossible to bring it to pass among so many members of the Protestant princes that are to be consulted with; for we neither have time to treat, nor will half of them dare to negotiate the matter, the Imperialists being quartered in their very bowels."

"But may not some expedient be found out," says the doctor, "to bring them altogether to treat of it at a general meeting?"

"It is well proposed," says the duke; "but in what town or city shall they assemble where the very deputies shall not be besieged by Tilly or Wallenstein in fourteen days' time, and sacrificed to the cruelty and fury of the Emperor Ferdinand?"

"Will your highness be the easier in it," replies the doctor, "if a way be found out to call such an assembly upon other causes, at which the Emperor may have no umbrage, and perhaps give his assent? You know the diet at Frankfort is at hand: it is necessary the Protestants should have an assembly of their own, to prepare matters for the general diet, and it may be no difficult matter to obtain it."

The duke, surprised with joy at the motion, embraced the doctor with an extraordinary transport:—"Thou hast done it, doctor," said he, and immediately caused him to draw a form of a letter to the Emperor, which he did with the utmost dexterity of style, in which he was a great master, representing to his Imperial Majesty, that, in order to put an end to the troubles in Germany, his Majesty would be pleased to permit the Protestant princes of the empire to hold a diet to themselves, to consider of such matters as they were to treat of at the general diet, in order to conform themselves to the will and pleasure of his Imperial Majesty, to drive out foreigners, and settle a lasting peace in the empire. He also insinuated something of their resolutions unanimously to give their suffrages in favour of the King of Hungary at the election of a King of the Romans, a thing which he knew the Emperor had in his thoughts, and would push with all his might at the diet. This letter was sent, and the bait so neatly concealed, that the Electors of Bavaria and Mentz, the King of Hungary, and several of the Popish princes, not foreseeing that the ruin of them all lay in the bottom of it, foolishly advised the Emperor to consent to it.

In consenting to this the Emperor signed his own destruction; for here began the conjunction of the German Protestants with the Swede, which was the most fatal blow to Ferdinand and never could be recovered.

Accordingly the diet was held at Leipsic, 8th February, 1630, where the Protestants agreed on several heads for their mutual defence, which were the grounds of the following war: these were the famous conclusions of Leipsic, which so alarmed the Emperor and the whole empire, that, to crush it in the beginning, the Emperor commanded Count Tilly immediately to fall upon the Landgrave of Hesse and the Duke of Saxony, as the principal heads of the union,—but it was too late. (Note 1.)

The conclusions were digested into ten heads.

1. That since their sins had brought God's judgment upon the whole Protestant church, they should command public prayers to be made to Almighty God for the diverting the calamities that attended them.

2. That a treaty of peace might be set on foot, in order to come to a right understanding with the Catholic princes.

3. That a time for such a treaty being obtained, they should appoint an assembly of delegates to meet preparatory to the treaty.

4. That all their complaints should be humbly represented to his Imperial Majesty and the Catholic Electors, in order to a peaceable accommodation.

5. That they claim the protection of the Emperor, according to the laws of the empire, and the present Emperor's solemn oath and promise.

6. That they would appoint deputies, who should meet at certain times to consult of their common interest, and who should be always empowered to conclude of what should be thought needful for their safety.

7. That they shall raise a competent force to maintain and defend their liberties, rights, and religion.

8. That it is agreeable to the constitution of the empire, concluded in the diet at Augsburg, to do so.

9. That the arming for their necessary defence shall by no means hinder their obedience to his Imperial Majesty, but that they will still continue their loyalty to him.

10. They agree to proportion their forces, which, in all, amounted to seventy thousand men. (Note 2.)

The Emperor, exceedingly startled at the conclusions, issued out a severe proclamation or ban against them, which imported much the same thing as a declaration of war, and commanded Tilly to begin, and immediately to fall on the Duke of Saxony with all the fury imaginable, as I have already observed.

Here began the flame to break out; for, upon the Emperor's ban, the Protestants sent away to the King of Sweden for succour. His Swedish Majesty had already conquered Mecklenburg and part of Pomerania, and was advancing with his victorious troops, increased by the addition of some regiments raised in those parts, in order to carry on the war against the Emperor, having designed to follow up the Oder into Silesia, and so to push the war home to the Emperor's hereditary countries of Austria and Bohemia, when the first messengers came to him in this case; but this changed his measures, and brought him to the frontiers of Brandenburg, resolved to answer the desires of the Protestants. But here the Duke of Brandenburg began to halt, making some difficulties, and demanding terms, which drove the King to use some extremities with him, and stopt the Swede for a while, who had otherwise been on the banks of the Elbe as soon as Tilly, the Imperial general, had entered Saxony, which if they had done, the miserable destruction of Magdeburg had been prevented, as I have observed before.

The King had been invited into the union, and when he first came back from the banks of the Oder he had accepted it, and was preparing to back it with all his power. The Duke of Saxony had already a good army, which he had with infinite diligence recruited, and mustered under the cannon of Leipsic. The King of Sweden having, by his ambassador at Leipsic, entered into the union of the Protestants, was advancing victoriously to their aid, just as Count Tilly had entered the Duke of Saxony's dominions.

The fame of the Swedish conquests, and of the hero who commanded them, shook my resolution of travelling into Turkey, being resolved to see the conjunction of the Protestants' armies, and, before the fire was broken out too far, to take the advantage of seeing both sides.

While I remained at Vienna, uncertain which way I should proceed, I remember I observed they talked of the King of Sweden as a prince of no consideration; one that they might let go on and tire himself in Mecklenburg, and thereabout, till they could find leisure to deal with him, and then might be crushed as they pleased; but as it is never safe to despise an enemy, so this was not an enemy to be despised, as they afterwards found.

As to the conclusions of Leipsic, indeed at first they gave the Imperial court some uneasiness; but when they found the Imperial armies began to fright the members out of the union, and that the several branches had no considerable forces on foot, it was the general discourse at Vienna that the union at Leipsic only gave the Emperor an opportunity to crush absolutely the Dukes of Saxony, Brandenburg, and the Landgrave of Hesse, and they looked upon it as a thing certain.

I never saw any real concern in their faces at Vienna until news came to court that the King of Sweden had entered into the union; but as this made them very uneasy, they began to move the powerfulest methods possible to divert this storm; and upon this news Tilly was hastened to fall upon Saxony before this union could proceed to a conjunction of forces.

This was certainly a very good resolution, and no measure could have been more exactly concerted, had not the diligence of the Saxons prevented it.

The gathering of this storm, which, from a cloud, began to spread over the empire, and from the little duchy of Mecklenburg began to threaten all Germany, absolutely determined me, as I noted before, as to travelling; and, laying aside the thoughts of Hungary, I resolved, if possible, to see the King of Sweden's army.

I parted from Vienna the middle of May, and took post for Great Glogau, in Silesia, as if I had purposed to pass into Poland, but designing indeed to go down the Oder to Custrin, in the marquisate of Brandenburg, and so to Berlin; but when I came to the frontiers of Silesia, though I had passes, I could go no further, the guards on all the frontiers were so strict; so I was obliged to come back into Bohemia, and went to Prague.

From hence I found I could easily pass through the Imperial provinces to the Lower Saxony, and accordingly took passes for Hamburg, designing, however, to use them no further than I found occasion. By virtue of these passes I got into the Imperial army under Count Tilly, then at the siege of Magdeburg, May the second. (Note 3.)

I confess I did not foresee the fate of this city; neither, I believe, did Count Tilly himself think of glutting his fury with so entire a desolation; much less did the people expect it. I did believe they must capitulate; and I perceived, by discourse in the army, that Tilly would give them but very indifferent conditions, but it fell out otherwise. The treaty of surrender was, as it were, begun, nay some say concluded, when some of the outguards of the Imperialists, finding the citizens had abandoned the guards of the works, and looked to themselves with less diligence than usual, they broke in, carried a half moon sword in hand with little resistance; and though it was a surprise on both sides, the citizens neither fearing, nor the army expecting, the occasion, the garrison, with as much resolution as could be expected under such a fright, flew to the walls, twice beat the Imperialists off; but fresh men coming up, and the administrator of Magdeburg himself being wounded and taken, the enemy broke in, took the city by storm, and entered with such terrible fury, that, without respect to age or condition, they put all the garrison and inhabitants, man, woman, and child, to the sword, plundered the city, and, when they had done, set it on fire.

This calamity, sure, was the most dreadful sight that ever I saw: the rage of the Imperial soldiers was quite intolerable, and not to be expressed. Out of twenty-five thousand, some said thirty thousand people, there was not a soul to be seen alive, till the flames drove those that were hid in vaults and secret places to seek death in the streets, rather than perish in the fire. Of these miserable creatures some were killed, too, by the furious soldiers; but at last they saved the lives of such as came out of their cellars and holes, and so about two thousand poor desperate creatures were left. The exact number of those that perished in this city could never be known, because those the soldiers had first butchered the flames afterwards consumed.

I was on the other side the Elbe when this dreadful piece of butchery was done. The city of Magdeburg had a sconce or fort over against it, called the toll-house, which joined to the city by a very fine bridge of boats. This was taken by the Imperialists a few days before; and having a mind to see it, and the rather because from thence I could have a very good view of the city, I was gone over Tilly's bridge of boats to view this fort. About ten o'clock in the morning I perceived they were storming by the firing, and immediately all ran to the works: I little thought of the taking the city, but imagined it might be some out-work attacked; for we all expected the city would surrender that day or next, and they might have capitulated upon very good terms.

Being upon the works of the fort, on a sudden I heard a cry in the city that that cannot be imagined, and it is not possible to express the manner of it; but I could see the women and children running about the streets in a most lamentable condition.

The city wall did not run along the side of the river with so great a height, but we could plainly see the market place, and several streets which ran down to the river. In about an hour's time after this first cry all was confusion; there was little shooting; the execution was all cutting of throats and mere house-murders. The resolute garrison, with the brave Baron Falenberg, fought it out to the last, and were cut in pieces; and by this time the Imperial soldiers having broke open the gates and entered on all sides, the slaughter was very dreadful. We could see the poor people in crowds driven down the streets, flying from the fury of the soldiers, who followed, butchering them as fast as they could, till, driving them to the river's edge, the desperate wretches threw themselves into the river, where thousands perished, especially women and children.

Several men that could swim got over to our side, where the soldiers, not heated with fight, gave them quarter, and took them up; and I cannot but do this justice to the German officers in the fort, they had five small flat boats, and they gave leave to the soldiers to go off in them, and get what booty they could, but charged them not to kill anybody, but take them all prisoners.

Their humanity was not ill rewarded; for the soldiers, wisely avoiding those places where their fellows were employed in butchering the mise-nable people, rowed to other places, where crowds of people stood crying out for help, and expecting to be every minute either drowned or murdered: of these, at sundry times, they fetched over near six hundred, but took care to take in none but such as offered them good pay.

Never was money or jewels of greater service than now, for they that had anything of that sort to offer were soonest helped.

There was a burgher of the town, who, seeing a boat coming near him, but out of his call, by the help of a speaking-trumpet told the soldiers he would give them twenty thousand dollars to fetch him off: they rowed close to the shore, and took him, with his wife and six children, into the boat; but such throngs of people got about it, they had like to have sunk her; so that the soldiers were fain to drive a great many out again by main force; and while they were doing this, some of the enemy, coming down the street, desperately drove them all into the water.

The boat, however, brought the burgher and his wife and children safe; and though they had not all that wealth about them, yet in jewels and money he gave them so much as made all the fellows very rich.

I cannot pretend to describe the cruelty of this day; the town by five in the afternoon was all in flames; the wealth consumed was inestimable, and a loss to the very conqueror. I think there was little or nothing left but the great church, and about one hundred houses.

This was a sad welcome into the army for me, and gave me a horror and aversion to the Emperor's people, as well as to his cause. I quitted the camp the third day after this execution, while the fire was hardly out in the city; and from thence, getting safe conduct to pass into the Palatinate, I turned out of the road at a small village on the Elbe, called Emerfield, but can give but small account of the town, having a boor for our guide, whom we could hardly understand. I arrived at Leipsic on the 17th of May.

We found the elector intense upon strengthening his army, but the people in the greatest terror imaginable, every day expecting Tilly with the German army, who, by his cruelty at Magdeburg, was become so dreadful to the Protestants, that they expected no mercy wherever he came.

The Emperor's power was made so formidable to all the Protestants, particularly since the diet at Ratisbon left them in a worse case than it found them, that they had not only formed the conclusions of Leipsic, which all men looked upon as the effect of desperation rather than any probable means of their deliverance, but had privately implored the protection and assistance of foreign powers, and particularly the King of Sweden, from whom they had promises of a speedy and powerful assistance.

And truly, if the Swede had not, with a very strong hand, rescued them, all their conclusions at Leipsic had served but to hasten their ruin.

I remember very well, when I was in the Imperial army, they discoursed with such contempt of the forces of the Protestants, that not only Imperialists, but the Protestants themselves, gave them up as lost. The Emperor had not less than two hundred thousand men, in several armies, on foot, who most of them were on the back of the Protestants in every corner.

If Tilly did but write a threatening letter to any city or prince of the union, they presently submitted, renounced the conclusions of Leipsic, and received Imperial garrisons, as the cities of Ulm and Memingen, the duchy of Wirtemberg, and several others, and almost all Suabia.

Only the Duke of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse upheld the drooping courage of the Protestants, and refused all terms of peace; slighted all the threatenings of the Imperial generals; and the Duke of Brandenburg was brought in afterwards almost by force.

The Duke of Saxony mustered his forces under the walls of Leipsic, and I, having returned to the city two days before, saw them pass in review.

The duke, gallantly mounted, rode through the ranks, attended by his field-marshal Arnheim, and seemed mighty well pleased with them, and indeed the troops made a very fine appearance; but I that had seen Tilly's army, and his old weather-beaten soldiers, whose discipline and exercises were so exact, and their courage so often tried, could not look on the Saxon army without some concern for them when I considered who they had to deal with.

Tilly's men were rugged, surly fellows; their faces had an air of hardy courage, mangled with wounds and scars; their armour showed the bruises of musket-bullets, and the rust of winter storms. I observed of them their clothes were always dirty, but their arms were clean and bright: they were used to camp in the open fields, and sleep in the frosts and rain; their horses were strong and hardy like themselves, and well taught their exercises.

The soldiers knew their business so exactly, that general orders were enough; every private man was fit to command, and their wheelings, marchings, counter-marchings, and exercises were done with such order and readiness, that the distinct words of command were hardly of any use among them: they were flushed with victory, and scarce knew what it was to fly.

There had passed some messages between Tilly and the duke, and he gave always such ambiguous answers as he thought might serve to gain time; but Tilly was not to be put off with words, and drawing his army towards Saxony, sends four propositions to him to sign, and demands an immediate reply: the propositions were positive.

1. To cause his troops to enter into the Emperor's service, and to march in person with them against the King of Sweden.

2. To give the Imperial army quarters in his country, and supply them with necessary provisions.

3. To relinquish the union of Leipsic, and disown the ten conclusions.

4. To make restitution of the goods and lands of the church.

The Duke, being pressed by Tilly's trumpeter for an immediate answer, sat all night and part of the next day with his privy councillors, debating what reply to give; which at last was concluded, in short, that he would live and die in defence of the Protestant religion and the conclusions of Leipsic, and bade Tilly defiance.

The die being thus cast, he immediately decamped with his whole army for Torgau, fearing that Tilly should get there before him, and so prevent his junction with the Swede. The duke had not yet concluded any positive treaty with the King of Sweden, and the Duke of Brandenburg having made some difficulty of joining, they both stood on niceties till they had like to have ruined themselves at once.

Brandenburg had given up the town of Spandau to the king by a former treaty, to secure a retreat for his army, and the king was advanced as far as Frankfort upon the Oder, when, on a sudden, some small difficulties arising, Brandenburg seemed cold in the matter, and with a sort of indifference demands his town of Spandau to be restored again.

Gustavus Adolphus, who began presently to imagine the duke had made his peace with the Emperor, and so would either be his enemy or pretend a neutrality, generously delivered him his town of Spandau; but immediately turns about, and with his whole army besieges him in his capital city of Berlin.

This brought the duke to know his error; and by the interposition of the ladies, the Queen of Sweden being the duke's sister, the matter was accommodated, and the duke joined his forces with the king.

But the Duke of Saxony had like to have been undone by this delay; for the Imperialists, under Count de Furstenburg, were entered his country, and had possessed themselves of Hall, and Count Tilly was on his march to join him, as he afterwards did, and, ravaging the whole country, laid siege to Leipsic itself. The duke, driven to this extremity, rather flies to the Swede than treats with him, and on the 2nd of September the duke's army joined with the King of Sweden.

I came to Leipsic to see the Duke of Saxony's army, and that being marched, as I have said, for Torgau, I had no business there; but if I had, the approach of Tilly and the Imperial army was enough to hasten me away, for I had no occasion to be besieged there; so on the 27th of August I left the town, as several of the principal inhabitants had done before, and more would have done had not the governor published a proclamation against it; and besides, they knew not whither to fly, for all places were alike exposed. The poor people were under dreadful apprehensions of a siege, and of the merciless usage of the Imperial soldiers, the example of Magdeburg being fresh before them, the duke and his army gone from them, and the town, though well furnished, but indifferently fortified.

In this condition I left them, buying up stores of provisions, working hard to secure their meats, set up palisades, repair their fortifications, and preparing all things for a siege; and following the Saxon army to Torgau, I continued in the camp till a few days before they joined the King of Sweden.

I had much ado to persuade my companion from entering into the service of the Duke of Saxony, one of whose colonels, with whom we had contracted a particular acquaintance, offering him a commission to be cornet in one of the old regiments of horse.

But the difference I had observed between this new army and Tilly's old troops had made such an impression on me, that I confess I had no manner of inclination for the service, and therefore persuaded him to wait awhile till we had seen a little further into affairs, and particularly till we had seen the Swedish army, which we had heard so much of.

The difficulties which the Elector Duke of Saxony made of joining with the king were made up by a treaty concluded with the king on the 2d of September, at Coswig, a small town on the Elbe, where the king's army was arrived the night before; for General Tilly being now entered into the duke's country, had plundered and ruined all the lower part of it, and was now actually besieging the capital city of Leipsic.

These necessities made almost any conditions easy to him; the greatest difficulty was that the King of Sweden demanded the absolute command of the army, which the duke submitted to with less good will than he had reason to do, the king's experience and conduct considered.

I had not patience to attend the conclusions of their particular treaties; but as soon as ever the passage was clear I quitted the Saxon camp, and went to see the Swedish army. I fell in with the out-guards of the Swedes at a little town called Beltsig, on the river Wersa, just as they were relieving the guards, and going to march, and, having a pass from the English ambassador, was very well received by the officer who changed the guards, and with him I went back into the army. By nine in the morning the army was in full march, the king himself at the head of them, on a grey pad, and riding from one brigade to another, ordered the march of every line himself.

When I saw the Swedish troops, their exact discipline, their order, the modesty and familiarity of their officers, and the regular living of the soldiers, their camp seemed a well-ordered city; the meanest countrywoman with her market-ware was as safe from violence as in the streets of Vienna.

There were no regiments of whores in rags, such as followed the Imperialists; nor any women in the camp but such as were known to the provosts to be the wives of the soldiers, who were necessary for washing linen, taking care of the soldiers' clothes, and dressing their victuals.

The soldiers were well clad, not gay, furnished with excellent arms, and exceedingly careful of them; and though they did not seem so terrible as I thought Tilly's men did when I first saw them, yet the figure they made, together with what we had heard of them made them seem to me invincible.

The discipline and order of their marchings, camping, and exercise, was excellent and singular, and which was to be seen in no armies but the king's, his own skill, judgment, and vigilance, having added much to the general conduct of armies then in use.

As I met the Swedes on their march, I had no opportunity to acquaint myself with anybody till after the junction of the Saxon army, and then it being but four days to the great battle of Leipsic, our acquaintance was small, saving what fell accidentally by conversation.

I met with several gentlemen in the king's army who spoke English very well; besides that, there were three regiments of Scots in the army, the colonels whereof I found were extraordinarily esteemed by the king, as the Lord Rea, Colonel Lumsdell, and Sir John Hepburn; the latter of these, after I had by accident become acquainted with, I found had been for many years acquainted with my father, and on that account I received a great deal of civility from him, which afterwards grew into a kind of intimate friendship. He was a complete soldier indeed, and for that reason so well beloved by that gallant king, that he hardly knew how to go about any great action without him.

It was impossible for me now to restrain my young comrade from entering into the Swedish service, and indeed everything was so inviting that I could not blame him.

A captain in Sir John Hepburn's regiment had picked acquaintance with him, and he, having as much gallantry in his face as real courage in his heart, the captain had persuaded him to take service, and promised to use his interest to get him a company in the Scotch brigade.

I had made him promise not to part from me in my travels without my consent, which was the only obstacle to his desires of entering into the Swedish pay; and being one evening in the captain's tent with him, and discoursing very freely together, the captain asked him very short, but friendly, and looking earnestly at me, "Is this the gentleman, Mr Fielding, that has done so much prejudice to the King of Sweden's service?"

I was doubly surprised at the expression, and at the colonel, Sir John Hepburn, coming at that very moment into the tent. The colonel hearing something of the question, but knowing nothing of the reason of it, any more than as I seemed a little to concern myself at it, yet, after the ceremony due to his character was over, would needs know what I had done to hinder his majesty's service.

"So much truly," says the captain, "that if his majesty knew it, he would think himself very little beholden to him."

"I am sorry, sir," says I, "I should offend in anything, who am but a stranger; but if you would please to inform me, I will endeavour to alter anything in my behaviour that is prejudicial to any one, much less to his majesty's service."

"I shall take you at your word, sir," says the captain; "the King of Sweden, sir, has a particular request to you."

"I should be glad to know two things, sir," said I; "first, how that can be possible, since I am not yet known to any man in the army, much less to his majesty? and, secondly, what the request may be?"

"Why, sir, his majesty desires you would not hinder this gentleman from entering into his service, who, it seems, desires nothing more, if he may have your consent."

"I have too much honour for his majesty," returned I, "to deny anything which he pleases to command; but methinks it is some hardship you should make that the king's order which it is very probable he knows nothing of."

Here Sir John Hepburn took the case up something gravely, and, drinking a glass of Leipsic beer to the captain, said—"Come, captain, don't press these gentlemen; the king desires no man's service but what is purely volunteer." So we entered into other discourse; and the colonel, perceiving by my talk that I had seen Tilly's army, was mighty curious in his questions, and seemed very well satisfied with the account I gave him.

The next day, the army having passed the Elbe at Wittenburg, and joined the Saxon army near Torgau, his majesty caused both armies to draw up in battalian, giving every brigade the same post in the lines as he purposed it to fight in.

I must do the memory of that glorious general this honour, that I never saw an army drawn up with so much variety, order, and exact regularity since, though I have seen many armies drawn up by some of the greatest captains of the age; the order by which his men were directed to flank and relieve one another, the methods of receiving one body of men, if disordered, into another, and rallying one squadron without disordering another, was so admirable; the horse everywhere flanked, lined, and defended by the foot, and the foot by the horse, and both by the cannon, was such, that if those orders were but as punctually obeyed, it were impossible to put an army so modelled into confusion.

The review being over, and the troops returned to their camps, the captain, with whom we drank the day before, meeting me, told me I must come and sup with him in his tent, where he would ask my pardon for the affront he gave me before.

I told him he need not put himself to the trouble; I was not affronted at all; that I would do myself the honour to wait on him, provided he would give me his word not to speak any more of it as an affront.

We had not been a quarter of an hour in his tent before Sir John Hepburn came in again, told me he was glad to find me there; that he came to the captain's tent to inquire how to send to me; and that I must do him the honour to go with him to wait on the king, who had a mind to hear the account I could give him of the Imperial army from my own mouth.

I must confess I was at some loss in my mind how to make my address to his majesty; but I had heard so much of his conversible temper, and particular sweetness of humour with the meanest soldier, that I made no more difficulty, but having paid my respects to Colonel Hepburn, thanked him for the honour he had done me, and offered to rise and wait upon him.

"Nay," says the colonel, "we will eat first, for I find Gourdon," which was the captain's name, "has got something for supper, and the king's order is at seven o'clock." Sir John, becoming very friendly, must know my name; which when I had told him, and of what place and family, he rose from his seat, and embracing me, told me he knew my father very well, and had been intimately acquainted with him; and told me several passages wherein my father had particularly obliged him.

After this we went to supper, and the king's health being drunk round, the colonel moved the sooner, because he had a mind to talk with me. When we were going to the king he inquired where I had been, and what occasion brought me to the army.

I gave him the short history of my travels, and that I came hither from Vienna on purpose to see the King of Sweden and his army. He asked me if there was any service he could do me, by which he meant, whether I desired an employment. I pretended not to take him so; but told him the protection his acquaintance would afford me was more than I could have asked, since I might thereby have opportunity to satisfy my curiosity, which was the chief end of my coming abroad.

He, perceiving by this that I had no mind to be a soldier, told me very kindly I should command him in anything; that his tent and equipage, horses and servants, should always have orders to be at my service; but that, as a piece of friendship, he would advise me to retire to some place distant from the army, for they would march to-morrow, and the king was resolved to fight General Tilly, and he would not have me hazard myself; that, if I thought fit to take his advice, he would have me take that interval to see the court at Berlin, whither he would send one of his servants to wait on me.

His discourse was too kind not to extort the tenderest acknowledgment from me that I was capable of. I told him his care was so obliging, that I knew not what return to make, but if he pleased to leave me to my choice, I desired no greater favour than to trail a pike under his command in the ensuing battle.

"I can never answer it to your father, young gentleman," says he, "to suffer you to expose yourself so far."

I replied, my father would certainly acknowledge his friendship in the proposal made me; but I believed he knew him better than to think he would be well pleased with me if I should accept of it; that I was sure my father would have rode post five hundred miles to have been at such a battle under such a general, and it should never be told him that his son had rode fifty miles to be out of it.

He seemed to be something concerned at the resolution I had taken, and replied very quickly upon me, that he approved very much of my courage: "But," says he, "no man gets any credit by running upon needless adventures, nor loses any by shunning hazards which he has no order for. It is enough," says he, "for a gentleman to behave well when he is commanded upon any service: I have had fighting enough," says he, "upon these points of honour, and I never got anything but reproof for it from the king himself."

"Well, sir," said I, "but if a man expects to rise by his valour, he must show it somewhere; and if I were to have any command in an army, I would first try whether I could deserve it: I have never yet seen any service, and must have my induction some time or other: I shall never have a better master than yourself, nor a better school than such an army."

"Well," says Sir John, "but you may have the same school, and the same teaching, after this battle is over; for I must tell you beforehand this will be a bloody touch. Tilly has a great army of old lads that are used to boxing; fellows with iron faces; and it is a little too much to engage so hotly the first entrance into the wars. You may see our discipline this winter, and make your campaign with us next summer, when you need not fear but we shall have fighting enough, and you will be better acquainted with things: we never put our common soldiers upon pitched battles the first campaign, but place our new men in garrisons, and try them in parties first."

"Sir," said I, with a little more freedom, "I believe I shall not make a trade of the war, and therefore need not serve an apprenticeship to it: it is a hard battle where none escape. If I come off, I hope not to disgrace you; and if not, it will be some satisfaction to my father to hear his son died fighting, under the command of Sir John Hepburn, in the army of the King of Sweden; and I desire no better epitaph upon my tomb."

"Well," says Sir John; and by this time we were just come to the king's quarters, and the guards calling to us interrupted his reply; so we went into the court-yard where the king was lodged, which was in an indifferent house of one of the burghers of Dieben, and Sir John stepping up, met the king coming down some steps into a large room which looked over the town-wall into a field where part of the artillery was drawn up. Sir John Hepburn sent his man presently to me to come up, which I did; and Sir John, without any ceremony, takes me up to the king, who was leaning on his elbow in the window. The king turning about, "This is the English gentleman," says Sir John, "who I told your majesty had been in the Imperial army."

"How then did he get hither," says the king, "without being taken by the scouts?" At which question Sir John said nothing.

"By a pass, and please your majesty, from the English ambassador's secretary at Vienna," said I, making a profound reverence.

"Have you then been at Vienna?" says the king.

"Yes, and please your majesty," said I. Upon which the king, folding up a letter he had in his hand, seemed much more earnest to talk about Vienna than about Tilly.

"And pray what news had you at Vienna?"

"Nothing, sir," said I, "but daily accounts, one in the neck of another, of their own misfortunes, and your majesty's conquests, which make a very melancholy court there."

"But pray," said the king, "what is the common opinion there about these affairs?"

"The common people are terrified to the last degree," said I; "and when your majesty took Frankfort on the Oder, if your army had marched but twenty miles into Silesia, half the people would have run out of Vienna; and I left them fortifying the city."

"They need not," replied the king, smiling; "I have no design to trouble them; it is the Protestant countries I must be for." Upon this the Duke of Saxony entered the room, and, finding the king engaged, offered to retire; but the king beckoned with his hand, and called to him in French: "Cousin," says the king, "this gentleman has been travelling, and comes from Vienna;" and so made me repeat what I had said before; at which the king went on with me, and Sir John Hepburn informing his majesty that I spoke High Dutch, he changed his language, and asked me in High Dutch where it was that I saw General Tilly's army? I told his majesty at the siege of Magdeburg.

"At Magdeburg!" said the king, shaking his head. "Tilly must answer to me one day for that city; and if not to me, to a greater king than I. Can you guess what army he had with him?"

"He had two armies with him," said I; "but one, I suppose, will do your majesty no harm."

"Two armies!" said the king.

"Yes, sir; he has one army of about twenty-six thousand men," said I; "and another of above fifteen thousand whores and their attendants;" at which the king laughed heartily.

"Aye, aye," says the king; "those do us as much harm as the twenty-six thousand; for they eat up the country, and devour the poor Protestants more than the men. Well," says the king, "do they talk of fighting us?"

"They talk big enough, sir," said I; "but your majesty has not been so often fought with, as beaten in their discourse."

"I know not for the men," said the king; "but the old man is as likely to do it as talk of it, and I hope to try them in a day or two." The king inquired after that of several matters about the Low Countries, the Prince of Orange, and of the court and affairs in England; and Sir John Hepburn, informing his majesty that I was the son of an English gentleman of his acquaintance, the king had the goodness to ask him what care he had taken of me against the day of battle.

Upon which Sir John repeated to him the discourse we had together by the way: the king seemed particularly pleased with it, and began to take me to task himself.

"You English gentlemen," says he, "are too forward in the wars, which makes you leave them too soon again."

"Your majesty," replied I, "makes war in so pleasant a manner, as makes all the world fond of fighting under your conduct."

"Not so pleasant neither," says the king: "here's a man can tell you that sometimes it is not very pleasant."

"I know not much of the warrior, sir," said I, "nor of the world; but if always to conquer be the pleasure of war, your majesty's soldiers have all that can be desired."

"Well," says the king; "but, however, considering all things, I think you would do well to take the advice Sir John Hepburn has given you."

"Your majesty may command me to anything; but where your majesty and so many gallant gentlemen hazard their lives, mine is not worth mentioning; and I should not dare to tell my father, at my return into England, that I was in your majesty's army, and made so mean a figure, that your majesty would not permit me to fight under your royal standard."

"Nay," replied the king, "I lay no commands; but you are young."

"I can never die, sir," said I, "with more honour than in your majesty's service." I spoke this with so much freedom, and his majesty was so pleased with it, that he asked me how I would choose to serve, on horseback or on foot?

I told his majesty I should be glad to receive any of his majesty's commands; but if I had not that honour, I purposed to trail a pike under Sir John Hepburn, who had done me so much honour as to introduce me into his majesty's presence.

"Do so, then," replied the king; and, turning to Sir John Hepburn, said, "and pray do you take care of him;" at which, overcome with the goodness of his discourse, I could not answer a word, but made him a profound reverence, and retired.

The next day but one, being the 7th of September, before day the army marched from Dieben to a large field about a mile from Leipsic, where we found Tilly's army in full battalian, in admirable order, which made a show both glorious and terrible.

Tilly, like a fair gamester, had taken up but one side of the plain, and left the other free, and all the avenues open for the king's army; nor did he stir to the charge till the king's army was completely drawn up, and advanced towards him. He had in his army forty-four thousand old soldiers, every way answerable to what I said before; and I shall only add, a better army, I believe, never was so soundly beaten.

The king was not much inferior in force, being joined with the Saxons, who were reckoned twenty-two thousand, and who drew up on the left, making a main battle and two wings, as the king did on the right.

His majesty placed himself at the right wing of his own horse; Gustavus Horne had the main battle of the Swedes; the Duke of Saxony had the main battle of his own troops, and General Arnheim the right wing of his horse.

The second line of the Swedes consisted of the two Scotch brigades and three Swedish, with the Finland horse in the wings.

In the beginning of the fight Tilly's right wing charged with such irresistible fury upon the left of the king's army where the Saxons were posted, that nothing could withstand them: the Saxons fled amain, and some of them carried the news over the country that all was lost, and the king's army overthrown; and indeed it passed for an oversight with some, that the king did not place some of his old troops among the Saxons, who were new-raised men. The Saxons lost here near two thousand men, and hardly ever showed their faces again all the battle, except some few of their horse.

I was posted with my companion, the captain, at the head of three Scotch regiments of foot, commanded by Sir John Hepburn, with express directions from the colonel to keep by him.

Our post was in the second line, as a reserve to the king's main battle; and, which was strange, the main battle, which consisted of four great brigades of foot, were never charged during the whole fight, and yet we, who had the reserve, were obliged to endure the whole weight of the Imperial army.

The occasion was, the right wing of the Imperialists having defeated the Saxons, and being eager in the chace, Tilly, who was an old soldier, and ready to prevent all mistakes, forbids any pursuit: "Let them go," said he; "but let us beat the Swedes, or we do nothing."

Upon this the victorious troops fall in upon the flank of the king's army, which, by the Saxons being fled, lay open to them: Gustavus Horne commanded the left wing of the Swedes, and, having first defeated some regiments which charged him, falls in upon the rear of the Imperial right wing, and separates them from the van, who were advanced a great way forward in pursuit of the Saxons; and having routed the rear, or reserve, falls on Tilly's main battle, and defeated part of them; the other part had gone in chace of the Saxons, but now returned, fell in upon the rear of the left wing of the Swedes, charging them in the flank, for they drew up on the very ground which the Saxons had quitted.

This changed the whole front, and made the Swedes face about to the left, and make a great front on their flank to make this good. Our brigades, who were placed as a reserve for the main battle, were, by special order from the king, wheeled about to the left, and placed for the right of this new front to charge the Imperialists: they were about twelve thousand of their best foot, besides horse, and, flushed with the execution of the Saxons, fell on like furies.

The king by this time had almost defeated the Imperialists' left wing: their horse, with more haste than good speed, had charged faster than their foot could follow, and having broke into the king's first line, he let them go; where, while the second line bore the shock, and bravely resisted them, the king followed them on the crupper with thirteen troops of horse and some musketeers, by which, being hemmed in, they were all cut down in a moment, as it were, and the army never disordered with them.

This fatal blow to the left wing gave the king more leisure to defeat the foot who followed, and to send some assistance to Gustavus Horne in his left wing, who had his hands full with the main battle of the Imperialists.

But those troops who, as I said, had routed the Saxons, being called off from the pursuit, had charged our flank, and were now grown very strong, and renewed the battle in a terrible manner.

Here it was I saw our men go to wrack. Colonel Hall, a brave soldier, commanded the rear of the Swedes' left wing: he fought like a lion, but was slain, and most of his regiment cut off, though not unrevenged, for they entirely ruined Furstenburg's regiment of foot. Colonel Cullembach, with his regiment of horse, was extremely overlaid also, and the colonel and many brave officers killed, and, in short, all that wing was shattered, and in an ill condition.

At this juncture came the king, and having seen what havoc the enemy made of Cullembach's troops, he came riding along the front of our three brigades, and led us on to the charge himself. The colonel of his guards, the Baron Dyvel, was shot dead just as the king had given him some orders.

When the Scots advanced, seconded by some regiments of horse, which the king also sent to the charge, the bloodiest fight began that ever man beheld; for the Scotch brigades giving fire three ranks at a time, over one another's head, poured in their shot so thick, that the enemy were cut down like grass before a scythe; and following into the thickest of their foot, with the clubs of their muskets made a most dreadful slaughter, and yet there was no flying—Tilly's men might be killed and knocked down, but no man turned his back, nor would give an inch of ground, but as they were wheeled, marched, or retreated by their officers.

There was a regiment of cuirassiers which stood whole to the last, and fought like heroes, went ranging over the field when all their army was broken, and nobody cared for charging them: they were commanded by Baron Cronenburg, and at last went off from the battle whole. These were armed in black armour from head to foot, and they carried off their general.

About six o'clock the field was cleared of the enemy, except at one place on the king's side, where some of them rallied, and, though they knew all was lost, would take no quarter, but fought it out to the last man, being found dead the next day in rank and file, as they were drawn up.

I had the good fortune to receive no hurt in this battle, excepting a small scratch on the side of my neck by the push of a pike; but my friend received a very dangerous wound when the battle was as good as over.

He had engaged with a German colonel, whose name we could never learn; and having pressed very close upon him so that he had shot his horse, the horse in the fall kept the colonel down, lying on one of his legs; upon which he demanded quarter, which Captain Fielding granting, helped him to quit his horse, and, having disarmed him, was bringing him into the line, when the regiment of cuirassiers, which I mentioned, commanded by Baron Cronenburg, came roving over the field, and with a flying charge saluted our front with a salvo of carabine shot, which wounded us a great many men; and, among the rest, the captain received a shot in his thigh which laid him on the ground, and, being separated from the line, his prisoner got away with them.

This was the first service I was in, and indeed I never saw any fight since maintained with such gallantry, such desperate valour, together with such dexterity of management, both sides being composed of soldiers fully tried, bred to the wars, expert in everything, exact in their order, and incapable of fear, which made the battle much more bloody than usual.

Sir John Hepburn, at my request, took particular care of my comrade, and sent his own surgeon to look after him; and afterwards, when the city of Leipsic was retaken, provided him lodgings there, and came very often to see him; and indeed I was in great care for him too, the surgeons being very doubtful of him a great while; for, having lain in the field all night among the dead, his wound, for want of dressing, and with the extremity of cold, was in a very ill condition, and the pain of it had thrown him into a fever.

It was quite dusk before the fight ended, especially where the last-rallied troops fought so long, and therefore we durst not break our order to seek out our friends; so that it was near seven o'clock the next morning before we found the captain, who, though very weak by the loss of blood, had raised himself up, and placed his back against the buttock of a dead horse.

I was the first that knew him, and, running to him, embraced him with a great deal of joy: he was not able to speak, but made signs to let me see he knew me; so we brought him into the camp, and Sir John Hepburn, as I noted before, sent his own surgeons to look after him.

The darkness of the night prevented any pursuit, and was the only refuge the enemy had left; for had there been three hours more daylight, ten thousand more lives had been lost; for the Swedes, and Saxons especially, enraged by the obstinacy of the enemy, were so thoroughly heated, that they would have given quarter but to few.

The retreat was not sounded until seven o'clock, when the king drew up the whole army upon the field of battle, and gave strict command that none should stir from their order; so the army lay under arms all night, which was another reason why the wounded soldiers suffered very much by the cold; for the king, who had a bold enemy to deal with, was not ignorant what a small body of desperate men rallied together might have done in the darkness of the night, and therefore he lay in his coach all night at the head of the line, though it froze very hard.

As soon as the day began to peep, the trumpets sounded to horse, and all the dragoons and eight horse in the army were commanded to the pursuit: the cuirassiers and some commanded musketeers advanced some miles to make good their retreat, if need were, and all the foot stood to their arms for a reserve. But in half an hour word was brought to the king that the enemy was quite dispersed; upon which detachments were made out of every regiment to search among the dead for any of our friends that were wounded; and the king himself gave a strict order, that if any were found wounded and alive among the enemy, none should kill them, but take care to bring them into the camp—a piece of humanity which saved the lives of near a thousand of the enemy.

This piece of service being over, the enemy's camp was seized upon, and the soldiers permitted to plunder it; all the cannon, arms, and ammunition, were secured for the king's use; the rest was given up to the soldiers, who found so much plunder, that they had no reason to quarrel for shares.

For my share, I was so busy with my wounded captain, that I got nothing but a sword, which I found just by when I first saw him; but my man brought me a very good horse, with furniture and a pistol of extraordinary workmanship.

I bade him get upon his back and make the best of the day for himself, which he did, and I saw him no more till three days after, when he found me out at Leipsic, but was so richly dressed that I hardly knew him; and, after making his excuse for being so long absent, gave me a very pleasant account where he had been.

He told me, that, according to my order, being mounted on the horse he had brought me, he first rode into the field among the dead to get some clothes suitable to the equipage of his horse; and having seized on a laced coat, a helmet, a sword, and an extraordinary good cane, was resolved to see what was become of the enemy, and following the track of the dragoons, which he could easily do by the bodies on the road, he fell in with a small party of twenty-five dragoons, under no command but a corporal, making to a village where some of the enemy's horse had been quartered. The dragoons, taking him for an officer by his horse, desired him to command them: told him the enemy was very rich, and they doubted not a good booty. He was a bold, brisk fellow, and told them with all his heart; but said he had but one pistol, the other being broke with firing; so they lent him a pair, and a small piece they had taken, and he led them on.

There had been a regiment of horse and some troops of Crabats in the village, but they were fled on the first notice of the pursuit, excepting three troops; and these, on sight of this small party, supposing them to be only the first of a greater number, fled in the greatest confusion imaginable: they took the village and about fifty horses, with all the plunder of the enemy, and with the heat of the service, he said, he had spoiled my horse, for which he had brought me two more; for he, passing for the commander of the party, had all the advantage the custom of war gives an officer in like cases.

I was very well pleased with the relation the fellow gave me, and laughing at him, "Well, captain," said I, "and what plunder have you got?"

"Enough, sir," said he, "to make me a captain, if you please, and a troop ready raised too; for the party of dragoons are posted in the village, by my command, till they have further orders."

In short, he pulled out sixty or seventy pieces of gold, five or six watches, thirteen or fourteen rings, whereof two were diamond—one of them worth fifty dollars; silver, as much as his pockets would hold; besides that, he had brought three horses, two of which were laden with baggage, and he had hired a boor to stay with them at Leipsic till he had found me.

"But I am afraid, captain," says I, "you plundered the village, instead of plundering the enemy."

"No, indeed, not we, sir," said he; "but the Crabats had done it for us, and we lit on them just as they were carrying it off."

"Well," said I, "but what will you do with your men? for when you come to give them orders, they will know you well enough."

"No, no," said he, "I took care of that; for just now I gave a soldier five dollars to carry them news that the army was marched to Moersburg, and that they should follow thither to the regiment."

Having secured his money in my lodgings, he asked me if I pleased to see his horses, and to have one for myself? I told him I would see them in the afternoon; but the man being impatient, goes and fetches them. There were three horses, one a very good one—and, by the furniture, an officer's horse of the Crabats, and that my man would have me accept—for the other he had spoiled, as he said.

I was but indifferently horsed before, so I accepted of the horse, and went down with him to see the rest of his plunder: he had three or four pair of pistols, two or three bundles of officer's linen and lace, a field bed and a tent, and several other things of value; but at last coming to a small fardel, "this," says he, "I took whole from a Crabat running away with it under his arm;" so he brought it up into my chamber. He had not looked into it, he said, but he understood it was some plunder the soldiers had made, and, finding it heavy, took it by consent: we opened it, and found it was a bundle of some linen, three or four pieces of plate, and in a small cup three rings, a fine necklace of pearl, and the value of one hundred rix dollars in money.

The fellow was amazed at his own good fortune, and hardly knew what to do with himself. I bade him go take care of his other things; and his horses, and come again; so he went and discharged the boor that waited, packed up all his plunder, and came up to me in his old clothes again.

"How now, captain?" says I, "what! have you altered your equipage already?"

"I am no more ashamed," answered he, "of your livery, than of your service; nevertheless, your servant for what I have got by it."

"Well," said I to him, "but what will you do with all your money?"

"I wish my poor father had some of it," says he; "and, for the rest, I got it for you, sir, and desire you would take it."

This was spoke with so much honesty and freedom, that I could not but take it very kind; but, however, I told him I would not take a farthing from him as his master, but I would have him play the good husband with it, as he had had such good fortune.

He told me he would take my directions in everything.

"Why, then," says I, "I'll tell you what I would advise you to do; turn it all into ready money, and convey it by return home into England, and follow yourself the first opportunity, and, with good management, you may put yourself in a good situation."

The man, with a sort of dejection in his looks, asked me if he had disobligeed me in anything? "Why?" says I. "That you are willing to turn me out of your service," says he.

"No, George," (that was his name) "but you may live on this money without being a servant."

"I would throw it all into the Elbe," says he, "over Torgau-bridge, rather than leave your service; and besides," says he, "cannot I save my money without going from you? I got it in your service, and I will never spend it out of it, unless you put me away. I hope my money will not make me the worse servant: if I thought so, I would soon have little enough."

"Nay, George," says I, "I shall not oblige you to it, for I am not willing to lose you neither;—let us put all our effects together, and see what they come to."

So he laid all on the table, and, by our computation, he had got as much as was worth about fourteen hundred rix-dollars, besides three horses with their furniture, a tent, bed, and some wearing linen. He then took the necklace of pearl, a very good watch, a diamond ring, and one hundred pieces of gold, and laid them by themselves, and having, according to our best calculation, valued the things, he put up all the rest, and, as I was going to ask him what they were left out for, he took them up in his hand, and, coming round the table, told me that if I did not think him unworthy of my service and favour, he begged I would give him leave to make that present to me; that his going out was my first thought that he had got it all in my service, and he should think I had no kindness for him if I refused it.

I was resolved in my mind not to take it from him, and yet I could find no means to resist his importunity. At last I told him I would accept part of his present, and that I esteemed his respect in that as much as the whole; and that I would not have him importune me further, I took the ring and watch, with the horse and furniture, and made him turn all the rest into money at Leipsic, not suffering him, as before, to wear his livery, made him put himself into a tolerable equipage, and taking a young Leipsicker into my service, he attended me as a gentleman from that time forward.

The king's army never entered Leipsic, but proceeded to Moersburg, and from thence to Hall, and so marched on into Franconia, while the Duke of Saxony employed his forces in recovering Leipsic, and in driving the Imperialists out of his country.

I continued at Leipsic twelve days, not being willing to leave Fielding till he was recovered; but Sir John Hepburn so often importuned me to come into the army, and sent me word that the king had very often inquired for me, that at last I consented to go without him; so having made our appointment where to meet, and how to correspond by letters, I went to wait on Sir John Hepburn, who then lay with the king's army at the city of Erfurt in Saxony.

As I was riding between Leipsic and Hall, I observed my horse went very awkwardly and uneasy, and sweat very much, though the weather was cold, and we had ridden but very gently: I fancied, therefore, that the saddle might hurt the horse, and, calling up my new captain, "George," says I, "I believe this saddle hurts the horse;" so we alighted, and, looking under the saddle, found the back of the horse extremely galled: so I bid him take off the saddle, which he did, and, giving the horse to my young Leipsicker to hold, we sat down to see if we could mend it, for there was no town near us. Says George, pointing with his finger, "If you please to cut open the panel there, I'll get something to stuff into it which will bear it from the horse's back."

So while he looked for something to thrust in, I cut a hole in the pannel of the saddle, and, following it with my finger, I felt something hard, which seemed to move up and down again as I thrust it with my finger. "Here's something that should not be here;" said I, not yet imagining what afterwards fell out, and calling him back, bade him put up his finger.

"Whatever it is," says he, "it is this hurts the horse, for it bears just on his back when the saddle is set on." So we strove to take hold of it, but could not reach it: at last we took the upper part of the saddle quite from the pannel, and there lay a silk purse wrapped in a piece of leather, and full of gold ducats.

"Thou art born to be rich, George," says I to him; "here's more money." We opened the purse, and found in it four hundred and thirty-eight pieces of gold.

Here I had a new skirmish with him whose the money should be. I said it was his; he said no: I had accepted of the horse and furniture, and all that was about him was mine, and solemnly vowed he would not have a penny of it. I saw no remedy, but put up the money for the present, mended our saddle, and went on.

We lay that night at Hall, and having had such a booty in the saddle, I made him search the saddles of the other two horses, in one of which he found three French crowns, but nothing in the other.

We arrived at Erfurt the 28th of September; but the army was removed, and entered into Franconia, and at the siege of Koningshoven we came up with them. The first thing I did was to pay my civilities to Sir John Hepburn, who received me very kindly, but told me, withal, I had not done well to be so long from him; that the king had particularly inquired for me, and had commanded him to bring me to him at my return. I told him the reason of my stay at Leipsic, and how I had left that place and my companion, before he was cured of his wounds, to wait on him according to his letters.

He told me the king had spoken some things very obliging about me, and he believed would offer me some command in the army, if I thought well to accept of it. I told him I had promised my father not to take service in an army without his leave; and yet, if his majesty should offer it, I neither knew how to resist it, nor had I an inclination to anything more than the service and such a leader; though I had much rather have served as a volunteer at my own charge, which he knew was the custom of our English gentlemen, than in any command.

He replied, "Do as you think fit; but some gentlemen would give twenty thousand crowns to stand so fair for advancement as you do."

The town of Koningshoven capitulated that day, and Sir John was ordered to treat with the citizens, so I had no further discourse with him then; and the town being taken, the army immediately advanced down the river Main, for the king had his eye upon Frankfort and Mentz, two great cities, both which he soon became master of, chiefly by the prodigious expedition of his march, for within a month after the battle he was in the lower parts of the empire, and had passed from the Elbe to the Rhine, an incredible conquest; had taken all the strong cities, the Bishoprics of Bamberg, of Wurzburg, and almost all the circle of Franconia, with part of Schawberland:—a conquest large enough to be seven years obtaining by the common course of arms.

Business going on thus, the king had not leisure to think of small matters, and I being not thoroughly resolved in my mind, did not press Sir John to introduce me. I had wrote to my father an account of my reception in the army, the civilities of Sir John Hepburn, the particulars of the battle, and indeed pressed him to give me leave to serve the King of Sweden, to which particulars I waited for an answer; but the following occasion determined me before an answer could possibly reach me.

The king was before the strong castle of Marienburg, which commands the city of Wurtsburg: he had taken the city, but the garrison and richer part of the burghers were retired into the castle, and, trusting to the strength of the place, which was thought impregnable, they bade the Swedes do their worst. It was well provided with all things, and a strong garrison in it, so that the army indeed expected it would be a long piece of work.

The castle stood on a high rock, and on the steep of the rock was a bastion, which defended the only passage up the hill into the castle. The Scots were chose out to make this attack, and the king was an eye-witness to their gallantry. In the action Sir John was not commanded out, but Sir James Ramsey led them on; but I observed that most of the Scotch officers in the other regiments prepared to serve as volunteers for the honour of their countrymen, and Sir John Hepburn led them on.

I was resolved to see this piece of service, and therefore joined myself to the volunteers. We were armed with partisans, and each man two pistols at his belt; it was a piece of service that seemed perfectly desperate; the advantage of the hill, the precipice we were to mount, the height of the bastion, the resolute courage and number of the garrison, who, from a complete covert, made a terrible fire upon us, all joined to make the action hopeless; but the fury of the Scotch musketeers was not to be abated by any difficulties: they mounted the hill, scaled the works like madmen, running on the enemy's pikes, and after two hours' desperate fight, in the midst of fire and smoke, took it by storm, and put all the garrison to the sword. The volunteers did their part, and had their share of the loss too; for thirteen or fourteen were killed out of thirty-seven, besides the wounded, among whom I received a hurt more troublesome than dangerous, by a thrust of a halberd into my arm, which proved a very painful wound, and it was a great while in being thoroughly recovered.

The king received us as we drew off at the foot of the hill, calling the soldiers his brave Scots, and commending the officers by name. The next morning the castle was also taken by storm, and the greatest booty that ever was found in any one conquest in the whole war. The soldiers got here so much money, that they knew not what to do with it; and the plunder they got here and at the battle of Leipsic made them so unruly, that, had not the king been the best master of discipline in the world, they had never been kept in any reasonable bounds.

The king had taken notice of our small party of volunteers, and though I thought he had not seen me, yet he sent the next morning for Sir John Hepburn, and asked him if I were not come to the army?

"Yes, sir," said Sir John, "he has been here two or three days." And as he was forming an excuse for not having brought me to wait on his majesty, says the king, interrupting him, "I wonder you would let him thrust himself into such a hot piece of service as storming the Port Graft. Pray let him know I saw him, and have a very good account of his behaviour."

Sir John returned with this account to me, and pressed me to pay my duty to his majesty the next morning; and accordingly, though I had but an ill night with the pain of my wound, I was with him at the levee in the castle.

I cannot but give some short account of the glory of that morning. The castle had been cleared of the dead bodies of the enemy; and what was not pillaged by the soldiers, was placed under a guard. There was first, a magazine of very good arms for about eighteen or twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse; a very good train of artillery of eighteen pieces of battery, thirty-two brass field-pieces, and four mortars.

The bishop's treasure, and other public moneys not plundered by the soldiers, which belonged to the officers, amounted to four hundred thousand florins in money; and the burghers of the town, in solemn procession, bareheaded, brought the king three tons of gold as a composition to exempt the city from plunder.

Here was also a stable of gallant horses, which the king had the curiosity to go and see.

When the ceremony of the burghers was over, the king came down into the castle-court, walked on the parade (where the great train of artillery was placed on their carriages) and round the walls, and gave orders for repairing the bastion that was stormed by the Scots; and as at the entrance of the parade Sir John Hepburn and I made our reverence to the king, "Ho! Cavalier," said the king to me, "I am glad to see you," and so passed forward. I made my bow very low; but his majesty said no more at that time.

When the view was over, the king went up into the lodgings, and Sir John and I walked in the chamber for about a quarter of an hour, when one of the gentlemen of the bedchamber came out to Sir John, and told him the king asked for him. He staid but a little with the king, and came out to me, and said the king had ordered him to bring me to him.

His majesty, with a countenance full of honour and goodness, interrupted my compliment, and asked me how I did; at which, answering only with a bow, said the king, "I am sorry to see you are hurt; I would have laid my commands on you not to have shown yourself in so sharp a piece of service, if I had known you had been in the camp."

"Your majesty does me too much honour," said I, "in your care of a life that has yet done nothing to deserve your favour."

His majesty was pleased to say something very kind to me relating to my behaviour in the battle of Leipsic, which I have not vanity enough to write; at the conclusion whereof, when I replied very humbly I was not sensible any service I had done, or could do, could possibly merit so much goodness, he told me he had ordered me a small testimony of his esteem, and withal gave me his hand to kiss. I was now conquered, and with a sort of surprise told his Majesty, I found myself so much engaged by his goodness, as well as my own inclination, that if his Majesty would please to accept of my devoir, I was resolved to serve in his army, or wherever he pleased to command me.

"Serve me!" says the king, "why so you do; but I must not have you be a musqueteer; a poor soldier at a dollar a week will do that; pray, Sir John," says he king, "give him what commission he desires."

"No commission, sir," says I, "would please me better than leave to fight near your majesty's person, and to serve you at my own charge, till I am qualified by more experience to receive your commands."

Why, then, it shall be so, said the king; "and I charge you, Hepburn, when anything offers that is either fit for him, or he desires, you will tell me of it," and giving me his hand again to kiss, I withdrew.

I was followed, before I had passed the castle-court, by one of the king's pages, who brought me a warrant directed to Sir John Hepburn, to go to the master of the horse for an immediate delivery of things ordered by the king himself for my account, where being come, the equerry produced me a very good coach, with four horses, harness, and equipage, and two very fine saddle horses out of the bishop's stable; with these there was a list for those servants, and a warrant to the steward of the king's baggage to defray me, my horses, and servants, at the king's charge, till further orders. I was very much at a loss how to manage myself in this strange freedom of so great a prince and consulting with Sir John Hepburn, I was proposing to him whether it was not proper to go immediately back to pay my duty to his majesty, and acknowledge his bounty in the best terms I could; but while we were resolving to do so, the guards stood to their arms, and we saw the king go out at the gate in his coach to pass into the city, so we were diverted from it for that time. I acknowledge the bounty of the king was very surprising; but I must say it was not so very strange to me when I afterwards saw the course of his management—bounty in him was a natural talent; but he never distributed his favours only where he thought himself both beloved and faithfully served, and when he was so, even the single actions of his private soldiers he would take particular notice of, and publicly own, acknowledge, and reward, of which I am obliged to give some instances,

A private musketeer, at the storming of the castle of Wurtburg, when all the detachment was beaten off, stood in the face of the enemy, fired his piece, and though he had a thousand shot made at him, stood unconcerned, and charged his piece again, and let fly at the enemy, continuing to do so thrice, at the same time beckoning with his hand to his fellows to come on again—which they did, animated by his example, and carried the place for the king.

When the town was taken, the king ordered the regiment to be drawn out, and calling for that soldier, thanked him before them all for taking the town for him, gave him a thousand dollars, and a commission with his own hand for a foot company, or leave to go home, which he chose. The soldier took the commission on his knees, kissed it, and put it into his bosom, and told the king he would never leave his service while he lived.

This bounty of the king's, timed and suited by his judgment, was the reason that he was very well served, universally beloved, and most punctually obeyed by his soldiers, who were sure to be cherished and encouraged if they did well, having the king generally an eye-witness of their behaviour.

My indiscretion, rather than valour, had engaged me so far at the battle of Leipsic, that, being in the van of Sir John Hepburn's brigade, almost three whole companies of us were separated from our line, and surrounded by the enemy's pikes: I cannot but say also, that we were disengaged rather by a desperate charge Sir John made with the whole regiment to fetch us off, than by our own valour, though we were not wanting to ourselves neither; but this part of the action being talked of very much to the advantage of the young English volunteer, and possibly more than I deserved, was the occasion of all the distinction the king used me with.

I had by this time letters from my father, in which, though with some reluctance, he left me at liberty to enter into arms if I thought fit, always obliging me to be directed, and, as he said, commanded, by Sir John Hepburn; at the same time he wrote to Sir John, commending his son's fortunes, as he called it, to his care: which letters Sir John showed the king unknown to me. I took care always to acquaint my father of every circumstance, and forgot not to mention his majesty's extraordinary favour, which so affected my father, that he obtained a very honourable mention of it in a letter from King Charles to the King of Sweden, written by his own hand.

I had waited on his majesty with Sir John Hepburn to give him thanks for his magnificent present, and was received with his usual goodness; and after that I was every day among the gentlemen of his ordinary attendance; and if his majesty went out on a party, as he would often do, or to view the country, I always attended him among the volunteers, of whom a great many always followed him, and he would often call me out, talk with me, send me on messages to towns, to princes, free cities, and the like upon extraordinary occasions.

The first piece of service he put me on had like to have embroiled me with one of his favourite colonels. The king was marching through the Bergstraet, a low country on the edge of the Rhine, and, as all men thought, was going to besiege Heidelberg; but on a sudden orders a party of his guards, with five companies of Scots, to be drawn out. While they were drawing out this detachment, the king called me to him. "Ho! cavalier," says he, that was his usual word, "you shall command this party;" and thereupon gives me orders to march back all night, and in the morning, by break of day, to take post under the walls of the fort of Oppenheim, and immediately to entrench myself as well as I could. Grave Neels, the colonel of his guards, thought himself injured by this command; but the king took the matter upon himself, and Neels told me very familiarly afterwards, "We have such a master," says he, "that no man can be affronted by: I thought myself wronged," says he, "when you commanded my men over my head, but for my life I knew not which way to be angry."

I executed my commission so punctually, that by break of day I was set down within musket-shot of the fort, under covert of a little mount, on which stood a windmill, and had indifferently fortified myself, and at the same time had posted some of my men on two other passes, but at farther distance from the fort, so that it was effectually blocked up on the land side. In the afternoon the enemy sallied on my first entrenchment; but being covered from their cannon, and defended by a ditch which I had drawn across the road, they were so well received by my musketeers, that they retired with the loss of six or seven men. (Note 5.)

The next day Sir John Hepburn was sent with two brigades of foot to carry on the work, and so my commission ended. The king expressed himself very well pleased with what I had done, and, when he was so, was never sparing in telling it: for he used to say that public commendations were great encouragements to valour.

While Sir John Hepburn lay before the fort, and was preparing to storm it, the king's design was to get over the Rhine; but the Spaniards, who were in Oppenheim, had sunk all the boats they could find: at last the king, being informed where some lay that were sunk, caused them to be weighed with all expedition possible, and in the night of the 27th of December, in three boats, passed over his regiment of guards about three miles above the town, and, as the king thought, secure from danger; but they were no sooner landed, and not drawn into order, but they were charged by a body of Spanish horse, and had not the darkness given them opportunity to draw up in the enclosures in several little parties, they had been in great danger of being disordered; but by this means they lined the edges and lanes so with musketeers, that the remainder had time to draw up in battalia, and saluted the horse in such a manner that they drew further off.

The king was very impatient, hearing his men engaged, having no boats nor possible means to get over to help them; at last, about eleven o'clock at night, the boats came back, and the king thrust another regiment into them, and, though his officers dissuaded him, would go over himself with them on foot, and did so. This was three months that very day since the battle of Leipsic was fought, and winter-time too, that the progress of his arms had spread from the Elbe, where it parts Saxony and Brandenburg, to the Lower Palatinate and the Rhine.

I went over in the boat with the king, and never saw him in so much concern in my life, for he was in pain for his men; but before we got on shore the Spaniards retired; however, the king landed, ordered his men, and prepared to entrench; but he had not time, for by this the boats were put off again, the Spaniards not knowing more troops were landed, and being reinforced from Oppenheim, came on again, and charged with great fury; but all things were now in order, and they were readily received and beaten back again. They came on again a third time, and with repeated charges attacked us; but at last, finding us too strong for them, they gave it over. By this time another regiment of foot was come over; and as soon as day appeared, the king, with the three regiments, marched again to the town, which surrendered at the first summons, and the next day the fort yielded to Sir John Hepburn.

The castle at Oppenheim held out still with a garrison of eight hundred Spaniards, and the king, leaving two hundred Scots of Sir James Ramsey's men in the town, drew out to attack the castle. Sir James Ramsey being left wounded at Wurtzburg, the king gave me the command of those two hundred men, which were a regiment, that is, all that were left of a gallant regiment of two thousand Scots, which the king brought out of Sweden with him under that brave colonel. There were about thirty officers who, having no soldiers, were yet in pay, and served as reformadoes with the regiment, and were over and above the two hundred men. The king designed to storm the castle on the lower side by the way that leads to Mentz, and Sir John Hepburn landed from the other side, and marched up to storm on the Rhine port.

My reformado Scots, having observed that the town-port of the castle was not so well guarded as the rest, all the eyes of the garrison being bent towards the king and Sir John Hepburn, came running to me, and told me they believed they could enter the castle sword in hand, if I would give them leave. I said I dare not give them orders, my commission being only to keep and defend the town; but they being very importunate, I told them they were volunteers, and might do what they pleased; that I would lend them fifty men, and draw the rest up to second them, or bring them off, as I saw occasion, so as I might not hazard the town. This was as much as they desired: they sallied immediately, and in a trice the volunteers scaled the port, cut in pieces the guard totally, and burst open the gate, at which the fifty entered. Finding the gate won, I advanced immediately with a hundred musketeers more, having locked up all the gates of the town but the castle port, and leaving still fifty for a reserve just at that gate; the townsmen, too, seeing the castle, as it were, taken, ran to arms, and followed me with above two hundred men. The Spaniards were knocked down by the Scots before they knew what the matter was, and the king and Sir John Hepburn, advancing to storm, were surprised when, instead of resistance, they saw the Spaniards throwing themselves over the walls to avoid the fury of the Scots. Few of the garrison got away, as most of them were either killed or taken; and having cleared the castle, I set open the port on the king's side, and sent his majesty word that the castle was his own.

The king came on, and entered on foot: I received him at the head of the Scotch reformadoes, who all saluted him with their pikes. The king gave them his hat, and turning about, "Brave Scots," says he, smiling, "you were too quick for me:" then, beckoning to me, made me tell him how and in what manner we had managed the storm, which he was exceedingly well pleased with, but especially at the caution I had used to bring them off if they had miscarried, and secure the town.

From hence the army marched to Mentz, which in four days capitulated, with the fort and citadel, and the city paid his majesty three hundred thousand dollars to be exempted from the fury of the soldiers. Here the king himself drew the plan of those invincible fortifications which to this day make it one of the strongest cities in Germany. Friburg, Koningstein, Neustadt, Keiser-Lauteren, and almost all the Lower Palatinate, surrendered at the very terror of the King of Sweden's approach, and never suffered the danger of a siege.

The king held a most magnificent court at Mentz, attended by the Landgrave of Hesse, with an incredible number of princes and lords of the empire, with ambassadors and residents of foreign princes; and here his majesty stayed till March, when the queen, with a great retinue of Swedish nobility, came from Erfurt to see him. The king, attended by a gallant train of German nobility, went to Frankfort, and from thence on to Hoest, to meet the queen, where her majesty arrived February 8th.

During the king's stay in these parts his armies were not idle: his troops, on one side, under the Rhinegrave, a brave and ever-fortunate commander, and under the Landgrave of Hesse on the other, ranged the country from Lorrain to Luxemburg, and passed the Moselle on the west, and the Weser on the north. Nothing could stand before them. The Spanish army, which came to the relief of the Catholic electors, was everywhere defeated, and beaten quite out of the country, and the Lorrain army quite ruined. It was a most pleasant court, to be sure, as ever was seen, where every day expresses arrived of armies defeated, towns surrendered, contributions agreed upon, parties routed, prisoners taken, and princes sending ambassadors to sue for truces and neutralities, to make submissions and compositions, and to pay arrears and contributions.

Here arrived, February 10, the King of Bohemia from England, and with him my Lord Craven, with a body of Dutch horse, and a very fine train of English volunteers, who immediately, without any stay, marched on to Hoest, to wait upon his Majesty of Sweden, who received him with a great deal of civility, and was treated at a noble collation, by the king and queen, at Frankfort. Never had the unfortunate king so fair a prospect of being restored to his inheritance of the Palatinate as at that time, and had King James, his father-in-law, had a soul answerable to the occasion, it had been effected before; but it was a strange thing to see him equipped from the English court with one lord and about forty or fifty English gentlemen in his attendance: whereas, had the King of England now, as it is well known he might have done, furnished him with ten or twelve thousand English foot, nothing could have hindered him taking a full possession of his country; and yet even without that help did the King of Sweden clear almost his whole country of Imperialists, and after his death reinstall his son in the electorate; but no thanks to us.

Lord Craven did me the honour to inquire for me by name, and his majesty of Sweden did me yet more by presenting me to the King of Bohemia, and Lord Craven gave me a letter from my father; and speaking something of my father having served under the Prince of Orange in the famous battle of Nieuport, the King of Sweden, smiling, returned, "And pray tell him from me his son has served as well in the warm battle of Leipsic."

My father being very much pleased with the honour I had received from so great a king, had ordered me to acquaint his majesty, that if he pleased to accept of their service, he would raise him a regiment of English horse, at his own charge, to be under my command, and to be sent over into Holland; and Lord Craven had orders from the King of England to signify his consent to the said levy. I acquainted my old friend, Sir John Hepburn, with the contents of the letter, in order to have his advice, who, being pleased with the proposal, would have me go to the King immediately with the letter; but present service put it off some days.

The taking of Creutznach was the next service of any moment: the King drew out in person to the siege of this town: they soon came to a parley, but the castle seemed a work of difficulty, for its situation was so strong, and so surrounded with works behind and above one another, that most people thought the King would receive a check from it; but it was not easy to resist the resolution of the King of Sweden. (Note 6.)

He never battered it but with two small pieces; but having viewed the works himself, ordered a mine under the first ravelin, which being sprung with success, he commanded a storm. I think there were not more commanded men than volunteers, both English, Scotch, French, and Germans: my old comrade, Captain Fielding, was by this time recovered of his wound at Leipsic, and made one. The first body of volunteers of about forty were led on by Lord Craven, and I led the second, among whom were most of the reformed Scotch officers who took the castle of Oppenheim; the first party was not able to make anything of it; the garrison fought with so much fury, that many of the volunteer gentlemen being wounded, and some killed, the rest were beaten off with loss. The king was in some passion at his men, and rated them for running away, as he called it, though they really retreated in good order, and commanded the assault to be renewed.

It was our turn to fall on next: our Scotch officers, not being used to be beaten, advanced immediately, and Lord Craven, with his volunteers, pierced in with us, fighting gallantly in the breach with a pike in his hand; and to give him the honour due to his bravery, he was with the first on the top of the rampart, and gave his hand to my comrade and lifted him up after him: we helped one another up, till at last almost all the volunteers had gained the height of the ravelin, and maintained it with a great deal of resolution, expecting, when the commanded men had gained the height, to advance upon the enemy, when one of the enemy's captains called to Lord Craven, and said, if they might have honourable terms they would capitulate, which my lord telling him he would engage for, the garrison fired no more, and the captain leaping down from the next rampart, came with Lord Craven into the camp, where the conditions were agreed on, and the castle surrendered.

After the taking of this town, the king, hearing of Tilly's approach, and how he had beaten Gustavus Horne, the king's field-marshal, out of Bamberg, began to draw his forces together, and, leaving the care of his conquests in these parts to his chancellor, Oxenstern, prepared to advance towards Bavaria.

I had taken an opportunity to wait upon his majesty with Sir John Hepburn, and being about to introduce the discourse of my father's letter, the king told me he had received a compliment on my account in a letter from King Charles.

I then said his majesty had, by his exceeding generosity, bound me and all my friends to pay their acknowledgments to him, and that I supposed my father had obtained such a mention of it from the King of England as gratitude moved him to: that his majesty's favour had been shown me to a family both willing and ready to serve him; that I had received some commands from my father, which, if his majesty pleased to do me the honour to accept of, might put me in a condition to acknowledge his majesty's goodness in a manner more proportioned to the sense I had of his favour; and with that I produced my father's letter, and read that clause in it which related to the regiment of horse, which was as follows:—

"I read with the utmost satisfaction the account you gave of the great and extraordinary conquests of the King of Sweden, and with his majesty's singular favour to you. I hope you will be careful to value and deserve so much honour. I am pleased you rather chose to serve as a volunteer at your own charge, than to take any command which, for want of experience, you might have misbehaved in."

"I have obtained of the king that he will particularly thank his majesty of Sweden for the honour he has done you; and if his majesty gives you so much freedom, I could be glad you should, in the humblest manner, thank his majesty, in the name of an old broken soldier."

"If you think yourself officer enough to command them, and his majesty please to accept them, I would have you offer to raise his majesty a regiment of horse, which I think I may nearly complete in our neighbourhood with some of your old acquaintance, who are willing to see the world."

"If his majesty gives you the word, they shall receive his commands in the Maese, the king having promised me to give them arms, and transport them for that service into Holland; and I hope they may do his majesty such service as may be for your honour and the advantage of his majesty's interest and glory."

"YOUR LOVING FATHER."

"'Tis an offer like a gentleman and like a soldier," says the king, "and I'll accept of it upon two conditions: first, that I will pay your father the advance money for raising the regiment; and next, that they shall be landed in the Weser or the Elbe, for which, if the King of England will not, I will pay the passage; for if they land in Holland, it may prove very difficult to get them to us when the army shall be marched out of this part of the country."

I returned this answer to my father, and sent my man George into England to order that regiment, and made him quarter-master. I sent blank commissions for the officers, signed by the King of Sweden, to be filled up as my father should think fit; and when I had the king's order for the commissions, the secretary told me I must go back to the king with them. Accordingly I went back to the king, who, opening the packet, laid all the commissions but one upon a table before him, and bade me take them, and keeping the one still in his hand, "Now," says he, "you are one of my soldiers," and therewith gave me a commission as colonel of horse in present pay.

I took the commission, kneeling, and humbly thanked his majesty: "But," says the king, "there is one article of war I expect of you more than of others."

"Your majesty can expect nothing of me which I shall not willingly comply with," said I, "as soon as I have the honour to understand what it is."

"Why, it is," says the king, "that you shall never fight but when you have orders; for I shall not be willing to lose my colonel before I have the regiment."

"I shall be ready at all times," returned I, "to obey your majesty's commands."

I sent my man express with the king's answer, and the commission to my father, who had the regiment completed in less than two months; and six of the officers, with a list of the rest, came away to me, whom I presented to his majesty, when he lay before Nuremburg, where they kissed his hand.

One of the captains offered to bring the whole regiment travelling as private men to the army in six weeks' time, and either to transport their equipage or buy it in Germany; but it was thought impracticable: however, I had so many came in that manner, that I had a complete troop always about me, and obtained the king's order to muster them as a troop.

On the 8th of March the king decamped, and, marching up the river Maine, bent his course directly for Bavaria, taking several small places by the way, and expecting to engage with Tilly, who he thought would dispute his entrance into Bavaria, kept his army together; but Tilly finding himself too weak to encounter him, turned away, and leaving Bavaria open to the king, marched into the Upper Palatinate. The king, finding the country clear of the Imperialists, comes to Nuremberg, made his entrance into that city the 21st March, and being nobly treated by the citizens, he continued his march into Bavaria, and on the 26th sat down before Donawert: the town was taken next day by storm, so swift were the conquests of this invincible captain. Sir John Hepburn, at the head of the English and Scotch volunteers, entered the town first, and cut all the garrison to pieces, except such as escaped over the bridge.

I had no share in the business of Donawert, being now among the horse, but I was posted on the roads with five troops of horse, where we picked up a great many stragglers of the garrison, whom we made prisoners of war. It is observable, that this town of Donawert was a very strong place and well fortified, and yet such expedition did the king make, and such resolution did he use in his first attacks, that he carried the town without putting himself to the trouble of formal approaches. It was generally his way when he came before any town, with a design to besiege it, not to encamp at a distance, and begin his trenches a great way off, but bring his men immediately within half musket-shot of the place; there, getting under the best cover he could, he would immediately begin his batteries and trenches before their faces, and, if there was any place possible to be attacked, he would fall to storming immediately. By this resolute way of coming on, he carried many a town in the first heat of his men, which would have held out many days against a more regular siege.

This march of the king broke all Tilly's measures; for now he was obliged to face about, and, leaving the Upper Palatinate, to come to the assistance of the Duke of Bavaria; for the king being twenty thousand strong, besides ten thousand foot and four thousand horse and dragoons which joined him from the Düringer Wald, was resolved to ruin the duke, who now lay open to him, and was the most powerful and inveterate enemy of the protestants in the empire.

Tilly was now joined with the Duke of Bavaria, and might together make about twenty-two thousand men, and, in order to keep the Swedes out of the country of Bavaria, had planted themselves along the banks of the river Lech, which runs on the edge of the duke's territories; and having fortified the other side of the river, and planted his cannon for several miles at all the convenient places on the river resolved to dispute the king's passage.

I shall be the longer in relating this account of the Lech, being esteemed in those days as great an action as any battle or siege of that age, and particularly famous for the disaster of the gallant old General Tilly; and for that I can be more particular in it than other accounts, having been an eye-witness to every part of it.

The king, being truly informed of the disposition of the Bavarian army, was once of the mind to have left the banks of the Lech, have repassed the Danube, and so setting down before Ingolstadt, the duke's capital city, by the taking that strong town, to have made his entrance into Bavaria, and the conquest of such a fortress, one entire action; but the strength of the place, and the difficulty of maintaining his leaguer in an enemy's country, while Tilly was so strong in the field, diverted him from that design: he therefore concluded that Tilly was first to be beaten out of the country, and then the siege of Ingolstadt would be easier.

Whereupon the king resolved to go and view the situation of the enemy. His majesty went out the 2nd of April with a strong party of horse which I had the honour to command. We marched as near as we could to the banks of the river, not to be too much exposed to the enemy's cannon, and having gained a little height, where the whole course of the river might be seen, the king halted and commanded to draw up. The king alighted, and, calling me to him, examined every reach and turning of the river by his glass, but finding it run a long and almost a straight course, he could find no place which he liked; but at last turning himself north, and looking down the stream, he found the river fetching a long reach, doubles short upon itself, making a round and very narrow point: "There's a point will do our business," says the king; "and if the ground be good I will pass there, let Tilly do his worst."

He immediately ordered a small party of horse to view the ground, and to bring him word particularly how high the bank was on each side and at the point. "And he," says the king, "shall have fifty dollars that will bring me word how deep the water is."

I asked his majesty leave to let me go, which he would by no means allow; but, as the party was drawing out, a sergeant of dragoons told the king, if he pleased to let him go disguised as a boor, he would bring him an account of everything he desired. The king liked the motion very well, and the fellow being well acquainted with the country, puts on a ploughman's habit, and went away immediately, with a long pole upon his shoulder; the horse lay all this while in the woods, and the king stood undiscerned by the enemy on the little hill aforesaid. The dragoon with his long pole comes boldly to the banks of the river, and calling to the sentinels which Tilly had placed on the other bank, talked with them, asked if they could not help him over the river and pretended he wanted to come to them; at last, being come to the point, where, as I said, the river makes a short turn, he stands parleying with them a great while, and sometimes pretended to wade over; he puts his long pole into the water, till, being gotten up to his middle, he could reach beyond him, where it was too deep, and, shaking his head, came back again.

The soldiers on the other side, laughing at him, asked him if he could swim? He said, "No, I cannot."

"Why, you fool," said one of the sentinels, "the channel of the river is twenty feet deep."

"How do you know that?" said the dragoon.

"Why, our engineer," answered he, "measured it yesterday."

This was what he wanted; but not yet fully satisfied—"Ay, but," says he, "may be it may not be very broad; if one of you would wade in to meet me, till I can reach you with my pole, I would give him half a ducat to pull me over."

The innocent way of his discourse so deluded the soldiers, that one of them immediately strips and goes in up to the shoulders, and our dragoon got in on this side to meet him; but the stream took the other soldier away, and he, being a good swimmer, came over to this side.

The dragoon was then in a great deal of pain for fear of being discovered, and was once going to kill the fellow and make off, but at last resolved to carry on the humour, and having entertained the man with the tale of a tub about the Swedes stealing his oats, the fellow, being cold, wanted to be gone, and the dragoon, as willing to be rid of him, pretended to be very sorry he could not get over the river, and so makes off.

By this, however, he learned both the depth and breadth of the channel, the bottom and nature of both shores, and everything the king wanted to know. We could see him from the hill by our glasses very plain, and could see the soldier naked with him.

"He is a fool," says the king, "he does not kill the fellow and run off;" but when the dragoon told his tale, the king was extremely well satisfied with him, gave him a hundred dollars, and made him a quarter-master of cuirassiers.

The king having further examined the dragoon, he gave him a very distinct account of the ground on this side, which he found to be higher than the enemy's by ten or twelve feet, and a hard gravel.

Hereupon the king resolves to pass there; and, in order to it, gives, himself, particular directions for such a bridge as I believe never any army passed a river on before or since.

His bridge was only loose planks laid upon large tressels, in the same homely manner as I have seen bricklayers raise a low scaffold to build a brick wall. The tressels were made higher than one another to answer to the river as it became deeper or shallower, and were all framed and fitted before any appearance was made of attempting to pass.

When all was ready, the king brings his army down to the bank of the river, and plants his cannon as the enemy had done, some here and some there, to amuse them.

At night, April 4th, the king commanded about two thousand men to march to the point, and to throw up a trench on either side, and quite round it, with a battery of six pieces of cannon at each end, besides three small mounts one at the point, and one on each side, which had each two pieces upon them. This work was begun so briskly, and so well carried on, the king firing all night from the other parts of the river, that by daylight all the batteries at the new work were mounted, the trench lined with two thousand musketeers, and all the utensils of the bridge lay ready to be put together.

Now the Imperialists discovered the design, but it was too late to hinder it; the musketeers in the great trench and the five new batteries made such continual fire, that the other bank, which, as before, laid twelve feet below them, was too hot for the Imperialists; whereupon Tilly, to be provided for the king at his coming over, falls to work in a wood right against the point, and raises a great battery for twenty pieces of cannon, with a breast-work, or line, as near the river as he could to cover his men, thinking that when the king had built his bridge he might easily beat it down with his cannon.

But the king had doubly prevented him, first, by laying his bridge so low that none of Tilly's shot could hurt it, for the bridge lay not half a foot above the water's surface; by which means the king, who in that showed himself an excellent engineer, had secured it from any batteries being made within the land, and the angle of the bank secured it from the remoter batteries on the other side, and the continual fire of the cannon and small shot beat the Imperialists from their station just against it, they having no works to cover them.

And in the second place, to secure his passage he sent over about two hundred men, and after that two hundred more, who had orders to cast up a large ravelin on the other bank just where he designed to land his bridge. This was done with such expedition, too, that it was finished before night, and in a condition to receive all the shot of Tilly's great battery, and effectually covered the bridge.

While this was doing, the king, on his side, lays over his bridge. Both sides wrought hard all day and all night, as if the spade, not the sword, had been to decide the controversy, and that he would get the victory whose trenches and batteries were first ready. In the meanwhile the cannon and musket-bullets flew like hail, and made the service so hot, that both sides had enough to do to make their men stand to their work. The king, in the hottest of it, animated his men by his presence, and Tilly, to give him his due, did the same; for the execution was so great, and so many officers killed, General Attringer wounded, and two serjeant-majors killed, that at last Tilly himself was obliged to be exposed, and to come up to the very face of our line to encourage his men, and give his necessary orders. (Note 7.)

And here, about one o'clock, much about the time that the king's bridge and works were finished, and just as, they said, he had ordered to fall upon our ravelin with three thousand foot, was the brave old Tilly wounded with a musket-bullet in the thigh: he was carried off to Ingolstadt, and lived some days after, but died of his wound the same day as the king had his horse shot under him at the siege of that town.

We made no question of passing the river here, having brought everything so forward, and with such extraordinary success; but we should have found it a very hot piece of work if Tilly had lived one day longer: and if I may give my opinion of it, having seen Tilly's battery and breastwork, in the face of which we must have passed the river, I must say, that whenever we had marched, if Tilly had fallen in with his horse and foot, placed in that trench, the whole army would have passed as much in danger as in the face of a strong town in the storming a counterscarp.

The king, when he saw with what judgment Tilly had prepared his works, and what danger he himself must have run, would often say, that day's success was every way equal to the victory of Leipsic.

Tilly being hurt and carried off, as if the soul of the army had been lost, they began to draw off. The Duke of Bavaria took horse and rode away, as if he had fled out of battle for his life.

The other generals, with a little more caution as well as courage, drew off by degrees, sending their cannons and baggage away first, and leaving some to continue firing on the bank of the river to conceal their retreat. The river preventing any intelligence, we knew nothing of the disaster which had befallen them; and the king, who looked for blows, having finished his bridge and ravelin, ordered to run a line with palisadoes to take in more ground on the bank of the river to cover the first troops he should send over. This being finished the same night, the king sends over a party of his guards to relieve the men who were in the ravelin, and commanded six hundred musketeers to man the new line out of the Scotch brigade.

Early in the morning, a small party of Scots, commanded by a Captain Forbes, of my Lord Rea's regiment, were sent out to learn something of the enemy, the king observing they had not fired all night; and while this party were abroad, the army stood in battalia; and my old friend Sir John Hepburn, whom, of all men, the king most depended upon for any desperate service, was ordered to pass the bridge with his brigade, and to draw up without the line, with command to advance as he found the horse who were to second him come over.

Sir John, being passed without the trench, meets Captain Forbes with some prisoners, and the good news of the enemy's retreat: he sends him directly to the king, who was by this time at the head of his army, in full battalia, ready to follow his vanguard, expecting a hot day's work of it.

Sir John sends messenger after messenger to the king, entreating him to give him orders to advance, but the king would not suffer him, for he was ever upon his guard, and would not venture a surprise; so the army continued on this side the Lech all day and the next night.

In the morning the king sent for me, and ordered me to draw out three hundred horse, and a colonel with six hundred horse, and another with eight hundred dragoons, and ordered us to enter the wood by three ways, but so as to be able to relieve one another; and then ordered Sir John Hepburn with his brigade to advance to the edge of the wood to secure our retreat; and at the same time commanded another brigade of foot to pass the bridge, if necessary, to second Sir John Hepburn; so warily did this prudent general proceed.

We advanced with our horse into the Bavarian camp, which we found forsaken. The plunder of it was inconsiderable; for the exceeding caution the king had used gave them time to carry off all their baggage. We followed them three or four miles, and returned to our camp.

I confess I was most diverted that day with viewing the works which Tilly had cast up, and must own again, that had he not been taken off, we had met with as desperate a piece of work as ever was attempted. The next day the rest of the cavalry came up to us, commanded by Gustavus Horne, and the king and the whole army followed: we advanced through the heart of Bavaria, took Rain at the first summons, and several other small towns, and sat down before Augsburg.

Augsburg, though a protestant city, had a popish Bavarian garrison in it of above five thousand men, commanded by a Fugger, a great family in Bavaria. The governor had posted several little parties as outscouts, at the distance of two miles and a half or three miles from the town. The king, at his coming up to this town, sends me with my little troop and three companies of dragoons to beat in these out-scouts: the first party I discovered was not above sixteen men, who had made a small barricado across the road, and stood resolutely upon their guard. I commanded the dragoons to alight, and open the barricado, which, while they resolutely performed, the sixteen men gave them two volleys of their muskets, and through the enclosures made their retreat to a turnpike about a quarter of a mile further.

We passed their first traverse, and coming up to the turnpike, I found it defended by two hundred musketeers: I prepared to attack them, sending word to the king of the strength of the enemy, and desired some foot to be sent me.

My dragoons fell on, and though the enemy made a very hot fire, had beat them from this post before two hundred foot, which the king had sent me, had come up. Being joined with the foot, I followed the enemy, who retreated, fighting, till they came under the cannon of a strong redoubt, where they drew up; and I could see another body of foot, of about three hundred, join them out of the works.

Upon this I halted, and considering I was in view of the town, and a great way from the army, I faced about, and began to march off. As we marched I found the enemy followed, but kept at a distance, as if they only designed to observe us. We had not marched far before I heard a volley of small shot, answered by two or three more, which I presently apprehended to be at the turnpike, where I had left a small guard of twenty-six men with a lieutenant.

I immediately detached one hundred dragoons to relieve my men, and secure my retreat, following myself as fast as the foot could march.

The lieutenant sent me back word the post was taken by the enemy, and my men cut off. Upon this I doubled my pace, and when I came up I found it as the lieutenant had said; for the post was taken, and defended by three hundred musketeers and three troops of horse. By this time also I found the party in my rear made up towards me; so that I was like to be charged, in a narrow place, both in front and rear.

I saw there was no remedy but with all my force to fall upon that party before me, and so to break through before those from the town could come up with me: therefore, commanding my dragoons to alight, I ordered them to fall on upon the foot. Their horse were drawn up in an enclosed field on one side of the road, a great ditch securing the other side; so that they thought if I charged the foot in front, they would fall upon my flank, while those behind would charge my rear; and, indeed, had the other come in time, they had cut me off. My dragoons made three fair charges on their foot; but were received with so much resolution, and so brisk a fire, that they were beaten off, and sixteen men killed.

Seeing them so rudely handled, and the horse ready to fall in, I relieved them with one hundred musketeers, and they renewed the attack; at the same time with my troop of horse, flanked on both wings with fifty musketeers, I faced their horse, but did not offer to charge them. The case grew now desperate, and the enemy behind were just at my heels with near six hundred men. The captain who commanded the musketeers, and flanked my horse, came up to me, and said, "If we do not force this pass, all will be lost: if you will draw out your troop and twenty of my foot, and fall in, I will engage to keep off the horse with the rest." "With all my heart," said I.

Immediately I wheeled off my troop, and a small party of the musketeers followed me, and fell in with the dragoons and foot, who, seeing the danger too as well as I, fought like madmen. The foot at the turnpike were not able to hinder our breaking through; so we made our way out, killing about one hundred and fifty of them, and put the rest into confusion.

But now I was in as great difficulty as before how to fetch off my brave captain of foot, for they charged home upon him: he defended himself with extraordinary gallantry, having the benefit of a piece of a hedge to cover him; but he lost half his men, and was just upon the point of being defeated, when the king, informed by a soldier that escaped from the turnpike, one of twenty-six, had sent a party of six hundred dragoons to bring me off: these came upon the spur, and joined with me just as I had broke through the turnpike. The enemy's foot rallied behind their horse, and by this time their other party was come in; but, seeing our relief, they drew off together.

I lost above one hundred men in these skirmishes, and killed of the enemy about one hundred and eighty. We secured the turnpike, and placed a company of foot there with one hundred dragoons, and came back well beaten to the army. The king, to prevent such uncertain skirmishes, advanced the next day in view of the town, and, according to his custom, sits down with his whole army within cannon-shot of their walls.

The king won this great city by force of words, for by two or three messages and letters to and from the citizens the town was gained, the garrison not daring to defend them against their wills. His majesty made his public entrance into the city on the 14th of April, and, receiving the compliments of the citizens, advanced immediately to Ingolstadt, which is accounted, and really is, the strongest town in all those parts.

There was a very strong garrison in it, and the Duke of Bavaria lay intrenched with his army under the walls of it, on the other side of the river. The king, who never loved long sieges, having reviewed the town, and brought his army within musket-shot of it, called a council of war, where it was the king's opinion, in short, that the town would cost him more than it was worth, and therefore he resolved to raise the siege.

Here the king, going to view the town, had his horse shot with a cannon-bullet from the works, which tumbled the king and his horse over each other, that every body thought he had been killed, but he received no hurt at all: that very minute, as near as could be learned, General Tilly died in the town of the shot he received on the bank of the Lech.

I was not in the camp when the king was hurt; for the king had sent almost all the horse and dragoons, under Gustavus Horne, to face the Duke of Bavaria's camp, and after that to plunder the country, which truly was a work the soldiers were glad of, for it was very seldom they had that liberty given them, and they made very good use of it when it was, for the country of Bavaria was rich and plentiful, having seen no enemy before during the whole war.

The army having left the siege of Ingolstadt, proceeds to take in the rest of Bavaria. Sir John Hepburn, with three brigades of foot, and Gustavus Horne, with three thousand horse and dragoons, went to the Landshut, and took it the same day. The garrison was all horse, and gave us several camisadoes at our approach, in one of which I lost two of my troops; but when we had beat them into close quarters they presently capitulated.

The general got a large sum of money of the town, besides a great many presents to the officers; and from thence the King went on to Munich, the Duke of Bavaria's court. Some of the general officers would fain have had the plundering of the duke's palace; but the king was too generous—the city paid him four hundred thousand dollars, and the duke's magazine was there seized, in which were one hundred and forty pieces of cannon, and small arms for above twenty thousand men.

The great chamber of the duke's rarities was preserved, by the king's special order, with a great deal of care. I expected to have staid here some time, and to have taken very exact account of this curious laboratory; but being commanded away, I had no time, and the fate of the war never gave me an opportunity to see it again.

The Imperialists, under the command of Commissary Osta, had besieged Bibrach, an Imperial city not very well fortified; and the inhabitants, being under the Swede's protection, defended themselves as well as they could, but were in great danger, and sent several expresses to the king for help.

The king immediately detaches a strong body of horse and foot to relieve Bibrach, and would be the commander himself—I marched among the horse—but the Imperialists saved us the labour; for the news of the king coming frightened away Osta, that he left Bibrach and hardly looked behind him till he got up to the Bodensee, on the confines of Switzerland.

At our return from this expedition the king had the first news of Wallenstein's approach, who, on the death of Count Tilly, being declared generalissimo of the Emperor's forces, had played the tyrant in Bohemia, and was now advancing with sixty thousand men, as they reported, to relieve the Duke of Bavaria. (Note 8.)

The King, therefore, in order to be in a situation to receive this great general, resolves to quit Bavaria, and to expect him on the frontiers of Franconia; and because he knew the Nurembergers, for their kindness to him, would be their first sacrifice, he resolved to defend that city against him, whatever it cost.

Nevertheless he did not leave Bavaria without a defence; but, on the one hand, he left Sir John Bannier with ten thousand men about Augsburg, and the Duke of Saxe-Weimar with another like army about Ulme and Meiningen, with orders so to direct their march as that they might join him upon any occasion in a few days.

We encamped about Nuremburg the middle of June. The army, after so many detachments, was not above nineteen thousand men. The Imperial army, joined with the Bavarian, were not so numerous as was reported, but were really sixty thousand men.

The king, not strong enough to fight yet (as he used to say), was strong enough not to be forced to fight, formed his camp so under the cannon of Nuremburg, that there was no besieging the town, but they must besiege him too; and he fortified his camp in so formidable a manner, that Wallenstein never durst attack him.

On the 30th of June Wallenstein's troops appeared, and on the 5th of July encamped close by the king, and posted themselves not on the Bavarian side, but between the king and his own friends of Schwaben and Frankendal, in order to intercept his provisions, and, as they thought, to starve him out of his camp. (Note 9.)

Here they lay to see who could subsist longest. The king was strong in horse, for we had full eight thousand horse and dragoons in the army, and this gave us great advantage in the several skirmishes we had with the enemy. They had possession of the whole country, and had taken effectual care to furnish their army with provisions: they placed their guards in such excellent order to secure their convoys, that their waggons went from stage to stage as quiet as in time of peace, and were relieved every five miles by parties constantly posted on the road.

And thus the Imperial general sat down by us, not doubting but he should force the king either to fight his way through on very disadvantageous terms, or to rise for want of provisions, and leave the city of Nuremburg a prey to his army; for he had vowed the destruction of the city, and to make it a second Magdeburg.

But the king, who was not to be easily deceived, had countermined all Wallenstein's designs: he had passed his honour to the Nurembergers that he would not leave them, and they had undertaken to victual his army, and secure him from want, which they did so effectually that he had no occasion to expose his troops to any hazard or fatigues for convoys or forage on any account whatever.

The city of Nuremburg is a very rich and populous city; and the king, being very sensible of their danger, had given his word for their defence: and when they, being terrified at the threats of the Imperialists, sent their deputies to beseech the king to take care of them, he sent them word he would, and be besieged with them. They, on the other hand, laid in such stores of all sorts of provision, both for man and horse, that had Wallenstein lain before it six months longer, there would have been no scarcity. Every private house was a magazine: the camp was plentifully supplied with all manner of provisions, and the market always full, and as cheap as in times of peace.

The magistrates were so careful, and preserved so excellent an order in the disposal of all sorts of provision, that no engrossing of corn could be practised, for the prices were every day directed at the town-house; and if any man offered to demand more money for corn than the stated price, he could not sell, because at the town storehouse you might buy cheaper.

Here are two instances of good and bad conduct:—The city of Magdeburg had been entreated by the king to settle funds, and raise money for their provision and security, and to have a sufficient garrison to defend them; but they made difficulties either to raise men for themselves, or to admit the king's troops to assist them, for fear of the charge of maintaining them; and this was the cause of the city's ruin.

The city of Nuremburg opened their arms to receive the assistance proffered by the Swedes, and their purses to defend their town and common cause; and this was the saving them absolutely from destruction. The rich burghers and magistrates kept open houses, where the officers of the army were always welcome; and the council of the city took such care of the poor, that there was no complaining, nor any disorders in the whole city.

There is no doubt but it cost the city a great deal of money; but I never saw a public charge borne with so much cheerfulness, nor managed with so much prudence and conduct, in my life. The city fed about fifty thousand every day, including their own poor, besides themselves; and yet the king had lain thus three months, and finding his armies longer in coming up than he expected, asked the burgrave how their magazines held out. He answered, they desired his majesty not to hasten things for them, for they could maintain themselves and him twelve months longer, if there was occasion. This plenty kept both the army and city in good health, as well as in good heart; whereas nothing was to be had of us but blows; for we fetched nothing from without our works, nor had any business without the line but to interrupt the enemy.

The manner of the king's encampment deserves a particular attention. He was a complete surveyor, and a master in fortification, not to be outdone by any. He had posted his army in the suburbs of the town, and drawn lines round the whole circumference, so that he begirt the whole city with his army: his works were large, the ditch deep, flanked with innumerable bastions, ravelins, hornworks, forts, redoubts, batteries, and pallisadoes, the incessant work of eight thousand men for about fourteen days.

Besides that, the king was adding something or other to it every day; and the very posture of his camp was enough to tell a larger army than Wallenstein's that he was not to be assaulted in his trenches.

The king's design appeared chiefly to be the preservation of the city; but that was not all—he had three armies acting abroad in three several places, namely, Gustavus Horne was on the Mosel; the chancellor Oxenstern about Mentz, Cologne, and the Rhine; Duke William and Duke Bernard, together with General Bannier, in Bavaria; and though he designed they should all join him, and had written to them to that purpose, yet he did not hasten them, knowing that while he kept the main army at bay about Nuremburg they would, without opposition, reduce those several countries they were acting in to his power.

This occasioned his lying longer in the camp at Nuremburg than he would have done, and also his giving the Imperialists so many alarms by his strong parties of horse, of which he was well provided, that they might not be able to make any considerable detachments for the relief of their friends; and here he showed his mastership in the war, for by this means his conquests went on as effectually as if he had been abroad himself.

In the meantime, it was not to be expected two such armies should lie long so near without some action. The Imperial army, being masters of the field, laid the country for about twenty miles round Nuremburg in a manner desolate: what the inhabitants could carry away had been before secured in such strong towns as had garrisons to protect them, and what was left the hungry Crabats devoured, or set on fire; but sometimes they were met with by our men, who often paid them home for it.

There had passed several rencounters between our parties and theirs; and, as it falls out in such cases, sometimes one side, sometimes the other got the better; but I have observed there never was any party sent out by the king's special appointment but always came home with victory.

The first considerable attempt, as I remember, was made on a convoy of ammunition. The party sent out was commanded by a Saxon colonel, and consisted of a thousand horse and five hundred dragoons, who burnt above six hundred waggons loaded with ammunition and stores for the army, besides taking about two thousand muskets, which they brought back to the army.

The latter end of July the king received advice that the Imperialists had formed a magazine for provisions at a town called Freynstat, twenty miles from Nuremburg. Hither all the booty and contributions raised in the Upper Palatinate, and parts adjacent, were brought and laid up in a place of security, a garrison of six hundred men being placed to defend it; and when a quantity of provisions was got together, convoys were appointed to fetch it off.

The king resolved, if possible, to take or destroy this magazine; and sending for Colonel Dubalt, a Swede, a man of extraordinary conduct, he tells him his design, and also that he must be the instrument to put it in execution, and ordered him to take what forces he thought convenient.

The colonel, who well knew the town, and the country about it, told his majesty he would attempt it with all his heart; but he was afraid it would require some foot to make the attack.

"We cannot stay for them," says the king; "you must then take some dragoons with you;" and immediately the king called for me.

I was just going up the stairs as the king's page was coming out to inquire for me; so I went immediately to the king.

"Here is a piece of hot work for you," says his majesty; "Dubalt will tell it you—go together and contrive it."

We immediately withdrew; and when the colonel had acquainted me with the discourse which had passed between the king and himself, I replied I thought dragoons might do as well; so we agreed to take sixteen hundred horse and four hundred dragoons.

The king, impatient in his design, came into the room to us to know what we had resolved on, approved our measures, gave us orders immediately, and, turning to me, says, "You shall command the dragoons, but Dubalt must be general in this case, for he knows the country."

"Your majesty," said I, "shall be always served by me in any figure you please." The king wished us good speed, and hurried us away the same afternoon, in order to get to the place in time.

We could march but slowly because of the carriages we had with us, and came to Freynstat about one o'clock in the night perfectly undiscovered. The guards were so negligent, that we came to the very port before they had notice of us; and a sergeant, with twelve dragoons, thrust in upon the out-sentinels, and killed them without noise.

Immediately ladders were placed to the half-moon which defended the gate, which the dragoons mounted and carried in a trice, about twenty-eight men being cut in pieces within. As soon as the ravelin was taken they burst open the gate, at which I entered at the head of two hundred dragoons, and seized the drawbridge. By this time the town was in alarm, and the drums beat to arms, but it was too late; for, by the help of a petard, we broke open the gate, and entered the town.

The garrison made an obstinate resistance for about half an hour; but our men being all in, and three troops of horse dismounted coming to our assistance with their carbines, the town was entirely mastered by three o'clock, and guards set to prevent anybody running to give notice to the enemy.

There were about two hundred of the garrison killed, and the rest taken prisoners. The town being thus secured, the gates were opened, and Colonel Dubalt came in with the horse.

The guards being set, we entered the magazine, where we found an incredible quantity of all sorts of provisions. There were one hundred and fifty tons of bread, eight thousand sacks of meal, four thousand sacks of oats, and of other provisions in proportion.

We caused as much of it as could be loaded to be brought away in such waggons and carriages as we found, and set the rest on fire, town and all. We staid by it till we saw it past a possibility of being saved, and then drew off with eight hundred waggons which we found in the place, most of which we loaded with bread, meal, and oats.

While we were doing this, we sent a party of dragoons into the fields, who met us again as we came out with about a thousand head of black cattle, besides sheep.

Our next care was to bring this booty home without meeting with the enemy; to secure which Colonel Dubalt immediately dispatched an express to the king to let him know of our success, and to desire a detachment might be made to secure our retreat, being charged with so much plunder.

And it is well the colonel did so; for though we had used all the diligence possible to prevent any notice, yet somebody had carried the news to the Imperial army; and their general, upon this, detaches Major-general Sparr with a body of six thousand men to cut off our retreat.

The king, who had notice of this detachment, marches out in person with three thousand men to wait upon General Sparr. All this was the account of one day. The king met General Sparr at the moment when his troops were divided, fell upon them, routed one part of them, and the rest in a few hours after; killed them one thousand men, and took General Sparr prisoner.

In the interval of this action we came safe to the camp with our booty, which was very considerable, and would have supplied our whole army for a month. Thus we feasted at the enemy's cost, and beat them into the bargain.

The king gave all the live cattle to the Nurembergers, who, though they had really no want of provisions, yet fresh meat was not so plentiful as such provisions, which were stored up in vessels and laid by.

After this skirmish we had the country more at command than before, and daily fetched in fresh provisions and forage from the fields.

The two armies had now lain a long time in sight of one another, and daily skirmishes had considerably weakened them; and the king, beginning to be impatient, hastened the advancement of his friends to join him, in which they were not backward; but having drawn together their forces from several parts, and all joined the Chancellor Oxenstern, news came the 15th of August that they were in full march to join us; and being come to a small town called Bruck, the king went out of the camp with about one thousand horse to view them.

I went along with the horse, and the 21st of August saw the review of all the armies together, which were thirty thousand men, in extraordinary equipage, old soldiers, and commanded by officers of the greatest conduct and experience in the world. There was the rich Chancellor of Sweden, who commanded as general; Gustavus Horne and John Bannier, both Swedes, and old generals; Duke William and Duke Bernard of Weimar, the Landgrave of Hesse Cassel, the Palatine of Birkenfeld, and abundance of princes and lords of the empire.

The armies being joined, the king, who was now a match for Wallenstein, quits his camp, and draws up in battalia before the Imperial trenches; but the scene was changed—Wallenstein was no more able to fight now than the king was before; but keeping within his trenches, stood upon his guard. The king, coming up close to his works, plants batteries, and cannonaded him in his very camp.

The Imperialists, finding the king press upon them, retreated into a woody country about three leagues, and taking possession of an old ruined castle, posted their army behind it.

This old castle they fortified, and placed a very strong guard there. The king having viewed the place, though it was a very strong post, resolved to attack it with the whole right wing. The attack was made with a great deal of order and resolution, the king leading the first party on with sword in hand, and the fight was maintained with the utmost gallantry and obstinacy all the day and the next night too, for the cannon and musket never gave over until the morning; but the Imperialists having the advantage of the hill, of their works and batteries, and being continually relieved, and the Swedes naked, without cannon or works, the post was maintained; and the king, finding it would cost him too much blood, drew off in the morning.

This was the famous fight at Altenberg, where the Imperialist boasted to have shown the world the King of Sweden was not invincible. They call it the victory at Altenberg. It is true the king failed in his attempt of carrying their works; but there was so little of a victory in it, that the Imperial general thought fit not to venture a second attack, but to draw off their army as soon as they could to a safer quarter.

I had no share in this battle, very few of the horse being in the action; but my companion, who was always among the Scotch volunteers, was wounded and taken prisoner by the enemy. They used him very civilly; and the king and Wallenstein straining courtesies with one another, the king released Major-General Sparr without ransom, and the Imperial general sent home Colonel Tortenson, a Swede, and sixteen volunteer gentlemen who were taken in the heat of the action, among whom my captain was one.

The king lay fourteen days facing the Imperial army, and using all the stratagems possible to bring them to a battle, but to no purpose; during which time we had parties continually out, and very often skirmishes with the enemy.

I had a command of one of these parties in an adventure wherein I got no booty, nor much honour. The king had received advice of a convoy of provisions which was to come to the enemy's camp from the Upper Palatinate, and intending to surprise them, he commanded us to waylay them with twelve hundred horse and eight hundred dragoons. I had exact directions given me of the way they were to come, and posting my horse in a village a little out of the road, I lay with my dragoons in a wood by which they were to pass by break of day.

The enemy appeared with their convoy, and being very wary, their outscouts discovered us in wood, and fired upon the sentinel I had posted in a tree at the entrance of the wood. Finding myself discovered, I would have retreated to the village where my horse were posted, but in a moment the wood was skirted with the enemy's horse, and a thousand musketeers advanced to beat me out.

In this dilemma I sent away three messengers one after another for the horse, who were within two miles of me, to advance to my relief; but all my messengers fell into the enemy's hands. Four hundred of my dragoons on foot, whom I had placed at a little distance before me, stood to their work, and beat off two charges of the enemy's foot, with some loss on both sides. Meantime two hundred of my men faced about, and, rushing out of the wood, broke through a party of the enemy's horse who stood to watch our coming out.

I confess I was exceedingly surprised at it, thinking the fellows had done it to make their escape, or else were gone over to the enemy; and my men were so discouraged at it, that they began to look about which way to run for safety, and were just upon the point of disbanding to shift for themselves, when one of the captains called to me aloud to beat a parley and treat. I made no answer, as if I had not heard him, and immediately gave the word for all the captains to come together. The consultation was but short, for the musketeers were advancing to a third charge with numbers which we were not likely to deal with.

In short, we resolved to beat a parley, and demand quarter, for that was all we could expect; when on a sudden the body of horse I had posted in the village, being directed by the noise, had advanced to relieve me, if they saw occasion, and had met the two hundred dragoons, who guided them directly to the spot where they had broke through, and all together fell upon the horse of the enemy who were posted on that side, and, mastering them before they could be relieved, cut them all to pieces and brought me off.

Under the shelter of this party we made good our retreat to the village, but we lost above three hundred men, and were glad to make off from the village too, for the enemy were very much too strong for us.

Returning thence towards the camp, we met with two hundred Crabats who had been upon the plundering account: we made ourselves some amends upon them for our former loss, for we showed them no mercy; but our misfortunes were not ended, for we had just dispatched those Crabats when we fell in with three thousand Imperial horse, who, on the expectation of the aforesaid convoy, were sent out to secure them.

All I could do could not persuade my men to stand their ground against this party; so that, finding they would run away in confusion, I agreed to make off, and, facing to the right, we went over a large common at full trot, till at last fear, which always increases in a flight, brought us to a gallop, with the enemy at our heels.

I must confess I was never so mortified in my life—it was to no purpose to turn—no man would stand by us—we ran for life—and a great many were left by the way, who were either wounded by the enemy's shot, or else could not keep pace with us.

At last, having got over the common, which was near two miles, we came to a lane: one of our captains, a Saxon, and a gentleman of good fortune, alighted at the entrance of the lane, and with a bold heart faced about, shot his own horse, and called his men to stand by him and defend the lane. Some of his men halted, and we rallied about six hundred men, which we posted as well as we could to defend the pass, but the enemy charged us with great fury.

The Saxon gentleman, after defending himself with exceeding gallantry, and refusing quarter, was killed upon the spot. A German dragoon, as I thought him, gave me a rude blow with the stock of his piece on the side of my head, and was just going to repeat it, when one of my men shot him dead. I was so stunned with the blow that I knew nothing; but, recovering, I found myself in the hands of two of the enemy's officers, who offered me quarter, which I accepted, and indeed, to give them their due, they used me very civilly.

Thus this whole party was defeated, and not above five hundred men got safe to the army, nor would half the number have escaped had not the Saxon captain made so bold a stand at the head of the lane.

Several other parties of the king's army revenged our quarrel, and paid them home for it;

but I had a particular loss in this defeat, that I never saw the King of Sweden after; for though his majesty sent a trumpet to reclaim us as prisoners the very next day, yet I was not delivered, some scruple happening about exchanging till after the battle of Lutzen, where that gallant prince lost his life. (Note 10.)

The Imperial army arose from their camp about eight or ten days after the king had removed, and I was carried prisoner in the army till they sat down to the siege of Coburg Castle, and then was left with other prisoners of war, in the custody of Colonel Spezuter, in a small castle near the camp called Neustadt.

Here we continued indifferently well treated, but could learn nothing of what action the armies were upon, till the Duke of Friedland, having been beaten off from the Castle of Coburg, marched into Saxony, and the prisoners were sent for into the camp, as was said, in order to be exchanged.

I came into the Imperial leaguer at the siege of Leipsic, and within three days after the city was surrendered, and I got liberty to lodge at my old quarters in the town upon my parole.

The King of Sweden was at the heels of the Imperialists, for, finding Wallenstein resolved to ruin the Elector of Saxony, the king had collected as much of his divided army as he could, and came upon him just as he was going to besiege Torgaw.

As it is not my design to write a history of any more of these wars than I was actually concerned in, I shall only note, that, upon the king's approach, Wallenstein halted, and likewise called all his troops together, for he apprehended the king would fall on him; and we that were prisoners fancied the Imperial soldiers went unwillingly out, for the very name of the King of Sweden was become terrible to them.

In short, they drew all the soldiers of the garrison they could spare out of Leipsic, and sent for Papenheim again, who was gone but three days before with six thousand men on a private expedition.

On the 10th of November the armies met on the plains of Lutzen—a long and bloody battle was fought; the Imperialists were entirely routed and beaten, twelve thousand slain upon the spot, their cannon, baggage, and two thousand prisoners taken; but the King of Sweden lost his life, being killed at the head of his troops in the beginning of the fight.

It is impossible to describe the consternation the death of this conquering king struck into all the princes of Germany—the grief for him exceeded all manner of human sorrow.

All people looked upon themselves as ruined and swallowed up; the inhabitants of two thirds of all Germany put themselves into mourning for him. When the ministers mentioned him in their sermons or prayers, whole congregations would burst out into tears. The Elector of Saxony was utterly inconsolable, and would for several days walk about his palace like a distracted man, crying, "The saviour of Germany was lost; the refuge of abused princes was gone; the soul of war was dead;" and from that hour was so hopeless of outliving the war, that he sought to make peace with the emperor.

Three days after this mournful victory the Saxons recovered the town of Leipsic by stratagem. The Duke of Saxony's forces lay at Torgow, and perceiving the confusion the Imperialists were in at the news of the overthrow of their army, they resolved to attempt the recovery of the town.

They sent about twenty scattering troopers, who, pretending to be Imperialists fled from the battle, were let in one by one; and still as they came in they staid at the court of guard in the port, entertaining the soldiers with discourse about the fight, and how they escaped, and the like, till the whole number being got in, at a watchword they fell on the guard, and cut them all in pieces; and immediately opening the gate to three troops of Saxon horse, the town was taken in a moment.

It was a welcome surprise to me, for I was then at liberty of course; and the war being now on another footing, as I thought, and the king no more, I resolved to quit the service.

I had sent my man, as I have already noted, into England, in order to bring over the troops my father had raised for the King of Sweden. He executed his commission so well, that he landed with five troops at Embden in a very good condition, and orders were sent them by the king to join the Duke of Lunenburg's army, which they did at the siege of Boxthude, in the Lower Saxony. Here, by long and very sharp service, they were most of them cut off; and though they were several times recruited, yet I understood there were not three full troops left.

The Duke of Saxe-Weimar, a gentleman of great courage, had the command of the army after the death of the king, and managed it with so much prudence, that all things were in as much order as could be expected after so great a loss, for the Imperialists were everywhere beaten, and Wallenstein never made any advantage of the king's death.

I waited on the duke at Hailbron, whither he was gone to meet the great Chancellor of Sweden, where I paid him my respects, and desired he would bestow the remainder of my regiment on my friend Captain Fielding, which he did with all the civility and readiness imaginable. I then took leave of my friend, and prepared to come into England.

I shall only note, that at this diet the Protestant princes of the empire renewed their league with one another, and with the crown of Sweden, and came to several regulations and conclusions for carrying on the war, which they afterwards prosecuted under the direction of the said Chancellor of Sweden.

But it was not the work of a small difficulty, nor of a short time. Having been persuaded to continue almost two years afterwards at Frankfurt, Hailbron, and thereabout, by the particular friendship of that noble, wise man, and extraordinary statesman, Axell Oxenstern, Chancellor of Sweden, I had an opportunity to be concerned in, and present at, several treaties of extraordinary consequence, sufficient for a history, if that were my design.

Particularly, I had the happiness to be present at, and have some concern in, the treaty for the restoring the posterity of the truly noble Palsgrave, King of Bohemia. King James of England had, indeed, too much neglected the whole family; and I might say with authority enough, from my own knowledge of affairs, had nothing been done for them but what was from England, that family had remained desolate and forsaken to this day.

But that glorious king, Gustavus, whom I can never mention without some remark of his extraordinary merit, had left particular instructions with his chancellor to rescue the Palatinate to its rightful lord, as a proof of his design to restore the liberty of Germany, and reinstate the oppressed princes who were subjected to the tyranny of the house of Austria.

Pursuant to this resolution, the chancellor proceeded very much like a man of honour; and though the King of Bohemia died a little before, yet he carefully managed the treaty, answered the objections of several princes who, in the general ruin of the family, had reaped private advantages, settled the capitulations for the quota of contributions very much for their advantage, and fully reinstalled Prince Charles in the possession of all his dominions in the Lower Palatinate, which afterwards was confirmed to him and his posterity by the peace of Westphalia, where all those bloody wars were finished in a peace, which has since been the foundation of the Protestants' liberty, and the best security of the whole empire.

I spent two years rather in wandering up and down than travelling; for though I had no mind to serve, yet I could not find in my heart to leave Germany; and I had obtained some so very close intimacies with the general officers, that I was often in the army, and sometimes they did me the honour to bring me into their councils of war.

Particularly, at that eminent council before the battle of Norlingen, I was invited to the council of war both by Duke Bernard of Weimar and by Gustavus Horne. They were generals of equal worth, and their courage and experience had been so well and so often tried, that more than ordinary regard was always paid to what they said. Duke Bernard was indeed the younger man, and Horne, too, had served longer under our great master the king; but it was hard to judge which was the better general, since they had experience enough, and shown undeniable proofs both of their bravery and conduct.

I am obliged, in the course of my relation, so often to mention the great respect I often received from these great men, that it makes me sometimes jealous lest the reader may think I affect it as vanity.

The truth is, and I am ready to confess the honours I received, upon all occasions, from persons of such worth, and who had such an eminent share in the greatest actions of that age, very much pleased me, and particularly as they gave me occasions to see everything that was doing on the whole stage of the war; for being under no command, but at liberty to rove about, I could come to no Swedish garrison or party, but sending my name to the commanding officer, I could have the word sent me; and if I came into the army, I was often treated as I then was at the famous battle of Norlingen.

I cannot but say that I always looked upon this particular respect to be the effect of the more than ordinary regard the great King of Sweden always showed me, rather than any merit of my own; and the veneration they all had for his memory made them continue to show me all the marks of a suitable esteem.

But to return to the council of war—the great, and indeed the only question before us, was, Shall we give battle to the Imperialists or not? Gustavus Horne was against it, and gave, as I thought, the most invincible arguments against a battle that reason could dictate.

First. They were weaker than the enemy by above five thousand men.

Secondly. The cardinal Infant of Spain, who was in the Imperial army with eight thousand men, was but there as a passenger, being going from Italy to Flanders to take upon him the government of the Low Countries; and if he saw no prospect of immediate action, would be gone in a few days.

Thirdly. They had two reinforcements, one of five thousand men under the command of Colonel Cratz, and one of seven thousand men under the Rhinegrave, who were at hand, the last within three days' march of them.

Lastly. They had already saved their honour, as they had put six hundred foot into the town of Norlingen in the face of the enemy's army, and consequently the town might hold out some days longer.

Fate, rather than reason, certainly guided the rest of the generals against such arguments as these. Duke Bernard and almost all the generals were for fighting, alleging the affront it would be to the Swedish reputation to see their friends in the town lost before their faces.

Gustavus Horne stood stiff to his cautious advice, and was against it; and I thought Baron d'Offkirk treated him a little indecently, for, being very warm in the matter, he told them, that if Gustavus Adolphus had been governed by such cowardly counsel, he had never been conqueror of half Germany in two years.

"No," replied old General Horne very smartly; "but had he been now alive to have testified for me that I was never taken by him for a coward, and yet the king was never for a victory with a hazard when he could have it without."

I was asked my opinion, which I would have declined, not being in any commission; but they pressed me to speak. I told them I was for staying at least till the Rhinegrave came up, who might, if expresses were sent to hasten him, be with us in twenty-four hours. But Offkirk could not hold his passion; and, had not he been overruled, he would have almost quarrelled with Marshal Horne. Upon which the old general, not to foment him, with a great deal of mildness, stood up, and spoke thus:—

"Come, Offkirk," says he, "I'll submit my opinion to you and the majority of our fellow-soldiers. We will fight; but, believe me, we shall have our hands full."

The resolution thus taken, they attacked the Imperial army. I must confess the councils of this day seemed as confused as the resolutions of the night.

Duke Bernard was to lead the van of the left wing, and to post himself upon a hill which was on the enemy's right without their intrenchments; so that, having secured that post, they might level their cannon upon the foot who stood behind the lines, and relieve the town at pleasure.

He marched accordingly by break of day, and falling with great fury upon eight regiments of foot which were posted at the bottom of the hill, he presently routed them, and made himself master of the post. Flushed with this success, he never regarded his own concerted measures of stopping there, and possessing what he had got, but pushes on and falls in with the main body of the enemy's army.

While this was doing Gustavus Horne attacks another post on a hill, where the Spaniards had posted and lodged themselves behind some works they had cast up on the side of the hill. Here they defended themselves with extreme obstinacy for five hours, and at last obliged the Swedes to give it over with loss.

This extraordinary gallantry of the Spaniards was certainly the saving of the Imperial army; for Duke Bernard having all this while resisted the frequent charges of the Imperialists, and borne the weight of two-thirds of their army, was not able to stand any longer; but sending one messenger on the neck of another to Gustavus Horne for more foot, he, finding he could not carry his point, had given it over, and was in full march to second the duke.

But now it was too late; for the King of Hungary, seeing the duke's men, as it were, wavering, and having notice of Horne's wheeling about to second him, falls in with all his force upon his flank, and with his Hungarian hussars made such a furious charge, that the Swedes could stand no longer.

The rout of the left wing was so much the more unhappy, as it happened just upon Gustavus Horne's coming up; for being pushed on with the enemy at their heels, they were driven upon their own friends, who, having no ground to open and give them way, were trodden down by their own runaway brethren. This brought all into the utmost confusion. The Imperialists cried "Victoria," and fell into the middle of the infantry with a terrible slaughter.

I have always observed it is fatal to upbraid an old experienced officer with want of courage. If Gustavus Horn had not been whetted with the reproaches of Baron d'Offkirk, and some of the other general officers, I believe it had saved the lives of one thousand men; for, when all was thus lost, several officers advised him to make a retreat with such regiments as he had yet unbroken, but nothing could persuade him to stir a foot; but, turning his flank into a front, he saluted the enemy as they passed by him in pursuit of the rest with such terrible volleys of small shot as cost them the lives of abundance of their men.

The Imperialists, eager in the pursuit, left him unbroken, till the Spanish brigade came up and charged him; these he bravely repulsed with a great slaughter, and after them a body of dragoons, till, being laid at on every side, and most of his men killed, the brave old general, with all who were left, were made prisoners. (Note 11.)

The Swedes had a terrible loss here; for almost all their infantry were killed or taken prisoners.

Gustavus Horne refused quarter several times, and still those that attacked him were cut down by his men, who fought like furies, and, by the example of their general, behaved themselves like lions. But at last these poor remains of a body of the bravest men in the world were forced to submit. I have heard him say he had much rather have died than been taken, but that he yielded in compassion to so many brave men as were about him; for none of them would take quarter till he gave his consent.

I had the worst share in this battle that ever I had in any action in my life, and that was, to be posted among as brave a body of horse as any in Germany, and yet not to be able to succour our own men, for our foot were cut in pieces, as it were, before our faces, and the situation of the ground was such that we could not fall in. All that we were able to do was to carry off about two thousand of the foot, who, running away in the rout of the left wing, rallied among our squadrons, and got away with us.

Thus we stood till we saw all was lost, and then made the best retreat we could to save ourselves, several regiments having never charged nor fired a shot; for the foot had so embarrassed themselves among the lines and works of the enemy, and in the vineyards and mountains, that the horse were rendered absolutely unserviceable.

The Rhinegrave had made such expedition to join us, that he reached within three miles of the place of action that night, and he was a great safeguard for us in rallying our dispersed men, who else had fallen into the enemy's hands, and in checking the pursuit of the enemy.

And, indeed, had but any considerable body of the foot made an orderly retreat, it had been very probable they had given the enemy a brush that would have turned the scale of victory; for our horse being whole, and in a manner untouched, the enemy found such a check in the pursuit, that sixteen hundred of their forwardest men, following too eagerly, fell in with the Rhinegrave's advanced troops the next day, and were cut in pieces without mercy.

This gave us some satisfaction for the loss, but it was but small compared to the ruin of that day. We lost near eight thousand men upon the spot, and above three thousand prisoners, all our cannon and baggage, and one hundred and twenty colours. I thought I never made so indifferent a figure in my life, and so we thought all, to come away, lose our infantry, our general, and our honour, and not so much as fight for it.

Duke Bernard was utterly disconsolate for old Gustavus Horne, for he concluded him killed; he tore the hair from his head like a madman, and, telling the Rhinegrave the story of the council of war, would reproach himself with not taking his advice, often repeating in his passion, "'Tis I that have been the death of the bravest general in Germany;" would call himself fool and boy, and such names, for not listening to the reasons of an old, experienced soldier. But when he heard he was still alive in the enemy's hands he was the easier, and applied himself to the recruiting his troops, and other business of the war, and it was not long before he paid the Imperialists with interest.

I returned to Frankfort au Main after this action, which happened the 17th of August, 1634; but the progress of the Imperialists was so great that there was no staying at Frankfort. The Chancellor Oxenstern removed to Magdeburg, Duke Bernard and the Landgrave marched into Alsatia, and the Imperialists carried all before them for the remainder of the campaign: they took Philipsburgh by surprise; they took Augsburg by famine; Spire and Treves by sieges, taking the elector prisoner.

But this success did one piece of service to the Swedes, that it brought the French into the war on their side, for the Elector of Treves was their confederate. The French gave the conduct of the war to Duke Bernard. This, though the Duke of Saxony fell off, and fought against them, turned the scale so much in their favour, that they recovered their losses, and proved a terror to all Germany. The further accounts of the war I refer to the histories of those times, which I have since read with great delight.

I confess, when I saw the progress of the Imperial army after the battle of Norlingen, and the Duke of Saxony turning his arms against them, I thought their affairs declining; and giving them over for lost, I left Frankfort, and came down the Rhine to Cologne, and from thence into Holland.

I came to the Hague the 8th of March, 1635, having spent three years and a half in Germany, and the greatest part of it in the Swedish army.

I stayed some time in Holland, viewing the wonderful power of art which I observed in the fortifications of their towns, where the very bastions stand on bottomless morasses, and yet are firm as any in the world. There I had the opportunity of seeing the Dutch army, and their famous general, Prince Maurice.

It is true the men behaved themselves well enough in action, when they were put to it; but the prince's way of beating his enemies, without fighting, was so unlike the gallantry of my royal instructor, that it had no manner of relish with me.

Our way in Germany was always to seek out the enemy and fight him; and, give the Imperialists their due, they were seldom hard to be found, but were as free of their flesh as we were.

Whereas Prince Maurice would lie in a camp till he starved half his men, if by lying there he could but starve two-thirds of his enemy's; so that indeed the war in Holland had more of fatigues and hardships in it, and ours had more of fighting and blows: hasty marches, long and unwholesome encampments, winter parties, counter-marching, dodging, and intrenching, were the exercises of his men, and oftentimes killed him more men with hunger, cold, and diseases, than he could do with fighting.

Not that it required less courage, but rather more; for a soldier had, at any time, rather die in the field by a musket than be starved with hunger, or frozen to death in the trenches.

Nor do I think I lessen the reputation of that great general; for it is most certain he ruined the Spaniards more by spinning the war thus out in length than he could possibly have done by a swift conquest; for had he, Gustavus like, with a torrent of victory dislodged the Spaniards of all the twelve provinces in five years, whereas he was forty years in beating them out of seven, he had left them rich and strong at home, and able to keep him in constant apprehensions of a return of their power.

Whereas, by the long continuance of the war, he so broke the very heart of the Spanish monarchy, so absolutely and irrecoverably impoverished them, that they have ever since languished of the disease, till they are fallen from the most powerful to be the most despicable nation in the world.

The prodigious charge the King of Spain was at in losing the seven provinces broke the very spirit of the nation, and that so much, that all the wealth of their Peruvian mountains have not been able to retrieve it.

King Philip having often declared that war, besides his armada for invading England, had cost him three hundred and seventy millions of ducats, and four millions of the best soldiers in Europe; whereof, by an unreasonable Spanish obstinacy, above sixty thousand lost their lives before Ostend, a town not worth a sixth part either of the blood or money it cost in a siege of three years, and which at last he had never taken, but that Prince Maurice thought it not worth the charge of defending it any longer.

However, I say, their way of fighting in Holland did not relish with me at all. The prince lay a long time before a little fort called Shenks-cans, which the Spaniards took by surprise, and I thought he might have taken it much sooner. Perhaps it might be my mistake; but I fancied my hero, the King of Sweden, would have carried it sword in hand in half the time.

However it was, I did not like it; so, in the latter end of the year, I came to the Hague, and took shipping for England, where I arrived, to the great satisfaction of my father and all my friends.

My father was then in London, and carried me to kiss the king's hand. His majesty was pleased to receive me very well, and to say a great many very obliging things to my father upon my account.

I spent my time very retired from court, for I was almost wholly in the country; and it being so much different from my genius, which hankered after a warmer sport than hunting among our Welsh mountains, I could not but be peeping in all the accounts from Germany to see how things went on. I could never hear of a battle but the Germans were beaten, yet I began to wish myself there.

But when an account came of the progress of Sir John Bannier, the Swedish general in Saxony, and of the constant victories he had there over the Saxons, I could no longer contain myself, and told my father this life was very disagreeable to me; that I lost my time here, and might to much more advantage go into Germany, where I was sure I might make my fortune upon my own terms; that, young as I was, I might have been a general officer by this time, if I had not laid down my commission; and if he pleased to give me leave, I would go to Germany again.

My father was very unwilling to let me go; but, seeing me uneasy, told me, if I was resolved, he would oblige me to stay no longer in England than the next spring, and then I should have his consent.

The winter following began to look very unpleasant upon us in England, and my father used often to sigh at it, and would sometimes tell me he was afraid we should have no need to send Englishmen to fight in Germany.

The cloud that seemed to threaten most was from Scotland. My father, who had made himself master of the arguments on both sides, used to say he feared there was some about the king, who exasperated him too much against the Scots, and drove things too high.

For my part, I confess I did not much trouble my head with the cause; but all my fear was they would not fall out, and we should have no fighting. I have often reflected since, that I ought to have known better, that had seen how the most flourishing provinces of Germany were reduced to the most miserable condition that ever any country in the world was, by the ravagings of soldiers, and the calamities of war.

How much soever I was to blame, yet so it was, I had a secret joy at the news of the king's raising an army, and nothing could have withheld me from appearing in it; but my eagerness was still increased by an express the king sent to my father to know if his son was in England; and my father having ordered me to carry the answer myself, I waited upon his majesty with the messenger. The king received me with his usual kindness, and asked me if I was willing to serve him against the Scots.

I answered, I was ready to serve him against any that his majesty thought fit to account his enemies, and should esteem it an honour to receive his commands. Hereupon his majesty offered me a commission. I told him I supposed there would not be much time for raising of men; that if his majesty pleased I would be at the rendezvous with as many gentlemen as I could get together to serve his majesty as volunteers.

The truth is, I found all the regiments of horse the king designed to raise were but two, as regiments; the rest of the horse were such as the nobility raised in their several counties, and commanded by themselves. As I had commanded a regiment of horse abroad, it looked a little odd to serve with a single troop at home; and the king took the thing presently.

"Indeed, it will be a volunteer war," said the king, "for the northern gentry have sent me an account of above four hundred horse they have already."

I bowed, and told his majesty I was glad to hear his subjects were so forward to serve him; so, taking his majesty's orders to be at York by the end of March, I returned to my father.

My father was very glad I had not taken a commission, for I know not from what kind of emulation between the western and northern gentry, the gentlemen of our side were not very forward in the service; their loyalty to the king in the succeeding times made it appear it was not from any disaffection to his majesty's interest or person, or to the cause; but this, however, made it difficult for me, when I came home, to get any gentleman of quality to serve with me; so that I presented myself to his majesty only as a volunteer, with eight gentlemen, and about thirty-six countrymen, well mounted and armed.

And as it proved, these were enough, for this expedition ended in an accommodation with the Scots; and they not advancing so much as to their own borders, we never came to any action; but the armies lay in the counties of Northumberland and Durham, eat up the country, and spent the king a vast sum of money; and so this war ended, a pacification was made, and both sides returned.

But, indeed, I never saw such a despicable appearance of men in arms to begin a war in my life; whether it was that I had seen so many braver armies abroad that prejudiced me against them, or that it really was so, for to me they seemed little better than a rabble met together to devour, rather than fight for their king and country. There was, indeed, a great appearance of gentlemen, and those of extraordinary quality; but their garb, their equipages, and their mien, did not look like war; their troops were filled with footmen and servants, and wretchedly armed, God wot!

I believe I might say, without vanity, one regiment of Finland horse would have made sport at beating them all. There were such crowds of parsons, for this was a church war in particular, that the camp and court was full of them; and the king was so eternally besieged with clergymen of one sort or another, that it gave offence to the chief of the nobility.

As was the appearance, so was the service; the army marched to the borders, and the headquarters was at Berwick-upon-Tweed; but the Scots never appeared, no, not so much as their scouts; whereupon the king called a council of war, and there it was resolved to send the Earl of Holland, with a party of horse, into Scotland, to learn some news of the enemy; and, truly, the first news he brought us was, that, finding their army encamped about Coldingham, fifteen miles from Berwick, as soon as he appeared the Scots drew out a party to charge him; upon which most of his men halted—I do not say run away, but it was next to it; for they could not be persuaded to fire their pieces, and wheel off like soldiers, but retreated in such a disorderly and shameful manner, that had the enemy had either the courage or conduct to have followed them, it must have certainly ended in the ruin of the whole party.

I confess, when I went into arms at the beginning of this war, I never troubled myself to examine sides; I was as glad to hear the drums beat for soldiers as if I had been a mere Swiss, who cares not which side gets the better, provided he receives his pay. I went as eagerly and blindly about my business as the meanest wretch that listed into the army; nor had I the least compassionate thought for the miseries of my native country till after the fight at Edgehill.

I had known as much, and perhaps more than most in the army, what it was to have an enemy ranging in the bowels of a kingdom; I had seen the most flourishing provinces of Germany reduced to perfect deserts, and the voracious Crabs, with inhuman barbarity, quenching the fires of the plundered villages with the blood of the inhabitants. Whether this had hardened me against the natural tenderness which I afterwards found return upon me or not, I cannot tell, but I reflected upon myself afterwards with a great deal of trouble for the unconcernedness of my temper at the approaching ruin of my native country.

I was in the first army at York, as I have already noted, and I must confess had the least diversion there that ever I found in an army in my life; for when I was in Germany with the King of Sweden, we used to see the king with the general officers every morning on horseback viewing his men, his artillery, his horses, and always something going forward.

Here we saw nothing but bishops, courtiers, and clergymen, as busy as if the direction of the war had been in them; the king was seldom seen among us, and never without some of them about him.

Those few of us that had seen the wars abroad, and would have made a short end of this campaign for him, began to be very uneasy, and particularly a certain nobleman took the freedom to tell the king that the clergy would certainly ruin the expedition. The case was this—he would have had the king to have immediately marched into Scotland, and put the matter to the trial of a battle, and he urged it every day; and the king, finding his reasons very good, would often be of his opinion, but next morning would be quite different.

This nobleman was a man of good conduct and of unquestioned courage, and afterwards lost his life for the king. He saw we had an army of young, stout fellows, numerous enough, and though they had not yet seen much service, he was for bringing them to action, that the Scots might not have time to strengthen themselves, nor they have time, by idleness and sotting (the bane of soldiers) to make themselves unfit for anything.

I was one morning in company with my lord, and as he was a warm man, and eager in his discourse, he said, “Pox of these priests—it is for them the king has raised this army, and put his friends to a vast charge; and now we are come, they will not let us fight.”

But I was afterwards convinced the clergy saw further into the matter than we did; they saw the Scots had a better army than we had, bold and ready, commanded by brave officers; and they foresaw that if we fought we should be beaten, and if beaten they were undone. And it was very true we had all been ruined if we had engaged. (Note 12.)

It is true, when we came to the pacification which followed, I confess I was of the same mind my lord had been of, for we had better have fought, and been beaten, than have made so dishonourable a treaty without striking a stroke. This pacification seems to me to have laid the scheme of all the blood and confusion which followed in the civil war; for whatever the king and his friends might pretend to do by talking big, the Scots saw he was to be bullied into anything, and that when it came to the push the courtiers never cared to bring it to blows.

I have little or nothing to say as to action in this mock expedition. The king was persuaded at last to march to Berwick, and, as I have said already, a party of horse went out to learn news of the Scots, and as soon as they saw them ran away bravely.

This made the Scots so insolent, that whereas before they lay encamped behind a river, and never showed themselves, in a sort of modest deference to their king, which was the pretence of not being aggressors or invaders, only arming in their own defence; now, having been invaded by the English troops entering Scotland, they had what they wanted; and to show it was not fear that restrained them before, but policy, now they came up in parties to our very gates, braving and facing us every day.

I had, with more curiosity than discretion, put myself as a volunteer at the head of one of our parties of horse under my Lord Holland, when they went out to discover the enemy; they went, they said, to see what the Scots were doing.

We had not marched far, but our scouts brought word they had discovered some horse, but could not come up to them because a river parted them. At the heels of these came another party of our men upon the spur to us, and said the enemy was behind, which might be true for aught we knew, but they were so far behind that nobody could see them, and yet the country was plain and open for above a mile before us.

Hereupon we made a halt, and indeed I was afraid it would have been a strange sort of a halt, for our men began to look one upon another, as they always do when they are going to break; and when the scouts came galloping in, the men were in such disorder, that, had but one man broke away, I am satisfied they had all run for it.

I found my Lord Holland did not perceive it; but after the first surprise was a little over, I told my lord what I had observed, and that, unless some course was immediately taken, they would all run at the first sight of the enemy. I found he was much concerned at it, and began to consult what course to take to prevent it.

I confess it is a hard question how to make men stand and face an enemy when fear has possessed their minds with an inclination to run away; but I will give that honour to the memory of that nobleman, who, though his experience in matters of war was small, having never been in much service, yet his courage made amends for it; for I dare say he would not have turned his horse from an army of enemies, nor have saved his life at the price of running away for it.

My lord soon saw as well as I the fright the men were in after I had given him a hint of it; and to encourage them rode through their ranks, spoke cheerfully to them, and used what arguments he thought proper to settle their minds.

I remembered a saying which I had heard old Marshal Gustavus Horne speak in Germany: “If you find your men falter, or in doubt, never suffer them to halt, but keep them advancing, for while they are going forward it keeps up their courage.”

As soon as I could get an opportunity to speak to him, I gave him this as my opinion. “That is very well,” says my lord; “but I am studying to post them so that they cannot run off if they would; and if they stand but once to face the enemy, I do not fear them afterwards.”

While we were discoursing thus, word was brought that several parties of the enemy were seen on the further side of the river; upon which my lord gave the word to march, and as we were marching on my lord calls out a lieutenant who had been an old soldier, with only five troopers in whom he put most confidence, and having given him his lesson, he sends him away : in a quarter of an hour one of the five troopers comes back galloping and hallooing, and tells us his lieutenant had with his small party beaten a party of twenty of the enemy's horse over the river, and had secured the pass, and desired my lord would march up to him immediately.

It is strange that men's spirits should be subject to such sudden changes, and capable of so much alteration from shadows of things. They were for running before they saw the enemy ; now they were in haste to be led on, but in raw men we are obliged to bear with anything, for the disorder in both was intolerable.

The story was a premeditated sham, and not a word of truth in it, invented to raise their spirits, and cheat them out of their cowardly, phlegmatic apprehensions, and my lord had his end in it, for they were all on fire to fall on ; and I am persuaded had they been led immediately into a battle begun to their hands, they would have laid about them like furies, for there is nothing like victory to flush a young soldier. Thus, while the humour was high, and the fermentation lasted, away we marched ; and passing one of their great commons, which they call moors, we came to the river, as he called it, where our lieutenant was posted with his four men. It was a little brook, fordable with ease ; and, leaving a guard at the pass, we advanced to the top of a small ascent, from whence we had a fair view of the Scotch army as they lay behind another river larger than the former.

Our men were posted well enough behind a small enclosure, with a narrow lane in their front, and my lord had caused his dragoons to be placed in the front to line the hedges ; and in this posture he stood viewing the enemy at a distance. The Scots, who had some intelligence of our coming, drew out three small parties, and sent them by different ways to observe our number ; and, forming a fourth party, which I guessed to be about six hundred horse, advanced to the top of the plain, and drew up to face us, but never offered to attack us.

One of the small parties, making about a hundred men, one third foot, passes upon our flank in view, but out of reach, and as they marched shouted at us, which our men, better pleased with that work than with fighting, readily enough answered, and would fain have fired at them for the pleasure of making a noise, for they were too far off to hit them.

I observed that these parties had always some foot with them, and yet, if the horse galloped or pushed on ever so forward, the foot were as forward as they, which was an extraordinary advantage.

Gustavus Adolphus, that king of soldiers, was the first that I have ever observed found the advantage of mixing small bodies of musketeers among his horse ; and had he had such nimble strong fellows as these, he would have prized them above all the rest of his men. These were those they called Highlanders : they would run on foot with their arms and all their accoutrements, keep very good order too, and keep pace with the horse, let them go at what rate they would. When I saw the foot thus interlined among the horse, together with their way of ordering flying parties, it presently occurred to my mind that here were some of our old Scots, come home out of Germany, that had the ordering of matters, and, if so, I knew we were not a match for them.

Thus we stood facing the enemy till our scouts brought us word the whole Scotch army was in motion, and in full march to attack us ; and though it was not true, for the fear of our men doubled every object, yet it was thought convenient to make our retreat. The whole matter was, that the scouts having informed them what they could of our strength, the six hundred were ordered to march towards us, and three regiments of foot were drawn out to support the horse.

I know not whether they would have ventured to attack us, at least before their foot had come up, but whether they would have put it to the hazard or not, we were resolved not to hazard the trial, so we drew down to the pass ; and as retreating looks something like running away, especially when an enemy is at hand, our men had much ado to make their retreat pass for a march, and not a flight ; and, by their often looking behind them, anybody might know what they would have done if they had been pressed.

I confess I was heartily ashamed when the Scots, coming up to the place where we had been posted, stood and shouted at us. I would have persuaded my lord to have charged them, and he would have done it with all his heart, but he saw it was not practicable ; so we stood at gaze with them above two hours, by which time their foot were come up to them, and yet they did not offer to attack us.

Never was I so ashamed of myself. We were all dispirited. The Scotch gentlemen would come out singly within shot of our post, which, in time of war, is always accounted a challenge to any single gentleman to come out and exchange a pistol with them, and nobody would stir. At last our old lieutenant rides out to meet a Scotchman that came pickeering on his quarter.

This lieutenant was a brave and a strong fellow, had been a soldier in the Low Countries, and though he was not of any quality, only a mere soldier, had his preferment for his conduct. He gallops bravely up to his adversary, and, exchanging their pistols, the lieutenant's horse happened to be killed. The Scotchman very generously dismounts, engages him with his sword, fairly masters him, and carries him away prisoner. I think this horse was all the blood that was shed in this war.

Lieutenant English (for that was his name), as he was a very stout old soldier, the disgrace of it broke his heart. The Scotchman, indeed, used him very generously, for he treated him in the camp very courteously, gave him another horse, and set him at liberty ; yet the man laid it so to heart that he never would appear again in the army, but went home to his own country and died.

I had enough of party-making, and was quite sick with indignation at the cowardice of the men, and my lord was in as great a fright as I, but there was no remedy ; we durst not turn about to retreat, for we should have been in such confusion that the enemy must have discovered it ; so my lord resolved to keep the post, if possible, and send to the king for some foot.

Then were our men ready to fight with one another who should be the messenger, and at last when a lieutenant with twenty dragoons was dispatched, he told him afterwards he found himself a hundred strong before he had got a mile from the place.

In short, as soon as ever the day declined, and the dusk of the evening began to shelter the designs of the men, they dropped away from us one by one, and at last in such numbers, that if we had stayed till the morning, we should not have had fifty men left out of twelve hundred horse and dragoons.

When I saw how it was, consulting with some of the officers, we all went to my Lord Holland, and pressed him to retreat before the enemy should discern the flight of our men ; so he drew us off, and we came to the camp next morning in the most shameful condition ever poor men could do, and this was the end of the worst expedition ever I made.

To fight and be beaten is a casualty common to a soldier, and I have since had enough of it ; but to run away at the sight of an enemy, and neither strike nor be stricken, is the very shame of the profession, and no man that has done it ought to show his face again in the field, unless disadvantages of place or number make it tolerable, neither of which was our case.

My Lord Holland made another march a few days after, in hopes to retrieve this miscarriage ; but I had enough of it, so I kept in my quarters ; and though his men did not desert him as before, they did not think fit to fight, and came off with but little more honour than they did before.

There was no need to go out to seek the enemy after this, for they came, as I have said, and pitched in sight of us, and their parties came up every day to the very outworks of Berwick, but nobody cared to meddle with them ; and in this posture things stood when the pacification was agreed on by both parties, which, like a short truce, only gave both sides breath to prepare for a new war, more ridiculously managed than the former.

When the treaty was so near a conclusion that conversation was admitted on both sides, I went over to the Scotch camp to satisfy my curiosity, as did many of our English officers.

I confess the soldiers made a very uncouth figure, especially the Highlanders ; the oddness and barbarity of their garb and arms seemed to have something in them remarkable.

They were generally tall, robust fellows ; their swords were extravagantly, and I think insignificantly broad, and they carried great wooden targets, large enough to cover the upper part of their bodies ; their dress was as antique as the rest—a cap on their heads, called by them a bonnet, long hanging sleeves behind, and their doublet, breeches, and stockings of a stuff they called plaid, striped across red and yellow, with short cloaks of the same. These fellows looked, when drawn out, like a regiment of merry Andrews ready for Barthlomew fair.

They are in companies all of a name, and therefore call one another only by their Christian names, as Jemmy, Jockey, Sawny, and the like ; and they scorn to be commanded but by one of their own clan or family. They are all gentlemen, and proud enough to be kings. The meanest fellow among them is as tenacious of his honour as the best nobleman in the country, and they will fight and cut one another's throats for every trifling affront.

But to their own clans or lairds they are the willingest and most obedient fellows in nature. Give them their due, were their skill in exercises and discipline proportioned to their courage, they would make the bravest soldiers in the world.

They are large bodies, and prodigiously strong ; and two qualities they have above other nations—hardy to endure hunger, cold, and hardships, and wonderfully swift of foot. The latter is such an advantage in the field, that I know none like it ; for if they conquer, no enemy can escape them ; and if they run, even the horse can hardly overtake them. These were some of those who, as I have observed before, went out in parties with their horse.

There were three or four thousand of these in the Scotch army, armed only with swords and targets ; and in their belts some of them had a pistol, but no muskets at that time among them.

But there were also a great many regiments of disciplined men, who, by the carrying of their arms, looked as if they understood their business, and, by their faces, that they durst see an enemy.

I had not been half an hour in their camp after the ceremony of giving our names, and passing their out-guards and main guard, was over, but I was saluted by several of my acquaintance, and, in particular, by one who led the Scotch volunteers at the taking the Castle of Oppenheim, of which I have given an account. They used me with all the respect they thought due to me on account of old affairs, gave me the word, and a sergeant waited upon me whenever I pleased to go abroad.

I continued twelve or fourteen days among them till the pacification was concluded, and they were ordered to march home. They spoke very respectfully of the king, but I found were exasperated to the last degree at Archbishop Laud and the English bishops, for endeavouring to impose the Common Prayer-book upon them ; and they always talked with the utmost contempt of our soldiers and army. I always waved the discourse about the clergy, and the occasion of the war ; but I could not but be too sensible what they said of our men was true ; and by this I perceived they had a universal intelligence from among us, both of what we were doing and what sort of people we were that were doing it ; and they were mighty desirous of coming to blows with us.

I had an invitation from their general, but I declined it, lest I should give offence. I found they accepted the pacification as a thing not likely to hold, and that they were resolved to keep their forces on foot, notwithstanding the agreement. Their whole army was full of brave officers, men of much experience and conduct ; and all men who know anything of war know good officers make a good army.

Things being thus huddled up, the English came back to York, where the army separated, and the Scots went home to increase theirs; for I easily foresaw that peace was the furthest thing from their thoughts.

The next year the flame broke out again: the king drew his forces down into the north as before, and expresses were sent to all the gentlemen that had commands to be at the place by the 15th of July. As I had accepted of no command in the army, so I had no inclination at all to go; for I foresaw there would be nothing but disgrace attend it.

My father, observing such an alteration in my usual forwardness, asked me one day what was the matter that I, who used to be so forward to go into the army, and so eager to run abroad to fight, now showed no inclination to appear when the service of the king and country called me to it.

I replied, I had as much zeal as ever for the king's service, and for the country too; but he knew a soldier could not abide to be beaten: and being from thence a little more inquisitive, I told him the observations I had made in the Scotch army, and the people I had conversed with there; and I added, "Sir, assure yourself, if the king offers to fight them, he will be beaten; and I do not love to engage when my judgment tells me beforehand I shall be worsted."

And as I had foreseen it came to pass; for the Scots, resolving to proceed, never stood upon the ceremony of aggression as before, but, on the 20th of August, they entered England with their army.

However, as my father desired, I went to the king's army, which was then at York, but had not got altogether, the king himself being at London; but upon this news takes post for the army, and advancing a part of his forces, he posted Lord Conway and Sir Jacob Astley, with a brigade of foot and some horse, at Newborn, upon the river Tyne, to keep the Scots from passing that river.

The Scots could have passed the Tyne without fighting; but to let us see that they were able to force their passage, they fell upon this body of men, and, notwithstanding all the advantages of the place, drove them from the post, took their baggage and two pieces of cannon, with some prisoners.

Sir Jacob Astley made what resistance he could; but the Scots charged with so much fury, and Sir Jacob being overpowered, he was soon put into confusion. Immediately the Scots made themselves masters of Newcastle, and the next day of Durham, and laid those two counties under intolerable contributions. (Note 13.)

Now was the king absolutely ruined; for among his own people the discontents before were so plain, that, had the clergy had any forecast, they would never have embroiled him with the Scots till he had fully brought matters to an understanding at home: but the case was thus:—

The king, by the good management of Bishop Juxon, his treasurer, had a million of ready money in his treasury, and, upon that account having no need of a parliament, had not called one in twelve years, and perhaps had never called another, if he had not, by this unhappy circumstance, been reduced to an extremity; for now the above money was spent in two foolish expeditions, and his army appeared in a condition not fit to engage the Scots. The detachment under Sir Jacob Astley, which were of the flower of his men, had been routed at Newborn, and the enemy had possession of two entire counties.

Archbishop Laud was universally blamed for prompting the king to provoke the Scots, a headstrong nation, and zealous for their own way of worship; and Laud himself found too late the consequences of it, both to the whole cause and to himself; for the Scots, whose native temper is not easy to forget an injury, pursued him, by their party in England, and never gave it over till they laid his head on the block.

The ruined country now clamoured in his majesty's ears with daily petitions, and the gentry of other neighbouring counties cried out for peace and a parliament. The king, embarrassed with these difficulties, and quite empty of money, calls a great council of the nobility at York, and demands their advice, which any one could have told him before would be to call a parliament.

I cannot, without regret, look back upon the misfortune of the king, who, as he was one of the best princes in his personal conduct, had yet some of the greatest unhappinesses, as a king, that ever prince had, and the whole course of his life demonstrated it.

1. Impolitic honesty. His enemies called it obstinacy: but as I was perfectly acquainted with his temper, I cannot but think it was his judgment, when he thought he was in the right, to adhere to it as a duty, though against his interest.

2. Too much compliance when he was complying.

No man but himself would have denied what at times he denied, and have granted what at other times he granted; and this uncertainty of counsel proceeded from two causes:—

1. The heat of the clergy, to whom he was exceedingly devoted, and for whom indeed he ruined himself.

2. The wisdom of his nobility.

Thus, when the counsel of his bishops prevailed, all was fire and fury; the Scots were rebels, and must be subdued; and the parliament's demands were to be rejected as exorbitant.

But whenever the king's judgment was led by the grave and steady advice of his nobility and councillors, he was always inclined by them to temperate his measures between the two extremes: and had he gone on in such a temper, he had never met with the misfortunes which afterwards attended him, nor had so many thousands of his friends lost their lives and fortunes in his service.

I am sure we that knew what it was to fight for him, and that loved him better than any of the clergy could pretend to, have had many a consultation how to bring over our master from so espousing their interest as to ruin himself for it; but it was in vain.

I took this interval, when I sat still and only looked on, to make these remarks, because I remember the best friends the king had were at this time of that opinion. That it was an unaccountable piece of indiscretion to commence a quarrel with the Scots, a poor and obstinate people, for a ceremony and a book of church discipline, at a time when the king stood but upon indifferent terms with his people at home.

The consequence was, it put arms into the hands of his subjects to rebel against him: it embroiled him with his parliament in England, to whom he was fain to stoop in a fatal and unusual manner to get money, all his own being spent, and so to buy off the Scots, whom he could not beat.

I must give one instance of the unaccountable politics of his ministers. If they over-ruled this unhappy king to it, with design to exhaust and impoverish him, they were the worst of traitors, if not the grossest of fools.

They prompted the king to equip a fleet against the Scots, and to put on board five thousand landmen. Had this been all, the design had been good, that while the king had faced the army upon the borders, these five thousand landing in the frith of Edinburgh might have put that whole nation into confusion. But, in order to this, they advise the king to lay out his money in fitting out the biggest ships he had; and the Royal Sovereign, the largest ship the world had then ever seen, which cost him no less than one hundred thousand pounds, was now built, and fitted out for this voyage.

This was the most incongruous and ridiculous advice that could be given, and made us all believe we were betrayed, though we knew not by whom.

To fit out ships of one hundred guns to invade Scotland, which had not one man of war in the world, nor any open confederacy with any prince or state that had any fleet for a defence, was a most ridiculous thing. A hundred sail of Newcastle colliers to carry the men, with their stores and provisions, and ten frigates of forty guns each, had been as good a fleet as reason and the nature of things could have made tolerable.

Thus things were carried on, until the king, reduced by the mismanagement of his councils, and beaten by the Scots, was driven to the necessity of calling a parliament in England.

It is not my design to enter into the feuds and wrangles of this parliament. I have noted my observations of their mistakes who brought the king to this unhappy necessity of calling them.

His majesty had tried parliaments upon several occasions before, but never found himself so much embroiled with them but he could send them home and there was an end of it; but as he could not avoid calling these, so they took care to put him out of a condition to dismiss them.

The Scotch army was now quartered upon the English. The counties, the gentry, and the assembly of lords at York, petitioned for a parliament.

The Scots presented their demands to the king, in which it was observed that matters were concerted between them and a party in England; and I confess, when I saw that, I began to think the king in an ill case.

For as the Scots pretended grievances, we thought, the king redressing those grievances, they could ask no more; and therefore all men advised the king to grant their full demands. And the king, not having money sufficient to supply the Scots in their march home, I know there were several meetings of gentlemen with a design to advance considerable sums to the king to set him free, and in order to reinstate his majesty as before.

Not that we ever advised the king to rule without a parliament, but we were very desirous of putting him out of the necessity of calling them, at least just then.

But the eighth article of the Scots' demands expressly required that an English parliament might be called to remove all obstructions of commerce, and to settle peace, religion, and liberty; and in another article they tell the king, the 24th of September, being the time his majesty appointed for the meeting of the peers, will make it too long ere the parliament meet.

And in another, that a parliament was the only way of settling peace, and bringing them to his majesty's obedience.

When we saw this in the army, it was time to look about. Everybody indeed perceived that the Scotch army would call an English parliament; and whatever aversion the king had to it, all saw he would be obliged to comply with it; and now they began to see their error who advised the king to this Scotch war.

While these things were transacting, the assembly of the peers met at York, and, by their advice, a treaty was begun with the Scots. I had the honour to be sent with the first message, which was in writing.

I brought it, attended with a trumpet and a guard of five hundred horse, to the Scotch quarters. I was stopped at Darlington, and my errand being known, General Lesly sent a Scotch major and fifty horse to receive me, but would let neither my trumpet nor guard set foot within their quarters.

In this manner I was conducted to an audience in the chapter-house at Durham, where a committee of Scotch lords, who attended the army, received me very courteously, and gave me their answer in writing also.

It was in this answer that they showed, at least to me, their design of embroiling the king with his English subjects; they discoursed very freely with me, and did not order me to withdraw when they debated their private opinions; they drew up several answers, but did not like them; at last they offered me one, which I did not receive—I thought it was too insolent to be borne with: as near as I can remember it ran thus:—

“The commissioners of Scotland, attending the service in the army, do refuse any treaty in the city of York.”

One of the commissioners, who treated me with more distinction than the rest, gave me an opportunity, by the kindness of his discourse, to speak more freely of this than I expected.

I told them, if they would return to his majesty an answer fit for me to carry, or if they would say they would not treat at all, I would deliver such a message.

I then beseeched them to consider the answer was to their sovereign, and to whom they made a great profession of duty and respect, and at least they ought to give their reasons why they declined a treaty at York, and to name some other place, or humbly to desire his majesty to name some other place; but to send word they would not treat at York, I could deliver no such message, for, when fully considered, it would signify they would not treat at all.

I used a great many reasons and arguments with them on this head; and at last, with some difficulty, obtained of them to give the reason, which was, the Earl of Strafford's having the chief command at York, whom they denounced their mortal enemy, he having declared them rebels in Ireland.

With this answer I returned. I could make no observation in the short time I was with them, for I staid but one night, and was guarded as a close prisoner all the while. I saw several of their officers whom I knew, but they durst not speak to me, and if they had offered, my guard would not have permitted them.

In this manner I was conducted out of their quarters to my own party again; and having delivered my message to the king, and told his majesty the circumstances, I saw the king received the account of the haughty behaviour of the Scots with some regret; however, it was his majesty's time now to bear, and therefore the Scots were complied with, and the treaty appointed at Rippon, where, after much debate, several preliminary articles were agreed on, as a cessation of arms, quarters and bounds to the armies, subsistence to the Scotch army, and the residue of the demands was referred to a treaty at London.

We were all amazed at the treaty, and I remember we would much rather have been suffered to fight, for, though we had been worsted at first, the power and strength of the king's interest, which was not yet tried, must, in the end, have been too strong for the Scots, whereas we now saw the king was for complying with anything, and all his friends would be ruined.

I confess I had nothing to fear, and so was not much concerned; but our predictions soon came to pass, for no sooner was this parliament called, but abundance of those who had embroiled their king with his people of both kingdoms, like the disciples when their Master was betrayed to the Jews, forsook him and fled.

And now parliament tyranny began to succeed church tyranny, and we soldiers were glad to see it at first. The bishops trembled; the judges went to gaol; the officers of the customs were laid hold on; and the parliament began to lay their fingers on the great ones, particularly Archbishop Laud and the Earl of Strafford.

We had no great concern for the first, but the last was a man of so much conduct and gallantry, and so beloved by the soldiers and principal gentry of England, that everybody was touched with his misfortune.

The parliament now grew mad in their turn, and as the prosperity of any party is the time to show their discretion, the parliament showed they knew as little where to stop as other people. The king was not in a condition to deny anything, and, shortly after, whatever was demanded was complied with.

They attainted the Earl of Strafford, and, metaphorically, made the king cut off his right hand to save his left, and yet not save it neither; they obtained another bill, to empower them to sit during their own pleasure, and after them triennial parliaments to meet, whether the king called them or not; and granting this completed his majesty's ruin.

Had the house only regulated the abuses of the court, punished evil counsellors, and restored parliaments to their original and just powers, all had been well, and the king, though he had been more than mortified, had yet reaped the benefit of future peace; for now the Scots were sent home, after having eaten up two counties, and received a prodigious sum of money to boot; and the king, though too late, goes in person to Edinburgh, and grants them all they could desire, and more than they asked; but in England the desires were unbounded, and drove at all extremes.

They threw out the bishops from sitting in the house, made a protestation equivalent to the Scotch covenant, and, this done, printed their remonstrance. This so provoked the king, that he resolves upon seizing some of the members, and in an ill hour enters the House of Commons in person to take them. Thus one imprudent thing on one hand produced another on the other hand, until the king was obliged to leave them to themselves for fear of receiving treatment unworthy of himself.

These proceedings began to alarm the gentry and nobility of England, for however willing we were to have evil counsellors removed, and the government return to a settled and legal course, according to the happy constitution of this nation, and might have been forward enough to have owned the king had been misled and imposed upon to do things which he had rather had not been done, yet it did not follow that all the powers and prerogatives of the crown should devolve upon the parliament, and the king, in a manner, be deposed, or else sacrificed to the fury of the rabble.

The heats of the house running them thus to all extremes, and at last to take from the king the power of the militia, which indeed was all that was left to make him anything of a king, put him upon opposing force with force; and thus the flame of civil war began.

However backward I was in engaging in the second year's expedition against the Scots, I was as forward now, for I waited on the king at York, where a gallant company of gentlemen as ever were seen in England engaged themselves to enter into his service; and here some of us formed ourselves into troops for the guard of his person.

The king having been waited upon by the gentry of Yorkshire, and having told them his resolution of erecting his royal standard, and received from them hearty assurances of support, dismisses them, and marches to Hull, where lay the train of artillery, and all the arms and ammunition belonging to the northern army which had been disbanded.

But here the parliament had been beforehand with his majesty, so that when he came to Hull he found the gates shut, and Sir John Hotham, the governor, upon the walls, though with a great deal of seeming humility and protestations of loyalty to his person, yet with a positive denial to admit any of the king's attendants into the town.

If his majesty pleased to enter the town in person, with any reasonable number of his household, he would submit, but would not be prevailed on to receive the king, as he would be received, with his forces, though those forces were then but very few.

The king was exceedingly provoked at this repulse, and indeed it was a great surprise to us all, for certainly never prince began a war against the whole strength of his kingdom under the circumstances that he was in. He had not a garrison, or a company of soldiers, in his pay; not a stand of arms, or a barrel of powder, a musket, cannon, or mortar; not a ship of all the fleet, or money in his treasury to procure them; whereas the parliament had all his navy, ordnance, stores, magazines, arms, ammunition, and revenue in their keeping.

And this I take to be another defect of the king's counsel, and a sad instance of the destruction of his affairs, that when he saw how all things were going to wreck, as it was impossible but he should see it, and it is plain he did see it, that he should not, long enough before it came to extremities, secure the navy, magazines, and stores of war in the hands of his trusty servants, that would have been sure to have preserved them for his use at a time when he wanted them.

It cannot be supposed but the gentry of England, who generally preserved their loyalty for their royal master, and at last heartily showed it, were exceedingly discouraged at first, when they saw the parliament had all the means of making war in their own hands, and the king was naked and destitute both of arms and ammunition, and money to procure them.

Not but that the king, by extraordinary application, recovered the disorder the want of these things had thrown him into, and supplied himself with all things needful.

But my observation was this—had his majesty had the magazines, navy, and forts, in his own hand, the gentry, who wanted but the prospect of something to encourage them, had come in at first, and the parliament, being unprovided, would have been presently reduced to reason.

But this was it that balked the gentry of Yorkshire, who went home again, giving the king good promises, but never appeared for him till, by raising a good army in Shropshire and Wales, he marched towards London, and they saw there was a prospect of being supported.

In this condition the king erected his standard at Nottingham, August 22nd, 1642; and I confess I had very melancholy apprehensions of the king's affairs, for the appearance of the royal standard was but small. The affront the king had met with at Hull had dispirited the northern gentry, and the king's affairs looked with a very dismal aspect.

We had expresses from London of the prodigious success of the parliament's levies, how their men came in faster than they could entertain them, and that arms were delivered out to whole companies listed together; and all this while the king had not got together a thousand foot, and had no arms for them neither.

When the king saw this, he immediately dispatched five several messengers, whereof one went to the Marquis of Worcester into Wales;

one to the queen, then at Windsor; one to the Duke of Newcastle, then Earl of Newcastle, into the north; one into Scotland, and one into France where the queen soon after arrived to raise money and buy arms, and to get what assistance she could among her own friends.

Nor was her majesty idle, for she sent over several ships laden with arms and ammunition with a fine train of artillery, and a great many very good officers; and though one of the first fell into the hands of the parliament, with three hundred barrels of powder and some arms, and one hundred and fifty gentlemen, yet most of them found means to get to us, and most of the ships the queen freighted arrived; and at last her majesty came herself, and brought an extraordinary supply of men, money, and arms, with which she joined the king's forces, under the Earl of Newcastle, in the north.

Finding his majesty active to muster his friends together, I asked him if he thought it might not be for his majesty's service to let me go among my friends and his loyal subjects about Shrewsbury?

"Yes," says the king, smiling, "I intend you shall, and I design to go with you myself."

I did not understand what the king meant then, and did not think it good manners to inquire; but the next day I found all things disposed for a march, and the king on horseback by eight in the morning; when, calling me to him, he told me I should go before, and let my father and all my friends know he would be at Shrewsbury the Saturday following.

I left my equipages, and, taking post with only one servant, was at my father's the next morning by break of day. My father was not surprised at the news of the king's coming; for it seems he, together with the loyal gentry of those parts, had sent particularly to give the king an invitation to move that way, which I was not made privy to, with an account of what encouragement they had there in the endeavours made for his interest.

In short, the whole country was entirely for the king; and such was the universal joy the people showed when the news of his majesty's coming down was positively known, that all manner of business was laid aside, and the whole body of the people seemed to be resolved upon the war.

As this gave a new face to the king's affairs, so I must own it filled me with joy; for I was astonished before, when I considered what the king and his friends were like to be exposed to. The news of the proceedings of the parliament, and their powerful preparations, were now no more terrible. The king came at the time appointed, and having lain at my father's house one night, entered Shrewsbury in the morning.

The acclamations of the people, the concourse of the nobility and gentry about his person, and the crowds which now came every day in to his standard, were incredible.

The loyalty of the English gentry was not only worthy notice, but their power also was extraordinarily visible; for the king, in about six weeks, which was the most of his stay at Shrewsbury, was supplied with money, arms, ammunition, and a train of artillery, and had enlisted an army of upwards of twenty thousand men.

His majesty, seeing the general alacrity of his people, immediately issued out commissions, and formed regiments of horse and foot; and having some experienced officers about him, together with about sixteen who came from France with a ship loaded with arms and some field-pieces, which came very seasonably into the Severn, the men were exercised, regularly disciplined and quartered, and now we began to look like soldiers.

My father had raised a regiment of horse at his own charge, and the king gave out arms to them from the supplies which I mentioned came from abroad. Another party of horse, all brave stout fellows, and well mounted, came in from Lancashire, and the Earl of Derby at the head of them.

The Welshmen came in by droves; and so great was the concourse of people, that the king began to think of marching, and gave the command, as well as the trust of regulating the army, to the brave Earl of Lindsey, as general of the foot. (Note 14.)

The parliament-general being the Earl of Essex, two braver men, or two better officers, were not in the kingdom: they had both been old soldiers, and had served together as volunteers, in the Low-country wars, under Prince Maurice. They had been comrades and companions abroad, and now came to face one another as enemies in the field. (Note 15.)

Such was the expedition used by the king and his friends in the levies of this first army, that, notwithstanding the wonderful expedition the parliament made, the king was in the field before them; and now the gentry in other parts of the nation bestirred themselves, and seized upon and garrisoned several considerable places for the king.

In the north, the Earl of Newcastle not only garrisoned the most considerable places, but even the general possession of the north was for the king, excepting Hull, and some few places which the old Lord Fairfax had taken up for the Parliament. On the other hand, Cornwall entire and most of the western counties were the king's. The parliament had their chief interest in the south and eastern parts of England, as Kent, Surrey, and Sussex, Essex, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, Bedford, Huntingdon, Hertford, Buckinghamshire, and the other midland counties.

These were called, or some of them at least, the associated counties, and felt little of the war, other than the charges; but the main support of the parliament was the city of London. The king made the seat of his court at Oxford, which he caused to be regularly fortified. The Lord Say had been here, and had possession of the city for the enemy, and was debating about fortifying it, but came to no resolution, which was a very great oversight in them, the situation of the place, and the importance of it, on many accounts, to the city of London, considered; they would have retrieved this error afterwards, but then it was too late, for the king made it the head-quarters, and received great supplies and assistance from the wealth of the colleges and the plenty of the neighbouring country.

Abingdon, Wallingford, Basingstoke, and Reading were all garrisoned and fortified as outworks to defend this as the centre; and thus all England became the theatre of blood, and war was spread into every corner of the country, though as yet there was not a stroke struck.

I had no command in this army: my father led his own regiment, and, old as he was, would not leave his royal master; and my elder brother staid at home to support the family. As for me, I rode a volunteer in the royal troop of guards, which may very well deserve that title, being composed of young gentlemen, sons of the nobility and prime gentry of the nation, and I think not a person of so mean a birth or fortune as myself.

We reckoned in this troop two-and-thirty lords, or who came afterwards to be such, and eight-and-thirty younger sons of the nobility, five French noblemen, and the rest gentlemen of very good families and estates.

And that I may give the due to their personal valour, many of this troop lived to have regiments and troops under their command in the service of the king; many of them lost their lives for him, and most of them their estates: nor did they behave unworthy of themselves in their first showing their faces to the enemy, as shall be mentioned in its place.

While the king remained at Shrewsbury his loyal friends bestirred themselves in several parts of the kingdom. Goring had secured Portsmouth; but being young in matters of war, and not in time relieved, though the Marquis of Hertford was marching to relieve him, yet he was obliged to quit the place, and shipped himself for Holland, from whence he returned with relief for the king, and afterwards did very good service upon all occasions, and very effectually cleared himself of the scandal the hasty surrender of Portsmouth had brought upon him.

The chief power of the king's forces lay in three places—in Cornwall, in Yorkshire, and at Shrewsbury. In Cornwall, Sir Ralph Hopton, afterwards Lord Hopton, Sir Bevil Granvil, and Sir Nicholas Slamming, secured all the country, and afterwards spread themselves over Devonshire and Somersetshire, took Exeter from the parliament, fortified Bridgewater and Barnstaple, and beat Sir William Waller at the battle of Roundway Down, as I shall mention more particularly when I come to recite the part of my own travels that way.

In the north, the Marquis of Newcastle secured all the country, garrisoned York, Scarborough, Carlisle, Newcastle, Pontefract, Leeds, and all the considerable places, and took the field with a very good army, though afterwards he proved more unsuccessful than the rest, having the whole power of a kingdom at his back, the Scots coming in with an army to the assistance of the parliament, which indeed was the general turn of the scale of the war; for, had it not been for this Scotch army, the king had most certainly reduced the Parliament, at least to good terms of peace, in two years' time.

The king's force at Shrewsbury I have related already: the alacrity of the gentry filled him with hopes, and all his army with vigour, and the 8th of October, 1642, his majesty gave orders to march. The Earl of Essex had spent above a month after his leaving London (for he went thence the 9th of September) in modelling and drawing together his forces: his rendezvous was at St Alban's, from whence he marched to Northampton, Coventry, and Warwick, and leaving garrisons in them, he comes on to Worcester.

Being thus advanced, he possesses Oxford, as I noted before, Banbury, Bristol, Gloucester, and Worcester, out of all which places, except Gloucester, we drove him back to London in a very little while.

Sir John Biron had raised a very good party of five hundred horse, mostly gentlemen, for the king, and had possessed Oxford; but on the approach of the Lord Say quitted it, being now but an open town, and retreated to Worcester; from whence, on the approach of Essex's army, he retreated to the king.

And now all things grew ripe for action, both parties having secured their posts, and settled their schemes of the war, taking their posts and places as their measures and opportunities directed. The field was next in their eye, and the soldiers began to inquire when they should fight, for as yet there had been little or no blood drawn, but it was not long before they had enough of it; for I believe I may challenge all the historians in Europe to tell me of any war in the world where, in the space of four years, there were so many pitched battles, sieges, fights, and skirmishes, as in this war.

We never encamped or intrenched, never fortified the avenues to our posts, or lay fenced with rivers and defiles. Here were no leaguers in the field, as at the story of Nuremberg; neither had our soldiers any tents, or what they call heavy baggage. It was the general maxim of this war, Where is the enemy? Let us go and fight them: or, on the other hand, if the enemy was coming, What was to be done? Why, what should be done? Draw out into the field and fight them.

I cannot say it was the prudence of the parties, and had the king fought less he had gained more; and I shall remark several times when the eagerness of fighting was the worst counsel, and proved our loss. This benefit, however, happened in general to the country, that it made a quick, though a bloody, end of the war, which otherwise had lasted till it might have ruined the whole nation.

On the 10th of October the king's army was in full march; his majesty, generalissimo; the Earl of Lindsey, general of the foot; Prince Rupert, general of the horse; and the first action in the field was by Prince Rupert and Sir John Biron. Sir John had brought his body of five hundred horse, as I have said, from Oxford to Worcester; the Lord Say, with a strong party, being in the neighbourhood of Oxford, and expected in the town, Colonel Sandys, a hot man, who had more courage than judgment, advanced with about fifteen hundred horse and dragoons, with design to beat Sir John Biron out of Worcester, and take post there for the parliament.

The king had notice that the Earl of Essex was designed for Worcester, and Prince Rupert was ordered to advance with a body of horse and dragoons to face the enemy, and bring off Sir John Biron. This his majesty did to amuse the Earl of Essex, that he might expect him that way; whereas the king's design was to get between the Earl of Essex's army and the city of London, and his majesty's end was doubly answered, for he not only drew Essex on to Worcester, where he spent more time than he needed, but he beat the party into the bargain.

I went volunteer in this party, and rode in my father's regiment; for though we really expected not to see the enemy, yet I was tired with lying still. We came to Worcester just as notice was brought to Sir John Biron that a party of the enemy was on their march for Worcester, upon which the prince, immediately consulting what was to be done, resolves to march the next morning and fight them.

The enemy, who lay at Pershore, about eight miles from Worcester, and, as I believe, had no notice of our march, came on very confidently in the morning, and found us ready drawn up to receive them. I must confess this was the bluntest, downright way of making war that ever was seen.

The enemy, who, in all the little knowledge I had of war, ought to have discovered our numbers, and guessed by our posture what our design was, might easily have informed themselves that we intended to attack them, and so might have secured the advantage of a bridge in their front; but, without any regard to these methods of policy, they came on at all hazards.

Upon this notice my father proposed to the prince to halt for them, and suffer ourselves to be attacked, since we found them willing to give us the advantage. The prince approved of the advice, so we halted within view of a bridge, leaving space enough on our front for about half the number of their force to pass and draw up; and at the bridge was posted about fifty dragoons, with orders to retire as soon as the enemy advanced, as if they had been afraid.

On the right of the road was a ditch, and a very high bank behind, where we had placed three hundred dragoons, with orders to lie flat on their faces till the enemy had passed the bridge, and to let fly among them as soon as our trumpets sounded a charge.

Nobody but Colonel Sandys would have been caught in such a snare, for he might easily have seen that when he was over the bridge there was not room enough for him to fight; but the Lord of Hosts was so much in their mouths (for that was the word for that day) that they took little heed how to conduct the host of the Lord to their own advantage.

As we expected, they appeared, beat our dragoons from the bridge, and passed it. We stood firm in one line, with a reserve, and expected a charge; but Colonel Sandys showing a great deal more judgment than we thought he was master of, extended himself to the left, finding the ground too straight, and began to form his men with a great deal of readiness and skill, for by this time he saw our number was greater than he expected.

The prince perceiving it, and foreseeing that the stratagem of the dragoons would be frustrated by this, immediately charges with the horse, and the dragoons at the same time, standing upon their feet, poured in their shot upon those that were passing the bridge. This surprise put them into such disorder, that we had but little work with them; for though Colonel Sandys, with the troops next him, sustained the shock extremely well, and behaved themselves gallantly, yet the confusion beginning in their rear, those that had not yet passed the bridge were kept back by the fire of the dragoons, and the rest were easily cut to pieces.

Colonel Sandys was mortally wounded and taken prisoner; and the crowd was so great to get back, that many pushed into the water, and were rather smothered than drowned. Some of them, who never came into the fight, were so frightened, that they never looked behind them until they came to Pershore; and, as we were afterwards informed, the life-guards of the general, who had quartered in the town, left it in great disorder, expecting us at the heels of their men.

If our business had been to keep the parliament army from coming to Worcester, we had a very good opportunity to have secured the bridge at Pershore; but our design lay another way, as I have said, and the king was for drawing Essex on to the Severn, in hopes to get behind him, which fell out accordingly.

Essex, spurred by this affront in the infancy of their affairs, advanced the next day, and came to Pershore time enough to be at the funeral of some of his men, and from thence he advanced to Worcester.

We marched back to Worcester extremely pleased with the good success of our first attack, and our men were so flushed with this little victory, that it put vigour into the whole army. The enemy lost about three thousand men, and we carried away near one hundred and fifty prisoners, with five hundred horses, some standards and arms; and among the prisoners their colonel, but he died a little after of his wounds.

Upon the approach of the enemy Worcester was quitted, and the forces marched back to join the king's army, which lay then at Bridgenorth, Ludlow, and thereabout. As the king expected, it fell out. Essex found so much work at Worcester to settle parliament-quarters, and secure Bristol, Gloucester, and Hereford, that it gave the king a full day's march of him; so the king having the start of him, moved towards London; and Essex, nettled to be both beaten in fight and outdone in conduct, decamped, and followed the king.

The parliament, and the Londoners too, were in a strange consternation at this mistake of their general; and had the king, whose great misfortune was always to follow precipitant advices, but pushed on his first design, which he had formed with very good reason, and for which he had been dodging with Essex eight or ten days, viz. of marching directly to London, where he had a very great interest, and where his friends were not yet oppressed and impoverished, as they were afterwards, he had turned the scale of his affairs, and every man expected it, for the members began to shift for themselves; expresses were sent on the heels of one another to the Earl of Essex to hasten after the king, and, if possible, to bring him to battle. Some of these letters fell into our hands, and we might easily discover that the parliament were in the last confusion at the thoughts of our coming to London. Besides this, the city was in a worse fright than the house, and the great moving men began to go out of town. In short, they expected us, and we expected to come; but Providence, for our ruin, had otherwise determined it.

Essex, upon news of the king's march, and upon receipt of the parliament's letters, made long marches after us, and on the 23rd of October reached the town of Keynton, in Warwickshire.

The king was almost as far as Banbury, and there called a council of war. Some of the old officers that foresaw the advantage the king had, the concern the city was in, and the vast addition both to the reputation of his forces and the increase of his interest it would be, if the king could gain that point, urged the king to march on to London.

Prince Rupert and the fresh colonels pressed for fighting, told the king it dispirited their men to march with the enemy at their heels; that the parliament army was inferior to him by six thousand men, and fatigued with hasty marching; that their orders being to fight, he had nothing to do but to post himself to advantage, and receive them to their destruction; that the action near Worcester had let him know how easy it was to deal with a rash enemy; and that it was a dishonour for him, whose forces were so much superior, to be pursued by his subjects in rebellion.

These and the like arguments prevailed with the king to alter his wiser measures, and resolve to fight. Nor was this all: when a resolution of fighting was taken, that part of the advice which they who were for fighting gave as a reason for their opinion, was forgot, and, instead of halting, and posting ourselves to advantage till the enemy came up, we were ordered to march back and meet them.

Nay, so eager was the prince for fighting, that when, from the top of Edgehill, the enemy's army was descried in the bottom between them and the town of Keynton, and that the enemy had bid us defiance, by discharging three cannons, we accepted the challenge, and answering with two shot from our army, we must needs forsake the advantages of the hills, which they must have mounted under the command of our cannon, and march down to them into the plain.

I confess I thought here was a great deal more gallantry than discretion, for it was plainly taking an advantage out of our own hands, and putting it into the hands of the enemy; for an enemy that must fight may always be fought with to advantage.

My old hero, the glorious Gustavus Adolphus, was as forward to fight as any man of true valour mixed with any policy need to be, or ought to be; but he used to say, "An enemy, reduced to a necessity of fighting, is half beaten."

It is true, we were all but young in the war: the soldiers hot and forward, and eagerly desired to come to hands with the enemy. But I take the more notice of it here, because the king in this acted against his own measures, for it was the king himself had laid the design of getting the start of Essex, and marching to London.

His friends had invited him thither, and expected him, and suffered deeply for the omission.

and yet he gave way to these hasty counsels, and suffered his judgment to be overruled by a majority of voices—an error, I say, the King of Sweden was never guilty of; for if all the officers at a council of war were of different opinion, yet, unless their reasons mastered his judgment, their votes never altered his measures; but this was the error of our good but unfortunate master three times in this war, and particularly in two of the greatest battles, this of Edgehill, and that of Naseby.

The resolution for fighting being published in the army, gave a universal joy to the soldiers, who expressed an extraordinary ardour for fighting.

I remember my father, talking with me about it, asked me what I thought of the approaching battle.

I told him I thought the king had done very well; for at that time I did not consult the extent of the design, and had a mighty mind, like other rash people, to see it brought to a day, which made me answer my father, "Sir, I doubt there will be but indifferent doings on both sides between two armies, both made up of fresh men that have never seen any service."

My father minded little what I spoke of that; but when I seemed pleased that the king had resolved to fight, he looked angrily at me, and said he was sorry I could see no further into things.

"I tell you," added he hastily, "if the king should kill and take prisoners this whole army, general and all, the parliament will have the victory; for we have lost more by slipping this opportunity of getting into London than we shall ever get by ten battles."

I saw enough of this afterwards to convince me of the weight of what my father said, and so did the king too; but it was then too late—advantages slip in war are never recovered.

We were now in full march to fight the Earl of Essex. It was on Sunday morning, the 24th of October, 1642, fair weather over head, but the ground very heavy and dirty.

As soon as we came to the top of Edgehill we discovered their whole army. They were not drawn up, having had two miles to march that morning, but they were very busy forming their lines, and posting their regiments as they came up. Some of their horse were exceedingly fatigued, having marched forty-eight hours together; and had they been suffered to follow us three or four days' march further, several of their regiments of horse would have been quite ruined, and their foot would have been rendered unserviceable for the present. But we had no patience.

As soon as our whole army was come to the top of the hill, we were drawn up in order of battle. The king's army made a very fine appearance, and indeed they were a body of as gallant men as ever appeared in the field, and as well furnished at all points; the horse exceedingly well accoutred, being most of them gentlemen and volunteers, some whole regiments serving without pay; their horses very good, and as fit for service as could be desired.

The whole army were not above eighteen thousand men, and the enemy not one thousand over or under, though we had been told they were not above twelve thousand; but they had been reinforced with four thousand men from Northampton.

The king was with the general, the Earl of Lindsey, in the main battle; Prince Rupert commanded the right wing, and the Marquis of Hertford, the Lord Willoughby, and several other very good officers, the left.

The signal of battle being given with two cannon shot, we marched in order of battalia down the hill, being drawn up in two lines with bodies of reserve. The enemy advanced to meet us much in the same form, with this difference only, that they had placed their cannon on the right, and the king had placed ours in the centre, before, or rather between, two great brigades of foot.

Their cannon began with us first, and did some mischief among the dragoons of our left wing; but our officers perceiving the shot took the men and missed the horses, ordered all to alight, and every man leading his horse, to advance in the same order; and this saved our men, for most of the enemy's shot flew over their heads.

Our cannon made a terrible execution upon their foot for a quarter of an hour, and put them into great confusion, till the general obliged them to halt, and changed the posture of his front, marching round a small rising ground, by which he avoided the fury of our artillery.

By this time the wings were engaged, the king having given the signal of battle, and ordered the right wing to fall on. Prince Rupert, who commanded that wing, fell on with such fury, and pushed the left wing of the parliament army so effectually, that in a moment he filled all with terror and confusion. Commissary-general Ramsey, a Scotchman, an experienced officer, commanded their left wing, and though he did all that an expert soldier and a brave commander could do, yet it was to no purpose; his lines were immediately broken, and all overwhelmed in a trice.

Two regiments of foot, whether as part of the left wing, or on the left of the main body, I know not, were disordered by their own horse, and rather trampled to death by the horses than beaten by our men; but they were so entirely broken, that I do not remember that ever they made one volley upon our men, for their own horse running away, and falling foul on these foot, were so vigorously followed by us, that the foot never had a moment to rally or look behind them.

The point of the left wing of horse were not so soon broken as the rest, and three regiments of them stood firm for some time; the dexterous officers of the other regiments taking the opportunity, rallied a great many of their scattered men behind them, and pieced in some troops with those regiments; but after two or three charges which a brigade of our second line, following the prince, made upon them, they also were broken with the rest.

I remember that, at the great battle of Leipsic, the right wing of the Imperialists having fallen in upon the Saxons with like fury to this, bore down all before them, and beat the Saxons quite out of the field, upon which the soldiers cried, "Victoria!—Let us follow."

"No, no," said old General Tilly, "let them go, and let us beat the Swedes, too, then all is our own."

Had Prince Rupert taken this method, and, instead of following the fugitives, who were dispersed so effectually that two regiments would have secured them from rallying—I say, had he fallen in upon the foot, or wheeled to the left, and fallen in upon the rear of the enemy's right wing of horse, or returned to the assistance of the left wing of our horse, we had gained the most absolute and complete victory that could be, nor had a thousand men of the enemy's army got off.

But this prince, who was full of fire, and pleased to see the rout of the enemy, pursued them quite to the town of Keynton, where indeed he killed abundance of their men, and some time also was lost in plundering the baggage; but in the mean time the glory and advantage of the day was lost to the king, for the right wing of the parliament horse could not be so broken.

Sir William Balfour made a desperate charge upon the point of the king's left, and had it not been for two regiments of dragoons, who were planted in the reserve, had routed the whole wing; for he broke through the first line, and staggered the second, who advanced to their assistance, but was so warmly received by those dragoons, who came seasonably in, and gave their first fire on horseback, that his fury was checked, and having lost a great many men, was forced to wheel about to his own men; and had the king had but three regiments of horse at hand to have charged him, Balfour had been routed.

The rest of this wing kept their ground, and received the first fury of the enemy with great firmness; after which, advancing in their turn, they were once masters of the Earl of Essex's cannon.

And here we lost another advantage; for if any foot had been at hand to support these horse, they had carried off the cannon, or turned it upon the main body of the enemy's foot; but the foot were otherwise engaged. The horse on this side fought with great obstinacy and variety of success a great while.

Sir Philip Stapylton, who commanded the guards of the Earl of Essex, being engaged with a party of our Shrewsbury cavaliers, as we called them, was once in a fair way to have been cut off by a brigade of our foot, who being advanced to fall on upon the parliament's main body, flanked Sir Philip's horse in their way, and, facing to the left, so furiously charged him with their pikes, that he was obliged to retire in great disorder, and with the loss of a great many men and horses.

All this while the foot on both sides were desperately engaged, and, coming close up to the teeth of one another with the clubbed musket and push of pike, fought with great resolution, and a terrible slaughter on both sides, giving no quarter for a great while; and they continued to do thus till, as if they were tired and out of wind, each party seemed willing enough to leave off and take breath.

Those which suffered most were that brigade which had charged Sir Philip Stapylton's horse, who, being bravely engaged in the front with the enemy's foot, were, on the sudden, charged again in front and flank by Sir William Balfour's horse and disordered, after a very desperate defence.

Here the king's standard was taken, the standard-bearer, Sir Edward Varney, being killed; but it was rescued again by Captain Smith, and brought to the captain the same evening, for which the king knighted the captain.

This brigade of foot had fought all the day, and had not been broken at last if any horse had been at hand to support them. The field began to be now clear: both armies stood, as it were, gazing at one another; only the king, having rallied his foot, seemed inclined to renew the charge, and began to cannonade them, which they could not return, most of their cannon being nailed while they were in our possession, and all the cannoniers killed or fled, and our gunners did execution upon Sir William Balfour's troops for a good while.

My father's regiment being in the right with the prince, I saw little of the fight but the rout of the enemy's left, and we had as full a victory there as we could desire, but spent too much time in it: we killed about two thousand men in that part of the action, and having totally dispersed them, and plundered their baggage, began to think of our friends when it was too late to help them.

We returned, however, victorious to the king just as the battle was over; and the king asked Prince Rupert, "What news?"—He told him he could give his majesty a good account of the enemy's horse—"Ay, by G—d!" said a gentleman that stood by me, "and of their carts too."

Those words were spoken with such a sense of the misfortune, and made such an impression in the whole army, that it occasioned some ill blood afterwards among us, and but that the king took up the business, it had been of ill consequence; for some person who had heard the gentleman speak it, informed the prince who it was, and the prince, resenting it, spoke something about it in the hearing of the party when the king was present.

The gentleman, with a manly freedom, told his highness openly he had said the words, and though he owned he had no disrespect for his highness, yet he was still of opinion the enemy's army might have been better beaten.

The prince replied something very disobliging; the gentleman came up to the king, and, kneeling, humbly besought his majesty to accept of his commission, and to give him leave to tell the prince, that whenever his highness pleased, he was ready to give him satisfaction.

The king was so concerned at this misunderstanding between them, that he seemingly was very much out of humour with the prince about it. However, his majesty soon ended the dispute, by laying his commands on them both to speak no more of it for that day; and refusing the commission from the colonel, for he was no less, sent for them both next morning in private, and made them friends again.

But to return to our story.—We came back to the king time enough to put the Earl of Essex's men out of all humour of renewing the fight; and, as I observed before, both parties stood gazing at one another, and our cannon playing upon them, obliged Sir William Balfour's horse to wheel off in some disorder, but they returned us none again; which, as we afterwards understood, was, as I said before, for want of both powder and gunners; for the cannoniers and firemen were killed, or had quitted their train in the fight when our horse had possession of their artillery; and as they had spiked up some of the cannon, so they had carried away fifteen carriages of powder.

Night coming on, ended all discourse of more fighting, and the king drew off and marched towards the hills. I know no other token of victory which the enemy had, than their lying in the field of battle all night, which they did for no other reason than that, having lost their baggage and provisions, they had nowhere to go, and which we did not, because we had good quarters at hand.

The number of prisoners and of the slain were not very equal: the enemy lost more men, we most of quality. Six thousand men, on both sides, were killed on the spot, whereof, when our rolls were examined, we missed two thousand five hundred. We lost our brave general, the old Earl of Lindsey, who was wounded and taken prisoner, and died of his wounds; Sir Edward Stradling, Colonel Lundsford, prisoners; and Sir Edward Varney, and a great many gentlemen of quality slain. (Note 16.)

On the other hand, we carried off Colonel Essex, Colonel Ramsey, and the Lord St. John, who also died of his wounds. We took five ammunition waggons, full of powder, and brought off about five hundred horse in the defeat of the left wing, with eighteen standards and colours, and lost seventeen.

The slaughter of the left wing was so great, and the flight so effectual, that several of the officers rode clear away, coasting round, and got to London, where they reported that the parliament army was entirely defeated, all lost, killed, or taken, as if none but them were left alive to carry the news.

This filled them with consternation for awhile; but when other messengers followed, all was restored to quiet again, and the parliament cried up their victory, and sufficiently mocked God and their general with their public thanks for it. Truly, as the fight was a deliverance to them, they were in the right to give thanks for it; but as to its being a victory, neither side had much to boast of, and they less a great deal than we had.

I got no hurt in this battle; and indeed we of the right wing had but little fighting: I think I discharged my pistols but once, and my carbine twice, for we had more fatigue than fight. The enemy fled, and we had little to do but to follow and kill those we could overtake.

I spoiled a good horse, but got a better from the enemy in his room, and came home weary enough. My father lost his horse, and in the fall was bruised in his thigh by another horse treading on him, which disabled him for some time, and, at his request, by his majesty's consent, I commanded the regiment in his absence.

The enemy received a recruit of four thousand men the next morning: if they had not, I believe they would have gone back to Worcester; but, encouraged by that reinforcement, they called a council of war, and had a long debate whether they could attack us again: but, notwithstanding their great victory, they durst not attempt it, though this addition of strength made them superior to us by three thousand men.

The king, indeed, expected that when these troops joined them they would advance, and we were preparing to receive them at a village called Aino, where the head-quarters continued three or four days; and had they really esteemed the first day's work a victory, as they called it, they would have done it: but they thought not proper to venture, but marched away to Warwick, and from thence to Coventry.

The king, to urge them to venture upon him, and come to a second battle, sat down before Banbury, and took both town and castle, and two entire regiments of foot, and one troop of horse quitted the parliament service, and took up their arms for the king. This was done almost before their faces, which was a better proof of a victory on our side than any they could pretend to.

From Banbury we marched to Oxford; and now all men saw the parliament had made a great mistake (for they were not always in the right any more than we) to leave Oxford without a garrison. The king caused new regular works to be drawn round it, and seven royal bastions with ravelins and outworks, a double ditch, counterscarp, and covered way; all which, added to the advantage of its situation, made it a formidable place, and from this time it became our place of arms, and the centre of affairs on the king's side.

If the parliament had the honour of the field, the king reaped the fruits of the victory; for all this part of the country submitted to him. Essex's army made the best of their way to London, and were but in an ill condition when they came there, especially their horse.

The parliament, sensible of this, and receiving daily accounts of the progress we made, began to cool a little in their temper, abated of their first rage, and voted an address for peace; and sent to the king to let him know they were desirous to prevent the effusion of more blood, and to bring things to an accommodation, or, as they called it, "a right understanding."

I was now, by the king's particular favour, summoned to the councils of war, my father continuing absent and ill; and now I began to think of the real grounds, and, which was more, of the fatal issue of the war.

I say I now began; for I cannot say that I ever rightly stated matters in my own mind before, though I had been enough used to blood, and to see the destruction of people, sacking of towns, and plundering the country, yet it was in Germany, and among strangers; but I found an unaccountable sadness upon my spirits to see this acting in my own native country.

It grieved me to the heart, even in the rout of our enemies, to see the slaughter of them; and even in the fight, to hear a man cry for quarter in English, moved me to a compassion which I had never been used to; nay, sometimes it looked to me as if some of my own men had been beaten: and when I heard a soldier cry, "O

God! I am shot," I looked behind me to see which of my own troop was fallen. Here I saw myself at the cutting of the throats of my friends, and indeed some of my near relations. My old comrades and fellow-soldiers in Germany were some with us, some against us, as their opinions happened to differ in religion.

For my part, I confess I had not much religion in me at that time; but I thought religion rightly practised on both sides would have made us all better friends; and, therefore, sometimes I began to think that both the bishops of our side, and the preachers on theirs, made religion rather the pretence than the cause of the war: and from those thoughts I vigorously argued it at the council of war against marching to Brentford while the address for a treaty of peace from the parliament was in hand; for I was for taking the parliament by the handle which they had given us, and entering into a negotiation with the advantage of its being at their own request.

I thought the king had now in his hands an opportunity to make an honourable peace; for this battle at Edgehill, as much as they boasted of the victory to hearten up their friends, had sorely weakened their army, and discouraged their party too. The horse were particularly in an ill case, and the foot greatly diminished, and the remainder very sickly: but, besides this, the parliament were greatly alarmed at the progress we made afterward, and still fearing the king's surprising them, had sent for the Earl of Essex to London to defend them, by which the country was, as it were, deserted and abandoned, and left to be plundered—our parties overrun all places at pleasure.

All this while I considered, that whatever the soldiers of fortune meant by the war, our desires were to suppress the exorbitant power of a party, to establish our king in his just and legal rights, but not with a design to destroy the constitution of government, and the being of parliament; and therefore I thought now was the time for peace, and there were a great many worthy gentlemen in the army of my opinion: and, had our master had ears to hear us, the war might have had an end here.

This address for peace was received by the king at Maidenhead, whither this army was now advanced, and his majesty returned an answer by Sir Peter Killigrew, that he desired nothing more, and would not be wanting on his part.

Upon this the parliament name commissioners, and his majesty excepting against Sir John Evelyn, they left him out, and sent others; and desired the king to appoint his residence near London, where the commissioners might wait upon him.

Accordingly the king appointed Windsor for the place of treaty, and desired it might be hastened. Thus all things looked with a favourable aspect, when one unlucky action knocked it all on the head, and filled both parties with more implacable animosity than they had before, and all hopes of peace vanished.

During this progress of the king's armies, we were always abroad with the horse ravaging the country, and plundering the Roundheads. Prince Rupert, a most active, vigilant party-man, and, I must own, fitter for such than for a general, was never lying still, and I seldom stayed behind; for, our regiment being very well mounted, he would always send for us if he had any extraordinary design in hand.

One time, in particular, he had a design upon Aylesbury, the capital of Buckinghamshire; indeed our view at first was rather to beat the enemy out of the town, and demolish their works, and perhaps raise some contributions on the rich country round it, than to garrison the place and keep it, for we wanted no more garrisons, being masters of the field.

The prince had two thousand five hundred horse with him in this expedition, but no foot: the town had some foot raised in the country by Mr Hambden, and two regiments of the country militia, whom we made light of, but we found they stood to their tackle better than well enough. We came very early to the town, and thought they had no notice of us; but some false brother had given the alarm, and we found them all in arms; the hedges without the town lined with musketeers, on that side in particular where they expected us, and the two regiments of foot drawn up in view to support them, with some horse in the rear of all.

The prince, willing, however, to do something, caused some of his horse to alight, and serve as dragoons; and having broken a way into the enclosures, the horse beat the foot from behind the hedges, while the rest who were alighted charged them in the lane which leads to the town. Here they had cast up some works, and fired from their lines very regularly, considering them as militia only, the governor encouraging them by his example; so that finding, without some foot, there would be no good to be done, we gave it over, and drew off, and so Aylesbury escaped a scouring for that time.

I cannot deny but these flying parties of horse committed great spoil among the country people, and sometimes the prince gave a liberty to some cruelties which were not at all for the king's interest; because it being still upon our own country, and the king's own subjects, whom, in all his declarations, he protested to be careful of, it seemed to contradict all those protestations and declarations, and served to aggravate and exasperate the common people; and the king's enemies made all the advantages of it that were possible, by crying out of twice as many extravagancies as were committed.

It is true the king, who naturally abhorred such things, could not restrain his men, nor his generals, so absolutely as he would have done. The war on his side was voluntarily; many gentlemen served him at their own charge, and some paid whole regiments themselves.

Sometimes also the king's affairs were straighter than ordinary, and his men were not very well paid, and this obliged him to wink at their excursions upon the country, though he did not approve of them; and yet I must own, that in those parts of England where the war was hottest there never was seen that ruin and depopulation, murders, ravishments, and barbarities, which I have seen even among protestant armies abroad in Germany, and other foreign parts of the world: and if the parliament had seen those things abroad as I had, they would not have complained.

The most I have seen was plundering the towns for provisions, drinking their beer, and turning our horses into their fields or stacks of corn, and sometimes the soldiers would be a little rude with the wenches; but, alas! what was this to Count Tilly's ravages in Saxony? or what was our taking of Leicester by storm, where they cried out of our barbarities, to the sacking of New Brandenburg, or the taking of Magdeburg?

In Leicester, of seven or eight thousand people in the town, three hundred were killed: in Magdeburg, of twenty-five thousand, scarce two thousand seven hundred were left, and the whole town burnt to ashes. I myself have seen sixteen or eighteen villages on fire in a day, and the people driven away from their dwellings like herds of cattle, the men murdered, the women stripped, and seven or eight thousand of them together, after they had suffered all the indignities and abuses of the soldiers, driven stark naked in the winter through the great towns to seek shelter and relief from the charity of their enemies.

I do not instance these greater barbarities to justify lesser actions, which are nevertheless irregular; but I do say, that, circumstances considered, this war was managed with as much humanity on both sides as could be expected, especially considering the animosity of parties.

But to return to the prince—he had not always the same success in these enterprises, for sometimes we came short home: and I cannot omit one pleasant adventure which happened to a party of ours in one of these excursions into Buckinghamshire.

The major of our regiment was soundly beaten by a party which, as I may say, was led by a woman, and if I had not rescued him, I know not but he had been taken prisoner by that woman. It seems our men had besieged some fortified house about Oxfordshire, towards Thame, and the house being defended by the lady in her husband's absence, she had yielded the house upon a capitulation; one of the articles of which was, to march out with all her servants, soldiers, and goods, and to be conveyed to Thame.

Whether she thought to have gone no further, or that she reckoned herself safe there, I know not: but my major, with two troops of horse, met with this lady and her party, about five miles from Thame, as we were coming back from our defeated attack of Aylesbury.

We reckoned ourselves in an enemy's country, and had lived a little at large, or at discretion, as it is called abroad; and these two troops, with the major, were returning to our detachment from a little village, where, at a farmer's house, they had met with some liquor; and truly some of his men were so drunk they could but just sit upon their horses. The major himself was not much better, and the whole body were but in a sorry condition to fight.

Upon the road they met this party. The lady, having no design of fighting, and being, as she thought, under the protection of the articles, sounded a parley, and desired to speak with the officer.

The major, as drunk as he was, could tell her, that, by the articles, she was to be assured no further than Thame; and being now five miles beyond it, she was a fair enemy, and therefore demanded to surrender themselves prisoners.

The lady seemed surprised; but, being sensible she was in the wrong, offered to compound for her goods, and would have given him three hundred pounds, and, I think, seven or eight horses. The major would certainly have taken it, if he had not been drunk; but he refused it, and gave threatening words to her (blustering in language which he thought certainly would frighten a woman,) that he would cut them all to pieces, and give no quarter.

The lady, who had been more used to the smell of powder than he imagined, called some of her servants to her, and, consulting with them what to do, they all unanimously encouraged her to let them fight; told her that it was plain that the commander was drunk, and all that were with him were rather worse than him, and hardly able to sit their horses; and that therefore one bold charge would put them all into confusion.

The lady consented, and, as she was a woman, they desired her to secure herself among the waggons; but she refused, and told them bravely she would take her fate with them.

In short, she boldly bade the major defiance, and that he might do his worst, since she had offered him fair, and he had refused it: her mind was altered now, and she would give him nothing, and bade him be gone.

Upon this she gave him leave to go back to his men; but before he could tell his tale to them, she was at his heels with all her men, and gave him such a home charge as put his men into disorder; and being too drunk to rally, they were knocked down before they knew what to do with themselves, and in a few minutes more they took to a plain flight.

But what was still worse, the men, being some of them very drunk, when they came to run for their lives, fell over one another, and tumbled over their horses, and made such work that a troop of women might have beaten them all.

In this pickle, with the enemy at his heels, I came in with him, hearing the noise; when I appeared the pursuers retreated, and seeing what a condition my people were in, and not knowing the strength of the enemy, I contented myself with bringing them off, without pursuing the other; nor could I ever hear positively who this female captain was.

We lost seventeen or eighteen of our men, and about thirty horses; but when the particulars of the story were told us, our major was so laughed at by the whole army, and everywhere, that he was ashamed to show himself for a week or a fortnight after.

But to return to the king: his majesty, as I observed, was at Maidenhead, addressed by the parliament for peace; and Windsor being appointed for the place of treaty, the van of his army lay at Colnbrook.

In the meantime, whether it were true or only a pretence, but it was reported the parliament general had sent a body of his troops, with a train of artillery, to Hammersmith, in order to fall upon some part of our army, or to take some advanced post, which was to the prejudice of our men; whereupon the king ordered the army to march, and, by the favour of a thick mist, came within half a mile of Brentford before he was discovered.

There were two regiments of foot and about six hundred horse in the town of the enemy's best troops: these, taking the alarm, posted themselves on the bridge at the west end of the town. The king attacked them with a select detachment of his best infantry, and they defended themselves with incredible obstinacy.

I must own I never saw raw men (for they could not have been in arms above four months) act like them in my life. In short, there was no forcing these men; for though two whole brigades of our foot, backed by our horse, made five several attacks upon them, they could not break them, and we lost a great many brave men in that action. At last, seeing their obstinacy, a party of horse was ordered to go round from Osterly; and entering the town on the north side, where, though the horse made some resistance, it was not considerable, the town was presently taken.

I led my regiment through an enclosure, and came into the town nearer to the bridge than the rest, by which means I arrived first; but I had this loss by my expedition, that the foot charged me before the body was come up, and pouring in their shot very furiously, my men were but in an ill case, and would not have stood much longer if the rest of the horse, coming up the lane, had not found them other employment.

When the horse were thus entered, they immediately dispersed the enemy's horse, who fled away towards London, and falling in, sword in hand, upon the rear of the foot who were engaged at the bridge, they were all cut in pieces, except about two hundred, who, scorning to ask quarter, desperately threw themselves into the river Thames, where they were most of them drowned.

The parliament and their party made a great outcry at this attempt; that it was base and treacherous while in a treaty of peace; and that the king, having amused them with hearkening to a treaty, designed to have seized upon their train of artillery first, and after that to have surprised both the city of London and the parliament. And I have observed since, that our historians note this action as contrary to the laws of honour and treaties, though, as there was no cessation of arms agreed on, nothing is more contrary to the laws of war than to suggest it.

That it was a very unhappy thing to the king and whole nation, as it broke off the hopes of peace, and was the occasion of bringing the Scotch army in upon us, I readily acknowledge; but that there was anything dishonourable in it I cannot allow: for though the parliament had addressed to the king for peace, and such steps were taken in it as before, yet, as I have said, there were no proposals made on either side for a cessation of arms; and all the world must allow that, in such cases, the war goes on in the field while the peace goes on in the cabinet. And if war goes on, admitting the king had designed to the surprise the city or parliament, or all of them, it had been no more than the custom of war allows, and what they would have done by him if they could.

The treaty of Westphalia, or peace of Munster, which ended the bloody wars of Germany, was a precedent for this. That treaty was actually negotiating seven years, and yet the war went on with all the vigour and rancour imaginable, even to the last; nay, the very time after the conclusion of it, but before the news could be brought to the army, did he that was afterwards King of Sweden, Carolus Gustavus, take the city of Prague by surprise, and therein an inestimable booty.

Besides, all the wars of Europe are full of examples of this kind; and therefore I cannot see any reason to blame the king for this action, as to the fairness of it. Indeed, as to the policy of it, I can say little; but the case was this:—the king had a gallant army, flushed with success, and things hitherto had gone on very prosperously both with his own army and elsewhere: he had above thirty-five thousand men in his own army, including his garrisons left at Banbury, Shrewsbury, Worcester, Oxford, Wallingford, Abingdon, Reading, and places adjacent.

On the other hand, the parliament army came back to London in but a very sorry condition; * for what with their loss in their victory, as they called it, at Edgehill, their sickness, and a hasty march to London, they were very much diminished, though at London they soon recruited them again. And this prosperity of the king's affairs might encourage him to strike this blow, thinking to bring the parliament to better terms by the apprehensions of the superior strength of the king's forces.

But, however it was, the success did not equally answer the king's expectation: the vigorous defence made by the troops posted at Brentford gave the Earl of Essex opportunity, with extraordinary application, to draw his forces out to Turnham Green; and the exceeding alacrity of the enemy was such, that their whole army appeared with them, making together an army of twenty-four thousand men, drawn up in view of our forces, by eight o'clock the next morning.

The city regiments were placed between the regular troops, and altogether offered us battle, but we were not in a condition to accept it. The king, indeed, was sometimes of the mind to charge them, and once or twice ordered parties to advance to begin to skirmish, but, upon better advice, altered his mind; and indeed it was the wisest counsel to defer the fighting at that time.

The parliament generals were as unfixed in their resolutions on the other side as the king: sometimes they sent out parties, and then called them back again. One strong party, of near three thousand men, marched off towards Acton, with orders to amuse us on that side, but were countermanded.

Indeed I was of the opinion we might have ventured the battle; for though the parliament's army were more numerous, yet the city trained bands, which made up four thousand of their foot, were not much esteemed, and the king was a great deal stronger in horse than they; but the main reason that hindered the engagement was want of ammunition, which the king having duly weighed, he caused the carriages and cannon to draw off first, and then the foot, the horse continuing to face the enemy till all was clear again, and then we drew off too, and marched to Kingston, and the next day to Reading.

* General Ludlow, in his 'Memoirs,' vol. i, page 52, says,—"Their men returned from Warwick to London, not like men who had obtained a victory, but like men that had been beaten."

Now the king saw his mistake in not continuing his march for London, instead of facing about to fight the enemy at Edgehill; and all the honour we had gained in so many successful enterprises lay buried in this shameful retreat from an army of citizens' wives; for truly their appearance at Turnham green was gay, but not great.

There were as many lookers-on as actors; the crowds of ladies, apprentices, and mobility, were so great, that when the parties of our army advanced, and, as they thought to charge, the coachmen, horsemen, and crowd made such a bustle to be out of harm's way, that it looked little better than a rout; and I was persuaded a good home charge from our horse would have sent their whole army after them; but so it was, that this crowd of an army was to triumph over us, and they did it, for all the kingdom was carefully informed how their dreadful looks had frightened us away.

Upon our retreat, the parliament resented this attack, which they called treacherous, and voted no accommodation; but they considered of it afterwards, and sent six commissioners to the king with propositions; but the change of the scene of action changed the terms of peace, and now they made terms like conquerors, petition him to desert his army, return to the parliament, and the like.

Had his majesty, at the head of his army, with the full reputation they had before, and in the ebb of their affairs, rested at Windsor, and commenced a treaty, they had certainly made more reasonable proposals; but now the scabbard seemed to be thrown away on both sides.

The rest of the winter was spent in strengthening parties and places, also in fruitless treaties of peace, messages, remonstrances, and paper war on both sides, but no action remarkable happened anywhere that I remember; yet the king gained ground everywhere, and his forces in the north increased under the Earl of Newcastle; also my Lord Goring (then only Colonel Goring) arrived from Holland, bringing three ships laden with arms and ammunition, and notice that the queen was following with more.

Goring brought four thousand barrels of gunpowder and twenty thousand small arms, all which came very seasonably, for the king was in great want of them, especially the powder. Upon this recruit the Earl of Newcastle drew down to York, and being above sixteen thousand strong, made Sir Thomas Fairfax give ground, and retreat to Hull.

Whoever lay still, Prince Rupert was always abroad, and I chose to go out with his highness as often as I had opportunity, for hitherto he was always successful. About this time, the Prince being at Oxford, I gave him intelligence of a party of the enemy who lived a little at large, too much for good soldiers, about Cirencester: the prince, glad of the news, resolved to attack them; and though it was a wet season, and the roads exceeding bad, being in February, yet we marched all night in the dark, which occasioned the loss of some horses, and men too, in sloughs and holes, which the darkness of the night had occasioned them to fall into.

We were a very strong party of horse, being about three thousand horse and dragoons, and coming to Cirencester very early in the morning, to our great satisfaction the enemy were perfectly surprised, not having the least notice of our march, which answered more ways than one.

However, the Earl of Stamford's regiment made some resistance; but the town having no works to defend it, saving a slight breastwork at the entrance of the road, with a turnpike, our dragoons alighted, and forcing their way over the bellies of Stamford's foot, they beat them from their defence, and followed them closely into the town.

Stamford's regiment was entirely cut in pieces, and several others, to the number of about eight hundred men, and the town entered without any other resistance. We took twelve hundred prisoners, three thousand arms, and the county magazine, which at that time was considerable, for there were about a hundred and twenty barrels of powder, and all things in proportion.

I received the first hurt I got in this war at this action; for having followed the dragoons, and brought my regiment within the barricado which they had gained, a musket-bullet struck my horse just in the head, and that so effectually, that he was dead in an instant. The fall plunged me into a puddle of water; and my man having brought me another horse, and cleaned me a little, I was just getting up, when a bullet struck me on my left hand, which I had just clapped on the horse's mane to lift myself into the saddle. The blow broke one of my fingers, and bruised my hand very much, and it proved a very painful hurt to me.

For the present I did not much concern myself about it, but made my mantle tie it up close in my handkerchief, and led up my men to the marketplace, where we had a very smart brush with some musketeers who were posted in the churchyard; but our dragoons soon beat them out there, and the whole town was then our own. We made no stay here, but marched back with all our booty to Oxford, for we knew the enemy were very strong at Gloucester, and that way.

Much about the same time the Earl of Northampton, with a strong party, set upon Lichfield, and took the town, but could not take the close; but they beat a body of four thousand men, coming to the relief of the town, under Sir John Gell, of Derbyshire, and Sir William Brereton, of Cheshire, and killing six hundred of them, dispersed the rest.

Our second campaign now began to open. The king marched from Oxford to relieve Reading, which was besieged by the parliament forces; but Colonel Fielding, lieutenant-governor, Sir Arthur Ashton being wounded, surrendered to Essex before the king could come up, for which he was tried by a court-martial, and condemned to die, but the king forbore to execute the sentence.

This was the first town we had lost in the war, for still the success of the king's affairs was very encouraging. This bad news, however, was overbalanced by an account brought the king at the same time, by an express from York, that the queen had landed in the north, and had brought over a great magazine of arms and ammunition, besides some men.

Some time after this her majesty, marching southward to meet the king, joined the army near Edgehill, where the first battle was fought. She brought the king three thousand foot, fifteen hundred horse and dragoons, six pieces of cannon, fifteen hundred barrels of powder, and twelve thousand small arms.

During this prosperity of the king's affairs, his armies increased mightily in the western counties also. Sir William Waller indeed commanded for the parliament in those parts too, and particularly in Dorsetshire, Hampshire, and Berkshire, where he carried on their cause but too fast; further west, Sir Nicholas Flamming, Sir Ralph Hopton, and Sir Bevil Greenvil had extended the king's quarters from Cornwall, through Devonshire, and into Somersetshire, where they took Exeter, Barnstaple, and Bideford; and the first of these they fortified very well, making it a place of arms for the west, and afterwards it was the residence of the queen.

At last the famous Sir William Waller and the king's forces met, and came to a pitched battle, where Sir William lost all his honour again. This was at Roundway-down in Wiltshire. Waller had engaged our Cornish army at Landsdown, and in a very obstinate fight had the better of them, and made them retreat to the Devizes. (Note 17.)

Sir William Hopton, however, having a good body of foot untouched, sent expresses and messengers one at the back of another to the king for some horse; and the king being in great concern for that army, who were composed of the flower of the Cornish men, commanded me to march with all possible secrecy, as well as expedition, with twelve hundred horse and dragoons from Oxford to join them.

We set out in the depth of the night, to avoid, if possible, any intelligence being given of our route, and soon joined with the Cornish army, when it was as soon resolved to give battle to Waller, and, to give him his due, he was as forward to fight as we.

As it is easy to meet when both sides are willing to be found, Sir William Waller met us upon Roundway-down, where we had a fair field on both sides, and room enough to draw up our horse.

In a word, there was little ceremony to the work; the armies joined, and we charged his horse with so much resolution, that they quickly fled, and quitted the field, for we overmatched him in horse, and this was the entire destruction of their army; for their infantry, which outnumbered ours by fifteen hundred, were now at our mercy; some faint resistance they made, just enough to give us occasion to break into their ranks with our horse, where we gave time to our foot to defeat others that stood to their work, upon which they began to disband, and ran every way they could; but our horse having surrounded them, made a fearful havoc.

We lost not above two hundred men in this action. Waller had above four thousand killed and taken, and as many dispersed that never returned to their colours. Those of the foot that had escaped got into Bristol, and Waller, with the poor remains of his routed regiments, got to London; so that it is plain some ran east, and some west, and every way they could. My going with this detachment prevented my being at the siege of Bristol, which Prince Rupert attacked much about the same time, and it surrendered in three days. The parliament questioned Colonel Nathaniel Fiennes, the governor, and had him tried as a coward by a court-martial, and condemned to die, but suspended the execution also, as the king did the governor of Reading.

I have often heard Prince Rupert say they did Colonel Fiennes wrong in that affair; and that if the colonel would have summoned him, he would have demanded a passport of the parliament, and have come up and convinced the court that Colonel Fiennes had not misbehaved himself, and that he had not a sufficient garrison to defend a city of that extent, having not above twelve hundred men in the town, excepting some of Waller's runaways, most of whom were unfit for service, and without arms; and that the citizens in general being disaffected to him, and ready on the first occasion to open the gates to the king's forces, it was impossible for him to have kept the city; and "when I had further informed them," said the prince, "of the measures I had taken for a general assault the next day, I am confident I should have convinced them that I could have taken the city by storm if he had not surrendered."

The king's affairs were now in a very good posture, and three armies in the north, west, and in the centre, counted, in the musters, above seventy thousand men, besides small garrisons and parties abroad. Several of the lords, and more of the commons, began to fall off from the parliament, and make their peace with the king, and the affairs of the parliament began to look very ill.

The city of London was their inexhaustible support and magazine, both for men, money, and all things necessary; and whenever their army was out of order, the clergy of their party in a Sunday or two would preach the young citizens out of their shops, the labourers from their masters, into the army, and recruit them on a sudden; and all this was still owing to the omission I first observed, of not marching to London when it might have been so easily effected.

We had now another or a fairer opportunity than before, but an ill use was made of it. The king, as I have observed, was in a very good posture: he had three large armies roving at large over the kingdom. The Cornish army, victorious and numerous, had beaten Waller, secured and fortified Exeter, which the queen had made her residence, and was there delivered of a daughter, the Princess Henrietta Maria, afterwards Duchess of Orleans, and mother of the Duchess Dowager of Savoy, commonly known, in the French style, by the title of Madame Royal.

They had secured Salisbury, Sherborne Castle, Weymouth, Winchester, and Basinghouse, and commanded the whole country, except Bridgewater, Taunton, Plymouth, and Lynn; all which places they held blocked up.

The king was also entirely master of all Wales, Monmouthshire, Cheshire, Shropshire, Staffordshire, Worcestershire, Oxfordshire, Berkshire, and all the towns, from Windsor up the Thames to Cirencester, except Reading and Henley; and of the whole Severn, excepting Gloucester.

The Earl of Newcastle had garrisons in every strong place in the north, from Berwick-upon-Tweed to Boston in Lincolnshire and Newark-upon-Trent, Hull only excepted, whither the Lord Fairfax and his son, Sir Thomas, were retreated, their troops being routed and broken, Sir Thomas Fairfax's baggage, with his lady and servants taken prisoners, and himself hardly escaping.

And now a great council of war was held in the king's quarters what enterprise to go upon; and it happened to be the very same day when the parliament were in a serious debate what should become of them, and whose help they should seek, and indeed they had cause for it; and had our councils been as ready and well-grounded as theirs, we had put an end to the war in a month's time.

In this council the king proposed the marching to London, to put an end to the parliament, and encourage his friends and loyal subjects in Kent who were ready to rise for him; and showed us letters from the Earl of Newcastle, wherein he offered to join his majesty with a detachment of four thousand horse and eight thousand foot, if his majesty thought fit to march southward, and yet leave forces sufficient to guard the north from any invasion.

I confess, when I saw the scheme the king had himself drawn for this attempt, I felt an unusual satisfaction in my mind, from the hopes that we might bring this war to some tolerable end; for I professed myself, on all occasions, heartily weary of fighting with friends, brothers, neighbours, and acquaintance; and I made no question but this motion of the king's would effectually bring the parliament to reason.

All men seemed to like the enterprise but the Earl of Worcester, who, on particular views for securing the country behind, as he called it, proposed the taking in the town of Gloucester and Hereford first. He made a long speech of the danger of leaving Massey, governor of Gloucester, an active, resolute man, with a strong party, in the heart of all the king's quarters, ready on all occasions to sally out and surprise the neighbouring garrisons, as he had done Sudley Castle and others, and of the ease and freedom to all those western parts to have them fully cleared of the enemy.

Interest presently backed this advice, and all those gentlemen whose estates lay that way, or whose friends lived about Worcester, Shrewsbury, Bridgenorth, or the borders, and who, as they said, had heard the frequent wishes of the country to have the city of Gloucester reduced, fell in with this advice, alleging the consequence it was of for the commerce of the country to have the navigation of the Severn free, which was only interrupted by this one town from the sea up to Shrewsbury, &c.

I opposed this, and so did several others—Prince Rupert was vehemently against it; and we both offered, with the troops of the county, to keep Gloucester blocked up during the king's march for London, so that Massey should not be able to stir.

This proposal made the Earl of Worcester's party more eager for the siege than before, for they had no mind to a blockade, which would leave the country to maintain the troops all the summer; and, of all the men, the prince did not please them; for he having no extraordinary character for discipline, his company was not much desired, even by our friends.

Thus, in an ill hour, it was resolved to sit down before Gloucester. The king had a gallant army of twenty-eight thousand men, whereof eleven thousand horse, the finest body of gentlemen that ever I saw together in my life; their horses without comparison, and their equipages the finest and best in the world, and their persons English, which I think is enough to say of them.—(Note 18.)

According to the resolution taken in the council of war, the army marched westward, and sat down before Gloucester the beginning of August. There we spent a month to the least purpose that ever army did: our men received frequent affronts from the desperate sallies of an inconsiderable enemy.

I cannot forbear reflecting on the misfortunes of this siege—our men were strangely dispirited in all the assaults they gave upon the place—there was something looked like disaster and mismanagement, and our men went on with an ill-will, and no resolution. The king despised the place; and to carry it sword in hand, made no regular approaches, but the garrison being desperate, made the greatest slaughter.

In this work our horse, who were so numerous and fine, had no employment. Two thousand horse had been enough for this business; the enemy had no garrison or party within forty miles of us, so that we had nothing to do but look on, with infinite regret, upon the losses of our foot.

The enemy made frequent and desperate sallies, in one of which I had my share. I was posted upon a parade, or place of arms, with part of my regiment, and part of Colonel Goring's regiment of horse, in order to support a body of foot who were ordered to storm the point of a breastwork which the enemy had raised to defend one of the avenues to the town.

The foot were beat off with loss, as they always were; and Massey, not content to have beaten them from his works, sallied out with near four hundred men, and falling in upon the foot, as they were rallying under the cover of our horse, we put ourselves in the best posture we could to receive them.

As Massey did not expect, I suppose, to engage with any horse, he had no pikes with him, which encouraged us to treat him the more rudely; but, as to desperate men danger is no danger, when he found he must clear his hands of us before he could despatch the foot, he faced up to us, fired but one volley of his small shot, and fell to battering us with the stocks of their muskets in such a manner that one would have thought they had been madmen.

We at first despised this way of clubbing us, and, charging through them, laid a great many upon the ground, and in repeating our charge trampled more under our horses' feet, and wheeling thus continually beat them off from our foot, who were just upon the point of disbanding.

Upon this they charged us again with their fire, and at one volley killed thirty-three or thirty-four men and horses; and had they had pikes with them, I know not what we should have done; but at last charging through them again, we divided them; one part, being hemmed in between us and our own foot, were cut in pieces; the rest, as I understood afterwards, retreated into the town, having lost three hundred of their men.

In this last charge I received a rude blow from a stout fellow on foot with the butt end of his musket, which stunned me, and fetched me off from my horse; and had not some took care of me, I had been trod to death by our own men: but the fellow being immediately killed, and my friends finding me alive, had taken me up, and carried me off at some distance, where I came to myself again after some time, but knew little of what I did or said that night.

This was the reason why I say I afterwards understood the enemy retreated, for I saw no more what they did then; nor indeed was I well of this blow for all the rest of the summer, but had frequent pains in my head, dizzinesses, and swimming, that gave me some fears the blow had injured the skull; but it wore off again, nor did it at all hinder my attending my charge.

This action, I think, was the only one that looked like a defeat given the enemy at this siege: we killed them near three hundred men, as I have said, and lost about sixty of our troopers.

All this time, while the king was harassing and weakening the best army he ever saw together during the whole war, the parliament generals, or rather preachers, were recruiting theirs; for the preachers were better than drummers to raise volunteers, zealously exhorting the London dames to part with their husbands, and the city to send some of their trained bands to join the army for the relief of Gloucester; and now they began to advance towards us.

The king, hearing of the advance of Essex's army, who by this time was come to Aylesbury, had summoned what forces he had within call to join him; and accordingly he received three thousand foot from Somersetshire; and having battered the town for thirty-six hours, and made a fair breach, resolved upon an assault, if possible, to carry the town before the enemy came up. The assault began about seven in the evening, and the men boldly mounted the breach; but, after a very obstinate and bloody dispute, were beaten out again by the besieged with great loss.

Being thus often repulsed, and the Earl of Essex's army approaching, the king called a council of war, and proposed to fight them.

The officers of the horse were for fighting; and, without doubt, we were superior to him both in number and goodness of our horse, but the foot were not in an equal condition; and the colonels of foot, representing to the king the weakness of their regiments, and that their men had been greatly disheartened at this cursed siege, the graver counsel prevailed, and it was resolved to raise the siege, and retreat towards Bristol, till the army was recruited.

Pursuant to this resolution, the 5th of September, the king having before sent away his heavy cannon and baggage, raised the siege, and marched to Berkeley Castle. The Earl of Essex came the next day to Birdlip Hills; and understanding, by messengers from Colonel Massey, that the siege was raised, sent a recruit of two thousand five hundred men into the city, and followed us himself with a great body of horse.

This body of horse showed themselves to us once in a large field fit to have entertained them in; and our scouts having assured us they were not above four thousand, and had no foot with them, the king ordered a detachment of about the same number to face them.

I desired his majesty to let us have two regiments of dragoons with us, which was then eight hundred men in a regiment, lest there might be some dragoons among the enemy, which the king granted; and accordingly we marched, and drew up in view of them. They stood their ground, having, as they supposed, some advantage of the manner they were posted in, and expected we would charge them.

The king, who did us the honour to command this party, finding they would not stir, called me to him, and ordered me, with the dragoons and my own regiment, to take a circuit round by a village to a certain lane, where, in their retreat, they must have passed, and which opened to a small common on their flank, with orders, if they had engaged, to advance and charge them in the flank.

I marched immediately; but though the country about there was almost all enclosures, yet their scouts were so vigilant that they discovered me, and gave notice to the body; upon which their whole party moved to the left, as if they intended to charge me before the king with his body of horse could come; but the king was too vigilant to be so circumvented, and therefore his majesty, perceiving this, sent away three regiments of horse to second me, and a messenger before them to order me to halt, and expect the enemy, for that he would follow with the whole body.

But before this order reached me I had halted for some time; for finding myself discovered, and not judging it safe to be entirely cut off from the main body, I stopped at the village, and causing my dragoons to alight, and line a thick hedge on my left, I drew up my horse just at the entrance into the village opening to a common. The enemy came up on the trot to charge me, but were saluted with a terrible fire from the dragoons out of the hedge, which killed them near a hundred men.

This being a perfect surprise to them, they halted, and just at that moment they received orders from their main body to retreat; the king, at the same time, appearing upon some small heights in their rear, which obliged them to think of retreating, or coming to a general battle, which was not their design.

I had no occasion to follow them, not being in a condition to attack their whole body; but the dragoons, coming out into the common, gave them another volley at a distance, which reached them effectually, for it killed about twenty of them, and wounded more; but they drew off, and never fired a shot at us, fearing to be enclosed between two parties, and so marched away to their general's quarters, leaving ten or twelve more of their fellows killed, and about a hundred and eighty horses. Our men, after the country fashion, gave them a shout at parting, to let them see we knew they were afraid of us.

However, this relieving of Gloucester raised the spirits as well as the reputation of the parliament forces, and was a great defeat to us; and from this time things began to look with a melancholy aspect, for the prosperous condition of the king's affairs began to decline.

The opportunities he had let slip were never to be recovered; and the parliament, in their former extremity, having voted an invitation to the Scots to march to their assistance, we had now new enemies to encounter, and indeed there began the ruin of his majesty's affairs; for the Earl of Newcastle, not able to defend himself against the Scots on his rear, the Earl of Manchester in his front, and Sir Thomas Fairfax on his flank, was everywhere routed and defeated, and his forces obliged to quit the field to the enemy.

About this time it was that we first began to hear of one Oliver Cromwell, who, like a little cloud, rose out of the east, and spread first into the north, till it shed down a flood that overwhelmed the three kingdoms.

He first was a private captain of horse, but now commanded a regiment; and joining with the Earl of Manchester, the first action we heard of him, which emblazoned his fame, was at Grantham, where, with only his own regiment, he defeated twenty-four troops of horse and dragoons of the king's forces.

Then at Gainsborough, with two regiments of his own horse, and one of dragoons, he defeated near three thousand of the Earl of Newcastle's men, killed Lieutenant-General Cavendish, brother to the Earl of Devonshire, who commanded them, and relieved Gainsborough; and, though the whole army came in to the rescue, he made good his retreat to Lincoln, with little loss.

The next week he defeated Sir John Henderson at Winsby, near Horncastle, with sixteen regiments of horse and dragoons, himself having not half that number, killed the Lord Widdrington, Sir Ingram Hopton, and several gentlemen of quality.

Thus this firebrand of war began to blaze, and he soon grew a terror to the north; for victory attended him like a page of honour, and he was scarce ever known to be beaten during the whole war.

Now we began to reflect again on the misfortune of our master's counsels: had we marched to London, instead of besieging Gloucester, we had finished the war with a stroke.

The parliament's army was in a most despicable condition, and had never been recruited, had we not given them a month's time, which we lingered away fatally at this town of Gloucester; but it was too late to reflect—we were a disheartened army, though not beaten yet, nor broken—we had a large country to recruit in, and we lost no time, but raised men apace.

In the meantime his majesty, after a short stay at Bristol, made back again towards Oxford with a part of the foot and all the horse.

At Cirencester we had a skirmish again with the Earl of Essex: that town owed us a shrewd turn for having handled them so coarsely before, when Prince Rupert seized the county magazine. I happened to be in the town that night with Sir Nicholas Crisp, whose regiment of horse was quartered there with Colonel Spencer, and some foot; my own regiment being gone before to Oxford.

About ten at night a party of Essex's men beat up our quarters by surprise, just as we had served them before: they fell in with us just as we were going to bed; and having beaten the out-guards, were got into the middle of the town before our men could get on horseback.

Sir Nicholas Crisp, hearing the alarm, got up, and, with some of his clothes on and some off, came into my chamber—"We are all undone," said he: "the Roundheads are upon us." We had but little time to consult; but being in one of the principal inns in the town, we instantly ordered the gates of the inn to be shut, and sent to the other inns, where our men were quartered, to do the like, with orders, if they had any back doors or ways to get out, to come to us.

By this means, however, we got so much time as to get on horseback, and so many of our men came to us by back ways, that we had near three hundred horse in the yards and places behind the house; and now we began to think of breaking out by a lane which led from the back side of the inn; but a new accident determined us another, though a worse way.

The enemy being entered, and our men cooped up in the yards of the inns, Colonel Spencer, the other colonel, whose regiment of horse lay also in the town, had got on horseback before us, and engaged with the enemy; but, being overpowered, retreated fighting, and sent to Sir Nicholas Crisp for help.

Sir Nicholas, moved to see the distress of his friend, turning to me, said, "What can we do for him?"

I replied, I thought it was time to help him, if possible; upon which, opening the inn-gates, we sallied out in very good order, about three hundred horse; and several of the troops from other parts of the town joining us, we recovered Colonel Spencer, and, charging home, beat back the enemy to their main body; but finding their foot drawn up in the churchyard, and several detachments moving to charge us, we retreated in as good order as we could.

They did not think fit to pursue us, but took all the carriages which were under the convoy of this party, laden with provisions and ammunition, &c., and above five hundred of our horse. The foot shifted away as well as they could. Thus we made off in a shattered condition towards Farringdon, and so to Oxford; and I was very glad my regiment was not there. (Note 19.)

We had little rest at Oxford, or indeed anywhere else, for the king had marched from thence, and we followed him. I was rather uneasy at being absent from my regiment, and did not know how the king might resent it, which caused me to ride after them with all expedition. The armies were engaged that very day at Newbury, but I came in too late.

I had not behaved myself so as to be suspected of a wilful shunning the action; but a colonel of a regiment ought to avoid absence from his regiment in time of fight, be the excuse ever so just, as carefully as he would a surprise in his quarters.

The truth is, it was an error of my own, and owing to two days' stay I made at the Bath, where I met with some ladies who were my relations; but this is far from being an excuse, for if King Charles had been a Gustavus Adolphus, I had certainly received a check for it.

This fight was very obstinate; and could our horse have come to action as freely as the foot, the parliament army had suffered much more, for we had here a much better body of horse than they, and we never failed beating them where the weight of the work lay upon the horse.

Here the city trained bands, of which there were two regiments, and whom we used to despise, fought very well; they lost one of their colonels and several officers in the action, and I heard our men say they behaved themselves as well as any forces the parliament had.

The parliament cried victory here too, as they always did, and indeed where the foot were concerned they had the advantage, but our horse defeated them evidently. The king drew up his army in battalia, and faced them all the next day, inviting them to renew the fight, but they had no inclination to come on again.

It was a kind of hedge fight, for neither army was drawn out in the field, if it had, it would never have held from six in the morning to ten at night; but they fought for advantages—sometimes one side had the better, sometimes the other; they fought twice through the town, in at one end and out at the other, and in the hedges and lanes, with exceeding fury.

The king lost the most men, his foot having suffered for want of succour from the horse, which, on two several occasions, could not come at them; but the parliament foot suffered also, and two regiments were entirely cut in pieces, and the king kept the field.

Essex, the parliament general, had the pillage of the dead, and left us to bury them; for while we stood all day to our arms, having given them a fair field to fight us in, their camp rabble stripped the dead bodies, and they, not daring to venture a second engagement, marched away towards London.

The king lost in this action the Earls of Carnarvon and Sunderland, the Lord Falkland, a French marquis, some very gallant officers, and about twelve hundred men. The Earl of Carnarvon was brought into an inn in Newbury, where the king came to see him. He had just life enough to speak to his majesty, and died in his presence.

The king was exceedingly concerned for him, and was observed to shed tears. We were indeed all of us troubled for the loss of so brave a gentleman, but the concern our royal master discovered moved us exceedingly. Everybody endeavoured to have the king out of the room, but he would not stir from the bed-side till one of the surgeons acquainted his majesty that all hopes of life were gone.

The indefatigable industry of the king, his servants and friends, continually to supply and recruit his forces, and to harass and fatigue the enemy, was such that we should still have given a good account of the war had the Scots stood neuter, but bad news came every day from the north. As for other places, parties were always in action; Sir William Waller and Sir Ralph Hopton beat one another by turns; and Sir Ralph had extended the king's quarters from Launceston in Cornwall to Farnham in Surrey, where he gave Sir William a rub, and drove him into the castle.

But in the north the storm grew thick, the Scots advanced to the borders, and entered England, in confederacy with the parliament, against their king, for which the parliament requited them afterwards as they deserved.

Had it not been for the Scotch army, the parliament had easily been reduced to terms of peace, but after this they never made any proposals fit for the king to receive. Want of success before had made them differ among themselves; Essex and Waller were ever at variance; the Earl of Manchester and Lord Willoughby differed to the highest degree, and the king's affairs went never the worse for it.

But this storm in the north ruined us all, for the Scots prevailed in Yorkshire, and being joined by Fairfax, Manchester, and Cromwell, carried all before them, so that the king was obliged to send Prince Rupert, with a body of four thousand horse, to the assistance of the Earl of Newcastle, where that prince finished the destruction of the king's interest by a rash and unaccountable action, of which I shall speak in its place.

Another action on the part of the king gave great offence, which was the calling the Scots into the nation, for even the king's own friends disliked it, and was carefully improved by his enemies, to the disadvantage of the king and of his cause.

The rebels in Ireland had, ever since the bloody massacre of the protestants, maintained a war against the English, and the Earl of Ormond was general and governor for the king. The king, finding his affairs pinch him at home, sent orders to the Earl of Ormond to agree to a cessation of arms with the rebels, and to ship over certain of his regiments hither to his majesty's assistance.

It is true the Irish had deserved to be very ill treated by the English; but while the parliament pressed the king with a cruel and unnatural war at home, and called in an army out of Scotland to support their quarrel with their king, I could never be convinced that it was such a dishonourable action for the king to suspend the correction of his Irish rebels till he was in a capacity to do it with safety to himself, or to delay any further assistance to preserve himself here; and the troops he recalled being his own, it was no breach of his honour to make use of them, since he now wanted them for his own security against those who fought against him at home.

But the king was persuaded to take one step further, and that, I confess, was displeasing to us all, and some of his best and most faithful servants took the freedom to speak plainly to him of it, and that was, bringing some regiments of the Irish themselves over. This cast, as we thought, an odium upon our whole nation, being some of those very wretches who had dipped their hands in the innocent blood of the protestants, and with unheard-of butcheries had massacred so many thousands of English in cool blood.

Abundance of gentlemen forsook the king upon this account; and, seeing they could not brook the fighting in conjunction with this wicked generation, came into the declaration of the parliament, and, making composition for their estates, lived retired all the rest of the war, or went abroad.

But as exigencies and necessities oblige us to do things which at other times we would not do, and is, as to man, some excuse for the doing such things, so I cannot but think the guilt and dishonour of such an action must lie, very much of it at least, at their doors who drove the king to these necessities and distresses by calling in an army of his own subjects whom he had not injured, but had complied with them in everything, to make war upon him without any provocation.

As to the quarrel between the king and his parliament, there may be something said on both sides; and the king saw cause himself to disown and dislike some things he had done, which the parliament objected against, such as levying money without consent of parliament, infractions on their privileges, and the like. Here, I say, was some room for an argument at least, and concessions on both sides were needful to come to a peace; but for the Scots, all their demands had been answered, all their grievances had been redressed: they had made articles with their sovereign, and he had performed those articles; their capital enemy, episcopacy, was abolished; they had not one thing to demand of the king which he had not granted, and therefore they had no more cause to take up arms against their sovereign than they had against the Grand Seigneur. But it must for ever lie against them as a brand of infamy, and as a reproach on their whole nation, that, purchased by the parliament's money, they sold their honesty, and rebelled against their king for hire; and it was not many years before, as I have said already, they were fully paid the wages of their unrighteousness, and chastised for their treachery by the very same people whom they thus basely assisted; then they would have retrieved it, if it had not been too late.

But I could not but accuse this age of injustice and partiality, who, while they reproached the king for his cessation of arms with the Irish rebels, and not prosecuting them with the utmost severity, though he was constrained by the necessity of the war to do it, could yet, at the same time, justify the Scots taking up arms in a quarrel they had no concern in, and against their own king, with whom they had artiled and capitulated, and who had so punctually complied with all their demands, that they had no claim upon him, no grievances to be redressed, no oppression to cry out of him, nor could ask any thing of him which he had not granted.

But as no action in the world is so vile but the actors can cover with some specious pretence, so the Scots, now passing into England, published a declaration to justify their assisting the parliament; to which I shall only say, in my opinion, it was no justification at all; for, admitting the parliament's quarrel had been ever so just, it could not be just in them to aid them, because it was against their own king, to whom they had sworn allegiance, or at least crowned, and thereby had recognized his authority.

For, if mal-administration be, according to Pryn's doctrine, or according to their own Buchanan, a sufficient reason for subjects to take up arms against their prince, the breach of his coronation-oath being supposed to dissolve the oath of allegiance; yet this can never be extended to make it lawful, that because a king of England may, by mal-administration, discharge the subjects of England from their allegiance, that therefore the subjects of Scotland may take up arms against the King of Scotland, he having not infringed the compact of government as to them, and they having nothing to complain of for themselves.

Thus I thought their own arguments were against them, and Heaven seemed to concur with it; for although they did carry the cause for the English rebels, yet the most of them left their bones here in the quarrel.

But what signifies reason to the drum and the trumpet? The parliament had the supreme argument with those men—the money; and having accordingly advanced a good round sum, upon payment of this (for the Scots would not stir a foot without it), they entered England on the 15th of January, 1643, with an army of twelve thousand men, under the command of General Lesley, now Earl of Leven, an old soldier of great experience, having been bred to arms from his youth in the service of the Prince of Orange. (Note 20.)

The Scots were no sooner entered England but they were joined by all the friends to the parliament party in the north; and first, Colonel Grey, brother to Lord Grey, joined them with a regiment of horse, and several out of Westmoreland and Cumberland, and they advanced to Newcastle, which they summoned to surrender.

The Earl of Newcastle, who rather saw than was able to prevent the storm, was in Newcastle, and did his best to defend it; but the Scots, increased by this time to about twenty thousand, laid close siege to the place, which was but meanly fortified, and having repulsed the garrison upon several sallies, and pressing the place very close, after a siege of twelve days they entered the town sword in hand.

The Earl of Newcastle got away, and afterwards gathered what forces together he could; but not strong enough to hinder the Scots from advancing to Durham, which he quitted to them, nor to hinder the conjunction of the Scots with the forces of Fairfax, Manchester, and Cromwell.

Whereupon the earl, seeing all things thus going to wreck, he sent his horse away, and retreated with his foot into York, making all necessary preparations for a vigorous defence there, in case he should be attacked, which he was pretty sure of, as indeed afterwards happened. York was in a very good posture of defence: the fortifications very regular, and exceeding strong; well furnished with provisions, and had now a garrison of twelve thousand men in it. The governor, under the Earl of Newcastle, was Sir Thomas Glemham, a good soldier, and a gentleman of great courage.

The Scots, as I have said, having taken Durham, Tynemouth Castle, and Sunderland, and being joined by Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had taken Selby, resolved, with their united strength, to besiege York; but when they came to view the city, and saw a plan of the works, and had intelligence of the strength of the garrison, they sent expresses to Manchester and Cromwell for help, who came on and joined them with nine thousand, making together about thirty thousand men.

The Earl of Newcastle's repeated messengers had now convinced the king that it was absolutely necessary to send some forces to his assistance, or else all would be lost in the north. Whereupon Prince Rupert was detached with orders, first to go into Lancashire, and relieve Latham House, defended by the brave Countess of Derby; and then, taking all the forces he could collect in Cheshire, Lancashire, and Yorkshire, to march to relieve York.

The prince marched from Oxford with but three regiments of horse, and one of dragoons, making in all about two thousand eight hundred men. The colonels of horse were Goring, Biron, and myself; the dragoons were commanded by Colonel Smith.

In our march we were joined by a regiment of horse from Banbury, one of dragoons from Bristol, and three regiments of horse from Chester, who, having been at the siege of Nantwich, were obliged to raise the siege by Sir Thomas Fairfax; and the foot having yielded, the horse made good their retreat to Chester, being about two thousand, of whom three regiments now joined us.

We received also two thousand foot from West-Chester, and two thousand more out of Wales, and with this strength we entered Lancashire. We had not much time to spend, and a great deal of work to do.

Bolton and Liverpool felt the first fury of the prince: at Bolton, indeed, he had some provocation, for here we were like to be beaten off. When first the prince came to Bolton, he sent a summons to demand the town for the king, but received no answer but from their guns, commanding the messenger to keep off at his peril.

They had raised some works about the town; and having by their intelligence learned that we had no artillery, and were only a flying party, so they called us, they contemned the summons, and showed themselves upon their ramparts ready for us. The prince was resolved to humble them, if possible, and took up his quarters close to the town.

In the evening he ordered me to advance with one regiment of dragoons, and my horse to bring them off, if occasion was, and to post myself as near as possibly I could to the lines, yet so as not to be discovered; and at the same time having concluded what part of the works to fall upon, he drew up his men on two other sides, as if he would storm them there, and on a signal I was to begin the real assault on my side with my dragoons.

I had got so near the town with my dragoons, making them creep upon their bellies a great way, that we could hear the soldiers talk on the walls, when the prince, believing one regiment would be too few, sent me word that he had ordered a regiment of foot to help, and that I should not discover myself till they were come up to me. This broke our measures; for the march of this regiment was discovered by the enemy, and they took the alarm.

Upon this I sent to the prince to desire he would put off the storm for that night, and I would answer for it the next day; but the prince was impatient, and sent orders we should fall on as soon as the foot came up to us. The foot, marching out of the way, missed us, and fell in with a road that leads to another part of the town, and not being able to find us, made an attack upon the town themselves; but the defendants, being ready for them, received them very warmly, and beat them off with great loss.

I was at a loss now what to do; for hearing the guns, and by the noise knowing it was an assault upon the town, I was very uneasy to have my share in it; but as I had learned under the King of Sweden punctually to adhere to the execution of orders, and my orders being to lie still till the foot came up with me, I would not have stirred if I had been sure to have done ever so much service; but, however, to satisfy myself, I sent to the prince to let him know that I continued in the same place, expecting the foot, and none being yet come up, I desired further orders.

The prince was greatly amazed at this, and, finding there must be some mistake, came galloping away in the dark to the place, and drew off the men, which was no hard matter, for they were willing enough to give it over.

The prince ordered me to come off so privately as not to be discovered, if possible, which I effectually did; and so we were disappointed for that night. The next day the prince fell on upon another quarter with three regiments of foot, but was beaten off with loss, and the like a third time.

At last the prince, resolving to carry it, doubled his numbers, and renewing the attack with fresh men, the foot entered the town over their works, killing, in the first heat of the action, all that came in their way; some of the foot, at the same time, letting in the horse; and so the town was entirely won. There were about six hundred of the enemy killed, and we lost four hundred in all, which was owing to the foolish mistakes we made. Our men got some plunder here which the parliament made a great noise about; but it was their due, and they bought it dear enough.

Liverpool did not cost us so much, nor did we get so much by it, the people having sent their women and children, and best goods, on board the ships in the road, and as we had no boats to board them with, we could not get at them. Here, as at Bolton, the town and fort were taken by storm, and the garrison were many of them cut in pieces, which, by the way, was their own faults.

Our next stop was at Latham house, which the Countess of Derby had gallantly defended above eighteen weeks against the parliament forces; and this lady not only encouraged her men by her cheerful and noble maintenance of them, but by examples of her own undaunted spirit, exposing herself upon the walls in the midst of the enemy's shot, would be with her men in the greatest dangers; and she well deserved our care of her person, for the enemy were prepared to use her very rudely if she had fallen into their hands. (Note 21.)

Upon our approach the enemy drew off; and the prince not only effectually relieved this vigorous lady, but left a good quantity of all sorts of ammunition, three great guns, five hundred arms, and two hundred men, commanded by a major, as her extraordinary guard.

Here the way being now opened, and our success answering our expectations, several bodies of foot came into us from Westmoreland and from Cumberland; and here it was that the prince found means to surprise the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, which was recovered for the king by the management of the mayor of the town, and some loyal gentlemen of the county, and a garrison placed there again for the king.

But our main design being the relief of York, the prince advanced that way apace, his army still increasing; and being joined by the Lord Goring from Rutlandshire with four thousand horse, which were the same the Earl of Newcastle had sent away when he threw himself into York with the infantry, we were now eighteen thousand effective men, of which ten thousand were horse and dragoons; so the prince, full of hopes, and his men in good heart, boldly marched directly for York.

The Scots, as much surprised at the taking of Newcastle as at the coming of their enemy, began to inquire which way they should get home, if they should be beaten; and calling a council of war, they all agreed to raise the siege. The prince, who drew with him a great train of carriages, charged with provision and ammunition for the relief of the city, like a wary general, kept at a distance from the enemy, and fetching a great compass about, brought all safe into the city, and entered York with all his army.

No action of the whole war would have gained the prince so much honour, or the king's affairs so much advantage, had the prince but restrained his courage after this, and checked his fatal eagerness for fighting. Here was a siege raised, the reputation of the enemy justly slurred, a city relieved, and furnished with all things necessary, in the face of an army superior in number by near ten thousand men, and commanded by a triumvirate of those veteran generals, Leven, Fairfax, and Manchester.

Had the prince but remembered the proceeding of the great Duke of Parma at the relief of Paris, he would have seen the relieving the city was his business; it was the enemy's business to fight; it was his to avoid it, if possible; for, having delivered the city, and put the disgrace of raising the siege upon the enemy, he had nothing further to do but to have waited till he had seen what course the enemy would take, and taken his further measures from their motion.

But the prince, a continual friend to precipitant councils, would hear no advice. I entreated him not to put it to the hazard: I told him that he ought to consider, if he lost the day, he lost the kingdom, and took the crown from off the king's head. I put him in mind that it was impossible those three generals should continue long together; and that if they did, they would not agree long in their councils, which would be as well for us as their separating.

It was plain Manchester and Cromwell must return to the associated counties, who would not suffer them to stay, for fear the king should attempt them; that he could subsist well enough, having York city and river at his back. But the Scots would eat up the country, make themselves odious, and dwindle away to nothing, if he would but hold them at bay a little. Other general officers were of the same opinion; but all I could say, or they either, to a man deaf to anything but his own courage, signified little. He would draw out and fight; there was no persuading him to the contrary, unless a man would run the risk of being upbraided with being a coward, and afraid of the work.

The enemy's army lay on a large common, called Marston Moor, doubtful what to do: some were for fighting the prince; the Scots were against it, being uneasy at having the garrison of Newcastle at their backs; but the prince brought their councils of war to a result, for he let them know they must fight him whether they would or not; for the prince being, as before, eighteen thousand men strong, and the Earl of Newcastle having joined him with eight thousand foot out of the city, were marched in quest of the enemy, had entered the moor in view of their army, and began to draw up in order of battle; but night coming on, the armies only viewed each other at a distance for that time.

We lay all night upon our arms, and with the first of the day were in order of battle: the enemy was getting ready; but part of Manchester's men were not in the field, but lay about three miles off, and made a hasty march to come up. (Note 22.)

Prince Rupert's army was exceedingly well managed: he himself commanded the left, the Earl of Newcastle the right wing; and Lord Goring, as general of the foot, assisted by Major-General Porter and Sir Charles Lucas, led the main battle.

I had prevailed with the prince, according to the method of the King of Sweden, to place some small bodies of musketeers in the intervals of his horse in the left wing, but could not prevail upon the Earl of Newcastle to do it in the right, which he afterwards repented.

In this posture we stood facing the enemy, expecting they would advance to us, which at last they did; and the prince began the day by saluting them with his artillery, which, being well placed, galled them terribly for a quarter of an hour; they could not shift their front, so they advanced hastily to get within our great guns, and consequently out of their danger, which brought the fire the sooner on.

The enemy's army was ordered thus:—Sir Thomas Fairfax had the right wing, in which was the Scotch horse, and the horse of his own and his father's army; Cromwell led the left wing with his own and the Earl of Manchester's horse; and the three generals, Lesley, old Fairfax, and Manchester, led the main battle.

The prince, with our left wing, fell on first, and, with his usual fury, broke, like a clap of thunder, into the right wing of the Scotch horse, led by Sir Thomas Fairfax; and, as nothing could stand in his way, he broke through and through, and entirely routed them, pursuing them quite out of the field.

Sir Thomas Fairfax, with a regiment of lancers, and about five hundred of his own horse, made good the ground for some time; but our musketeers, which, as I said, were so placed, were such an unlooked-for sort of an article in a fight among the horse, that those lancers, which otherwise were brave fellows, were mowed down with their shot, and all was put into confusion.

Sir Thomas Fairfax was wounded in the face, his brother killed, and a great slaughter was made of the Scots, to whom, I confess, we showed no favour.

While this was doing on our left, Lord Goring, with the main battle, charged the enemy's foot, and particularly one brigade, commanded by Major-General Porter, being mostly pikemen, charged with that fury in a close body of pikes, that they overturned all that came in their way, and, breaking into the middle of the enemy's foot, filled all with terror and confusion, insomuch that the three generals, thinking all had been lost, fled, and quitted the field.

But matters went not so well with that always unfortunate gentleman, the Earl of Newcastle, and our right wing of horse, for Cromwell charged him with a powerful body of horse; and though the earl and those about him did what men could do, and behaved themselves with all possible gallantry, yet there was no withstanding Cromwell's horse; but, like Prince Rupert, they bore down all before them: and now the victory was wrung out of our hands by our own gross miscarriage; for the prince, as it was his custom, too eager in the chase of the enemy, was gone, and could not be heard of.

The foot in the centre, the right wing of the horse being routed by Cromwell, was left, and without the guard of his horse; Cromwell having routed the Earl of Newcastle, and beaten him quite out of the field, and Sir Thomas Fairfax rallying his dispersed troops, they fell all together upon the foot.

General Lord Goring, like himself, fought like a lion; but, forsaken by his horse, was hemmed in on all sides, and overthrown; and an hour after this, the prince returning too late to recover his friends, was obliged, with the rest, to quit the field to conquerers.

This was a fatal day to the king's affairs, and the risk too much for any man in his senses to run. We lost four thousand men on the spot, three thousand prisoners, amongst whom was Sir Charles Lucas, Major-General Porter, Major-General Telier, and about one hundred and seventy gentlemen of quality. We lost all our baggage, twenty-five pieces of cannon, three hundred carriages, one hundred and fifty barrels of powder, and ten thousand arms.

The prince got into York with the Earl of Newcastle and a great many gentlemen, and seven or eight thousand of the men, as well horse as foot.

I had but very coarse treatment in this battle, for, returning with the prince from the pursuit of the right wing, and finding all lost, I halted with some other officers to consider what to do. At first we were for making our retreat in a body, and might have done so well enough, if we had known what had happened, before we saw ourselves in the middle of the enemy, for Sir Thomas Fairfax, who had got together his scattered troops, and joined by some of the left wing, knowing who we were, charged us with great fury.

It was not a time to think of anything but getting away, or dying upon the spot. The prince kept on in the front, and Sir Thomas Fairfax, by this charge, cut off about three regiments of us from our body; but, bending his main strength at the prince, left us, as it were, behind him in the middle of the field of battle. We took this for the only opportunity we could have to get off, and, joining together, we made across the place of battle in as good order as we could, with our carbines presented.

In this posture we passed by several bodies of the enemy's foot, who stood with their pikes charged to keep us off; but they had no occasion, for we had no design to meddle with them, but to get from them. Thus we made a swift march, and thought ourselves pretty secure; but our work was not done yet, for on a sudden we saw ourselves under a necessity of fighting our way through a great body of Manchester's horse, who came galloping upon us over the moor. They had, as we suppose, been pursuing some of our broken troops which were fled before, and, seeing us, they gave us a home charge.

We received them as well as we could, but pushed to get through them, which at last we did with a considerable loss even to them. However, we had so many men either killed or separated from us, for all could not follow the same way, that of our three regiments we could not be above four hundred horse together when we got quite clear, and these were mixed men, some of one troop and regiment, some of another.

Not that I believe many of us were killed in the last attack, for we had plainly the better of the enemy, but our design being to get off, some shifted for themselves one way, and some another, in the best manner they could, and as their several fortunes guided them. Four hundred more of this body, as I afterwards understood, having broke through the enemy's body another way, kept together and got into Pontefract Castle, and three hundred more made northward and to Skippon, where the prince afterwards fetched them off.

Those few of us that were left together with whom I was, being now pretty clear of pursuit, halted and began to inquire who we were, and what we should do; and, on a short debate, I proposed we should make to the first garrison of the king's that we could recover, and that we should keep together, lest the country people should insult us upon the roads. With this resolution we pushed on westward for Lancashire; but our misfortunes were not yet at an end—we travelled very hard, and got to a village upon the river Wharf, near Wetherby.

At Wetherby there was a bridge—but we understood that a party from Leeds had secured the town and the post, in order to stop the flying cavaliers, and that it would be very hard to get through there, though, as we understood afterwards, there were no soldiers there, but a guard of the townsmen. In this dilemma we consulted what course to take—to stay where we were till morning, we all concluded would not be safe; some advised to take the stream with our horses, but the river being deep, and the current strong, seemed to bid us have a care what we did of that kind, especially in the night.

Here we intended to refresh ourselves and our horses, but were terribly disappointed, therefore we resolved to go on till we should come to a ford or bridge, where we might get over. Some guides we had, but they either were foolish or false, for after we had ridden eight or nine miles they plunged us into a river at a place they called a ford, but it was a very bad one; and though our horses swam, yet seven or eight were lost, but, however, we saved the men, and we all got over.

We made bold with our first convenience to trespass upon the country for a few horses, where we could find them, to remount our men whose horses were drowned, and continued our march; but being obliged to refresh ourselves at a small village on the edge of Branham Moor, we found the country alarmed by our taking some horses, and we were no sooner mounted in the morning, and entering on the moor, but we understood we were pursued by a troop of horse.

There was no remedy but we must pass this moor; and though our horses were exceedingly tired, yet we pressed on upon a round trot, and recovered an enclosed country on the other side, where we halted.

And here, necessity putting us upon it, we were obliged to look out for more horses, for several of our men were dismounted, and others had their horses disabled by carrying double, those who had lost their horses by getting up behind them; but we were supplied by our enemies against their will.

The enemy followed us over the moor, and we having a woody enclosed country about us, where we were, I observed by their moving they had lost sight of us, upon which I proposed concealing ourselves till we might judge of their numbers. We did so, and lying close in a wood, they passed hastily by us, without skirting or searching the wood, which was what, on another occasion, they would not have done.

I found they were not above one hundred and fifty horse, and considering that to let them go before us would be to alarm the country and stop our design, I thought, since we might be able to deal with them, we should not meet with a better place for it, and told the rest of our officers my mind, which all our party presently, for we had not time for a long debate, agreed to.

Immediately upon this I caused two men to fire their pistols in the wood, at two different places, as far asunder as I could. This I did to give them an alarm, and amuse them, for, being in the lane, they would otherwise have got through before we had been ready, and I resolved to engage them there as soon as it was possible.

After this alarm we rushed out of the wood with about one hundred horse, and charged them on the flank in a broad lane, the wood being on their right. Our passage into the lane being narrow, gave us some difficulty in our getting out; but the surprise of the charge did our work; for the enemy, thinking we had been a mile or two before, had not the least thought of this onset till they heard us in the wood, and then they who were before could not come back.

We broke into the lane just in the middle of them, and by that means divided them; and, facing to the left, charged the rear. First our dismounted men, which were near fifty, lined the edge of the wood, and fired with their carbines upon those which were before, so warmly, that they put them into great disorder.

Meanwhile fifty more of our horse from the further part of the wood showed themselves in the lane upon their front; this put the foremost party into a great perplexity, and they began to face about, to fall upon us who were engaged in the rear; but their facing about in a lane where there was no room to wheel, as one who understands the manner of wheeling a troop of horse must imagine, put them into great disorder.

Our party in the head of the lane, taking the advantage of this mistake of the enemy, charged in upon them, and routed them entirely. Some found means to break into the enclosures on the other side of the lane, and got away. About thirty were killed, and about twenty-five made prisoners, and forty very good horses were taken; all this while not a man of ours was lost, and not above seven or eight wounded.

Those in the rear behaved themselves better: for they stood our charge with a great deal of resolution, and all we could do could not break them; but at last our men who had fired on foot through the hedges at the other party, coming to do the like here, there was no standing it any longer. The rear of them faced about, retreated out of the lane, and drew up in the open field to receive and rally their fellows.

We killed about seventeen of them, and followed them to the end of the lane, but had no mind to have any more fighting than needs must; our condition at that time not making it proper, the towns round us being all in the enemy's hands, and the country but indifferently pleased with us; however, we stood facing them till they thought fit to march away.

Thus we were supplied with horses enough to remount our men, and pursued our first design of getting into Lancashire. As for our prisoners, we let them go off on foot.

The country being by this time alarmed, and the rout of our army everywhere known, we foresaw abundance of difficulties before us; we were not strong enough to venture into any great towns, and we were too many to be concealed in small ones. Upon this we resolved to halt in a great wood, about three miles beyond the place where we had the last skirmish, and sent out scouts to discover the country, and to learn what they could, either of the enemy or of our friends.

Anybody may suppose we had but indifferent quarters here, either for ourselves or for our horses; but, however, we made shift to lie here two days and one night.

In the interim I took upon me, with two more, to go to Leeds to learn some news. We were disguised like country ploughmen; the clothes we got at a farmer's house, which for that odd occasion we plundered. I cannot say no blood was shed in a manner too rash, and which I would not have done at any other time; but our case was desperate, and the people too surly, and shot at us out of their windows, wounded one man and shot a horse, which we counted as great a loss to us as a man, for our safety depended upon our horses.

Here we got clothes of all sorts enough for both sexes, and thus dressing myself up like a peasant, with a white cap on my head, and a fork on my shoulder, and one of my comrades in the farmer's wife's russet gown and petticoat, like a woman; the other with an old crutch like a lame man, and all mounted on such horses as we had taken the day before from the country, away we went for Leeds, by three several ways, and agreed to meet upon the bridge.

My pretended countrywoman, who was to pass for my wife, seemed easy in her dress, as did also the cripple, though they were both gentlemen of good quality of the Earl of Worcester's family; but I thought myself very awkward in mine, which made me very shy, especially among the soldiers. We passed their sentinels and guards at Leeds undiscovered, and put up our horses at several houses in the town, from whence we went up and down to make our remarks.

My cripple was the fittest to go among the soldiers, because there was less danger of his being pressed: there he informed himself of the matters of war, particularly that the enemy sat down again to the siege of York: that flying parties were in pursuit of the cavaliers; and there he heard that five hundred horse of Lord Manchester's had followed a party of cavaliers over Branham moor; and that, entering a lane, the cavaliers, who were a thousand strong, fell upon them, and killed them all but about fifty.

This, though it was an untruth, was very pleasant to us to hear, knowing it was our party, because of the other part of the story, which was thus; that the cavaliers had taken possession of such a wood, where they rallied all the troops of their flying army; that they had plundered the country as they came, taking all the horses they could get; that they had plundered goodman Thompson's house, which was the farmer I mentioned, and killed man, woman, and child; and that they were about two thousand strong.

My other friend in woman's clothes got among the good wives at the inn where she set up her horse, and there she heard the same sad and dreadful tidings; and that this party was so strong, none of the neighbouring garrisons durst stir out; but that they had sent expresses to

York for a party of horse to come to their assistance,

I walked up and down the town, but fancied myself so ill disguised, and so easy to be known, that I cared not to talk with anybody. We met at the bridge exactly at our time, and compared our intelligence, found it answered our end of coming, and that we had nothing to do but to get back to our men; but my cripple told me he would not stir till he bought some victuals; so away he hopped with his crutch, and bought four or five great pieces of bacon, as many of hung beef, and two or three loaves; and borrowing a sack at the inn, which he never returned, he loaded his horse, and, getting a large leather bottle, he filled it with aqua-vitæ instead of small beer, as did my woman comrade the same.

I was uneasy in my mind, and took no care but to get out of the town; however, we all came off well enough; but 'twas well that I had no provisions with me, as you will presently hear.

We came, as I said, into the town by several ways, and so we went out; but about three miles from the town we met again exactly where we had agreed: I being about a quarter of a mile from the rest, met three country fellows on horseback; one had a long pole on his shoulder, another a fork, the third no weapon at all that I saw. I gave them the road very orderly, being habited like one of their brethren; but one of them stopping short and looking earnestly at me, called out in a broad north-country tone, "Hark thee, friend, whar hast thou thilk horse?"

I confess I was in some confusion, neither being able to answer the question nor to speak in his tone; so I behaved as if I had not heard him, and went on.

Upon this the clown immediately came up to me, and taking hold of my horse's bridle, said, "Na, but ye's not gang soa;" at which, vexed that I could not talk to the fellow in his own dialect, I reached him a knock on the pate with my fork, which brought him from his horse, and then began to mend my pace; the other clowns, though they knew not what the fellow wanted, pursued me, and finding they had better heels than I, I saw there was no remedy but to make use of my hands and faced about.

The first that came up with me was he that had no weapon, so I thought I might parley with him, and speaking as country-like as I could, I asked him what he wanted.

"Thou'st knaw that soon, and Ise but come at thee."

I immediately replied, "Then keep awa, mon, or Ise brain thee."

By this time the third man came up, and the parley ended; for he gave me no words, but laid at me with his long pole, and that with such fury that I began to be doubtful of him.

Though I had pistols under my grey frock, I was loath to shoot the fellow, as well for that the noise of a pistol might bring more people in, the village being in our rear; and also because I could not imagine what the fellow meant, or would have; but at last finding he would be too many for me with that long weapon, I threw myself off my horse, and running in with him, stabbed my fork into his horse's belly. The horse being wounded, staggered a while, and then fell, and the booby had not the sense to get down in time, but fell with him; upon which, giving him a knock or two with my fork, I secured him.

The other, by this time, had furnished himself with a great stick out of a hedge; and, before I was disengaged from the last fellow, gave me two such blows, that if they had been upon my head, instead of my shoulder, I had ended the fight and my life together.

It was time to look about me now, for this was a madman; I defended myself with my fork, but it would not do; at last, in short, I was forced to pistol him, and getting on horseback again, with all the speed I could make, got away to the wood to our men.

If my two fellow spies had not been behind, I had never known what was the meaning of this quarrel of the three countrymen, but my cripple had all the particulars; for he being behind us, as I have already observed, when he came up to the first fellow who began the fray, he found him beginning to come to himself; so he got off, and pretending to help him, he put him up upon his breech, and being a very facetious fellow, said, "Well, and what's the matter now?"

"Ah, wae's me," replied the clown, "I is killed."

"Not quite, mon," said Cripple, smiling.

"Oh that's a fau thief," meaning me, and thus they parleyed.

Cripple then got him upon his feet, and gave him a dram of his aqua-vitæ bottle, and made much of him, in order to know what was the occasion of the quarrel. Our disguised woman seemingly pitied the fellow too, and they set him up again upon his horse, and then told him that fellow, still meaning me, was got upon one of his brother's horses, who lived at Wetherby.

They, to humour him, said the cavaliers stole him; but it was like such rogues; and thus they jogged on until they came to the place where the other two lay.

The first fellow they assisted as they had done the other, and gave him a dram out of the leather bottle; but the last fellow was past their care; so they came away: for when they understood that it was my horse they claimed, they began to be afraid that their own horses might be known too, and then they had been in a worse condition than myself, and must have been forced to have done them some mischief to have got away.

I had sent out two troopers to fetch them off, if there was any occasion; but their stay was not long, for the troopers seeing them at a little distance coming towards us, they presently returned.

I had enough of going for a spy, and my companions had enough of staying in the wood; for other intelligences agreed with ours, and all concurred in this, that it was time to be going. However, this use we made of it, that while the country thought us so strong, we were in the less danger of being attacked, though in the more of being observed; but all this while we heard nothing of our friends till the next day; when we heard Prince Rupert, with about a thousand horse, was at Skipton, and from thence marched away to Westmoreland.

We concluded now we had two or three days good; for since messengers were sent to York for a party to suppress us, we must have at least two days' march of them, and therefore all concluded we were to make the best of our way: early in the morning, therefore, we decamped from those dull quarters; and as we marched through a village, we found the people very civil to us, and the women cried out, "God bless them, it is a pity that the Roundheads should make such work with brave men," and the like. Finding we were among our friends, we resolved to halt a little, and refresh ourselves; and, indeed, the people were very kind to us, gave us victuals and drink, and took care of our horses.

It happened to be my lot to stop at a house where the good woman took a great deal of pains to provide for us; but I observed her husband walked about with a cap upon his head, and very much out of order. I took no great notice of it, being very sleepy, and having asked my landlady to let me have a bed, I laid down and slept. When I awaked I found my landlord on another bed in the same room, groaning very heavily.

When I came down stairs, I found Cripple talking with the landlady; he was now out of his disguise, but we called him Cripple still; and the other, who put on the woman's clothes, we called Goody Thompson. As soon as Cripple saw me, he called me out.

"Do you know the man of the house you are quartered in?"

"No, not I; pray, why do you ask?"

"No, so I believe; nor they you; if they did, his wife would not have made you a posset, and got you a white loaf."

"I do not understand you. What do you mean?"

"Have you seen the man?"

"Seen him? yes, and heard him too; the man's sick, and groaned so heavily that I could not lay upon the bed any longer for him."

"Why, he's the man that you knocked down yesterday with your fork, and I have had all the story out yonder at the next door."

I confess it grieved me to have been forced to treat a person so roughly who was one of our friends, but to make some amends, we contrived to give the poor man his brother's horse; and my Cripple told him a formal story, that he believed the horse was taken away from the fellow by some of our men; and, if he knew him again, if it was his friend's horse, he should have him.

The man came down upon the news, and I caused six or seven horses which were taken at the same time to be shown him; he immediately chose the right; so I gave him the horse, and we pretended a great deal of sorrow for the man's hurt, and that we had knocked the fellow on the head as well as taken away the horse.

The man was so overjoyed at the revenge he thought was taken on the fellow, that we heard him groan no more.

We ventured to stay all day at this town, and the next night, and got guides to lead us to Blackstone Edge, a ridge of mountains which part this side of Yorkshire from Lancashire.

Early in the morning we marched, and kept our scouts very carefully out every way, who brought us no news for this day; we kept on all night, and made our horses do penance for the little rest they had; and the next morning we passed the hills, and got into Lancashire, to a town called Littlebury; and from thence to Rochdale, a little market town.

And now we thought ourselves safe as to the pursuit of the enemies from the side of York; our design was to get to Bolton; but all the county was full of the enemy in flying parties, and how to get there we knew not.

At length we resolved to send a messenger to Bolton; but he came back and told us he had, with lurking and hiding, tried all the ways that he thought possible, but to no purpose, for he could not get into the town. We sent another, and he never returned; and, some time after, we understood he was taken by the enemy. At last one got into the town, who brought us word they were tired out with constant alarms, had been straitly blocked up, and every day expected a siege; and therefore advised us either to go northward, where Prince Rupert and Lord Goring ranged at liberty; or to get over Warrington bridge, and so secure our retreat to Chester.

This double direction divided our opinions; I was for getting into Chester to recruit myself with horses and with money, both which I wanted, and to get refreshment, which we all stood in need of; but the major part of our men were for the north. First, they said, there was their general; and it was their duty to the cause, and the king's interest obliged us to go where we could do best service; and there were their friends, and every man might hear some news of his own regiment, for we belonged to several; besides, all the towns to the left of us were possessed by Sir William Brereton; Warrington, in Lancashire, and Northwich, in Cheshire, garrisoned by the enemy, and a strong party at Manchester; so that it was very likely we should be beaten and dispersed before we could get to Chester.

These reasons, and especially the last, determined us for the north, and we had resolved to march the next morning, when other intelligence brought us to more speedy resolutions. We kept our scouts continually abroad to bring us intelligence of the enemy, whom we expected on our backs, and also to keep an eye upon the country; for, as we lived upon them something at large, they were ready enough to do us any ill turn that lay in their power.

The first messenger that arrived was from our friends at Bolton, with information that they were preparing at Manchester to attack us: one of our parties had been as far as Stockport, on the edge of Cheshire, and was pursued by a party of the enemy, but got off by the help of the night.

Thus, all things looking black to the south, we had resolved to march northward in the morning, when one of our scouts, from the side of Manchester, assured us, Sir Thomas Middleton, with some of the parliament forces and the country troops, making above twelve hundred men, were on their march to attack us, and would certainly beat up our quarters that night.

Upon this advice we resolved to be gone; and getting all things in readiness, we began to march about two hours before night; and having got a trusty fellow for our guide, a fellow that we found was a friend to our side, he put a project into my head, which saved us all for that time; and that was, to give out in the village that we were marched back to Yorkshire, resolving to get into Pontefract Castle.

Accordingly he conducted us out of the town the same way we came in; and taking a boy with him, he sent the boy back just at night, and bade him say he saw us go up the hills at Blackstone Edge; and it happened very well, for this party were so sure of us that they had placed four hundred men on the road to the northward to intercept our retreat, and had left no way for us, as they thought, to escape, but back again.

About ten o'clock at night they assaulted our quarters, but finding we were gone, and being informed which way, they followed upon the spur; and travelling all night, being moon-light, they found themselves the next morning about fifteen miles east just out of their way; for we had, by the help of our guide, turned short at the foot of the hills; and, through blind, untrodden paths, and, with difficulty enough, by noon the next day, had reached almost twenty-five miles north near a town called Clithero.

Here we halted in the open field, and sent out people to see how things were in the country. This part of the country, almost impassable, and surrounded with hills, was indifferently quiet, and we got some refreshment for ourselves, but very little horse-meat, and so went on; but we had not marched far before we found ourselves discovered; and the four hundred horse sent to lie in wait for us as before, having understood which way we went, followed us hard; and by letters to some of their friends at Preston, we found we were beset again.

Our guide began now to be out of his knowledge, and our scouts brought us word the enemy's horse was posted before us, and we knew they were in our rear.

In this exigence we resolved to divide our small body, and so amusing them, at least one might get off if the other miscarried. I took about eighty horse with me, among which were all that I had of our own regiment, amounting to about thirty-two, and took the hills towards Yorkshire.

Here we met with such impassable hills, vast moors, rocks, and stony ways, as lamed all our horses and tired all our men; and sometimes I thought we should never be able to get over them, for our horses failing, and jack boots being but indifferent things to travel in, we might be starved before we should find any road or towns, for guide we had none, but a boy, who knew but little, and would cry when we asked him any questions.

I believe neither men nor horses ever passed in some places where we went; and for twenty hours we saw not a town nor a house, excepting sometimes from the top of the mountains at a vast distance.

I am persuaded we might have encamped here

if we had had provisions, till the war had been over, and have met with no disturbance; and I have often wondered since how we got into such horrible places as much as how we got out of them.

That which was worse to us than all the rest was, that we knew not where we were going, nor what part of the country we should come into when we came out of those desolate crags.

At last, after a terrible fatigue, we began to see the western parts of Yorkshire, some few villages, and the country at a distance looked a little like England; for I thought before, it looked like Old Brennus Hill, which the Grisons called the Grandfather of the Alps. We got some relief in the villages, which, indeed, many of us had so much need of, that they were hardly able to sit their horses, and others were forced to help them off, they were so faint.

I never felt so much of the power of hunger in my life; for having not eaten in thirty hours, I was as ravenous as a hound; and if I had had a piece of horse flesh, I believe I should not have had patience to have stayed dressing it, but have fallen upon it raw, and have eaten it as greedily as a Tartar.

However, I ate very cautiously, having often seen the danger of men's eating heartily after long fasting. Our next care was to inquire our way. Halifax, they told us, was on our right, there we durst not think of going; General Skippon was before us, and there we knew not how it was; for a body of three thousand horse, sent out by the enemy in pursuit of Prince Rupert, had been there but two days before, and the country people could not tell us whether they were gone or not; and Manchester's horse, which were sent out after our party, were then at Halifax in quest of us, and afterwards marched into Cheshire.

In this distress we would have hired a guide, but none of the country people would go with us; for the Roundheads would hang them, they said, when they came there. Upon this I called a fellow to me. "Harke, friend, dost thee know the way so as to bring us into Westmoreland, and not keep the great road from York?"

"Ay, merry, I ken the ways weel enou."

"And you would go and guide us, but that you are afraid the Roundheads will hang you."

"Indeed would I, measter, with all my heart."

"Why, then, thou hadst as well be hanged by a Roundhead as a Cavalier; for if thou wilt not go, I'll hang thee instantly."

"Na, and ye serve me soa, Ise ene gan with ye; for I care not for hanging; and ye'll get me a horse, Ise gang and be one of you, for I'll nere come heame more."

This pleased us still better, and we mounted the fellow; for three of our men died that night with the extreme fatigue of the last service.

Next morning, when our new trooper was mounted and clothed, we hardly knew him; and this fellow led us by such ways, such wildernesses, and yet with such prudence, keeping the hills to the left, that we might have the villages to refresh ourselves, that, without him, we had certainly either perished in those mountains, or fallen into the enemy's hands.

We passed the great road from York so critically as to time, that from one of the hills he showed us a part of the enemy's horse who were then marching into Westmoreland.

We lay still that day, finding we were not discovered by them; and our guide proved the best scout that we could have had; for he would go out ten miles at a time, and bring us in all the news of the country: here he brought us word that York was surrendered upon articles, and that Newcastle, which had been surprised by the king's party, was besieged by another army of Scots advanced to help their brethren.

Along the edges of those vast mountains we passed, with the help of our guide, till we came into the forest of Swale; and finding ourselves perfectly concealed, for no soldier had ever been here all the war, nor perhaps would not, if it had lasted seven years; we thought we wanted a few days' rest, at least for our horses; so we resolved to halt, and while we did so, we made some disguises, and sent out some spies into the country; but as here were no great towns, nor no post roads, we got very little intelligence.

We rested four days, and then marched again; and indeed having no great stock of money about us, and not very free of that we had, four days was enough for those poor places to be able to maintain us.

We thought ourselves pretty secure now; but our chief care was how to get over those terrible mountains; for having passed the great road that leads from York to Lancaster, the crags, the further northward we looked, appeared still the worse, and our business was all on the other side.

Our guide told us he would bring us out; if we would have patience, which we were obliged to, and kept on this slow march till he brought us to Stanhope, in the county of Durham; where some of Lord Goring's horse, and two regiments of foot, had their quarters: this was nineteen days from the battle of Marstonmoor.

Prince Rupert, who was then at Kendal in Westmoreland, and who had given me over as lost, when he had news of our arrival, sent an express to me to meet him at Appleby. I went thither accordingly, and gave him an account of our journey; and there I heard the short history of the other part of our men, whom we parted from in Lancashire.

They made the best of their way north; they had two resolute gentlemen who commanded; and being so closely pursued by the enemy, that, finding themselves under the necessity of fighting, they halted, and faced about, expecting the charge.

The boldness of the action made the officer who led the enemy's horse, which it seems were the county horse only, afraid of them; which they perceiving, taking the advantage of his fears, bravely advanced, and charged them; and though they were above two hundred horse, they routed them, killed about thirty or forty, got some horses and some money, and pushed on their march night and day; but coming near Lancaster, they were so waylaid and pursued, that they agreed to separate, and shift every man for himself.

Many of them fell into the enemy's hands; some were killed attempting to pass through the river Lune; some went back again, six or seven got to Bolton, and about eighteen got safe to Prince Rupert.

The prince was in a better condition here than I expected; he and Lord Goring, with the help of Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and the gentlemen of Cumberland, had a body of four thousand horse and about six thousand foot.

They had retaken Newcastle, Tynemouth, Durham, Stockton, and several towns of consequence, from the Scots, and might have cut them out work enough still, if that base people, resolved to engage their whole interest to ruin their sovereign, had not sent a second army of ten thousand men, under the Earl of Calender, to help their first.

These came and laid siege to Newcastle, but found more vigorous resistance now than they had done before.

There were in the town Sir John Morley, the Lord Crawford, Lord Rea, and Maxwell, Scots, and old soldiers, who were resolved their countrymen should buy the town very dear if they had it; and had it not been for our disaster at Marstonmoor, they had never had it; for Calender, finding he was not able to carry the town, sent to General Leven to come from the siege of York to help him.

Meantime the prince formed a very good army, and the Lord Goring, with ten thousand men, showed himself on the borders of Scotland, to try if that might not cause the Scots to recall their forces; and I am persuaded had he entered Scotland, the parliament of Scotland would have recalled the Earl of Calender, for they had but five thousand men left in arms to send against him; but he was loath to venture.

However, this effect it had, that it called the Scots northward again, and found them work there for the rest of the summer, to reduce the several towns in the bishopric of Durham.

I found with the prince the poor remains of my regiment, which, when joined with those that had been with me, could not all make up three troops, and but two captains, three lieutenants, and one cornet; the rest were dispersed, killed, or taken prisoners.

However, with those, which we still called a regiment, I joined the prince, and after having done all we could on that side, the Scots being returned from York, the prince returned through Lancashire to Chester.

The enemy often appeared and alarmed us, and once fell on one of our parties, and killed us about a hundred men; but we were too many for them to pretend to fight us, so we came to Bolton, beat the troops of the enemy near Warrington, where I got a cut with a halberd in my face, and arrived at Chester the beginning of August.

The parliament, upon their great success in the north, thinking the king's forces quite broken, had sent General Essex into the west, where the king's army was commanded by Prince Maurice, Prince Rupert's elder brother, but not very strong; and the king being, as they supposed, by the absence of Prince Rupert, weakened so much that he might be checked by Sir William Waller, who, with four thousand five hundred foot, and one thousand five hundred horse, was at that time about Winchester, having lately beaten Sir Ralph Hopton. Upon all these considerations, the Earl of Essex marched westward.

The forces in the west being too weak to oppose him, everything gave way to him, and all people expected he would besiege Exeter, where the queen was newly lying-in, and sent a trumpet to desire he would forbear the city until she could be removed; which he did, and passed on westward, took Tiverton, Bideford, Barnstaple, Launceston, relieved Plymouth, drove Sir Richard Grenvill up into Cornwall, and followed him thither, but left Prince Maurice behind him with four thousand men about Barnstaple and Exeter.

The king, in the meantime, marched from Oxford to Worcester, with Waller at his heels. At Edgehill his majesty turned upon Waller, and gave him a brush to put him in mind of the place; the king went on to Worcester, sent three hundred horse to relieve Durley Castle, besieged by the Earl of Denbigh, and sending part of his forces to Bristol, returned to Oxford.

His majesty had now firmly resolved to march into the west, not having yet any account of our misfortunes in the north. Waller and Middleton waylaid the king at Cropedy bridge; the king attacked Middleton at the bridge; Waller's men were posted with some cannon to guard a pass; Middleton put a regiment of the king's foot to the rout, and pursued them: Waller's men, willing to come in for the plunder, a thing their general had often used them to, quitted their post at the pass, and their great guns, to have part in the victory.

The king, coming in seasonably to the relief of his men, routed Middleton, and at the same time sent a party round, who clapt in between Sir William Waller's men and their great guns, and secured the pass and the cannon too.

The king took three colonels, besides other officers, and about three hundred men, prisoners, with eight great guns, nineteen carriages of ammunition, and killed about two hundred men.

Waller lost his reputation in this fight, and was exceedingly slighted ever after, even by his own party; but especially by such as were of Essex's party, between whom and Waller there had been jealousies and misunderstandings for some time.

The king, about eight thousand strong, marched on to Bristol, where Sir William Hopton joined him; and from thence he followed Essex into Cornwall; Essex still following Grenvill, the king came to Exeter, and joining with Prince Maurice, resolved to pursue Essex; and now the Earl of Essex began to see his mistake, being cooped up between two seas, the king's army in his rear, the country his enemy, and Sir Richard Grenvill in his van.

The king, who always took the best measures when left to his own counsel, wisely refused to engage, though superior in number, and much stronger in horse. Essex often drew out to fight; but the king, fortified, took the passes and bridges, planted cannon, and secured the country to keep off provisions, and continually straitened their quarters, but would not fight.

Now Essex sends away to the parliament for help, and they write to Waller, Middleton, and Manchester, to follow and come up with the king in his rear; but some were too far off, and could not, as Manchester and Fairfax ; others made no haste, as having no mind to it, as Waller and Middleton ; and if they had, it had been too late.

At last the Earl of Essex, finding nothing to be done, und unwilling to fall into the king's hands, took shipping, and left his army to shift for themselves. The horse, under Sir William Balfour, the best horse officer, and, without comparison, the bravest in all the parliament army, advanced in small parties, as if to skirmish, but following in with the whole body, being three thousand five hundred horse, broke through, and got off.

Though this was a loss to the king's victory, yet the foot were now in a condition so much the worse. Brave old Skipton proposed to fight through with the foot, and die, as he called it, like Englishmen, with sword in hand ; but the rest of the officers shook their heads at it ; for, being well paid, they had, at present, no inclination for dying.

Seeing it thus, they agreed to treat, and the king granted them conditions, upon laying down their arms, to march off free. This was too much : had his majesty but obliged them upon oath not to serve again for a certain time, he had done his business ; but this was not thought of ; so they passed free, only disarmed, the soldiers not being allowed so much as their swords.

The king gained by this treaty forty pieces of cannon, all of brass, three hundred barrels of gunpowder, nine thousand arms, eight thousand swords, match and bullet in proportion, two hundred waggons, one hundred and fifty colours and standards, all the bag and baggage, and about a thousand of the men listed in his army. This was a complete victory without bloodshed ; and had the king but secured the men from serving only for six months, it had most effectually answered the battle of Marston Moor.

As it was, it infused new life into all his majesty's forces and friends, and retrieved his affairs very much ; but especially it encouraged us in the north, who were more sensible of the blow received at Marston Moor, and of the destruction the Scots were bringing upon us all.

While I was at Chester, we had some small skirmishes with Sir William Brereton. One morning in particular Sir William drew up, and faced us, and one of our colonels of horse observing the enemy to be not, as he thought, above two hundred, desired leave of Prince Rupert to attack them with the like number, and accordingly he sallied out with two hundred horse.

I stood drawn up without the city with eight hundred more, ready to bring him off, if he should be put to the worst, which happened accordingly ; for, not having discovered neither the country nor the enemy as he ought, Sir William Brereton drew him into an ambuscade ; so that before he came up with Sir William's forces near enough to charge, he found about three hundred horse in his rear : though he was surprised at this, yet, being a man of ready courage, he boldly faced about with one hundred and fifty of his men, leaving the other fifty to face Sir William.

With this small party he desperately charged the three hundred horse in his rear, and putting them into disorder, broke through them, and had there been no greater force, he had cut them all to pieces.

Flushed with this success, and eager to assist the fifty men I had left behind, he faced about, and charged through them again, and with these two charges entirely routed them.

Sir William Brereton finding himself disappointed, advanced and fell upon the fifty men just as the colonel came up to them ; they fought him with a great deal of bravery ; but the colonel being unfortunately killed in the first charge, the men gave way, and came flying all in confusion, with the enemy at their heels.

As soon as I saw this, I advanced, according to my orders, and the enemy, as soon as we appeared, gave over the pursuit. This gentleman, I remember, was Colonel Morrough ; we fetched off his body, and retreated into Chester.

The next morning the prince drew out of the city with about one thousand two hundred horse and two thousand foot, and attacked Sir William Brereton in his quarters. The fight was very sharp for the time, and near seven hundred men on both sides were killed ; but Sir William would not put it to a general engagement, so the prince drew off, contenting himself to have insulted him in his quarters.

We now had received orders from the king to join him ; but I representing to the prince the condition of my regiment, which was now reduced to a hundred men, and that being within twenty-five miles of my father's house, I might soon recruit it, my father having got some men together already, I desired leave to lay at Shrewsbury for a month, to make up my men.

Accordingly, having obtained his leave, I marched to Wrexham, where, in two days, I got twenty men, and so on to Shrewsbury. I had not been here above ten days, but I received an express to come away with what recruits I had got together, Prince Rupert having positive orders to meet the king by a certain day.

I had not mounted one hundred men, though I had listed above two hundred, when these orders came ; but leaving my father to complete them for me, I marched with those I had, and went to Oxford.

The king, after the rout of the parliament forces in the west, had marched back, took Barnstaple, Plympton, Launceston, Tiverton, and several other places, and left Plymouth besieged by Sir Richard Grenvill ; met with Sir William Waller at Shaftesbury, and again at Andover ; had a skirmish with him at both places, and marched for Newbury.

Here the king sent for Prince Rupert to meet him, who, with three thousand horse, made long marches to join him ; but the parliament having joined their three armies together, Manchester from the north, Waller and Essex, the men being clothed and armed from the west, had attacked the king, and obliged him to fight, the day before the prince came up.

The king had so posted himself as that he could not be obliged to fight but with advantage ; the parliament's forces being superior in number, and therefore, when they attacked him, he galled them with his cannon, and, declining to come to a general battle, stood upon the defensive, expecting Prince Rupert with the horse.

The parliament's forces had some advantage over our foot, and took the Earl of Cleveland prisoner; but the king, whose foot were not above one or two, drew his men under the cannon of Dennington Castle, and, having secured his artillery and baggage, made a retreat with his foot in very good order, having not lost in all the fight above three hundred men, and the parliament as many. We lost five pieces of cannon and took two, having repulsed the Earl of Manchester's men on the north side of the town, with considerable loss.

The king, having lodged his train of artillery and baggage in Dennington Castle, marched the next day for Oxford; there we joined him with three thousand horse and two thousand foot. Encouraged with this reinforcement, the king appeared upon the hills on the north-west of Newbury, and faced the parliament army. The parliament having too many generals as well as soldiers, the former could not agree whether they should fight or not.

This was no great token of the victory they boasted of; for they were now twice our number in the whole, and their foot three for one. The king stood in battalia all day, and finding the parliament forces had no mind to engage him, he drew away his cannon and baggage out of Dennington Castle, in view of their whole army, and marched to Oxford.

This was such a false step of the parliament generals, that the people cried shame of them, and the parliament appointed a committee to inquire into it.

Cromwell accused Manchester, and Manchester accused Waller, and so they laid the fault upon each other.

Waller would have been glad to have charged it upon Essex; but, as it happened, he was not in the army, having been taken ill some days before; but, as it generally is when a mistake is made, the actors fall out among themselves, so it was here.

No doubt it was as false a step as that at Cornwall, to let the king draw away his baggage and cannon, in the face of three armies, and never fire a shot at them.

The king had not above eight thousand foot in his army, and they above twenty-five thousand. It is true, the king had eight thousand horse, a fine body, and much superior to theirs; but the foot might, with the greatest ease in the world, have prevented the removing of the cannon, and in three days have taken the castle, with all that was in it.

Those differences produced their self-denying ordinance, and the putting by most of their old generals, as Essex, Waller, Manchester, &c.; and Sir Thomas Fairfax, a terrible man in the field, though the mildest of men out of it, was voted to have the command of all their forces, and Lambert to take the command of Sir Thomas Fairfax's troops in the north, old Skipton being major-general.

This winter was spent on the enemy's side in modelling, as they called it, their army; and, on our side in recruiting ours, and some petty excursions.

Amongst the many addresses, I observed one from Sussex or Surry, complaining of the rudeness of our soldiers, and particularly of the ravishing of women and the murdering of men; from which I only observed that there were disorders among them as well as among us, only with this difference, that they, for reasons I mentioned before, were under circumstances to prevent it better than the king.

But I must do the king's memory that justice, that he used all possible methods, by punishment of soldiers, charging, and sometimes entreating, the gentlemen not to suffer such disorders and such violences in their men; but it was to no purpose for his majesty to attempt it, while his officers, generals, and great men winked at it; for the licentiousness of the soldier is supposed to be approved by the officer when it is not corrected.

The rudeness of the parliament soldiers began from the division among their officers; for in many places the soldiers grew so out of all discipline, and so insufferably rude, that they in particular refused to march when Sir William Waller went to Weymouth. This had turned to good account for us had these cursed Scots been out of our way; but they were the staff of the party; and now they were daily solicited to march southward, which was a very great affliction to the king and all his friends.

One booty the king got at this time which was a very seasonable assistance to his affairs.

A great merchant ship, richly laden at London, and bound to the East Indies, was, by the seamen, brought into Bristol, and delivered up to the king.

Some merchants in Bristol offered the king forty thousand pounds for her, which his majesty ordered should be accepted, reserving only thirty great guns for his own use.

The treaty at Uxbridge now was begun, and we, that had been well beaten in the war, heartily wished the king would come to a peace; but we all foresaw the clergy would ruin it all. The commons were for presbytery, and would never agree the bishops should be restored; the king was more willing to comply with anything than this, and we foresaw it would be so; from whence we used to say among ourselves, that the clergy was resolved, if there was no bishop, there should be no king.

This treaty at Uxbridge was a perfect war between the men of the gown; ours was between those of the sword; and I cannot but take notice how the lawyers, statesmen, and the clergy of every side bestirred themselves rather to hinder than promote the peace.

There had been a treaty at Oxford some time before, where the parliament, insisting that the king should pass a bill to abolish episcopacy, quit the militia, abandon several of his faithful servants to be exempted from pardon, and making several other most extravagant demands; nothing was done, but the treaty broke off, both parties being rather further exasperated than inclined to hearken to conditions.

However, soon after the success in the west, his majesty, to let them see that the victory had not elated him so as to make him reject the peace, sent a messenger to the parliament to put them in mind of messages of like nature which they had slighted, and to let them know that, notwithstanding he had beaten their forces, he was yet willing to hearken to a reasonable proposal for putting an end to the war.

The parliament pretended the king in his message did not treat with them as a legal parliament, and so made hesitations; but after long debates and delays they agreed to draw up propositions for peace to be sent to the king.

As this message was sent to the houses about August, I think they made it the middle of November before they brought propositions for a peace; and when they brought them they had no power to enter either upon a treaty, or so much as preliminaries for a treaty, only to deliver the letter and receive an answer.

However, such were the circumstances of affairs at this time, that the king was uneasy to see himself thus treated, and take no notice of it. The king returned an answer to the propositions, and proposed a treaty by commissioners, which the parliament appointed.

Three months more were lost in naming commissioners. There was much time spent in this treaty, but little done; the commissioners debated chiefly the article of religion and of the militia; in the latter they were very likely to agree; in the former both sides seemed too positive. The king would by no means abandon episcopacy, nor the parliament presbytery; for both, in their opinion, were of divine appointment.

The commissioners, finding this point hardest to adjust, went from it to that of the militia; but the time spinning out, the king's commissioners demanded longer time for the treaty; the other sent up for instructions, but the house refused to lengthen out the time.

This was thought an insolence upon the king, and gave all good people a detestation of such haughty behaviour; and thus the hopes of peace vanished; both sides prepared for war with as much eagerness as before.

The parliament was now employed in what they called modelling their army; that is to say, the independent party began to prevail; and as they outdid all the others in their resolution of carrying on the war to all extremities, so they were both the more vigorous and more politic party in carrying it on.

Indeed the war was after this carried on with greater animosity than ever, and the generals pushed forward with a vigour, that, as it had something in it unusual, told us plainly from this time, whatever they did before, they now pushed at the ruin even of monarchy itself.

All this while also the war went on, and though the parliament had no settled army, yet their regiments and troops were always in action, and the sword was at work in every part of the kingdom.

Among an infinite number of party skirmishes and fights this winter, one happened which nearly concerned me. Colonel Mitton, with about twelve hundred horse and foot, having intelligence from some of the inhabitants of Shrewsbury, on a Sunday morning early broke into the town and took it castle and all.

The loss for the quality, more than the number, was very great to the king's affairs. They took there fifteen pieces of cannon, Prince Maurice's magazine of arms and ammunition, Prince Rupert's baggage, and above fifty persons of quality and officers. There were not above eight or ten men killed on both sides; for the town was surprised, not stormed.

I had a particular loss in this action; for all the men and horses my father had got together for the recruiting my regiment were here lost and dispersed; and which was the worse, my father, happening to be then in the town, was taken prisoner, and carried to Beeston Castle, in Cheshire.

I was quartered all this winter at Banbury, in Oxfordshire, and went little abroad; nor had we any action till the latter end of February, when I was ordered to march to Leicester with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, in order, as we thought, to raise a body of men in that county, and Staffordshire, to join the king.

We lay at Daventry one night, and continued our march to pass the river above Northampton; that town being possessed by the enemy, we understood a party of Northampton forces were abroad, and intended to attack us.

Accordingly, in the afternoon, our scouts brought us word the enemy were quartered in some villages on the road to Coventry; our commander, thinking it much better to set upon them in their quarters than to wait for them in the field, resolved to attack them early in the morning before they were aware of it.

We refreshed ourselves in the field for that day, and getting into a great wood near the enemy, we stayed there all night, till almost break of day, without being discovered.

In the morning very early we heard the enemy's trumpets sound to horse; this roused us to look abroad; and sending out a scout, he brought us word a party of the enemy was at hand. We were vexed to be so disappointed; but finding their party small enough to be dealt with, Sir Marmaduke ordered me to charge them with three hundred horse and two hundred dragoons, while he at the same time entered the town.

Accordingly I lay still till they came to the very skirt of the wood where I was posted, when I saluted them with a volley from my dragoons out of the wood, and immediately showed myself with my horse on their front, ready to charge them; they appeared not to be surprised, and received our charge with great resolution; and being above four hundred men, they pushed me vigorously in their turn, putting my men into some disorder.

In this extremity I sent to order the dragoons to charge them in the flank, which they did with great bravery, and the other still maintained the fight with desperate resolution. There was no want of courage on either side; but our dragoons had the advantage, and at last routed them, and drove them back to the village.

Here Sir Marmaduke Langdale had his hands full too; for my firing had alarmed the places adjacent, that when he came into the town, he found them all in arms, and, contrary to his expectation, two regiments of foot, with about five hundred horse more. As Sir Marmaduke had no foot, only horse and dragoons, this was a surprise to him; but he caused his dragoons to enter the town, and charge the foot, while his horse secured the avenues of the town.

The dragoons bravely attacked the foot, and

Sir Marmaduke falling in with his horse, the fight was obstinate and bloody, when the horse that I had routed came flying into the street of the village, and my men at their heels.

Immediately I left the pursuit, and fell in with all my force to the assistance of my friends; and, after an obstinate resistance, we routed the whole party. We killed about seven hundred men, took three hundred and fifty, twenty-seven officers, one hundred arms, all their baggage, and two hundred horses, and continued our march to Harborough, where we halted to refresh ourselves.

Between Harborough and Leicester, we met with a party of eight hundred dragoons of the Parliament forces. They found themselves too few to attack; and therefore, to avoid us, they got into a small wood; but perceiving themselves discovered, they came boldly out, and placed themselves at the entrance into a lane, lining both sides of the hedges with their shot.

We immediately attacked them, beat them from the hedges, from thence into the wood, and out of the wood again, and forced them at last to a downright runaway on foot among the enclosures, where it was difficult to follow; killed about a hundred of them, and took two hundred and fifty prisoners, with all their horses, and came that night to Leicester. When we came there, and had taken up our quarters, Sir Marmaduke Langdale sent for me to sup with him, and told me that he had a secret commission in his pocket, which his majesty had commanded him not to open until he came to Leicester; that now he had sent for me to open it together, that we might know what it was we were to do, and to consider how to do it.

Then pulling out his sealed orders, we found we were to get what force we could together, and a certain number of carriages with ammunition, which the governor of Leicester was to deliver us, and a certain quantity of provisions, especially corn and salt, and to relieve Newark.

This town had long been besieged; the fortifications, together with its situation, had rendered it the strongest place in England; and as it was the greatest pass in the kingdom, so it was of vast consequence to the king's affairs.

There was in it a garrison of brave old rugged boys, fellows that, like Count Tilly's Germans, had iron faces, and they had defended themselves with extraordinary bravery a great while, but now were exceedingly reduced for the want of food.

Accordingly we received the ammunition and provision, and away we went for Newark. About Melton Mowbray, Colonel Rositer set upon us with above three thousand men; we were about the same number, having two thousand five hundred horse, and eight hundred dragoons. We had some foot, but they were still at Harborough, and were ordered to come after us.

Rositer, like a brave officer, charged us with great fury, and rather outdid us in number, while we defended ourselves with all the eagerness we could, and gave him to understand we were not so soon to be beaten as he expected.

While the fight continued doubtful, especially on our side, our people, who had charge of the carriages and provisions, began to enclose our flanks with them, as if we had been marching; which, though it was done without orders, had two very good effects, and which did us extraordinary service.

First, it secured us from being charged in the flank, which Rositer had twice attempted; and, secondly, it secured our carriages from being plundered, which had spoiled our expedition. Being thus enclosed, we fought with great security; and though Rositer made three desperate charges upon us, he could never break us.

Our men received him with so much courage, and kept their orders so well, that the enemy, finding it impossible to force us, gave over, and left us to pursue our orders. We did not offer to chase them, but contented enough to have repulsed and beaten them off, and our business being to relieve Newark, we proceeded.

If we are to reckon by the enemy's usual method, we got the victory because we kept the field, and had the pillage of their dead; but otherwise neither side had any great cause to boast.

We lost about 150 men, and near as many hurt; they left 170 on the spot, and carried off some. How many they had wounded we could not tell; we got about seventy or eighty horses, which helped to remount some of our men that had lost theirs in the fight.

We had, however, this disadvantage, that we were to march on immediately after this service; the enemy only to retire to their quarters, about a mile. This was an injury to our wounded men, who we were afterwards obliged to leave at Belvoir Castle, and from thence we advanced to Newark.

Our business at Newark was to relieve the place, and this we resolved to do, whatever it cost, though, at the same time, we resolved not to fight unless we were forced to it.

The town was rather blocked up than besieged; the garrison were strong, but ill provided: we had sent them word of our coming, and our orders to relieve them, and they proposed some measures for our doing it.

The chief strength of the enemy lay on the other side of the river; but they, having also some notice of our design, had sent over forces to strengthen their leaguer on this side. The garrison had often surprised them by sallies, and indeed had chiefly subsisted for some time by what they brought in on this manner.

Sir Marmaduke Langdale, who was our commander for the expedition, was for a general attempt to raise the siege; but I had persuaded him from it; first, because, if we should be beaten, as might be probable, we then lost the town.

Sir Marmaduke briskly replied, "A soldier ought never to suppose he shall be beaten."

"But, sir," said I, "you will get more honour by relieving the town than by beating them: one will be a credit to your conduct, as the other will be to your courage; and, if you think you can beat them, you may do it afterwards; and then if you are mistaken the town is nevertheless secured, and half your victory gained."

He was prevailed with to adhere to this advice, and accordingly we appeared before the town about two hours before night. The horse drew up before the enemy's works; the enemy drew up within their works, and, seeing no foot, expected our dragoons would dismount and attack them.

They were in the right to let us attack them, because of the advantage of their batteries and works, if that had been our design; but, as we intended only to amuse them, this caution of theirs effected our purpose; for, while we thus faced them with our horse, two regiments of foot which came up to us but the night before, and was all the infantry we had, with the waggons of provisions, and five hundred dragoons, taking a compass clean round the town, posted themselves on the lower side of the town by the river.

Upon a signal the garrison agreed on before, they sallied out at this very juncture with all the men they could spare, and dividing themselves in two parties, while one party moved to the left to meet our relief, the other party fell on upon part of that body which faced us.

We kept in motion, and upon this signal advanced to their works, and our dragoons fired upon them: and the horse wheeling and counter-marching often, kept them continually expecting to be attacked.

By this means the enemy were kept employed, and our foot, with the waggons, appearing on that quarter where they were least expected, easily defeated the advanced guards and forced that post; where, entering the leaguer, the other part of the garrison who had sallied that way came up to them, received the waggons, and the dragoons entered with them into the town.

That party which we faced on the other side of the works, knew nothing of what was done till all was over; the garrison retreated in good order, and we drew off, having finished what we came for with little fighting.

Thus we plentifully stored the town with all things wanting, and with an addition of 500 dragoons to their garrison; after which we marched away.

Our next orders were to relieve Pontefract Castle, another garrison of the king's which had been besieged ever since the fight at Marston Moor, by Lord Fairfax, Sir Thomas Fairfax, and other generals in their turn.

By the way we were joined with 800 horse out of Derbyshire, and some foot, so many as made us in all about 4,500 men.

Colonel Forbes, a Scotchman, commanded at the siege, in the absence of Lord Fairfax; the colonel had sent to my lord for more troops, and his lordship was gathering his forces to come up to him; but he was pleased to come too late.

We came up with the enemy's leaguer about break of day, and having been discovered by their scouts, they, with more courage than discretion, drew out to meet us.

We saw no reason to avoid them, being stronger in horse than they; and though we had but few foot, we had 1,000 dragoons. We had placed our horse and foot throughout in one line, with two reserves of horse, and between every division of horse a division of foot, only that on the extremes of our wings there were two parties of horse on each point by themselves, and the dragoons in the centre, on foot.

Their foot charged us home, and stood with push of pike a great while; but their horse charging our horse and musketeers, and being closed on the flanks with those two extended troops on our wings, they were presently disordered, and fled out of the field.

The foot, thus deserted, were charged on every side and broken. They retreated, still fighting and in good order, for awhile; but the garrison sallying upon them at the same time, and being followed close by our horse, they were scattered, entirely routed, and most of them killed.

Lord Fairfax was come with his horse as far as Ferrybridge, but the fight was over; and all he could do was to rally those that fled, and save some of their carriages, which else had fallen into our hands.

We drew up our little army in order of battle the next day, expecting Lord Fairfax would have charged us; but his lordship was so far from any such thoughts, that he placed a party of dragoons with orders to fortify the pass at Ferrybridge, to prevent our falling upon him in his retreat, which he needed not to have done; for, having raised the siege of Pontefract, our business was over: we had nothing to say to him, unless we had been strong enough to stay.

We lost not above thirty men in this action, and the enemy three hundred, with about one hundred and fifty prisoners, one piece of cannon, all their ammunition, one thousand arms, and most of their baggage, and Colonel Lambert was once taken prisoner, being wounded, but got off again. (Note 23.)

We brought no relief for the garrison, but the opportunity to furnish themselves out of the country, which they did very plentifully. The ammunition taken from the enemy was given to them, which they wanted, and was their due; for they had seized it in the sally they made, before the enemy was quite defeated.

I cannot omit taking notice, on all occasions, how exceedingly serviceable this method was of posting musketeers in the intervals, among the horse, in all this war.

I persuaded our generals to it as much as possible, and I never knew a body of horse beaten that did so; yet I had great difficulty to prevail upon our people to believe it, though it was taught me by Gustavus Adolphus, the greatest general in the world. Prince Rupert did it at the battle of Marston Moor; and had the Earl of Newcastle not been obstinate against it in his right wing, as I observed before, the day had not been lost.

In discoursing this with Sir Marmaduke Langdale, I had related several examples of the serviceableness of these small bodies of firemen, and, with great difficulty, brought him to agree, telling him I would be answerable for the success; after the fight, he told me plainly he saw the advantage of it, and would never fight otherwise again, if he had any foot to place.

Having relieved these two places, we hastened, by long marches, through Derbyshire, to join Prince Rupert on the edge of Shropshire and Cheshire. We found Colonel Rositer had followed us at a distance ever since the business at Melton Mowbray, but never cared to attack us, and we found he did the like still. Our general would fain have been doing with him again, but we found him too shy.

Once we laid a trap for him at Dovebridge, between Derby and Burton-upon-Trent, the body being marched two days before; three hundred dragoons were left to guard the bridge, as if we were afraid he should fall upon us.

Upon this we marched on to Burton, and the next day, fetching a compass round, came to a village near Titbury Castle, whose name I have forgot, where we lay still, expecting our dragoons would be attacked.

Accordingly Rositer, strengthened with some troops of horse from Yorkshire, came up to the bridge, and, finding some dragoons posted, advanced to charge them; the dragoons immediately mounted their horses and fled, as they were ordered; but the old lad was not to be caught so; for he halted immediately at the bridge, and would not come over till he had sent three or four flying parties abroad to discover the country.

One of these parties fell into our hands, and received but coarse entertainment. Finding the plot would not take, we appeared and drew up in view of the bridge, but he would not stir; so we continued our march into Cheshire, where we joined Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, making together a fine body, being above eight thousand horse and dragoons.

This was the best and most successful expedition I was in during this war. It was well concerted, and executed with as much expedition and conduct as could be desired. and the success was answerable to it.

Indeed, considering the season of the year, for we set out from Oxford the latter end of February, the ways bad, and the season wet, it was a terrible march of above two hundred miles, in continual action, and incessantly dodged and observed by a vigilant enemy, and at a time when the north was overrun by their armies, and the Scots wanting employment for their forces; yet, in less than twenty-three days, we marched two hundred miles, fought the enemy in open field four times, relieved one garrison besieged, raised the siege of another, and joined our friends at last in safety.

The enemy was in great pain for Sir William Brereton and his forces, and expresses rode night and day to the Scots in the north, and to the parties in Lancashire, to come to his help. The prince, who used to be rather too forward to fight than otherwise, could not be persuaded to make use of this opportunity, but loitered, if I may be allowed to say so, till the Scots, with a brigade of horse and two thousand foot, had joined him; and then it was not thought proper to engage them.

I took this opportunity to go to Shrewsbury to visit my father, who was a prisoner of war there, getting a pass from the enemy's governor. He allowed him the liberty of the town, and sometimes to go to his own house, upon his parole; so that his confinement was not very much to his personal injury: but this, together with the charges he had been at in raising the regiment, and above twenty thousand pounds in money and plate, which at several times he had lent, or rather given to the king, had reduced our family to very ill circumstances; and now they talked of cutting down his woods.

I had a great deal of discourse with my father on this affair; and finding him extremely concerned, I offered to go to the king, and desire his leave to go to London, and treat about his composition, or to render myself a prisoner in his stead, while he went up himself.

In this difficulty I treated with the governor of the town, who very civilly offered me his pass to go for London, which I accepted; and waiting on Prince Rupert, who was then at Worcester, I acquainted him with my design.

The prince was unwilling I should go to London; but told me he had some prisoners of the parliament's friends in Cumberland, and he would get an exchange for my father.

I replied, if he would give me his word for it, I knew I might depend upon it, otherwise there were so many of the king's party in their hands, that his majesty was tired with solicitations for exchanges; for we never had a prisoner but there were ten offers of exchanges for him. The prince said I might depend upon him, and he was as good as his word quickly after.

While the prince lay at Worcester he made an excursion into Herefordshire, and having made some of the gentlemen prisoners, brought them to Worcester; and though it was an action which had not been usual, they being persons not in arms, yet the like being my father's case, who was really not in commission, nor in any military service, having resigned his regiment three years before to me, the prince insisted on exchanging them for such as the parliament had in custody in similar circumstances.

The gentlemen, seeing no remedy, solicited their own case at the parliament, and got it passed in their behalf, and by this means my father got his liberty; and, by the assistance of the Earl of Denbigh, got leave to come to London to make a composition, as a delinquent, for his estate.

This they charged at seven thousand pounds; but, by the assistance of the same noble person, he got off for four thousand pounds: some members of the committee moved very kindly that my father should oblige me to quit the king's service; but that, as a thing which might be out of his power, was not insisted on.

The modelling the parliament army took them up all this winter, and we were in great hopes the divisions which appeared amongst them might have weakened their party; but when they voted Sir Thomas Fairfax to be general, I confess I was convinced the king's affairs were desperate, and lost.

Sir Thomas, abating the zeal of his party, and the mistaken opinion of his cause, was the fittest man amongst them to undertake the charge: he was a complete general, strict in his discipline, wary in conduct, fearless in action, unwearied in the fatigue of the war, and, withal, of a modest, noble, generous disposition.

We all apprehended danger from him, and heartily wished him of our own side; and the king was so sensible of it, that when an account was brought him of the choice they had made, he replied, "I am sorry for it; I had rather it had been anybody than he."

The first attempts of this new general and new army were at Oxford, which, by the neighbourhood of a numerous garrison in Abingdon, began to be very much straitened for provisions; and the new forces under Cromwell and Skippon, one lieutenant-general, the other major-general, to Fairfax, approaching with a design to block it up, the king left the place, supposing his absence would draw them away, as it soon did.

The king, resolving to leave Oxford, marched from thence with all his forces, the garrison expected, with design to have gone to Bristol; but hearing the plague was in that city, altered the measures, and changed the course of the king's designs, so he marched for Worcester the beginning of May, 1645. The foot, with a train of forty pieces of cannon, marching into Worcester, the horse stayed behind some time in Gloucestershire.

The first action our army did was to raise the siege of Chester; Sir William Brereton had besieged it, or rather blocked it up; and when his majesty came to Worcester he sent Prince Rupert, with four thousand horse and dragoons, with orders to join some foot out of Wales, to raise the siege; but Sir William thought fit to withdraw and not stay for them, and the town was freed without fighting. The governor took care in this interval to furnish himself with all things necessary for another siege; and, as for ammunition and other necessaries, he was in no want.

I was sent with a party into Staffordshire, with design to intercept a convoy of stores coming from London for the use of Sir William Brereton; but they having some notice of the design, stopped, and went out of the road to Burton-upon-Trent, and so I missed them; but that we might not come back quite empty, we attacked Hawkesly House, and took it, where we got good booty, and brought eighty prisoners back to Worcester. From Worcester the king advanced into Shropshire, and took his head-quarters at Bridgenorth.

This was a very happy march of the king's, and had his majesty proceeded, he had certainly cleared the north once more of his enemies, for the country was generally for him. At his advancing so far as Bridgenorth, Sir William Brereton fled up into Lancashire; the Scots brigades who were with him retreated into the north, while yet the king was about forty miles from them, and all things lay open for conquest.

The new generals, Fairfax and Cromwell, lay about Oxford preparing as if they would besiege it, and gave the king's army so much leisure, that his majesty might have been at Newcastle before they could be half way to him. But Heaven, when the ruin of a person or party is determined, always so infatuates their councils as to make them instrumental to it themselves.

The king let slip this great opportunity, as some thought, intending to break into the associated counties of Northampton, Cambridge, and Norfolk, where he had some interests forming. What the design was we knew not; but the king turned eastward and marched into Leicestershire, and having treated the country but very indifferently, as having deserved no better of us, laid siege to Leicester. (Note 24.)

This was but a short siege; for the king, resolving not to lose time, fell on with his great guns, and having beaten down their works, our foot entered, after a vigorous resistance, and took the town by storm.

There was some blood shed here, the town being carried by assault; but it was their own faults; for, after the town was taken, the soldiers and townsmen obstinately fought us in the market-place: insomuch that the horse was called to enter the town to clear the streets. But this was not all; I was commanded to advance with these horse, being three regiments, and to enter the town; the foot, who were engaged in the streets, crying out, "Horse! horse!"

Immediately I advanced to the gate, for we were drawn up about musket-shot from the works, to have supported our foot in case of a sally. Having seized the gate, I placed a guard of horse there, with orders to let nobody pass in or out, and, dividing my troops, rode up by two ways towards the market place.

The garrison, defending themselves in the market place and in the churchyard with great obstinacy, killed us a great many men; but, as soon as our horse appeared, they demanded quarter, which our foot refused them in the first heat, as is frequent in all nations in like cases, until at last they threw down their arms, and yielded at discretion; and then I can testify to the world that fair quarter was given them.

I am the more particular in this relation, having been an eye-witness of the action, because the king was reproached in all the public libels, with which those times abounded, for having put a great many to death, and hanged the committee of the parliament, and some Scots, in cold blood, which was a notorious forgery; and as I am sure there was no such thing done, so I must acknowledge I never saw any inclination in his majesty to cruelty, or to act anything which was not practised by the general laws of war, and by men of honour in all nations.

But the matter of fact, in respect to the garrison, was as I have related; and if they had thrown down their arms sooner, they had had mercy sooner; but it was not for a conquering army, entering a town by storm, to offer conditions or quarter in the streets.

Another circumstance was, that a great many of the inhabitants, both men and women, were killed, which is most true; and the case was thus:—The inhabitants, to show their over-forward zeal to defend the town, fought in the breach; nay, the very women, to the honour of the Leicester ladies, if they liked it, officiously did their parts; and after the town was taken, and when, if they had had any discretion with their zeal, they would have kept their houses, and been quiet; but they fired upon our men out of their windows, and from the tops of their houses, and threw tiles upon their heads; and I had several of my men wounded so, and seven or eight killed.

This exasperated us to the last degree; and finding one house better manned than ordinary, and many shot fired at us out of the windows, I caused my men to attack it, resolving to make them an example for the rest; which they did, and breaking open the doors, they killed all they found there without distinction; and I appeal to the world if they were to blame.

If the parliament committee, or the Scotch deputies, were here, they ought to have been quiet, since the town was taken; but they began with us, and, I think, brought it upon themselves. This is the whole case, so far as came within my knowledge, for which his majesty was so much abused.

We took here Colonel Gray and Captain Hacker, with about three hundred prisoners, and about three hundred more were killed. This was the last day of May, 1645.

His majesty, having given over Oxford for lost, continued here some days, viewed the town, ordered the fortifications to be augmented, and prepared to make it the seat of war.

But the parliament, roused at this appearance of the king's army, ordered their general to raise the siege of Oxford, where the garrison had, in a sally, ruined some of their works, and killed them a hundred and fifty men, taking several prisoners, and carrying them into the city; and ordered him to march towards Leicester to observe the king.

The king had now a small, but gallant army, all brave tried soldiers, and seemed eager to engage the new-modelled army; and his majesty, hearing that Sir Thomas Fairfax, having raised the siege of Oxford, advanced towards him, fairly saved him the trouble of a long march, and met him half way.

The army lay at Daventry, and Fairfax at Towcester, about eight miles off. Here the king sent away six hundred horse, with three thousand head of cattle, to relieve his people in Oxford; the cattle he might have spared better than the men.

The king having thus victualled Oxford, changed his resolution of fighting Fairfax, to whom Cromwell was now joined with four thousand men, or was within a day's march, and marched northward.

This was unhappy counsel, because late given; had we marched northward at first, we had done it; but thus it was. Now we marched with a triumphing enemy at our heels, and at Naseby their advanced parties attacked our rear.

The king, upon this, altered his resolution again, and resolved to fight, and at midnight called us up at Harborough to come to a council of war.

Fate and the king's opinion determined the council, and it was resolved to fight. Accordingly the van, in which was Prince Rupert's brigade of horse, of which my regiment was a part, countermarched early in the morning.

By five o'clock the whole army, in order of battle, began to discover the enemy from the rising grounds, about a mile from Naseby, and moved towards them. They were drawn up on a little ascent in a large common fallow field, in a line extended from one side of the field to the other, the field something more than a mile over; our army in the same order, in a line, with the reserves.

Prince Rupert commanded the right wing of the horse, Sir Marmaduke Langdale the left, and the king the main body. Of the enemy, Fairfax and Skippon led the body, Cromwell and Rossiter the right, and Ireton the left. The numbers of both armies so equal as not to differ five hundred men, save that the king had most horse by about one thousand, and Fairfax most foot by about five hundred. The number was in each army about eighteen thousand men.

The armies coming close up, the wings engaged first. The prince with his right wing charged with his wonted fury, and drove all the parliament's wing of horse, one division excepted, clear out of the field. Ireton, who commanded this wing, to give him his due, rallied often, and fought like a lion; but our wing bore down all before them, and pursued them with a terrible execution.

Ireton, seeing one division of his horse left, repaired to them, and keeping his ground, fell foul of a brigade of our foot, who coming up to the head of the line, he, enraged, charged them with his horse; but they with their pikes made great havock; so that this division was entirely routed. Ireton had his horse killed under him, himself thrust through the thigh with a pike, wounded in the face with a halberd, and was taken prisoner by a captain of foot.

Cromwell, who commanded the parliament's right wing, charged Sir Marmaduke Langdale with extraordinary fury; but he, an old tried soldier, stood firm and received the charge with equal gallantry, exchanging all their shot, carbines, and pistols, and then fell on sword in hand.

Rositer and Whaley had the better on the point of the wing, and routed two divisions of horse, pushing them behind the reserves, where they rallied, and charged again, but were at last defeated; the rest of the horse now charged in the flank retreated fighting, and were pushed behind the reserves of foot.

While this was doing, the foot engaged with equal fierceness, and for two hours there was a terrible fire. The king's foot, backed with gallant officers, and full of rage at the rout of their horse, bore down the enemy's brigade, led by Skippon. The old man wounded, retreated bleeding to their reserves.

All the foot, except the general's brigade, were thus driven into the reserves, where their officers rallied them, and brought them on to a fresh charge; and here the horse, having driven our horse about a quarter of a mile from the foot, faced about, and fell in on the rear of the foot.

Had our right wing done thus, the day had been secured; but Prince Rupert, according to his custom, following the flying enemy, never concerned himself with the safety of those behind; and yet he returned sooner than he had done in like cases too.

At our return we found all in confusion, our foot broken, all but one brigade, which, though charged in front, flank, and rear, could not be broken, till Sir Thomas Fairfax himself came up to the charge with fresh men, and then they were rather cut in pieces than beaten; for they stood with their pikes charged every way to the last extremity.

In this condition, at the distance of a quarter of a mile, we saw the king rallying his horse, and preparing to renew the fight; and our wing of horse coming up to him, gave him an opportunity to draw up a large body of horse, so large, that all the enemy's horse facing us stood still and looked on, but did not think fit to charge us, till their foot, who had entirely broken our main battle, were put into order again, and brought up to us.

The officers about the king advised his majesty rather to draw off; for, since our foot were lost, it would be too much odds to expose the horse to the fury of their whole army, and would but be sacrificing his best troops, without any hopes of success.

The king, though with great regret at the loss of his foot, yet seeing there was no other hope, took this advice, and retreated in good order to Harborough, and from thence to Leicester. (Note 25.)

This was the occasion of the enemy having so great a number of prisoners; for the horse being thus gone off, the foot had no means to make their retreat, and were obliged to yield themselves. Ireton now made the captain his prisoner, but gave him his liberty for the kindness he before had received from him.

Cromwell and Rositer, with all the enemy's horse, followed us as far as Leicester, and killed all that they could lay hold on. The king, expecting the enemy would come to Leicester, removed to Ashby de la Zouch, where we had some time to recollect ourselves.

This was the most fatal action of the whole war; not so much for the loss of our cannon, ammunition, and baggage, of which the enemy boasted so much, but it was impossible for the king ever to retrieve it: the foot, the best that ever he was master of, could never be supplied; his army in the west was exposed to certain ruin, the north overrun with the Scots; in short, the case grew desperate, and the king was once upon the point of bidding us all disband, and shift for ourselves.

We lost in this fight about two thousand slain, and the parliament near as many, but the prisoners were a greater number; the whole body of foot being, as I have said, dispersed, there were four thousand five hundred prisoners, besides four hundred officers, two thousand horses, twelve pieces of cannon, fifty barrels of powder, all the king's baggage, coaches, most of his servants, and his secretary, with his cabinet of letters, of which the parliament made great improvement, and basely enough caused his private letters between his majesty and the queen, her majesty's letters to the king, and other secret affairs, to be printed.

After this fatal blow, being retreated, as I have said, to Ashby de la Zouch, in Leicestershire, the king ordered us to divide; his majesty, with a body of horse, about three thousand, went to Lichfield, and through Cheshire into North Wales; and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, with about two thousand five hundred, went to New-wark.

The king remained in Wales for several months; and though the length of the war had almost drained that country of men, yet the king raised a great many men there, recruited his horse, and got together six or seven regiments of foot, which seemed to look like the beginning of a new army.

I had frequent discourses with his majesty in this low ebb of his affairs, and he would often wish he had not exposed his army at Naseby.

I took the freedom once to make a proposition to his majesty, which, if it had taken effect, I verily believe would have given a new turn to his affairs; and that was, at once to slight all his garrisons in the kingdom, and give private orders to all the soldiers in every place to join in bodies, and meet at two general rendezvous, which I would have appointed to be at Bristol and at West Chester.

I demonstrated how easily all the forces might reach these two places; for both being strong and very wealthy, and both sea-ports, he would have a free communication by sea with Ireland, and with his friends abroad; and having Wales entirely his own, he might yet have an opportunity to make good terms for himself, or else have another fair field with the enemy.

Upon a calculation of his troops in several garrisons, and small bodies dispersed about, I convinced the king, by his own accounts, that he might have two complete armies, each of twenty-five thousand foot, eight thousand horse, and two thousand dragoons; that Lord Goring and Lord Hopton might ship all their forces, and come by sea in two tides, and be with him in a shorter time than the enemy could follow.

With two such bodies he might face the enemy, and make a day of it; but now his men were only sacrificed, and eaten up by piece-meal in a party war, and spent their lives and estates to do him no service: that if the parliament garrisoned the towns and castles he should quit, they would lessen their army, and not dare to seek him in the field; and if they did not, but left them open, then it would be no loss to him, but he might possess them as often as he pleased.

This advice I pressed with such arguments, that the king was once going to dispatch orders for the doing it; but to be irresolute in counsel is always the companion of a declining fortune: the king was doubtful, and could not resolve till it was too late.

And yet, though the king's forces were very low, his majesty was resolved to make one adventure more, and it was a strange one; for, with but a handful of men, he made a desperate march almost two hundred and fifty miles in the middle of the whole kingdom, compassed about with armies and parties innumerable, traversed the heart of his enemy's country, entered their associated counties, where no army had ever yet come; and, in spite of all their victorious troops facing and following him, alarmed even London itself, and returned safe to Oxford.

His majesty continued in Wales from the battle at Naseby till the 5th or 6th of August, and till he had an account from all parts of the progress of his enemies, and the posture of his own affairs.

Here he found that the enemy being hard pressed in Somersetshire by Lord Goring and Lord Hopton's forces, who had taken Bridgewater and distressed Taunton, which was now at the point of surrender, they had ordered Fairfax and Cromwell, and the whole army, to march westward to relieve the town; which they did, and Goring's troops were worsted, and himself wounded at the fight at Langport.

The Scots, who were always the dead weight upon the king's affairs, having no more work to do in the north, were, at the parliament's desire, advanced southward, and then ordered away towards South Wales, and were set down to the siege of Hereford.

Here this famous Scotch army spent several months in a fruitless siege, ill-provided of ammunition and worse with money; and having sat near three months before the town, and done little but eaten up the country round them, upon the repeated accounts of the progress of the Marquis of Montrose in that kingdom, and pressing instances of their countrymen, they resolved to raise their siege and go home to relieve their friends.

The king, who was willing to be rid of the Scots upon good terms, and therefore to hasten them, and lest they should pretend to push on the siege to take the town first, gave it out that he was resolved with all his forces to go into Scotland and join Montrose; and so, having secured Scotland, to renew the war from thence.

And accordingly his majesty marched northwards with a body of four thousand horse; and, had the king really done this, and with that body of horse marched away, for he had the start of all his enemies by above a fortnight's march, he had then had the fairest opportunity for a general turn of all his affairs that he ever had in all the latter part of this war.

For Montrose, a gallant, daring soldier, who, from the least shadow of force in the furthest corner of his country, had, rolling like a snow-ball, spread all over Scotland, was come into the south parts, and had summoned Edinburgh, frightened away their statesmen, beaten their soldiers at Dundee and other places; and letters and messengers on the heels of one another repeated their cries to their brethren in England, to lay before them the sad condition of the country, and to hasten the army to their relief. The Scotch lords of the enemy's party fled to Berwick, and the Chancellor of Scotland went himself to General Lesly to press him for help.

In this extremity of affairs Scotland lay when we marched out of Wales. The Scots, at the siege of Hereford, hearing the king was gone northward with his horse, concluded he was gone directly for Scotland, and immediately sent Lesly with four thousand horse and foot to follow, but did not yet raise the siege.

But the king, still irresolute, turned away to the eastward, and went to Lichfield, where he showed his resentment at Colonel Hastings for his easy surrender of Leicester.

In this march the enemy took heart; we had troops of horse on every side upon us, like hounds started at a fresh stag. Lesly, with the Scots and a strong body, followed in our rear; Major-General Poyntz, Sir John Gell, Colonel Rositer, and others, in our way; they pretended to be ten thousand horse, and yet never dared to face us. The Scots made one attempt upon a troop which stayed a little behind, and took some prisoners; but when a regiment of our horse faced them they retired.

At a village near Lichfield another party of about a thousand horse attacked my regiment; we were on the left of the army, and at a little too far a distance. I happened to be with the king at that time, and my lieutenant-colonel with me, so that the major had charge of the regiment; he made a very handsome defence, but sent messengers for speedy relief; we were on a march, and therefore all ready, and the king ordered me a regiment of dragoons and three hundred horse, and the body halted to bring us off, not knowing how strong the enemy might be.

When I came to the place I found my major hard laid to, but fighting like a lion; the enemy had broke in upon him in two places, and had routed one troop, cutting them off from the body, and had made them all prisoners.

Upon this I fell in with the 300 horse, and cleared my major from a party who charged him in the flank; the dragoons immediately alighting, one party of them came upon my wing, and saluting the enemy with their muskets, put them to a stand; the other party of dragoons wheeling to the left, endeavoured to get behind them.

The enemy perceiving that they should be overpowered, retreated in as good order as they could, but left us most of our prisoners, and about thirty of their own. We lost fifteen of our men and the enemy about forty, chiefly by the fire of our dragoons in their retreat.

In this posture we continued our march; and though the king halted at Lichfield, which was a dangerous article, having so many of the enemy's troops upon his hands, and this time gave them opportunity to get into a body; yet the Scots, with their general, Lesly, resolving for the north, the rest of the troops were not able to face us, till having ravaged the enemy's country through Staffordshire, Warwick, Leicester, and Nottinghamshire, we came to the leaguer before Newark.

The king was once more on the mind to have gone into Scotland, and called a council of war for that purpose; but then it was resolved by all hands that it would be too late to attempt it; for the Scots and Major-general Poyntz were before us, and several strong bodies of horse in our rear; and there was no venturing now, unless any advantage presented to rout one of those parties which attended us.

Upon these and like considerations we resolved for Newark; on our approach the forces which blocked up that town drew off, being too weak to oppose us; for the king had now about 5,000 horse and dragoons, besides 300 horse and dragoons he took with him from Newark.

We halted at Newark to assist the garrison, or give them time rather to furnish themselves from the country with what they wanted, which they were very diligent in doing; for in two days they filled a large island which lies under the town, between the two branches of the Trent, with sheep, oxen, cows, and horses, an incredible number; and our affairs being now something desperate, we were not very nice in our usage of the country; for really if it was not with a resolution both to punish the enemy and enrich ourselves, no man can give any rational account why this desperate journey was undertaken.

It is certain the Newarkers, in the respite they gained by our coming, got about 50,000*l.* from the country round them, in corn, cattle, money, and other plunder.

From hence we broke into Lincolnshire, and the king lay at Belvoir Castle, and from thence to Stamford. The swiftness of our march was a terrible surprise to the enemy; for our van being at a village on the great road called Stilton, the country people fled into the isle of Ely, and every way, as if all were lost. Indeed our dragoons treated the country very coarsely, and all our men in general made themselves rich.

Between Stilton and Huntingdon we had a small bustle with some of the association troops of horse, but they were soon routed, and fled to Huntingdon, where they gave such an account of us to their fellows, that they did not think fit to stay for us, but left their foot to defend themselves as well as they could.

While this was doing in the van, a party from Burleigh house, near Stamford, the seat of the Earl of Exeter, pursued four troops of our horse, who, straggling towards Peterborough, and committing some disorders there, were surprised before they could get into a posture of fighting; and encumbered, as I suppose, with their plunder, they were entirely routed, lost most of their horses, and were forced to come away on foot; but finding themselves in this condition, they got into a body in the enclosures, and in that posture turning dragoons, they lined the hedges, and fired upon the enemy with their carbines.

This way of fighting, though not very pleasant to troopers, put the enemy's horse to some stand, and encouraged our men to venture into a village where the enemy had secured forty of their horse; and boldly charging the guard, they beat them off and recovered those horses; the rest made their retreat good to Wandsford bridge; but we lost near a hundred horses, and twelve of our men taken prisoners.

The next day the king took Huntingdon; the foot which were left in the town, as I observed by their horse, had posted themselves at the foot of the bridge, and fortified the pass with such things as the haste and shortness of the time would allow, and in this posture they seemed resolute to defend themselves.

I confess, had they in time planted a good force here, they might have put a full stop to our little army; for the river is large and deep, the country on the left marshy, full of drains and ditches, and unfit for horse, and we must have either turned back, or took the right hand into Bedfordshire; but there not being above four hundred foot, and they forsaken of their horse, the resistance they made was to no other purpose than to give us occasion to knock them on the head, and plunder the town.

However, they defended the bridge, as I have said, and opposed our passage. I was this day in the van, and our forlorn hope having entered Huntingdon without any great resistance till they came to the bridge, finding it barricaded, they sent me word. I caused the troops to halt, and rode up to the forlorn to view the countenance of the enemy, and found, by the posture they had put themselves in, that they resolved to sell us the passage as dear as they could.

I sent to the king for some dragoons, and gave him an account of what I observed of the enemy, and that I judged them to be a thousand men, for I could not particularly see their numbers.

Accordingly the king ordered five hundred dragoons to attack the bridge, commanded by a major; the enemy had two hundred musketeers placed on the bridge, their barricade served them for a breast-work on the front, and the low walls on the bridge served to secure their flanks; two bodies of their foot were placed on the opposite banks of the river, and a reserve stood in the highway on the rear.

The number of their men could not have been better ordered, and they wanted not courage answerable to the conduct of the party. They were commanded by one Bennet, a resolute officer, who stood in the front of his men on the bridge, with a pike in his hand.

Before we began to fall on, the king ordered to view the river, to see if it was nowhere passable, or any boat to be had; but the river being not fordable, and the boats all secured on the other side, the attack was resolved on, and the dragoons fell on with extraordinary bravery.

The foot defended themselves obstinately, and beat off our dragoons twice; and though Bennet was killed upon the spot, and, after him, his lieutenant, yet their officers relieving them with fresh men, they would certainly have beat us all off, had not a venturesome fellow, one of our dragoons, thrown himself into the river, swam over, and, in the midst of a shower of musket-bullets, cut the rope which tied a great flat-bottom boat, and brought her safe over.

With the help of this boat I got over a hundred troopers first, and then their horses; and with this party fell in with one of the small bodies of foot that were posted on that side, and having routed them, and, after them, the reserve which stood in the road, I made up to the other party; they stood their ground, and having rallied the runaways of both the other parties, charged me with their pikes, and brought me to a retreat; but by this time the king had sent over three hundred men more, and they coming up to me, the foot retreated.

Those on the bridge, finding how it was, and having no supplies sent them, fainted, and fled; and the dragoons rushing forward, most of them were killed; about one hundred and fifty of the enemy were killed, of which all the officers at the bridge; the rest ran away.

The town suffered for it; for our men left them little of anything they could carry. Here we halted, and raised contributions, took money of the country, and of the open towns, to exempt them from plunder.

Twice we faced the town of Cambridge, and several of our officers advised his majesty to storm it; but having no foot, and but one thousand two hundred dragoons, wiser heads diverted him from it; and leaving Cambridge on the left, we marched to Woburn, in Bedfordshire, and our parties raised money all over the country, quite into Hertfordshire, within five miles of St Alban's.

The swiftness of our march, and uncertainty which way we intended, prevented all possible preparation to oppose us, and we met with no party able to make head against us.

From Woburn the king went through Buckingham to Oxford; some of our men straggling in the villages for plunder, were often picked up by the enemy; but in all this long march we did not lose two hundred men, got an incredible booty, and brought six waggons laden with money, besides two thousand horses, and three thousand head of cattle, into Oxford.

From Oxford his majesty moved again into Gloucestershire, having left about fifteen hundred of his horse at Oxford, to scour the country and raise contributions, which they did as far as Reading.

Sir Thomas Fairfax was returned from taking Bridgewater, and was sat down before Bristol, in which Prince Rupert commanded with a strong garrison of twenty-five thousand foot and a thousand horse. We had not force enough to attempt anything there; but the Scots, who still lay before Hereford, were afraid of us, having before parted with all their horse under Lieut.-General Lesly, and but ill stored with provisions; and if we came on their backs, were in a fair way to be starved, or made to buy their provisions at the price of their blood.

His majesty was sensible of this, and had we had but ten regiments of foot, would certainly have fought the Scots; but we had no foot, or so few as not worth while to march them. However, the king marched to Worcester, and the Scots apprehending they should be blocked up, immediately raised the siege, pretending it was to go to help their brethren in Scotland, and away they marched northwards.

We picked up some of their stragglers, but they were so poor, had been so ill paid, and so harassed at the siege, that they had neither money nor clothes; and the poor soldiers fed upon apples and roots, and ate the very green corn as it grew in the fields, which reduced them to a very sorry condition of health, for they died like people infected with the plague.

It was now debated whether we should yet march for Scotland, but two things prevented:—

1. The plague was broke out there, and multitudes died of it, which made the king decline it.

2. The Marquis of Montrose having routed a whole brigade of Lesly's best horse, and carried all before him, wrote to his majesty that he did not now want assistance, but was in hopes in a few days to send a body of foot into England, to his majesty's succour.

This over-confidence of his was his ruin; for, on the contrary, had he earnestly pressed the king to have marched, and fallen in with his horse, the king had done it, and been absolutely master of Scotland in a fortnight's time; but Montrose was too confident, and defied them all, till at last they got their forces together, and Lesly with his horse out of England worsted him in two or three encounters, and then never left him till they drove him out of Scotland.

While his majesty stayed at Worcester several messengers came to him from Chester for relief, being exceedingly straitened by the forces of the parliament; in order to which the king marched, but Shrewsbury being in the enemy's hands, he was obliged to go round by Ludlow, where he was joined by some foot out of Wales.

I took this opportunity to ask his majesty's leave to go by Shrewsbury to my father's; and taking only two servants, I left the army two days before they marched.

This was the most unsoldier-like action that ever I was guilty of, to go out of the army to pay a visit when a time of action was just at hand; and though I protest I had not the least intimation, no, not from my own thoughts, that the army would engage, at least before they came to Chester, before which I intended to meet them; yet it looked so ill, so like an excuse, or a cowardliness or disaffection to the cause and to my master's interest, or something I know not what, that I could not bear to think of it, nor never had the courage to see the king's face after it.

From Ludlow the king marched to relieve Chester: Poyntz, who commanded the parliament's forces, followed the king with design to join with the forces before Chester, under Col. Jones, before the king could come up.

To that end Poyntz passed through Shrewsbury the day that the king marched from Ludlow; yet the king's forces got the start of him, and forced him to engage.

Had the king engaged him but three hours sooner, and consequently further off from Chester, he had ruined him; for Poyntz's men, not able to stand the shock of the king's horse, gave ground, and would in half an hour more have been beaten out of the field; but Colonel Jones, with a strong party from the camp, which was within two miles, came up in the heat of the action, fell on in the king's rear and turned the scale of the day.

The body was, after an obstinate fight, defeated, and a great many gentlemen of quality killed and taken prisoners; the Earl of Lichfield was of the number of the former, and sixty-seven officers of the latter, with a thousand others.

The king with about five hundred horse got into Chester, and from thence into Wales, whither all that could get away made up to him as fast as they could, but in a bad condition.

This was the last stroke they struck; the rest of the war was nothing but taking all his garrisons from him, one by one, till they finished the war with the capturing of his person; and then, for want of other business, fell to fighting among themselves.

I was quite disconsolate at the news of this last action, and the more because I was not there; my regiment was wholly dispersed; my lieutenant-colonel, a gentleman of good family, and a near relation to my mother, was prisoner; my major and three captains killed, and most of the rest taken prisoners.

The king, hopeless of any considerable party in Wales, Bristol being surrendered, sent for Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, who came to him. With them, and Lord Digby, Sir Marmaduke Langdale, and a great train of gentlemen, his majesty marched to Newark again, left a thousand horse with Sir William Vaughan, to attempt the relief of Chester; in doing which he was routed the second time by Jones and his men, and entirely dispersed.

The chief strength the king had in these parts was at Newark, and the parliament were very earnest with the Scots to march southward, and lay siege to Newark; and while the parliament pressed them to it, they sat still, and delayed it, several heats began, and some ill blood between them, which afterwards broke out into open war.

The English reproached the Scots with pretending to help them, and really hindering their affairs. The Scots returned, that they came to fight for them, and were left to be starved, and could neither get money nor clothes.

At last they came to this: the Scots will go to the siege if the parliament would send them money, but not before. However, as people sooner agree in doing ill than in doing well, they came to terms, and the Scots came with their whole army to the siege of Newark.

The king, foreseeing the siege, called his friends about him, told them he saw the circumstances were such, that they could help him but little, nor he protect them, and advised them to separate.

Lord Digby, with Sir Marmaduke Langdale and a strong body of horse, attempted to get into Scotland, to join Montrose, who was still in the Highlands though reduced to a low ebb; but these gentlemen were fallen upon on every side and routed, and at last being totally broken and dispersed, they flew to the Earl of Derby's protection in the Isle of Man.

Prince Rupert, Prince Maurice, Colonel Gerard, and above four hundred gentlemen, all officers of horse, laid their commissions down, and seizing upon Wooton House for a retreat, made proposals to the parliament to leave the kingdom, upon their parole not to return again in arms against the parliament, which was accepted, though afterwards the princes declined it.

I sent my man post to the princes to be included in this treaty, and for leave for all that would accept of like conditions; but they had given in the list of their names and could not alter it.

This was a sad time; the poor remains of the king's fortunes went everywhere to wreck; every garrison of the enemy was full of the cavalier prisoners, and every garrison the king had was beset with enemies either blocked up or besieged.

Goring and Lord Hopton were the only remains of the king's forces which kept in a body, and Fairfax was pushing them with all imaginable vigour, with his whole army about Exeter, and other parts of Devonshire and Cornwall.

In this condition the king left Newark in the night and got to Oxford.

The king had in Oxford eight thousand men, and from the towns of Banbury, Farringdon, Dennington Castle, and such places, there might have been brought together in twenty-four hours fifteen or twenty thousand men, with which, if he had then resolved to have quitted the place, and collected the forces in Worcester, Hereford, Lichfield, Ashby de la Zouch, and all the small castles and garrisons he had thereabouts, he might have had nearly forty thousand men, might have beaten the Scots from Newark, Colonel Jones from Chester, and all before Fairfax, who was in the west, could be able to come to their relief, and this his majesty's friends in North Wales had concerted; and in order to it, Sir Jacob Ashby gathered what forces he could in our parts, and attempted to join the king at Oxford, and to have proposed it to him; but Sir Jacob was entirely routed at Stow-on-the-Wold, and taken prisoner, and of three thousand men not above six hundred came to Oxford.

All the king's garrisons dropt one by one; Hereford, which had stood out against the whole army of the Scots, was surprised by six men and a lieutenant, dressed up as country labourers, and a constable pressed to work, who cut the guards in pieces and let in a party of the enemy.

Chester was reduced by famine, all the attempts the king made to relieve it being frustrated.

Sir Thomas Fairfax routed Lord Hopton at Torrington, and drove him to such extremities that he was forced up into the furthest corner of Cornwall. Lord Hopton had a gallant body of horse with him of nine brigades, but no foot; Fairfax a great army.

Heartless and tired out with continual ill news and ill success, I had frequent meetings with some gentlemen who had escaped from the rout of Sir William Vaughan, and we agreed upon a meeting at Worcester of all the friends we could get, to see if we could raise a body fit to do any service; or, if not, to consider what was to be done.

At this meeting we had almost as many opinions as people; our strength appeared too weak to make any attempt; the game was too far gone in our parts to be retrieved; all we could make up did not amount to above eight hundred horse.

It was unanimously agreed not to go into the parliament as long as our royal master did not give up the cause; but in all places, and by all possible methods, to do him all the service we could.

Some proposed one thing, some another; at last we proposed getting vessels to carry us to the Isle of Man to the Earl of Derby, as Sir Marmaduke Langdale, Lord Digby, and others had done.

I did not foresee any service it would be to the king's affairs; but I started a proposal, that marching to Pembroke in a body, we should there seize upon all the vessels we could, and embarking ourselves, horses, and what foot we could get, cross the Severn sea, and land in Cornwall, to the assistance of Prince Charles, who was in the army of Lord Hopton, and where only there seemed to be any possibility of a chance for the remaining part of our cause.

This proposal was not without its difficulties, as how to get to the sea-side, and, when there, what assurance of shipping. The enemy, under Major-general Langhorn, had overrun Wales, and it would be next to impossible to effect it.

We could never carry our proposal with the whole assembly; but, however, about two hundred of us resolved to attempt it, and the meeting being broke up without coming to any conclusion, we had a private meeting among ourselves to effect it.

We dispatched private messengers to Swansea and Pembroke, and other places; but they all discouraged us from the attempt that way, advised us to go higher towards North Wales, where the king's interest had more friends, and the parliament had no forces.

Upon this we met, and resolved, and having sent several messengers that way, one of our men provided us two small vessels in a little creek near Harleigh Castle, in Merionethshire. We marched away with what expedition we could, and embarked in the two vessels accordingly.

It was the worst voyage sure that ever men went; for first, we had no manner of accommodation for so many people, hay for our horses we could not get any, or very little, but good store of oats, which served us for our own bread as well as provender for the horses.

In this condition we put off to sea, and had a fair wind all the first night, but early in the morning a sudden storm drove us within two or three leagues of Ireland.

Under this misfortune, sea-sick, our horses rolling about upon one another, and ourselves stifled for want of room, no cabins nor beds, very cold weather, and very indifferent diet, we wished ourselves ashore again a thousand times; and yet we were not willing to go ashore in Ireland, if we could help it; for the rebels having possession of every place, that was just having our throats cut at once.

Having rolled about at the mercy of the winds all day, the storm ceasing in the evening, we had fair weather again, but wind enough; in two days and a night we came upon the coast of Cornwall, and, to our no small comfort, landed the next day at St. Ives in the county of Cornwall.

We rested ourselves here, and sent an express to Lord Hopton, who was then in Devonshire, of our arrival, and desired him to assign us quarters, and send us his further orders. His lordship expressed a very great satisfaction at our arrival, and left it to our own conduct to join him as we saw convenient.

We were marching to join him when news came that Fairfax had given him an entire defeat at Torrington. This was but the old story over again; we had been used to ill news a great while, and it was the less surprise to us.

Upon this news we halted at Bodmin till we should hear further; and it was not long before we saw a confirmation of the news before our eyes, for Lord Hopton, with the remainder of his horse, which he had brought off at Torrington in a very shattered condition, retreated to Launceston, the first town in Cornwall, and hearing that Fairfax pursued him, came on to Bodmin.

Hither he summoned all the troops which he had left, which when he had got together, were a fine body indeed of five thousand horse, but few foot but what were at Pendennis, Barnstaple, and other garrisons; these were commanded by Lord Hopton, Lord Goring had taken shipping for France, to get relief, a few days before.

Here a grand council of war was called, and several things were proposed, but as it always is in distress, people are most irresolute, so it was here; some were for breaking through by force, our number being superior to the enemy's horse.

To fight them with their foot would be desperation and ridiculous, and to retreat would but be to coop up ourselves in a narrow place, where at last we must be forced to fight upon disadvantage, or yield at mercy. Others opposed this as a desperate action, and without probability of success, and all were of different opinions.

I confess, when I saw how things were, I was satisfied the game was lost, and I was for the opinion of breaking through and doing it now, while the country was open and large, and not being forced to it when it must be with more disadvantage; but nothing was resolved on, and so we retreated before the enemy. Some small skirmishes there happened near Bodmin, but none that were very considerable.

It was the 1st of March when we quitted Bodmin, and quartered at large at Columb, St Denis, and Truro, and the enemy took his quarters at Bodmin, posting his horse at the passes from Padstow on the north, to Warbridge, Lestwithiel, and Foy, spreading so from sea to sea, that now breaking through was impossible. There was no more room for counsel, for unless we had ships to carry us off, we had nothing to do but when we were fallen upon, to defend ourselves, and sell victory as dear as we could to the enemy.

Charles, Prince of Wales, seeing the distress we were in, and loath to fall into the enemy's hands, shipped himself on board some vessels at Falmouth, with about four hundred lords and gentlemen; and as I had no command here to oblige my attendance, I was once going to make one, but my comrades, whom I had been the principal occasion of bringing hither, began to take it ill that I would leave them, and so I resolved we would take our fate together.

While thus we had nothing before us but a soldier's death, a fair field, and a strong enemy, and people began to look one upon another; the soldiers asked how their officers looked, and the officers asked how their soldiers looked, and every day we expected to be our last, when unexpectedly General Lord Fairfax sent a trumpet to Truro to Lord Hopton with a very humane and polite offer.

That since Lord Hopton, our general, could not be ignorant of his present condition, and that the place he was in could not afford him subsistence or defence, and especially, considering that the state of our affairs were such, that if we should escape from thence, we could not remove to our advantage, he had thought good to let us know, that if we would deliver up our horses and arms, he would, for avoiding the effusion of Christian blood, or the putting any unsoldierly extremities upon us, allow such honourable and safe conditions as were rather better than our present circumstances could demand, and such as should discharge him to all the world as a gentleman, a soldier, and a Christian.

After this followed the conditions he would give us, which were,

1st, That all the soldiery, as well English as foreigners, should have liberty to go beyond the seas, or to their own dwellings, as they pleased; and to such as should choose to live at home, protection for their liberty, and from all violence, and plundering of soldiers, and to give them bag and baggage, and all their goods, excepting horses and arms.

2nd, That for officers in commission and gentlemen of quality, he would allow them horses for themselves and one servant, or more, suitable to their quality, and such arms as are suitable to gentlemen of such quality travelling in times of peace; and such officers as would go beyond sea, should take with them their full arms and number of horses as are allowed in the army to such officers.

3rd, That all the troopers should receive, on the delivery of their horses, twenty shillings a man to carry them home, and the general's pass and recommendation to any gentleman who desired to go to the parliament to settle the composition for their estates.

Lastly, a very honourable mention of the general, and offer of their mediation to the parliament, to treat him as a man of honour, and one who has been tender of the country, and behaved himself with all the moderation and candour that could be expected from an enemy.

Upon the unexpected receipt of this message a council of war was called, and the letter read; no man offered to speak a word, the general moved it, but every one was loath to begin.

At last an old colonel started up, and asked the general what he thought might occasion the writing this letter? The general told him he could not tell; but one thing he was sure of, viz. that it was not for any want of force in their army to oblige us to other terms. Then a doubt was started, whether the king and parliament were not in any treaty, which this agreement might be prejudicial to.

This occasioned a letter to my Lord Fairfax, wherein our general returning the civilities, and neither accepting nor refusing his proposal, put it upon his honour, whether there was not some agreement or concession between his majesty and the parliament, in order to a general peace, which this treaty might be prejudicial to, or thereby be prejudicial to us.

Lord Fairfax ingenuously declared, "He had heard the king had made some concessions, and he heartily wished he would make such as would settle the kingdom in peace, that Englishmen might not wound and destroy one another; but that he declared he knew of no treaty commenced, nor anything past which could give us the least shadow of hope for any advantage in not accepting his conditions. And added, that though he did not exult over our circumstances, yet if we thought fit, upon any such supposition, to refuse his offers, he was not to seek in his measures."

And it appeared so, for he immediately advanced his forlorn hopes, and dispossessed us of two advanced quarters, and thereby straitened us yet more.

We had now nothing to say but treat, and our general was so sensible of our condition, that he returned the trumpet with a safe conduct for commissioners at twelve o'clock that night; upon which a cessation of arms was agreed on, we quitting Truro to Lord Fairfax, and he left St Alban's to us to keep our head-quarters.

The conditions were soon agreed on, we disbanded nine full brigades of horse, and all the conditions were observed with the utmost honour and care by Lord Fairfax, that ever I knew.

Nor can I omit, in another way, to make honourable mention of this noble enemy, though I did not like his cause.

I never saw a man of such a pleasant, calm, courteous, downright, honest behaviour; and for his courage and personal bravery in the field that we had felt enough of.

No man in the world had more fire and fury in him while in action, or more temper and softness out of it.

In short, and I cannot do him greater honour than saying he exceedingly came near the character of my foreign hero, Gustavus Adolphus, and, in my account, is, of all the soldiers in Enrope, the fitter to be reckoned in the second place of honour to him.

I had particular occasion to see much of his temper in all this action, being one of the hostages given by our general, Lord Hopton, for the performance of the conditions, in which circumstance Lord Fairfax did me several times the honour to send to me to dine with him; and was exceedingly pleased to discourse with me about the passages of the wars in Germany which I had served in; he having been at the same time in the Low Countries, in the service of Prince Maurice.

Here I cannot help also observing, if at any time my civilities extended to commendations of his own actions, and especially to comparing him to Gustavus Adolphus, he would blush like a woman, and be uneasy, declining the discourse, and in this he was still more like him.

Let no man scruple my honourable mention of this noble enemy, since no man can suspect me of favouring the cause he embarked in, which I served as heartily against as any man in the army; but I cannot conceal extraordinary merit for its being placed in any enemy.

This was the end of our making war; for now we were all under parole never to bear arms against the parliament; and though some did not keep their word, yet I think a soldier's parole ought to be the most sacred in such a case, that a soldier may be the easier trusted at all times upon his honour.

For my part I went home fully contented, since I could do my royal master no better service, that I had come off no worse.

The enemy going now on the full current of success, and the king reduced to the last extremity, and Fairfax, by long marches, being come back within five miles of Oxford; his majesty, loath to be cooped up in a town, which on no account could hold out long, quitted the town in a disguise, leaving Sir Thomas Glemham, governor, and being only attended with Mr Ashburnham and one more, rode away to Newark, and there fatally committed himself to the honour and fidelity of the Scots, under General Lieven.

There had been some little bickering between the parliament and the Scots commissioners, concerning the propositions which the Scots were for a treaty with the king upon, and the parliament refused it.

The parliament, upon all proposals of peace, had formerly invited the king to come and throw himself upon the honour, fidelity, and affection of his parliament.

And now the king from Oxford offering to come up to London, on the protection of the parliament for the safety of his person, they refused him, and the Scots differed from them in it, and were for a personal treaty.

This, in our opinion, was the reason which prompted the king to throw himself upon the fidelity of the Scots, who really by their infidelity had been the ruin of all his affairs, and now, by their perfidious breach of honour and faith with him, were virtually and mediately the ruin of his person.

The Scots were, as well as all the nation, surprised at the king coming among them; and the parliament sent an order to General Leven to secure the king in Warwick Castle; but old Leven was not in such haste to part with so rich a prize; for as soon as the king came into the Scotch army, the general prevailed upon his majesty to sign an order to Colonel Ballesis, the governor of Newark, to surrender it, which being done, the Scots departed homewards with the king in the camp with them; and marching on, a house was ordered to be provided for the king at Newcastle.

And now the parliament saw their error in refusing his majesty a personal treaty, which, if they had accepted (their army was not yet taught the way of huffing their masters), the kingdom might have been settled in peace.

Before, it was, by an order of parliament, let the king be sent to Warwick Castle; now, it is, to let his majesty come to London to treat with his people.

Yet neither one nor the other would do with the Scots; but we, who knew the Scots best, knew that there was ONE THING would do with them, if the other would not, and that was money; and therefore our hearts trembled for the king.

The Scots, having retreated to Newcastle with the king, there they quartered their whole army at large upon the country; the parliament voted they had no further occasion for the Scots, and desired them to go home about their business.

I do not aver it was in these words, but in whatsoever good words their messages might be expressed, this and nothing less was the English of it.

The Scots replied by setting forth their losses, damages, and dues, the substance of which was, "Pay us our money, and we will be gone, or else we won't stir."

The parliament requested an account of their demands, which the Scots gave in, amounting to a million sterling; but, according to their custom, and especially finding that the army under Fairfax inclined gradually that way, fell down to five hundred thousand pounds, and at last to four hundred thousand; but all the while this is transacting, a separate treaty is carried on at London with the commissioners of Scotland, and afterwards at Edinburgh, by which it is given them to understand, that whereas, upon payment of the money, the Scotch army is to march out of England, and to give up all the towns and garrisons which they hold in this kingdom; so they are to take it for granted that it is the meaning of the treaty, that they shall leave the king in the hands of the English parliament.

To make this go down the better, the Scotch parliament, upon his majesty's desire to go with their army into Scotland, sent him for answer, that it cannot be for the safety of his majesty or of the state to come into Scotland, not having taken the covenant, and this was carried in their parliament but by two voices.

The Scots having refused his coming into Scotland, as was concerted between the two houses, and their army being to march out of England, the delivering up the king became a consequence of the agreement unavoidable and of necessity.

His majesty, thus deserted of those into whose hands he had thrown himself, took his leave of the Scotch general at Newcastle, telling him in few words this sad truth, that he was bought and sold.

The parliament commissioners received him at Newcastle from the Scots, and brought him to Holmby House, in Northamptonshire; from whence, upon the quarrels and feuds of parties, he was fetched by a party of horse, commanded by Cornet Joyce, from the army, upon their mutinous rendezvous at Triplow Heath; and, after this, suffering many violences, and varieties of circumstances among the army, was carried to Hampton Court, from whence his majesty very readily made his escape; but not having notice enough to provide effectual means for his more safe deliverance, was obliged to deliver himself to Colonel Hammond in the Isle of Wight.

Here, after some indifferent usage, the parliament pursued a further treaty with him, and all points were agreed on but two.

1st, The entire abolishing episcopacy, which the king declared to be against his conscience, and his coronation oath.

2ndly, The sale of the church-lands, which he said, being most of them gifts to God and the church by persons deceased, his majesty thought could not be alienated without the highest sacrilege; and if taken from the uses to which they were appointed by the wills of the donors, ought to be restored back to the heirs and families of the persons who bequeathed them.

These two articles were fixed so steadfastly in the mind of his majesty, that he ventured his fortune and royal family, and even his own life, in defence of them: however, at last the king condescended so far in these, that the parliament voted his majesty's concessions to be sufficient to settle and establish the peace of the nation.

This vote discovered the bottom of all the counsels which then prevailed; for the army, who knew if peace was once settled, they should be undone, took the alarm at this, and clubbing together in committees and councils, at last brought themselves to a degree of hardness above all that ever this nation saw; for, calling into question the proceedings of their masters who employed them, they immediately fell to work upon the parliament, removed Colonel Hammond, who had the charge of the king, and had used him honourably, placed a new guard upon him, dismissed the commissioners, and put a stop to the treaty; and, following their blow, marched to London, placed regiments of foot at the parliament-house door; and, as the members came up, seized upon all those whom they had down in a list as promoters of the settlement and treaty, and would not suffer them to enter; but the rest, who, being of their own stamp, are permitted to pass, carried on the designs of the army, revived their votes of non-addresses to the king, and then, upon the army's petition, to bring all delinquents to justice, the mask was thrown off, the word all is declared to be meant the king, as well as every man else they pleased.

It is too sad a story, and too much a matter of grief to me, and to all good men, to renew the blackness of those days when law and justice were under the feet of power; the army ruled the parliament, the private officers their generals, the common soldiers their officers, and confusion was in every part of the government; in this hurry they sacrificed their king, and shed the blood of the English nobility without mercy.

The history of the times will supply the particulars which I omit, being willing to confine myself to my own accounts and observations; I was now no more an actor, but a melancholy observer of the misfortunes of my royal master and his friends.

I had given my parole not to take up arms against the parliament, and I saw nothing to invite me to engage on their side; I saw a world of confusion in all their councils, and I always expected that in a chain of distractions, as it generally falls out, the last link would be destruction; and though I pretended to no prophecy, yet the progress of affairs has brought it to pass, and I have seen Providence, who suffered, for the correction of this nation, the sword to govern and devour us, has at last brought destruction by the sword upon the head of most of the party who first drew it.

If, together with the brief account of what concern I had in the active part of the war, I leave behind me some of my own remarks and observations, it may be pertinent enough to my design, and not unuseful to posterity.

I observed, by the sequel of things, that it may be some excuse to the first parliament, who began this war, to say that they manifested their designs were not aimed at the monarchy, nor their quarrel at the person of the king; because, when they had him in their power, though against his will, they would have restored both his person and dignity as a king, only loading it with such clogs of the people's power as they at first pretended to; that is to say, the militia, and the power of naming the great officers at court, and the like; which powers, it was never denied, had been stretched too far in the beginning of this king's reign, and several things done illegally, which his majesty had been sensible of and was willing to rectify; but they, having obtained the power by victory, resolved so to secure themselves as that, whenever they laid down their arms, the king should not be able to do the like again.

And thus far they were not to be so much blamed; and we did not, on our own part, blame them, when they obtained the power, for parting with it on good terms.

But when I have thus far advocated for the enemies, I must be very free to state the crimes of this bloody war, by the events of it.

It is manifest there were among them, from the beginning, a party who aimed at the very root of the government, and at the very thing which they brought to pass, viz. the deposing and murdering their sovereign; and as the devil is always master where mischief is the work, this party prevailed, turned the other out of doors, and overturned all that little honesty that might be in the first beginning of this unhappy strife.

The consequence of this was, the presbyterians saw their error when it was too late, and then would gladly have joined the royal party, to have suppressed this new leaven which had infected the lump; and this is very remarkable, that most of the first champions of this war, who bore the brunt of it, when the king was powerful and prosperous, and when there was nothing to be got by it but blows, first or last, were so ill used by this independent powerful party, who tripped up the heels of all their honesty, that they were either forced, by ill treatment, to take up arms on our side, or suppressed and reduced by them.

In this the justice of Providence seemed very conspicuous, that these having pushed all things by violence against the king, and by arms and force brought him to their will, were at once both robbed of the end, their church government, and punished for drawing their swords against their masters, by their own servants drawing the sword against them; and God, in his due time, punished the others too.

And, what was yet further strange, the punishment of this crime of making war against their king, singled out those very men, both in the army and in the parliament, who were the greatest champions of the presbyterian cause in the council and in the field. Some minutes, too, of circumstances I cannot forbear observing, though they are not very material, as to the fatality and revolutions of days and times.

A Roman Catholic gentleman, of Lancashire, a very religious man in his way, who had observed mightily the fatality of times, places, and actions, being at my father's house, was discoursing once upon the just judgment of God in dating his providences, so as to signify to us his displeasure at particular circumstances; and, among the number of collections he had made, the following were some which I took particular notice of.

1. That King Edward VI died the same day of the same month in which he caused the altar to be taken down, and the image of the Blessed Virgin in the cathedral of St Paul's.

2. Archbishop Cranmer was burnt at Oxford the same day and month that he gave King Henry VIII advice to divorce his Queen Catherine.

3. Queen Elizabeth died the same day and month that she resolved, in her privy council, to behead the Queen of Scots.

4. King James died the same day that he published his book against Cardinal Bellarmine.

5. King Charles's long parliament, which ruined him, began the very same day and month which that parliament began, that, at the request of his predecessor, robbed the Roman church of all her revenues, and suppressed abbeys and monasteries.

How just his calculations were, or how true the matter of fact, I cannot tell, but it put me upon the same in several actions and successes of this war. And I found a great many circumstances, as to time and action, which befel both his majesty and his parties first.—Then others which befel the parliament and presbyterian faction which raised the war.—Then the independent tyranny which succeeded and supplanted the first party.—Then the Scots, who acted on both sides.—Lastly,

The restoration and re-establishment of the loyalty and religion of our ancestors.

1. For King Charles the First; 'tis observable that the charge against the Earl of Strafford, (a thing which his majesty blamed himself for all the days of his life, and at the moment of his last suffering,) was first read in the Lords' House on the 30th of January, the same day of the month six years that the king himself was brought to the block.

2. The king was carried away prisoner from Newark, by the Scots, May 10, the same day six years that, against his conscience and promise, he passed the bill of attainder against the loyal and noble Earl of Strafford.

3. The same day seven years that the king entered the House of Commons for the five members, which all his friends blamed him for, the same day the rump voted bringing his majesty to trial, after they had set by the Lords for not agreeing to it, which was the 3rd of January, 1648-49.

4. The 12th of May, 1646, being the surrender of Newark, the parliament held a day of thanksgiving and rejoicing for the reduction of the king and his party, and finishing the war, which was the same day five years that the Earl of Strafford was beheaded.

5. The battle at Naseby, which ruined the king's affairs, and where his secretary and his office were taken, was the 14th of June, the same day and month the first commission was given out by his majesty to raise forces.

6. The queen voted a traitress by the parliament the 3rd of May, the same day and month she carried the jewels into France.

7. The same day the king defeated Essex in the west, his son, Charles II, was defeated at Worcester.

8. Archbishop Laud's house at Lambeth assaulted by the mob, the same day of the same month that he advised the king to make war upon the Scots.

9. Impeached the 15th of December, 1640, the same day twelvemonth that he commanded the common prayer-book of Scotland to be printed, in order to be imposed upon the Scots, from which all our troubles began.

But many more, and more strange, are the critical junctures of affairs in the case of the enemy, or at least more observed by me.

1. Sir John Hotham, who repulsed his majesty and refused him admittance into Hull before the war, was siezed at Hull by the same parliament for whom he had done it, the same 10th day of August, two years, that he drew the first blood in that war.

2. John Hampden, Esq., of Buckinghamshire, killed the same day one year that the mob-petition from Bucks was presented to the king about him, as one of the five members.

3. Young Captain Hotham executed the 1st of January, the same day that he assisted Sir Thomas Fairfax in the first skirmish with the king's forces at Bramham Moor.

4. The same day and month, being the 6th of August, 1641, that the parliament voted to raise an army against the king, the same day and month, 1648, the parliament were assaulted and turned out of doors by that very army, and none left to sit but whom the soldiers pleased, which were therefore called the rump.

5. The Earl of Holland deserted the king, who had made him general of the horse, and went over to the parliament, and the 9th of March, 1641, carried the Commons' reproaching declaration to the king; and afterwards taking up arms for the king against the parliament, was beheaded by them on the 9th of March, 1648, just seven years after.

6. The Earl of Holland was sent to by the king to come to his assistance and refused, the 11th of July, 1641, and that very day seven years after was taken by the parliament of St Neots.

7. Colonel Massey defended Gloucester against the king, and beat him off the 5th of September, 1643, was after taken by Cromwell's men fighting for the king, on the 5th of September, 1651, two or three days after the fight of Worcester.

8. Richard Cromwell resigning, because he could not help it, the parliament voted a free commonwealth, without a single person or House of Lords; this was the 25th of May, 1658; the 25th of May, 1660, the king landed at Dover, and restored the government of a single person and House of Lords.

9. Colonel Lambert was proclaimed a traitor by the parliament, April the 20th, being the same day he proposed to Oliver Cromwell to take upon himself the title of king.

10. General Monck, being taken prisoner at Nantwich by Sir Thomas Fairfax, revolted to the parliament, the same day nineteen years he declared for the king, and thereby restored the royal authority.

11. The parliament voted to approve of Sir John Hotham's repulsing the king at Hull, the 28th of April, 1642; the 28th of April, 1660, the parliament first debated in the house the restoring the king to the crown.

12. The agitators of the army formed themselves into a cabal, and held their first meeting to seize on the king's person, and to take him into their custody from Holmby, the 28th of April, 1647; the same day, 1660, the parliament voted the agitators to be taken into custody, and committed as many of them as could be found.

13. The parliament voted the queen a traitress for assisting her husband, the king, May the 3rd, 1643. Her son, King Charles II, was presented with the votes of parliament to restore him, and the present of fifty thousand pounds, the 3rd of May, 1660.

14. The same day the parliament passed the act for recognition of Oliver Cromwell, October the 13th, 1654, Lambert broke the parliament and set up the army, October the 13th, 1659.

Some other observations I have made, which, as not so pertinent, I forbear to publish, among which I have noted the fatality of some days to parties, as,

The 2nd of September, Essex defeated in Cornwall; Oliver died; city works demolished: for the king.

The 2nd of September, the fight at Dunbar; the fight at Worcester; the oath against a single person past; Oliver's first parliament called: for the enemy.

The 29th of May, Prince Charles born; Leicester taken by storm; King Charles II restored: for the king.

Fatality of circumstances in this unhappy war, as—

1. The English parliament called in the Scots to invade their king, and are invaded themselves by the same Scots, in defence of the king whose case and the design of the parliament the Scots had mist ken.

2. The Scots, who unjustly assisted the parliament to conquer their lawful sovereign, contrary to their oath of allegiance, and without any pretence on the king's part, are afterwards absolutely conquered and subdued by the same parliament they assisted.

3. The parliament, who raised an army to depose their king, deposed by the very army they had raised.

4. The army broke three parliaments, and are at last broken by a free parliament, and all they had done by the military power undone at once by the civil.

5. Abundance of the chief men, who, by their fiery spirits involved the nation in a civil war, and took up arms against their prince, first or last met with ruin and disgrace from their own party.

1. Sir John Hotham and his son, who struck the first stroke, both beheaded or hanged by the parliament.

2. Major-general Massey three times taken prisoner by them, and once wounded at Worcester.

3. Major-general Langhorn; 4. Colonel Poyer; and 5. Colonel Powell, changed sides, and at last taken, could obtain no other favour than to draw lots for their lives; Colonel Poyer drew the dead lot, and was shot to death.

6. Earl of Holland, who, when the house voted who should be reprieved, Lord Goring, who had been their worst enemy, or the Earl of Holland, who, excepting one offence, had been their constant servant, voted Goring to be spared, and the earl to die.

7. The Earl of Essex, their first general.

8. Sir William Waller.

9. Lieutenant-general Ludlow.

All disgusted and voted out of the army, though they had stood the first shock of the war, to make way for the new model of the army, and to introduce a party.

In all these confusions I have observed two great errors, one of the king, and the other of his friends.

Of the king, that when he was in their custody, and at their mercy, he did not comply with their propositions of peace, before their army, for want of employment, fell into heats and mutinies; that he did not at first grant the Scots their own conditions, which, if he had done, he had gone into Scotland; and then, if the English would have fought the Scots for him, he had a reserve of his loyal friends who would have had room to have fallen in with the Scots to his assistance, who were afterwards dispersed and destroyed in small parties attempting to serve him.

While his majesty remained at Newcastle the queen wrote to him, persuading him to make peace upon any terms; and, in politics, her majesty's advice was certainly the best: for however low he was brought by a peace, it must have been better than the condition he was then in.

The error I mention of the king's friends was this, that after they saw all was lost, they could not be content to sit still and reserve themselves for better fortunes, and wait the happy time when the divisions of the enemy would bring them to certain ruin; but must hasten their own miseries by frequent fruitless risings, in the face of a victorious enemy, in small parties; and I always found these effects from it:—

First, the enemy, who were always together by the ears when they were let alone, were united and reconciled when we gave them any interruption; as particularly, in the case of the first assault the army made upon them, when Colonel Pride with his regiment garbled the house, as they called it; at that time a fair opportunity offered; but it was omitted till it was too late: that insult upon the house had been attempted the year before, but was hindered by the little insurrections of the royal party, and the sooner they had fallen out the better.

Secondly—These risings being desperate, with vast disadvantages, and always suppressed, ruined all our friends; the remnants of the cavaliers were lessened, the stoutest and most daring were cut off, and the king's interest exceedingly weakened, there not being less than thirty thousand of his best friends cut off in the several attempts made at Maidstone, Colehester, Lancashire, Pembroke, Pontefract, Kingston, Preston, Warrington, Worcester, and other places. Had these men all reserved fortunes to a conjunction with the Scots at either of the invasions they made into this kingdom, and acted with the conduct and courage they were known masters of, perhaps neither of those Scotch armies had been defeated.

But the impatience of our friends ruined all; for my part, I was as willing to put my hand to the ruin of the enemy as any of them, but I never saw any tolerable appearance of a force able to match the enemy, and I had no mind to be beaten and then hanged. Had we let them alone, they would have fallen into so many parties and factions, and so effectually have torn one another to pieces, that whichever party had come to us, we should, with them, have been too hard for all the rest.

This was plain by the course of things afterwards; when the independent army had ruffled the presbyterian parliament, the soldiery of that party made no scruple to join us, and would have restored the king with all their hearts, and many of them did join us at last.

And the consequence, though late, ended so; for they fell out so many times, army and parliament, parliament and army, and alternately pulled one another down so often, till at last the presbyterians, who began the war, ended it; and, to be rid of their enemies, rather than for any love to the monarchy, restored King Charles the Second, and brought him in on the very day that they themselves had formerly resolved the ruin of his father's government, being the 29th of May, the same day twenty years that the private cabal in London concluded their secret league with the Scots to embroil his father, King Charles the First.

NOTES.

(Note 1.) The protestant diet at Leipsic was begun Feb. 8, 1630, and continued to April 3, 1631. Four principal reasons were assigned for the congress. "The first of these four was this: that whereas the Duke of Saxony had, in the time of the diet of Frankfort, written advice unto the emperour, of the King of Sweden's approaching, the emperour tells him againe, how he hoped that himselfe (Saxon) and Brandenburg would well abide him. By which answer, Saxony perceived a new bill of charges comming upon the protestants next those parts where the King of Sweden was landed. The second was this: The round course taken by the emperour for the recovery of the church-lands. A third was this: That rigide course (taken by advice of the jesuites) for reformation of the protestant churches and schooles, and the forbidding of the libertie of the Augustane Confession. The fourth was, that decree of the emperour's for the continuance of the warres against the King of Sweden."—The Swedish Intelligencer, Part I, London, 1634. iv. p. 20.

(Note 2.) Of these levies the Elector of Saxony was to raise six regiments; Brandenburg three; each of the circles of Swabia, the Rhine, and Franconia, three; Lower Saxony one. Each regiment of foot was to consist of 3,000, and of horse 1,000.—Ib. p. 28.

(Note 3.) The storming of Magdeburg by John Tsercla, Count of Tilly, has always been considered as one of the most horrible butcheries which occurred in any war, and has only been paralleled by the conquerors of Ishmael and Warsaw in our days. The anniversary is still commemorated by the inhabitants; and their panic, during the late disgraceful siege, was considerably increased by the recollection. The following is the account of the siege in the 'Swedish Intelligencer':—"Upon the 12th of April, Tilly first presents himselfe in full battaglia within a mile of the city; at which time believed it was, that he would at least have fallen upon the great star-sconce, or toll-house, by the old Elbe; but that day attempted he no more than to beat some guards out of their redoubts into the city. The 13th he laies his siege; himself, Pappenheim, Savelli, Holstein, and Mansfeldt, round begirting it. This done, twelve pieces of cannon are placed against the bridge over the Elbe, upon which he made 568 shot that same day: his intent being to cut that passage off, that the town by it might send no succours to the foresaid sconce, or toll-house; but the General Falkenburg conveniently flanking some paces upon the toll-house, quite at last dismantled the enemies cannon. This not succeeding, Tilly falls pellmell at once upon both these places, giving eight several assaults unto them: but the Lord Falkenburg, with four whole cannon double charged with stones, old iron, &c. about 12 o'clocke at night, made them to give over. Some prisoners the next day taken, confesse there were 2,000 men that day slain of the assailants. This toll-house was a notable piece of fortification,* built on the other side the Elbe. To this Tilly now turned all his battery; heere he falls to myning, and all to no purpose. On the 15th, both by land and water he layes at it; but 300 muskettiers being by him sent in boates to assaile it on the water's side, were by those of the fort driven ashore, and either all drownd or slaine by the citizens; 200 also at the same time lost their lives on the land side. Now was there newes brought into Tillie's campe, of the King of Sweden's being upon his march, for the relieving of the besieged; a council of warre thereupon being called, some troups are sent towards Wittenberg and the Dessau bridge, there to stave off the king's forces. The newes of his coming againe slackning, April 21, to worke he fals againe; and giving on upon the toll-house, that notable piece is forsaken by the Magdeburgers; who, at their retreat, offering to fire it, the place was rescued by the Imperialists. Upon this, were all the forts on that side of the Elbe either taken or given over; the bridge also by Tilly burned, and approaches made unto the city; which was from thence immediately battered. Now were the besieged forced to burne their own New Towne; where 2,000 Imperialists immediately lodging themselves, fell to mining, and shooting of grana- does into the city. The 29th, by a sally out upon these in the New Towne, are some 100 slaine. The mynes doe no hurt, until one Farenback, a notable engineer, takes them in hand; who saps himself under the towne-ditches to the very hard wals, which he much shakes, by springing of a mine; in return of which service and some others, the emperor makes him a colonnell, granting him commission to raise two new regiments. May 2. The Imperialists in the new city, having suddenly in the night-time cast up a battery, shrewdly punish the besieged. May 7. General Tilly comes himself into the new towne, together with Pappenheim, then generall of the ordnance, and the count of Schomberg, sergeant-major-generall; and a great shew of ladders is made, as if there were a purpose of a general scaladoe. Tillie's hope was, that the towne would presently parly, upon sight of these preparations; but they, taking the alarme at it, instantly manne all their bulwarks. The 8th day is spent in shooting at a certain high tower, from which the towne-cannon much plagued the besiegers. This day Tilley sends a trumpet to summon the towne; they send another to him to signify their willingness to yield, might but their administrator still enjoy his bishopricke, and the towne their priviledges. This not consented to, the 9th day Pappenheim attempting to scale the wals, is by a sally beaten off; in which some of the enemies' mines being discovered, are by countermines in the towne defeated. That day is another trumpet sent into the towne. Towards evening, was there much bustling observed, and carriages to and againe in the enemies' leaguer: yea, they were perceived to rise with their whole army (as the towne thought), and march to Offensleben, half a mile from them. All that night was the Lord Falkenburg upon the wals; who perceiving in the morning no danger of assault, calls the city together into the state-horse, to give answer to the enemies' trumpet; yea, so secure they were, that the over-wacht souldiers are suffered to go from their courts of garde to take some sleepe; and some say, that the townesmen are gone to church to give God thanks for their deliverance from the siege. Thus, the wals being found empty, about seven in the morning, May 10th, Pappenheim having given the word, Jesu-Maria, to his souldiers, and a white string about their armes, makes towards the Heideker port; where, having thrown turfs and faggots into the ditch to fill it, thorow it, up to the middle, the Imperialists runne, with scaling ladders upon their backs. The walls are in a trice mounted, the towne entered, and the souldiers fall to killing. Falkenburg now flying in upon them, beates them back to the wals againe; but a port being by this tyme opened, and the enemies' horse let in, the valiant Falkenburg is slayne with a shot; the administrator hurt both in the thigh and head, and so taken. Whilst all thus goes to wraike, a mighty fire breakes out (howe, none knowes,) and it being a great windy day, all was on the sudden become one great flame, the whole towne being in twelve houres space utterly burnd to cinders, excepting 139 houses. Six goodly churches are burnt: the cathedrall, together with St. Marie's church and cloister, were by the monkes and souldiers diligently preserved. Twenty thousand people, at least, were killed, burned, and smothered; syxe thousand being observed to be drowned in the Elbe. Tilly's

Wallons* would give quarter to few; and the Crabats† never used to give or beg any; so that all were killed. May 12th, came Tilly into the towne, and finding some hundreds of women and children in the church, he gives them their lives, and some bread too; next day he forbids pillaging. Upon Sunday, May 15th, because he would have his cathedrall as like to Rome as might be, that is, dedicated in blood, he causes it to be cleansed and new consecrated; masse and Te Deum being sung in it, in thanksgiving for the victory. Future ages may perhaps compare the destruction of this goodly city unto that of Troy or of Jerusalem."

(Note 4.) The accession of King James to the throne of England, and the subsequent pacification of the borders and Highlands, had not destroyed the restless and impatient valour of the Scots. When the war in Germany broke out, several chieftains raised regiments chiefly at their own expense. Among these was Sir Houcheon Mackay, who had often been proceeded against for his predatory excursions into Sutherland. Upon his return from Germany, he was, for his services, created Lord Reay. Various methods of raising recruits were employed, and the following curious song, printed from an ancient MS., contributed probably not a little to increase the number of volunteers:

All brave lads that would haisard for honour,
Hark! how Bellona her trumpet doth blow;
Mars, with many a warlike banner,
Bravely displayed invites yow to go!
Germani, Suedden, Denmarke, are smoking
With a crew of brave lads others provoking,
All in their armour bright,
Daisling great Cesar's sight,
Summons you to ane fight! Tan la ra ra.

O, Viva! Viva! Gustavus we cry!
Heir we shall either won honour or dye!
Thow that riseth before the day dawning,
Mounted ere Phoebus saluteth the morne,
Yoffing, crying, youlling, yelling,
Lyk ane citie swyne summons out with an horne.
What honour canst thou gain by thy conquisht attending,
When thou hes brought a poor baist to their ending?
Please your yelping hounds,
And hear our martial sounds,
Till all the hills resounds: Tan la ra ra!

Fy, boyes! fy, boyes! leave it not there,
For honour is not gotten by hounting the hair,
Thou fyne thing, that still art resorting,
In princes pallaces deckt up like an ap,
Flattering, fawning, cringing, and courting,
Changing each moment in a new munkish shape;
Thinkest thou that a denti thing, or a fyne galliard,
Or that my ladies glove honours appallart,
Or Madams squivering voice,
Or such a fidling noice,
Sounding like, Sa Sa boyes! Tan la ra ra!

Up, lads! up, lads! up and advance,
For honour's not gotten by a cringe or a dance.
Thow that on thy pillow lyes sleiping,
Pampert with pleasures, and puffed up with pride,
And in thy armes a wanton keeping,
Thinking ther is no heavns besyd,
Slave to the womens lust, when thou doeth mount her,
What honour canst thou gain by thy raincounter?
Shame so the shall remain,
When we shall honour gain,
Where many a hero's slain! Tan ta ra ra.

* Soldiers raised in the Netherlands.

† The Croats, who rendered themselves so famous in the seven years' war, and were by Joseph II very impolitically formed into regular regiments.

Fy, man! fy, man! leave it for shame,
 For honour is not gotten by so easie a gain,
 All brave lads, raise up your spirits!
 Honour abydeeth you attendit by fame;
 Men are rewarded according to their merits
 Honour begeteth that winneth the same.
 Vivat, Gustavus! I pray God protekt him,
 And send the devill to the colstreat, for it doth expect him!
 Charge, lads! fall in a round,
 Till Cesar shall give ground.
 Hark, hark! our trumpets sound.
 Vivat, Gustavus Adolphus! we cry!
 Here we shall either wone honour or dy.

At Frankfort upon the Oder, Colonels Hepburn and Lumsdell, mentioned in the text, performed prodigies of valour. "The king calling the valiant Sir John Hebron (Hepburn) and Colonell Lumsdell unto him, 'Now, my brave Scots (saies he), remember your countrymen slaine at New Brandenburg.' Lumsdell, therefore, with his regiment of English and Scots; and Hebron, with his High Duchers, presse upon that sally port, and the enemies bullets flying as thick as hail, Lumsdell, with his drawne sword in his hand, cries, 'Let's enter, my hearts!' thrusting himself in amongst the thickest of them. His men followes resolutely, the pikes first entring; all knocking down the enemies most pitifully; for the inner port being shut behind them, they had no way to escape, but the little clicket-gate, through which as many as could crept into the towne. And by this time the greater gate being broke open, Hebron and Lumsdell entering with their men, make a most pittifull slaughter; and when any Imperialist cryed, 'Quarter!' 'New Brandenburg!' cries the other, and knocks him down. One Scotchman protested he had killed eighteen men with his owne hand. Here did Lumsdell take eighteen colours; yea, such testimony shewed he of his valour, that the king, after the battell, bade him aske what he would, and he would give it him. Sir John Hepburn, shewing extraordinary valour, was here hurt in the legge."—Swedish Intelligencer, ut supra, p. 90.

(Note 5.) The account of the siege and surrender of Oppenheim corresponds pretty accurately with that given in the work we have had occasion to quote so frequently, excepting in so far as respects the cavalier himself. During the storming of the castle, "fell there out a pretty merriment, which some readers may perchance be pleased withall. Whilest the most of the Spanish were begging for quarter, a certaine officer, with some others of his men, not daring to trust the courtesy of an enemy, fairly slips away from the Scots that had so ferryted them, running out of the towne for life, even close beside the king's army. It chanced that a hare, starting out of the bushes about the ditch, ranne directly before the Spaniards, and, within a few paces after, two or three other hares also ranne as directly after them. The Swedish soldiers laughed heartily to see what a convoy the Spaniards had gotten. 'Tis ill lucke (says one of their souldiers) to have one's way crost with a hare; and that ill lucke is now ours, for we are likely to get but little honour by them, should all their countrimen run away in the like manner."—Ib. P. II, p. 47.

(Note 6.) The siege of Creutznach was most obstinately contested, and the desperate valour of William, first Lord Craven, was such, that, on his coming into the King of Sweden's presence, his Majesty told him, "he adventured so desperately, he bid his younger brother fair play for his estate." In 1626 he had been created Lord Craven of Hamstead Marshall, county Berks. In 1637 he was, along with Prince Rupert, taken prisoner, and, on obtaining his liberty, served the States of Holland under the Prince of Orange. The 16th of March, an. 16 Car. II, he was created Earl Craven of Craven, county Ebor. In 1670 he was appointed Colonel of the Coldstream regiment of guards. When King James II endeavoured to take it away from him, "If they took away his regiment, they had as good take away his life, since he had nothing else to divert himself with." He was, however, obliged to give it up at King William's accession to the crown. He died April 9, 1597, aged eighty-eight years and ten months.

(Note 7.) This celebrated bridge is described at full length in the Swedish Intelligencer. It was framed by the Swedes, who acted as carpenters, and the Fins as pioneers. The following note is singular; but the extraordinary valour of the Swedes, even in the present day, must make us hesitate how far we should believe the insinuations against them; though the Fins are well known to be a pusillanimous people: "The Swedes, generally one with another, are all carpenters; and the Fins, being a plain, simple, and droyling kinde of people, are more used for the spade than for the sword; notwithstanding we have heard so much of the great exploits of these Finlanders. The Swedes and Finlanders, plainly, are not the best sooldiers of the army; 'tis the Scots and Germanes that have done it; and yet have both the other done their parts also."—P. II, p. 142, marginal note.—De Foe, in this part, as well as in many others, has made great use of this interesting work. The account of the bridge and the battle, as well as of the supposed means by which Tilly might have gained the battle, correspond together accurately in both works: "When Cardinall Passman, the emperor's ambassadour with the Pope, had the first news brought him of this victory, and of the manner of it, he to his friends pronounced, Actum est, 'there is an end of all;' which some people interpreted to be meant of the empire and of the Romish religion."—"And yet had not the king escaped so cheap as with the lives of two thousand brave men; had not he directed David's sling-stone into Goliath's forehead, guided one bullet into Altringer's forehead, and another into Tilly's thigh-bone; had not this brave old counte beene thus spoyled, the king had found but an unfriendly welcome into Bavaria," &c.—Ib. p. 148. Tilly is one of the numerous list of imperial generals, who were frequently unfortunate, yet still acquired a high reputation, such as Wallenstein, Daun, Melas, &c.

(Note 8.) The conditions under which the celebrated Wallenstein, Duke of Friedland, took the charge of generalissimo of the army, were most peremptory. He was to be generalissimo for life, and that in the most absolute manner, for the emperor, the King of Spain, and the whole house of Austria. The emperor should not be present at the army, much less have any command over it; the free liberty of confiscating and pardoning the countries he conquered was stipulated for by him; the duchy of Mecklenburg, with other dominions, were promised to him, &c.

(Note 9.) "The king had now 132 ensignes of foot, which made up 10,767 in the muster-booke; and 152 troops of horse, which came to 7,676. In all 18,443 men."—Swedish Intelligencer, P. II, p. 240.

(Note 10.) The celebrated victory of Lutzen was gained on the 6th of November, 1632, old style. In the Swedish Intelligencer, a long account of it is introduced, consisting of 48 quarto pages. The king previously harangued the Swedes and Germans separately, both together consisting of 17,000 or 18,000 men. The watchword of his army was, Gott mit uns, God with us; that of the Imperialists, Jesu Maria. Both the armies had had the same in the great battle of Leipsic. The king, in the midst of the battle, had charged a numerous body of cuirassiers, but they being too powerful, he was forced to retreat, and wounded in the left arm. As he was carried off the field, a cuirassier, who knew him, came behind him, and crying out, "This is the right bird," shot him through the body, but was immediately killed himself by Luchan, the king's master of the horse. The king's body was forced to be abandoned, and he was stript of every thing about him by the imperial soldiers, who were anxious to have a relic of so renowned a commander. It is well known, that afterwards the body of the king was recovered, and a most complete victory gained. One of the best imperial commanders, Count Pappenheim, was slain by a bullet from a falconet. He had, previous to the battle, taken the sacrament, confessed, and made this short testament: His soul he commended to God; his body (if he were slain) to the emperor, and his wife and children to Wallenstein. The imperialists vauntingly claimed the victory, but acknowledged that the king of Sweden was the bravest enemy and the best captain that ever was in Christendom. A stone pillar, to the north of the town of Lutzen, still marks the spot where he fell.

(Note 11.) In this disastrous battle, the Swedish veteran general, Gustavus Horne, with Field-marshal Gratz, and two other generals, were taken prisoners; and several generals and superior officers killed. The defeat would have been still more complete, if the Rhinegrave Otto Ludwig, with his forces, had not approached, and prevented the pursuit of the Swedes, by the cavalry and Croats.

(Note 12.) The Earl of Holland entered Berwick with the king, May 30, 1639, and the 31st he marched with 200 horse to Dunse. "Upon the coming of our forces into the town, [the expected Scots army was not to be found, but] the people cried, "God bless the king," and that they were all his majesty's obedient subjects, and readily brought forth their Scots ale and what they had, to bid the English welcome."—Rushworth's Collections, vol. II, p. 929. June 3, the earl again entered into Scotland, with 4,000 horse, but retired before the numbers of the Scots, and the superior skill of the Scottish general, Lesly.

(Note 13.) The 27th of August, 1640, at night, General Lesly arrived within a mile of Newcastle, and finding it garrisoned, marched the next morning to Newburn Ford, where he found the pass defended with strong works and six cannon, and guarded with 3,000 horse and 1,200 foot. He placed his own ordinance upon an adjoining hill, and so harassed the English foot that they fled in disorder, and abandoned their cannon. The horse attempted to rescue them, but were put to flight by Colonel Lesly, with about 1,500 horse. Upon this occasion, the celebrated gentleman-troop of Sir John Suckling was routed, and some of his horses taken.

(Note 14.) Robert Bertie, Earl of Lindsay, was eldest son of Peregrine Lord Willoughby, of Eresby, a celebrated worthy of Queen Elizabeth's reign. He was born in 1582; and, in 1603, succeeded to the office of lord high chamberlain of England; 1626, he was created Earl of Lindsay; in 1635, appointed lord high admiral; and, in 1642, general of the king's forces. The same year, 23rd October, he was killed at the battle of Edge Hill.

(Note 15.) Robert, Earl of Essex, was the only son of the great favourite of Queen Elizabeth, and, when young, was married to Lady Frances Howard. His divorce from her is well known; and he retired in disgust from the court in consequence of it. He died September 14th, 1646.

(Note 16.) "Those of ours (the parliamentary army) taken by the enemy were, the Lord St John, who was mortally wounded, and declared, at his death, a full satisfaction and cheerfulness to lay down his life for so good a cause; Colonel Walton, a member of parliament; and Captain Austin, an eminent merchant in London; of whom the last died through the hard usage he received in the gaol of Oxford, to which he was committed. It was observed, that the greatest slaughter on our side was of such as ran away; and on the enemy's side, of those that stood; of whom I saw about threescore lie within the compass of threescore yards, upon the ground whereon that brigade fought in which the king's standard was. We took prisoners the Earl of Lindsey, general of the king's army, who died of his wounds; Sir Edward Stradling, and Colonel Lunsford, who were sent to Warwick castle."—Memoirs of Lieutenant-general Ludlow. * Edin. 1751, p. 44.—The king published a declaration to his subjects after the late victory against the rebels, which was answered by a similar declaration of the lords and commons.

(Note 17.) After the parliamentary army had possessed themselves of Reading, they had several skirmishes with the royalists, in one of which Hampden, the great patriot, lost his life. Sir William Waller engaged the king's western army at Lansdown. The Cornish men stood their ground till they came to push of pike, but were then routed, and their commander, Sir Bevil Grenville, killed. General Ludlow, soon after, joined Waller. "But," he says in his own memoirs, "the great hopes we had conceived of enjoying some quiet in the west, by the means of this victory, were soon blasted. For a body of horse sent from Oxford, not being attended by any of our army, (though, as I have heard, commanded so to do,) engaged our horse at Roundway Hill; where the overforwardness of some of our party to charge the enemy upon disadvantageous ground, was the principal cause of their defeat. The horse being routed, our foot quitted their ground, and shifted for themselves; many of whom were taken, and many killed; the rest retreated to Bristol."—Vol. I, p. 54.

(Note 18.) "In the meantime the king's army besieged Gloucester, the king being there in person to countenance the siege. The besieged made a vigorous defence for about a month; during which time the parliament took care to recruit their army, in order to relieve them. Their rendezvous was appointed on Hounslow Heath, whither some members of parliament (of which my father was one) were sent, to inspect their condition, that their wants, being known, might be the better supplied, who found them a very shattered and broken body; but the city, being then very affectionate to the public, soon recruited them, and drew forth so many of their trained bands and auxiliary regiments as made them up a gallant army. In their march to Gloucester, some of ours fell upon a party of the enemy at Cirencester, of whom they took many prisoners, and seized a great quantity of provisions, which they found prepared for the enemy; who, upon our approach, raised the siege."—Ibid., p. 50. A particular and very circumstantial detail was published of this siege, in quarto, by order of parliament.

(Note 19.) "The Earl of Essex, having relieved the town of Gloucester, was marching back again, when he perceived the enemy endeavouring to get between him and London; and to that end, falling upon his rear with a strong party of horse, they so disordered his men, and retarded the march of his army, that he found himself obliged to engage them at Newbury. The dispute was very hot on both sides, and the enemy had the better at first; but our men resolving to carry their point, and the city regiments behaving themselves with great bravery, gave them, before night, so little to boast, that the next morning they were willing to permit the Earl of Essex to march to London without interruption. Few prisoners were taken on either side. The enemy had several of quality killed. We lost a colonel of one of the city regiments, together with some inferior officers."—Ludlow ut supra, p. 57.

(Note 20.) Alexander Lesly, Earl of Leven, for the first time, evinced his military genius as a volunteer in Lord Vere's regiment, in Holland, and afterwards went into the service of the great King of Sweden, who appointed him to defend the town of Stralsund against the imperialists. This he accomplished, and obliged the great Wallenstein to retire, though he had boasted he would take the town if it were even chained to the firmament. In 1630, he drove the imperialists out of Rugen, and then returned home. His actions at the head of the Scotch army are, for the most part, detailed in the text. In 1641, he was created Earl of Leven, and died at Balgony, in Fife, in the year 1662.

(Note 21.) This heroic lady was Charlotte, daughter to Claude de la Tremouille, Duke of Thouars, Prince of Palmont, &c., and wife of William, sixth Earl of Derby, who suffered death in the year 1651 for his loyalty to his king. She not only defended successfully Hotham House in 1644, but, in 1651, for a long time, the Isle of Man, which was the last place in the English dominions that submitted to the commonwealth. She was detained in prison till the restoration, and died March 21st, 1663.

(Note 22.) The battle of Marston Moor was fought July 2, 1644. Ludlow has the following observation, similar to some of our cavaliers: "If Prince Rupert, who had acquired honour enough by the relief of York in the view of three generals, could have contented himself with it, and retreated, as he might have done, without fighting, the reputation he had gained would have caused his army to increase like the rolling of a snowball; but he thinking this nothing, unless he might have ably forced his enemies to a battle, against the advice of many of those that were with him," &c.—Vol. I, p. 107. The country people, it is said, buried four thousand men, of which the prince is reported to have lost three thousand. In a letter from the parliamentary generals, they state their loss to have been one lieutenant-colonel, some few captains, and only two or three hundred men, which is not credible, considering the defeat of one of their wings.—Rushworth, III, 635-636.

(Note 23.) This affair is represented as a very slight skirmish by Ludlow (I, 104), who hitherto had served under the defeated Sir William Waller. Of the parliamentary army, were taken prisoners Colonel Wemys, Lieutenant-colonels Baker and Baynes, and several other officers. "Colonel Middleton was dismounted amongst the king's forces, of whom one, taking him for a commander of theirs, mounted him again, and bid him make haste, and kill a roundhead; and so he escaped."—Rushworth, III, 676.

(Note 24.) According to Ludlow, the king lost, during the storm, about 1,700 men; and those of the town about one hundred.

(Note 25.) "Being encouraged by his success at Leicester, and with the consideration that he was to encounter with an unexperienced enemy, upon advice that our army was in search of him, the king advanced towards them; and both armies met in the field of Naseby on the 14th of June, 1645. Some days before, one Colonel Vermuyden, an old soldier, who commanded a regiment of horse, had laid down his commission; whether through diffidence of success, or any other consideration, I know not: and, in the beginning of the engagement, Major-general Skipton, the only old soldier remaining amongst the chief officers of the army, received a shot in the body from one of our own party, as was supposed, unwillingly; whereby he was in a great measure disabled to perform the duty of his place that day, though extremely desirous to do it. Under these discouragements, the horse upon our left wing were attacked by those of the enemy's right, and beaten back to our cannon, which were in danger of being taken, our foot giving way also: but our right wing being strengthened by those of our left that were rallied by our officers, fell upon the enemy's left wing; and having broken and repulsed them, resolving to improve the opportunity, charged the main body of the king's army; and, with the assistance of two or three regiments of our infantry, entirely encompassed the enemy's body of foot; who, finding themselves deserted by their horse, threw down their arms, and yielded themselves prisoners. By this means our horse were at leisure to pursue the king and such as fled with him towards Leicester, taking many prisoners in the pursuit; who, with those taken in the field, amounted in all to about 6,000, and amongst them, six colonels, eight lieutenant-colonels, eighteen majors, seventy lieutenants, eighty ensigns, 200 inferior officers, about 140 standards of horse and foot, the king's footmen and servants, and the whole train of artillery and baggage. This victory was obtained with the loss of a very few on our side, and not above 300 or 400 of the enemy."—Ludlow, I, 131.

PREFACE.

THE year 1724 gave birth to a romance, which for originality of invention, for accuracy of painting, and for utility of purpose, was not exceeded by any of the former. In the story of "Roxana," there are incidents, indeed, that cannot be welcome to a virtuous mind; but the fault is in the subject rather than in the author, whose aim is to describe human nature as it is, for the purpose of contrasting it with what it should be. This fidelity of design will not always admit of an agreeable outline; and it was the humour of De Foe to employ his pen upon those subjects that present the broad features of life in their full deformity. In ordinary cases, this would be considered a mark of bad taste; but De Foe had always some important end to legitimate his choice. He was the last man to administer fuel to a flame that he sought rather to extinguish. He never tells a story for mere amusement, nor does he go out of his way to obtrude reflections for the purpose of correcting it. His facts, however disreputable to virtue, are always subservient to it in the long run: he tells his story for the sake of the moral, which forms a constituent part, and yet so inartificially produced, as to be essential to the narrative. As a correct painter of life and manners, he was under the necessity of taking the world as he found it; as a moralist, he was desirous of leaving it better. He therefore selected those parts from the great drama that he thought most susceptible of improvement, and converted them into sources of instruction, in a form that would be most accessible to the generality of readers. His knowledge of the world had taught him, that those who would not listen to a grave discourse, might be allured by an eventful story; that whilst to the former they gave only the unwilling assent of the judgment, its exemplification would go far towards fixing it upon the heart. Such a result, however, is not to be produced by a forced delineation of the passions, nor by pictures of life that do violence to truth. These, indeed, have been the common resort of novelists, whose aim at effect has betrayed them into a departure from the ordinary operations of nature, and producing a degree of excitement that requires to be kept alive by fresh stimulants; but as the illusion vanishes the mind falls a prey to grief and disappointment. De Foe never attempts the beau ideal of human life. His characters are those of ordinary occurrence, his portraits strictly natural, and his sketches of manners exactly such as existed at the period he describes.

"Roxana," like most of De Foe's narratives, has passed through several editions, but the variations in them require some distinct notice. In the second edition, De Foe was persuaded by his friend, Southern, to leave out the whole of the story relating to Roxana's daughter, Susannah; who, suspecting her relationship, contrived various expedients to throw herself in her mother's way, until she at length succeeded, and accomplished her ruin. Southern's objection, certainly a very curious one, rested upon the supposition, that the daughter's history was imaginary, whilst the rest of the story was founded upon fact. Whatever foundation there may be for this tradition, it is certain that most of the subsequent editions of the book contain the story, and it is one of the finest-wrought pictures in the work. There are some points in it that strongly resemble the case of poor Savage, whose prying curiosity was a great annoyance to his unnatural mother, but did not end so successfully. It was upon this part of Roxana's history, that Mr Godwin founded his tragedy of Fawkeners, which was acted and printed in December, 1807, with the following prologue by Charles Lamb:—

"An author who has given you all delight,
Furnish'd the tale our stage presents to-night;
Some of our earliest tears he taught to steal
Down our young cheeks, and forced us first to feel.
To solitary shores whole years confined,
Who has not read how pensive Crusoe pined?
Who, now grown old, that did not once admire
His goat, his parrot, his uncouth attire;
The stick, due notch'd, that told each tedious day,
That in the lonely island wore away?
Who has not shuddered, where he stands aghast
At sight of human footsteps in the waste;
Or joy'd not when his trembling hands unbind
Thee, Friday, gentlest of the savage kind?
The genius who conceived that magic tale
Was skilled by native pathos to prevail.
His stories, though rough drawn, and framed in haste,
Had that which pleas'd our hasty grandsire's taste.
His was a various pen that freely roved
Into all subjects,—was in most approved.
Whate'er the theme, his ready muse obeyed;
Love, courtship, politics, religion, trade.
Gifted alike to shine in every sphere,—
Novelist, historian, poet, pamphleteer.
In some blest interval of party strife,
He drew a striking sketch from private life;
Whose moving scenes of intricate distress,
We try to night in a dramatic dress;
A real story of domestic woe,
That asks no aid from music, verse, or show,
But trusts to truth, to nature, and DE FOE."

Mr Godwin, in his preface to the play, remarks, "The incident on which my production is founded made a strong impression on my fancy when a boy, and always rendered the book which contains it a favourite with me. The terrors of a guilty mind, haunted with mysterious fear of retribution, have seldom been more fearfully delineated."

The editions of "Roxana" printed since the death of the author, contain some variations in the matter as well as in the title. That of 1735, is called "The Life and Adventures of Roxana, the Fortunate Mistress, or most unhappy Wife." The edition of 1742, printed for H. Slater in Clement's lane, 12mo, varies again in the title, but the matter is an exact transcript of the first edition. In 1745, there appeared a new impression in 12mo, with a continuation of Roxana's life from the place where it was broken off by De Foe, until the time of her death, in 1742. It is impossible at this distance of time to say by whom it was written; no light is to be derived on this point from anything in the former part; the style certainly most strongly resembles that of the unquestionable productions of De Foe. These additions amount to about a fourth part of the work, and have been retained in the subsequent editions; but in most of them the work is printed incorrectly, and with the omission of some passages in the first edition. That of 1755, printed for H. Owen, in White Fryars, 12mo, is divided into chapters, and embellished with copper-plates; as is that published by J. Cooke, in 2 vols. 12mo, without a date. There is an edition in crown octavo, printed uniformly with "Moll Flanders," by C. Sympson, in Stone-cutter street, Fleet Market; and there is another in small quarto, printed uniformly with "Robinson Crusoe," towards the middle of the last century.* "Roxana," in common with the other fictions of De Foe, fell into the merciless grasp of Francis Noble, a bookseller in Holborn, and a wholesale dealer in the trash then published under the name of novels. Like his other works, it was dreadfully mangled in the operation. Besides mutilating it of nearly half its contents, and suppressing some of the finest and most interesting passages, he had recourse to artifice in order to procure a sale for his broken wares. His dealings with "Moll Flanders" have been already noticed; his "Roxana" bore the following title:—"The History of Mademoiselle de Belean: Or, the New Roxana, the Fortunate Mistress, afterwards Countess of Wintelsheim. Published by Mr Daniel De Foe; and from Papers found since his Decease, it appears was greatly altered by himself; and from the said Papers, the present work is produced. London: printed for F. Noble, &c. 1775." 12mo. As De Foe left no such papers as are here mentioned, it required no small stock of effrontery to publish the falsehood. Yet from these mutilated editions, so imposed upon the public, those which have since appeared, seem to have been chiefly copied.

The history of the beautiful Roxana, continues Mr Wilson, in the original dress that De Foe bestowed upon it, is one of those rare efforts of genius that occasionally blaze upon the world, to relieve it from the surrounding dullness. In rich natural painting, combining all the charms of simplicity with the most exquisite pathos, it is surpassed by none of his preceding works, and it is the subject only that renders it less acceptable than "Robinson Crusoe." The genius that inspired the one, has put forth the same energies in the other, producing an equally striking effect, and illustrating alike the peculiar talents of the writer.

Although the incidents that compose this instructive narrative derive all their interest from the contrivances of the writer, yet we may believe him when he says, "That the foundation is laid in truth of fact." It is not improbable that the original of the picture may have had an existence in the gay court of Charles II; but be this as it may, it is certain that the effect is greatly heightened by her being made to tell her own story. In this, indeed, consists its magical influence, persuading the reader that he is conversing with the very person, and receiving from her own lips the recital of her misfortunes.

Although "Roxana" has passed under the same ban of proscription as "Moll Flanders," yet there is an essential difference in the character of the two stories. The latter is an epitome of vice in low life, exhibiting the homely features of the class to which she belongs. Roxana, on the contrary, is a high bred courtesan. She is just such a sort of person as may be supposed to have figured in the gay and licentious days of Charles II; when a thorough-bred loyalist, whether in court or city, would have thought it a breach of good manners to be considered better than his prince. It is true, that in the empire of vice, the moralist knows no distinction of ranks. In its personal consequences, the rich and the poor meet upon one common ground, and the more eminent the station, the more baneful is the influence; but it is equally true, that in proportion to the refinements of life, its exhibition will be usually more or less disgusting. In Roxana, we have a portraiture of manners in the upper classes of society; whilst her maid, Amy, who performs a minor part in her adventures, belongs to the same class as Moll Flanders

THE AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

THE history of this beautiful lady is to speak for itself: if it is not as beautiful as the lady herself is reported to be; if it is not as diverting as the reader can desire, and much more than he can reasonably expect, and if all the most diverting parts of it are not adapted to the instruction and improvement of the reader, the relator says it must be from the defect of his performance; dressing up the story in worse clothes than the lady whose words he speaks, prepared for the world.

He takes the liberty to say, that this story differs from most of the modern performances of this kind, though some of them have met with a very good reception in the world. I say, it differs from them in this great and essential article, namely, that the foundation of this is laid in truth of fact; and so the work is not a story, but a history.

The scene is laid so near the place where the main part of it was transacted, that it was necessary to conceal names and persons; lest what cannot be yet entirely forgot in that part of the town should be remembered, and the facts traced back too plainly by the many people yet living, who would know the persons by the particulars.

It is not always necessary that the names of persons should be discovered, though the history may be many ways useful; and if we shall be always obliged to name the persons, or not to relate the story, the consequence might be only this:—that many a pleasant and delightful history would be buried in the dark, and the world deprived both of the pleasure and the profit of it.

The writer says he was particularly acquainted with this lady's first husband, the brewer, and with his father, and also with his bad circumstances; and knows that first part of the story to be truth.

This may, he hopes, be a pledge for the credit of the rest, though the latter part of her history lay abroad, and could not be so well vouched as the first; yet, as she has told it herself, we have the less reason to question the truth of that part also.

In the manner she has told the story, it is evident she does not insist upon her justification in any one part of it; much less does she recommend her conduct, or, indeed, any part of it, except her repentance, to our imitation. On the contrary, she makes frequent excursions, in a just censuring and condemning her own practice. How often does she reproach herself in the most passionate manner, and guide us to make just reflections in the like cases !

It is true she met with unexpected success in all her wicked courses ; but even in the highest elevations of her prosperity, she makes frequent acknowledgments, that the pleasure of her wickedness was not worth the repentance ; and that all the satisfaction she had, all the joy in the view of her prosperity, no, nor all the wealth she revelled in, the gaiety of her appearance, the equipages and the honours she was attended with, could quiet her mind, abate the reproaches of her conscience, or procure her an hour's sleep, when just reflection kept her waking.

The noble inferences that are drawn from this one part are worth all the rest of the story, and abundantly justify, as they are the professed design of, the publication.

If there are any parts in her story, which, being obliged to relate a wicked action, seem to describe it too plainly, the writer says, all imaginable care has been taken to keep clear of indecencies and immodest expressions ; and it is hoped you will find nothing to prompt a vicious mind, but everywhere much to discourage and expose it.

Scenes of crime can scarce be represented in such a manner but some may make a criminal use of them ; but when vice is painted in its low-prized colours, it is not to make people in love with it, but to expose it ; and if the reader makes a wrong use of the figures, the wickedness is his own.

In the meantime, the advantages of the present work are so great, and the virtuous reader has room for so much improvement, that we make no question the story, however meanly told, will find a passage to his best hours, and be read both with profit and delight.

ROXANA;

OR,

THE FORTUNATE MISTRESS.

I WAS born, as my friends told me, at the city of Poitiers, in the province or county of Poitou, in France, from whence I was brought to England by my parents, who fled for their religion about the year 1683, when the Protestants were banished from France by the cruelty of their persecutors.

I, who knew little or nothing of what I was brought over hither for, was well enough pleased with being here. London, a large and gay city, took with me mighty well, who, from my being a child, loved a crowd, and to see a great many fine folks.

I retained nothing of France but the language, my father and mother being people of better fashion than ordinarily the people called refugees at that time were; and having fled early, while it was easy to secure their effects, had, before their coming over, remitted considerable sums of money, or, as I remember, a considerable value in French brandy, paper, and other goods; and these selling very much to advantage here, my father was in very good circumstances at his coming over, so that he was far from applying to the rest of our nation that were here for countenance and relief. On the contrary, he had his door continually thronged with miserable objects of the poor starving creatures who at that time fled hither for shelter on account of conscience or something else.

I have, indeed, heard my father say, that he was pestered with a great many of those who, for any religion they had, might even have stayed where they were, but who flocked over hither in droves, for what they call, in English, a livelihood; hearing with what open arms the refugees were received in England, and how they fell readily into business, being, by the charitable assistance of the people of London, encouraged to work in their manufactories in Spittal-fields, Canterbury, and other places; and that they had a much better price for their work than in France and the like.

My father, I say, told me that he was more pestered with the clamours of these people than of those who were truly refugees, and fled in distress merely for conscience.

I was about ten years old when I was brought over hither, where, as I have said, my father lived in very good circumstances, and died in about eleven years more; in which time as I had accomplished myself for the sociable part of the world, so I had acquainted myself with some of our English neighbours, as is the custom in London; and as, while I was young, I had picked up three or four play-fellows and companions, suitable to my years; so, as we grew bigger, we learnt to call one another intimates and friends; and this forwarded very much the finishing me for conversation and the world.

I went to English schools, and being young, I learnt the English tongue perfectly well, with all the customs of the English young women; so that I retained nothing of the French but the speech; nor did I so much as keep any remains of the French language tagged to my way of speaking, as most foreigners do, but spoke what we call natural English, as if I had been born here.

Being to give my own character, I must be excused to give it as impartially as possible, and as if I was speaking of another body; and the sequel will lead you to judge whether I flatter myself or no.

I was (speaking of myself at about 14 years of age) tall and very well made; sharp as a hawk in matters of common knowledge; quick and smart in discourse; apt to be satirical; full of repartee, and a little too forward in conversation; or, as we call it in English, bold though perfectly modest in my behaviour. Being French born, I danced, as some say, naturally, loved it extremely, and sung well also, and so well that, as you will hear, it was afterwards some advantage to me. With all these things, I wanted neither wit, beauty, nor money. In this manner I set out into the world, having all the advantages that any young woman can desire to recommend me to others, and form a prospect of happy living to myself.

At about fifteen years of age, my father gave me, as he called it in French, 25,000 livres, that is to say, two thousand pounds portion, and married me to an eminent brewer in the city. Pardon me if I conceal his name, for though he was the fountain of my ruin, I cannot take so severe a revenge upon him.

With this thing called a husband I lived eight years in good fashion, and for some part of the time kept a coach, that is to say, a kind of mock coach; for all the week the horses were kept at work in the dray-carts, but on the Sunday I had the privilege to go abroad in my chariot, either to church or otherways, as my husband and I could agree about it, which, by the way, was not very often; but of that hereafter.

Before I proceed in the history of the married part of my life, you must allow me to give as impartial an account of my husband as I have done of myself. He was a jolly, handsome fellow as any woman need wish for a companion; tall and well made; rather a little too large, but not so as to be ungenteel; he danced well, which I think was the first thing that brought us together. He had an old father who managed the business carefully, so that he had little of that part lay on him, but now and then to appear and show himself; and he took the advantage of it, for he troubled himself very little about it, but went abroad, kept company, hunted much, and loved it exceedingly.

After I have told you that he was a handsome man and a good sportsman, I have indeed said all; and unhappy was I, like other young people of our sex, I chose him for being a handsome jolly fellow as I have said; for he was otherwise a weak, empty-headed, untaught creature, as any woman could ever desire to be coupled with. And here I must take the liberty, whatever I have to reproach myself with in my after conduct, to turn to my fellow-creatures, the young ladies of this country, and speak to them by way of precaution. If you have any regard to your future happiness—any view of living comfortably with a husband—any hope of preserving your fortunes, or restoring them after any disaster, never, ladies, marry a fool; any husband rather than a fool; with some other husbands you may be unhappy, but with a fool you will be miserable. With another husband you may, I say, be unhappy, but with a fool you must; nay, if he would, he cannot make you easy; every thing he does is so awkward, everything he says is so empty, a woman of any sense cannot but be surfeited and sick of him twenty times a day. What is more shocking than for a woman to bring a handsome, comely fellow of a husband in company, and then be obliged to blush for him every time she hears him speak? To hear other gentlemen talk sense, and he able to say nothing? And so look like a fool, or which is worse, hear him talk nonsense, and be laughed at for a fool?

In the next place, there are so many sorts of fools, such an infinite variety of fools, and so hard it is to know the worst of the kind, that I am obliged to say, no fool, ladies, at all, no kind of fool, whether a mad fool or a sober fool, a wise fool or a silly fool; take anything but a fool, nay, be anything, be even an old maid, the worst of nature's curses, rather than take up with a fool.

But to leave this awhile, for I shall have occasion to speak of it again; my case was particularly hard, for I had a variety of foolish things complicated in this unhappy match.

First, and which I confess is very insufferable, he was a conceited fool, tout opiniate, everything he said was right, was best, and was to the purpose, whoever was in company, and whatever was advanced by others, though with the greatest modesty imaginable; and yet when he came to defend what he had said by argument and reason, he would do it so weakly, so emptily, and so nothing to the purpose, that it was enough to make anybody that heard him sick and ashamed of him.

Secondly, he was positive and obstinate, and the most positive in the most simple and inconsistent things, such as were intolerable to bear.

These two articles, if there had been no more, qualified him to be a most unbearable creature for a husband; and so it may be supposed, at first sight, what a kind of life I led with him. However, I did as well as I could, and held my tongue, which was the only victory I gained over him; for when he would talk after his own empty rattling way with me, and I would not answer, or enter into discourse with him on the point he was upon, he would rise up in the greatest passion imaginable, and go away, which was the cheapest way I had to be delivered.

I could enlarge here much upon the method I took to make my life passable and easy with the most incorrigible temper in the world; but it is too long, and the articles too trifling: I shall mention some of them as the circumstances I am to relate shall necessarily bring them in.

After I had been married about four years, my own father died, my mother having been dead before. He liked my match so ill, and saw so little room to be satisfied with the conduct of my husband, that though he left me 5,000 livres, and more, at his death, yet he left it in the hands of my elder brother, who, running on too rashly in his adventures as a merchant, failed, and lost not only what he had, but what he had for me too, as you shall hear presently.

Thus I lost the last gift of my father's bounty by having a husband not fit to be trusted with it: there is one of the benefits of marrying a fool.

Within two years after my own father's death my husband's father also died, and, as I thought, left him a considerable addition to his estate, the whole trade of the brewhouse, which was a very good one, being now his own.

But this addition to his stock was his ruin, for he had no genius for his business; he had no knowledge of his accounts; he bustled a little about, indeed, at first, and put on a face of business, but he soon grew slack; it was below him to inspect his books, he committed all that to his clerks and book-keepers; and while he found money in cash to pay his malt-man and the excise, and put some in his pocket, he was perfectly easy and indolent, let the main chance go how it would.

I foresaw the consequence of this, and attempted several times to persuade him to apply himself to his business; I put him in mind how his customers complained of the neglect of his servants on one hand, and how abundance broke in his debt, on the other hand, for want of the clerk's care to secure him, and the like; but he thrust me by, either with hard words or fraudulently, with representing the cases otherwise than they were.

However, to cut short a dull story, which ought not to be long, he began to find his trade sink, his stock declined, and that, in short, he could not carry on his business, and once or twice his brewing utensils were extorted for the excise; and the last time he was put to great extremities to clear them.

This alarmed him, and he resolved to lay down his trade; which, indeed, I was not sorry for; foreseeing that if he did not lay it down in time, he would be forced to do it in another way, namely, as a bankrupt. Also I was willing he should draw out while he had something left, lest I should come to be stripped at home, and be turned out of doors with my children; for I had now five children by him, the only work (perhaps) that fools are good for.

I thought myself happy when he got another man to take his brewhouse clear off his hands; for paying down a large sum of money, my husband found himself a clear man, all his debts paid, and with between two and three thousand pounds in his pocket; and being now obliged to remove from the brewhouse, we took a house at ———, a village about two miles out of town; and happy I thought myself, all things considered, that I was got off clear, upon so good terms; and had my handsome fellow had but one cap full of wit, I had been still well enough.

I proposed to him either to buy some place with the money, or with part of it, and offered to join my part to it, which was then in being, and might have been secured; so we might have lived tolerably, at least, during his life. But as it is the part of a fool to be void of counsel, so he neglected it, lived on as he did before, kept his horses and men, rode every day out to the forest a hunting, and nothing was done all this while; but the money decreased apace, and I thought I saw my ruin hastening on, without any possible way to prevent it.

I was not wanting with all that persuasions and entreaties could perform, but it was all fruitless; representing to him how fast our money wasted, and what would be our condition when it was gone, made no impression on him; but like one stupid, he went on, not valuing all that tears and lamentations could be supposed to do; nor did he abate his figure or equipage, his horses or servants, even to the last, till he had not a hundred pounds left in the whole world.

It was not above three years that all the ready money was thus spending off; yet he spent it, as I may say, foolishly too, for he kept no valuable company neither, but generally with huntsmen and horse-courers, and men meaner than himself, which is another consequence of a man's being a fool; such can never take delight in men more wise and capable than themselves, and that makes them converse with scoundrels, drink belch with porters, and keep company always below themselves.

This was my wretched condition, when one morning my husband told me he was sensible he should come to a miserable condition, and he would go and seek his fortune somewhere or other. He had said something to that purpose several times before that, upon my pressing him to consider his circumstances, and the circumstances of his family, before it should be too late; but as I found he had no meaning in anything of that kind, as, indeed, he had not much in anything he ever said, so I thought they were but words of course now. When he said he would be gone, I used to wish secretly, and even say in my thoughts, I wish you would, for if you go on thus, you will starve us all.

He stayed, however, at home all that day, and lay at home that night; early the next morning he gets out of bed, goes to a window which looked out towards the stables, and sounds his French horn, as he called it, which was his usual signal to call his men to go out a hunting.

It was about the latter end of August, and so was light yet at five o'clock, and it was about that time that I heard him and his two men go out and shut the yard gates after them. He said nothing to me more than as usual when he used to go out upon his sport; neither did I rise, or say anything to him that was material, but went to sleep again after he was gone, for two hours or thereabouts.

It must be a little surprising to the reader to tell him at once, that after this, I never saw my husband more; but to go farther, I not only never saw him more, but I never heard from him, or of him, neither of any or either of his two servants, or of the horses, either what became of them, where or which way they went, or what they did, or intended to do, no more than if the ground had opened and swallowed them all up, and nobody had known it, except as hereafter.

I was not, for the first night or two, at all surprised, no, nor very much the first week or two, believing that if anything evil had befallen them, I should soon enough have heard of that; and also knowing, that as he had two servants and three horses with him, it would be the strangest thing in the world that anything could befall them all but that I must some time or other hear of them.

But you will easily allow, that as time ran on, a week, two weeks, a month, two months, and so on, I was dreadfully frightened at last, and the more when I looked into my own circumstances, and considered the condition in which I was left, with five children, and not one farthing subsistence for them, other than about seventy pounds in money, and what few things of value I had about me, which, though considerable in themselves, were yet nothing to feed a family, and for a length of time too.

What to do I knew not, nor to whom to have recourse; to keep in the house where I was I could not, the rent being too great; and to leave it without his order, if my husband should return, I could not think of that neither; so that I continued extremely perplexed, melancholy, and discouraged, to the last degree.

I remained in this dejected condition near a twelvemonth. My husband had two sisters, who were married, and lived very well, and some other near relations that I knew of, and I hoped would do something for me; and I frequently sent to these, to know if they could give me any account of my vagrant creature; but they all declared to me in answer, that they knew nothing about him; and after frequent sending, began to think me troublesome, and to let me know they thought so too, by their treating my maid with very slight and unhandsome returns to her inquiries.

This grated hard, and added to my affliction, but I had no recourse but to my tears, for I had not a friend of my own left me in the world. I should have observed, that it was about half a year before this elopement of my husband, that the disaster I mentioned above befel my brother, who broke, and that in such bad circumstances, that I had the mortification to hear, not only that he was in prison, but that there would be little or nothing to be had by way of composition.

Misfortunes seldom come alone: this was the forerunner of my husband's flight; and as my expectations were cut off on that side, my husband gone, and my family of children on my hands, and nothing to subsist them, my condition was the most deplorable that words can express.

I had some plate and some jewels, as might be supposed, my fortune and former circumstances considered; and my husband, who had never stayed to be distressed, had not been put to the necessity of rifling me, as husbands usually do in such cases. But, as I had seen an end of all the ready money during the long time I had lived in a state of expectation for my husband, so I began to make away one thing after another, till those few things of value which I had began to lessen apace, and I saw nothing but misery and the utmost distress before me, even to have my children starve before my face. I leave any one that is a mother of children, and has lived in plenty and good fashion, to consider and reflect what must be my condition. As to my husband, I had now no hope or expectation of seeing him any more; and indeed, if I had, he was the man, of all the men in the world, the least able to help me, or to have turned his hand to the gaining one shilling towards lessening our distress: he neither had the capacity nor the inclination; he could have been no clerk, for he scarce wrote a legible hand; he was so far from being able to write sense, that he could not make sense of what others wrote; he was so far from understanding good English that he could not spell good English; to be out of all business was his delight, and he would stand leaning against a post for half an hour together, with a pipe in his mouth, with all the tranquillity in the world, smoking, like Dryden's countryman, who whistled as he went for want of thought, and this even when his family was, as it were, starving, that little he had wasting, and that we were all bleeding to death; he not knowing, and as little considering, where to get another shilling when the last was spent.

This being his temper and the extent of his capacity, I confess I did not see so much loss in his parting with me as at first I thought I did, though it was hard and cruel to the last degree in him not giving me the least notice of his design, and indeed that which I was most astonished at was, that seeing he must certainly have intended this excursion some few moments at least before he put it in practice, yet he did not come and take what little stock of money we had left, or at least a share of it, to bear his expenses for a little while, but he did not; and I am morally certain he had not five guineas with him in the world when he went away. All that I could come to the knowledge of about him was, that he left his hunting horn, which he called the French horn, in the stable, and his hunting saddle, went away in a handsome furniture, as they call it, which he used sometimes to travel with, having an embroidered housing, a case of pistols, and other things belonging to them; and one of his servants had another saddle with pistols, though plain, and the other a long gun, so that they did not go out as sportsmen, but rather as travellers; what part of the world they went to I never heard for many years.

As I have said, I sent to his relations, but they sent me short and surly answers; nor did any one of them offer to come to see me, or to see the children, or so much as to inquire after them, well perceiving that I was in a condition that was likely to be soon troublesome to them; but it was no time now to dally with them, or with the world; I left off sending to them, and went myself among them, laid my circumstances open to them, told them my whole case, and the condition I was reduced to, begged they would advise me what course to take, laid myself as low as they could desire, and entreated them to consider that, I was not in a condition to help myself, and that without some assistance we must all inevitably perish; I told them, that if I had but one child, or two children, I would have done my endeavour to have worked for them with my needle, and should only have come to them to beg them to help me to some work, that I might get our bread by my labour; but to think of one single woman, not bred to work, and at a loss where to get employment, to get the bread of five children, that was not possible, some of my children being too young too, and none of them big enough to help one another.

It was all one; I received not one farthing of assistance from anybody, was hardly asked to sit down at the two sisters' houses, nor offered to eat or drink at two more near relations. The fifth, an ancient gentlewoman, aunt-in-law to my husband, a widow, and the least able also of any of the rest, did, indeed, ask me to sit down, gave me a dinner, and refreshed me with a kinder treatment than any of the rest, but added the melancholy part, viz. that she would have helped me, but that, indeed, she was not able, which, however, I was satisfied was very true.

Here I relieved myself with the constant assistant of the afflicted, I mean tears, for, relating to her how I was received by the other of my husband's relations, it made me burst into tears, and I cried vehemently for a great while together, till I made the good old gentlewoman cry too several times.

However, I came home from them all without any relief, and went on at home till I was reduced to such inexpressible distress that is not to be described. I had been several times after this at the old aunt's, for I prevailed with her to promise me to go and talk with the other relations, at least, that, if possible, she could bring some of them to take off the children, or to contribute something towards their maintenance; and, to do her justice, she did use her endeavour with them, but all was to no purpose, they would do nothing, at least that way. I think, with much entreaty, she obtained, by a kind of collection among them all, about eleven or twelve shillings in money, which, though it was a present comfort, was yet not to be named as capable to deliver me from any part of the load that lay upon me.

There was a poor woman that had been a kind of a dependent upon our family, and whom I had often, among the rest of the relations, been very kind to ; my maid put it into my head one morning to send to this poor woman, and to see whether she might not be able to help in this dreadful case.

I must remember it here, to the praise of this poor girl, my maid, that though I was not able to give her any wages, and had told her so, nay, I was not able to give her the wages that I was in arrears to her, yet she would not leave me ; nay, and as long as she had any money, when I had none, she would help me out of her own, for which, though I acknowledged her kindness and fidelity, yet it was but a bad coin that she was paid in at last, as will appear in its place.

Amy (for that was her name) put it into my thoughts to send for this poor woman to come to me, for I was now in great distress, and I resolved to do so ; but just the very morning that I intended it, the old aunt, with the poor woman in her company, came to see me ; the good old gentlewoman was, it seems, heartily concerned for me, and had been talking again among those people, to see what she could do for me, but to very little purpose.

You shall judge a little of my present distress by the posture she found me in : I had five little children, the eldest was under ten years old, and I had not one shilling in the house to buy them victuals, but had sent Amy out with a silver spoon to sell it, and bring home something from the butcher's ; and I was in a parlour, sitting on the ground, with a great heap of old rags, linen, and other things about me, looking them over, to see if I had anything among them that would sell or pawn for a little money, and had been crying ready to burst myself, to think what I should do next.

At this juncture they knocked at the door ; I thought it had been Amy, so I did not rise up, but one of the children opened the door, and they came directly into the room where I was, and where they found me in that posture, and crying vehemently, as above. I was surprised at their coming, you may be sure, especially seeing the person I had but just before resolved to send for ; but when they saw me, how I looked, for my eyes were swelled with crying, and what a condition I was in as to the house, and the heaps of things that were about me, and especially when I told them what I was doing, and on what occasion, they sat down, like Job's three comforters, and said not one word to me for a great while, but both of them cried as fast and as heartily as I did.

The truth was, there was no need of much discourse in the case, the thing spoke itself, they saw me in rags and dirt, who was but a little before riding in my coach ; thin, and looking almost like one starved, who was before fat and beautiful. The house that was before handsomely furnished with pictures and ornaments, cabinets, pierglasses, and every thing suitable, was now stripped and naked, most of the goods having been seized by the landlord for rent, or sold to buy necessities ; in a word, all was misery and distress, the face of ruin was everywhere to be seen ; we had eaten up almost every thing, and little remained, unless, like one of the pitiful women of Jerusalem, I should eat up my very children themselves.

After these two good creatures had sat, as I say, in silence some time, and had then looked about them, my maid Amy came in, and brought with her a small breast of mutton and two great bunches of turnips, which she intended to stew for our dinner. As for me, my heart was so overwhelmed at seeing these two friends, for such they were, though poor, and at their seeing me in such a condition, that I fell into another violent fit of crying, so that in short I could not speak to them for a great while longer.

During my being in such an agony, they went to my maid Amy at another part of the same room, and talked with her. Amy told them all my circumstances, and set them forth in such moving terms, and so to the life, that I could not upon any terms have done it like her myself, and, in a word, affected them both with it in such a manner, that the old aunt came to me, and though hardly able to speak for tears, "Look ye, cousin," said she, "in a few words, things must not stand thus, some course must be taken, and that forthwith ; pray where were these children born ?" I told her the parish where we lived before ; that four of them were born there, and one in the house where I now was, where the landlord, after having seized my goods for the rent past, not then knowing my circumstances, had now given me leave to live for a whole year more without any rent, being moved with compassion, but that this year was now almost expired.

Upon hearing this account, they came to this resolution, that the children should be all carried by them to the door of one of the relations mentioned above, and be set down there by the maid Amy, and that I, the mother, should remove for some days, shut up the doors, and be gone ; that the people should be told, that if they did not think fit to take some care of the children, they might send for the church-wardens, if they thought that better, for that they were born in that parish, and there they must be provided for ; as for the other child, which was born in the parish of —, that was already taken care of by the parish officers there, for indeed they were so sensible of the distress of the family, that they had at first word done what was their part to do.

This was what these good women proposed, and bade me leave the rest to them. I was at first sadly afflicted at the thoughts of parting with my children, and especially at that terrible thing, their being taken into the parish keeping ; and then a hundred terrible things came into my thoughts, viz. of parish children being starved at nurse ; of their being ruined, let grow crooked, lamed, and the like, for want of being taken care of, and this sunk my very heart within me.

But the misery of my own circumstances hardened my heart against my own flesh and blood ; and when I considered they must inevitably be starved, and I too, if I continued to keep them about me, I began to be reconciled to parting with them all, any how, and anywhere, that I might be freed from the dreadful necessity of seeing them all perish, and perishing with them myself ; so I agreed to go away out of the house, and leave the management of the whole matter to my maid Amy and to them, and accordingly I did so ; and the same afternoon they carried them all away to one of their aunts.

Amy, a resolute girl, knocked at the door, with the children all with her, and bade the eldest, as soon as the door was open, run in, and the rest after her. She set them all down at the door before she knocked, and when she knocked, she stayed till a maid servant came to the door; "Sweetheart," said she, "pray go in and tell your mistress here are her little cousins come to see her from —," naming the town where we lived, at which the maid offered to go back. "Here, child," said Amy, "take one of them in your hand, and I'll bring the rest;" so she gives her the least, and the wench goes in mighty innocently, with the little one in her hand, upon which Amy turns the rest in after her, shuts the door softly, and marches off as fast as she could.

Just in the interval of this, and even while the maid and her mistress were quarrelling—for the mistress raved and scolded at her like a mad woman, and had ordered her to go and stop the maid Amy, and turn all the children out of the doors again; but she had been at the door, and Amy was gone, and the wench was out of her wits, and the mistress too.—I say just at this juncture came the poor old woman, not the aunt, but the other of the two that had been with me, and knocks at the door; the aunt did not go, because she had pretended to advocate for me, and they would have suspected her of some contrivance; but as for the other woman, they did not so much as know that she had kept up any correspondence with me.

Amy and she had concerted this between them, and it was well enough contrived that they did so. When she came into the house, the mistress was fuming and raging like one distracted, and calling the maid all the foolish jades and sluts that she could think of, and that she would take the children and turn them all out into the streets. The good poor woman, seeing her in such a passion, turned about if she would be gone again, and said, "Madam, I'll come again another time, I see you are engaged." No, no, Mrs —, says the mistress, "I am not much engaged, sit down; this senseless creature here has brought in my fool of a brother's whole house of children upon me, and tells me, that a wench brought them to the door, and thrust them in, and bade her carry them to me; but it shall be no disturbance to me, for I have ordered them to be set in the street without the door, and so let the churchwardens take care of them, or else make this dull jade carry them back to — again, and let her that brought them into the world look after them if she will; what does she send her brats to me for?"

"The last indeed had been the best of the two," says the poor woman, "if it had been to be done, and that brings me to tell you my errand, and the occasion of my coming, for I came on purpose about this very business, and to have prevented this being put upon you, if I could, but I see I am come too late."

"How do you mean too late?" says the mistress; "what! have you been concerned in this affair then? what! have you helped to bring this family slur upon us?"—"I hope you do not think such a thing of me, madam," says the poor woman. "but I went this morning to — to see my old mistress and benefactor, for she had been very kind to me, and when I came to the door, I found all fast locked and bolted, and the house looking as if nobody was at home.

"I knocked at the door, but nobody came, till at last some of the neighbour's servants called to me, and said, 'There is nobody lives there, mistress; what do you knock for?' I seemed surprised at that, 'What! nobody live there!' said I; what do ye mean? does not Mrs — live there?' The answer was, 'No, she is gone;' at which I parleyed with one of them, and asked her what was the matter. 'Matter!' says she, 'why, it is matter enough: the poor gentlewoman has lived there all alone, and without anything to subsist her a long time, and this morning the landlord turned her out of doors.'

"'Out of doors!' says I; 'what! with all her children? poor lambs, what is become of them?' 'Why, truly, nothing worse,' said they, 'can come to them than staying here, for they were almost starved with hunger; so the neighbours, seeing the poor lady in such distress, for she stood crying and wringing her hands over her children like one distracted, sent for the churchwardens to take care of the children; and they, when they came, took the youngest, which was born in this parish, and have got it a very good nurse, and taken care of it; but as for the other four, they had them sent away to some of their father's relations, who were very substantial people, and who, besides that, lived in the parish where they were born.'

"I was not so surprised at this as not presently to foresee that this trouble would be brought upon you, or upon Mr —; so I came immediately to bring you word of it, that you might be prepared for it, and might not be surprised, but I see they have been too nimble for me, so that I know not what to advise. The poor woman, it seems, is turned out of doors into the street; and another of the neighbours there told me, that when they took her children from her, she swooned away, and when they recovered her out of that, she ran distracted, and is put into a mad-house by the parish, for there is nobody else to take care of her."

This was all acted to the life by this good, kind, poor creature; for though her design was perfectly good and charitable, yet there was not one word of it true in fact: for I was not turned out of doors by my landlord, nor gone distracted. It was true, indeed, that at parting with my poor children I fainted, and was like one mad when I came to myself and found they were gone; but I remained in the house a good while after that, as you shall hear.

While the poor woman was telling this dismal story, in came the gentlewoman's husband, and though her heart was hardened against all pity, who was really and nearly related to the children, for they were the children of her own brother, yet the good man was quite softened with the dismal relation of the circumstances of the family; and when the poor woman had done, he said to his wife, "This is a dismal case, my dear, indeed, and something must be done." His wife fell a-raving at him: "What," says she, "do you want to have four children to keep? Have we not children of our own? Would you have these brats come and eat up my children's bread? No, no, let them go to the parish, and let them take care of them; I'll take care of my own."

"Come, come, my dear," says the husband, "charity is a duty to the poor, and 'he that gives to the poor lends to the Lord;' let us lend our heavenly Father a little of our children's bread, as you call it; it will be a store well laid up for them, and will be the best security that our children shall never come to want charity, or be turned out of doors, as these poor innocent creatures are."—"Don't tell me of security," says the wife, "'tis a good security for our children to keep what we have together, and provide for them, and then 'tis time enough to help to keep other people's children. Charity begins at home."

"Well, my dear," says he again, "I only talk of putting out a little money to interest. Our Maker is a good borrower. Never fear making a bad debt there, child; I'll be bound for it."

"Don't banter me with your charity, and your allegories," says the wife angrily; "I tell you they are my relations, not yours, and they shall not roost here; they shall go to the parish."

"All your relations are my relations now," says the good gentleman very calmly, "and I won't see your relations in distress, and not pity them, any more than I would my own; indeed, my dear, they shan't go to the parish. I assure you, none of my wife's relations shall come to the parish, if I can help it."

"What! will you take four children to keep?" says the wife.

"No, no, my dear," says he, "there's your sister —, I'll go and talk with her; and your uncle —, I'll send for him and the rest. I'll warrant you, when you are all together we will find ways and means to keep four poor little creatures from beggary and starving, or else it would be very hard; we are none of us in so bad circumstances but we are able to spare a mite for the fatherless. Don't shut up your bowels of compassion against your own flesh and blood. Could you hear these poor innocent children cry at your door for hunger, and give them no bread?"

"Prithee, what need they cry at our door?" says she; "'tis the business of the parish to provide for them; they shan't cry at our door. If they do, I'll give them nothing."—"Won't you?" says he; "but I will. Remember that Scripture is directly against us, Prov. xxi, 13, 'Whoso stoppeth his ears at the cry of the poor, he also shall cry himself, but shall not be heard.'"

"Well, we," says she, "you must do what you will, because you pretend to be master; but if I had my will, I would send them where they ought to be sent. I would send them from whence they came."

Then the poor woman put in, and said, "But, madam, that is sending them to starve, indeed, for the parish has no obligation to take care of them, and so they will lie and perish in the street."

"Or be sent back again," says the husband, "to our parish in a cripple-cart, by a justice's warrant, and so expose us and our relations to the last degree among our neighbours, and among those who knew the good old gentleman their grandfather, who lived and flourished in this parish so many years, and was so well beloved among all people, and deserved it so well."

"I don't value that one farthing, not I," says the wife; "I'll keep none of them."

"Well, my dear," says her husband, "but I value it, for I won't have such a blot lie upon the family, and upon your children; he was a worthy, ancient, and good man, and his name is respected among all his neighbours; it will be a reproach to you, that are his daughter, and to our children, who are his grand-children, that we should let your brother's children perish, or come to be a charge to the public, in the very place where your family once flourished. Come, say no more: I will see what can be done."

Upon this he sent and gathered all the relations together at a tavern hard by, and likewise sent for the four little children, that they might see them; and they all, at first word, agreed to have them taken care of; and, because his wife was so furious, that she would not suffer one of them to be kept at home, they agreed to keep them all together for awhile; accordingly they committed them to the poor woman that had managed the affair for them, and entered into obligations to one another to supply the needful sums for their maintenance; and not to have one separated from the rest, they sent for the youngest from the parish where it was taken in, and had them all brought up together.

It would take up too long a part of this story to give a particular account with what a charitable tenderness this good person, who was but an uncle-in-law to them, managed that affair; how careful he was of them; went constantly to see them, and to see that they were well provided for, clothed, put to school, and at last put out in the world for their advantage; but 'tis enough to say he acted more like a father to them than an uncle-in-law, though all along much against his wife's consent, who was of a disposition not so tender and compassionate as her husband.

You may believe I heard this with the same pleasure which I now feel at the relating it again; for I was terribly affrighted at the apprehensions of my children being brought to misery and distress, as those must be who have no friends, but are left to parish benevolence.

I was now, however, entering on a new scene of life. I had a great house upon my hands, and some furniture left in it, but I was no more able to maintain myself and my maid Amy in it than I was my five children; nor had I anything to subsist with but what I might get by working, and that was not a town where much work was to be had.

My landlord had been very kind indeed, after he came to know my circumstances, though, before he was acquainted with that part, he had gone so far as to seize my goods, and to carry some of them off too.

But I had lived three quarters of a year in his house after that, and had paid him no rent, and which was worse, I was in no condition to pay him any. However, I observed he came oftener to see me, looked kinder upon me, and spoke more friendly to me than he used to do; particularly the last two or three times he had been there, he observed, he said, how poorly I lived, how low I was reduced, and the like; told me it grieved him for my sake; and the last time of all he was kinder still, told me he came to dine with me, and that I should give him leave to treat me: so he called my maid Amy, and sent her out to buy a joint of meat; he told her what she should buy; but naming two or three things, either of which she might take, the maid, a cunning wench, and faithful to me as the skin to my back, did not buy anything outright, but brought the butcher along with her, with both the things that she had chosen, for him to please himself. The one was a large, very good loin of veal; the other a piece of the fore-ribs of roasting beef. He looked at them, but bade me chaffer with the butcher for him, and I did so, and told him what the butcher had demanded for either of them, and what each of them came to. So he pulls out eleven shillings and threepence, which they came to together, and bade me take them both; the rest, he said, would serve another time.

I was surprised, you may be sure, at the bounty of a man that had but a little while ago been my terror, and had torn the goods out of my house like a fury: but I considered that my distresses had mollified his temper, and that he had afterwards been so compassionate as to give me leave to live rent-free in the house a whole year.

But now he put on the face, not of a man of compassson only, but of a man of friendship and kindness, and this was so unexpected that it was surprising. We chatted together, and were, as I may call it, cheerful, which was more than I could say I had been for three years before; he sent for wine and beer too, for I had none; poor Amy and I had drank nothing but water for many weeks, and, indeed, I have often wondered at the faithful temper of the poor girl, for which I but ill requited her at last.

When Amy was come with the wine, he made her fill a glass to him, and with the glass in his hand, he came to me and kissed me, which I was, I confess, a little surprised at, but more at what followed; for he told me, that as the sad condition which I was reduced to had made him pity me, so my conduct in it, and the courage I bore it with, had given him a more than ordinary respect for me, and made him very thoughtful for my good; that he was resolved for the present to do something to relieve me, and to employ his thoughts in the meantime to see if he could, for the future, put me in a way to support myself.

While he found me change colour, and look surprised at his discourse, for I did to be sure, he turns to my maid Amy, and looking at her, he says to me, "I say all this, madam, before your maid, because both she and you shall know that I have no ill design, and that I have, in mere kindness, resolved to do something for you, if I can: and as I have been a witness of the uncommon honesty and fidelity of Mrs Amy here to you in all your distresses, I know she may be trusted with so honest a design as mine is; for I assure you, I bear a proportioned regard to your maid too, for her affection to you."

Amy made him a courtesy, and the poor girl looked so confounded with joy, that she could not speak, but her colour came and went, and every now and then she blushed as red as scarlet, and the next minute looked as pale as death.

Well, having said this, he sat down, made me sit down, and then drank to me, and made me drink two glasses of wine together; "For," says he, "you have need of it;" and so indeed I had. When he had done so, "Come, Amy," says he, "with your mistress's leave, you shall have a glass too." So he made her drink two glasses also; and then rising up, "And now, Amy," says he, "go and get dinner; and you, madam," says he to me, "go up and dress you, and come down and smile and be merry;" adding, "I'll make you easy, if I can," and in the meantime, he said, he would walk in the garden.

When he was gone, Amy changed her countenance, indeed, and looked as merry as ever she did in her life. "Dear madam," says she, "what does this gentleman mean?" "Nay, Amy," said I, "he means to do us good, you see, don't he? I know no other meaning he can have, for he can get nothing by me." "I warrant you, madam," says she, "he'll ask of you a favour, by and by." "No, no, you are mistaken, Amy, I dare say," said I; "you have heard what he said—didn't you?" "Ay," says Amy, "it's no matter for that, you shall see what he will do after dinner." "Well, well, Amy," says I, "you have hard thoughts of him; I cannot be of your opinion. I don't see anything in him yet that looks like it." "As to that, madam," says Amy, "I don't see anything of it yet neither; but what should move a gentleman to take pity of us, as he does?" "Nay," says I, "that's a hard thing too, that we should judge a man to be wicked because he's charitable; and vicious because he's kind." "O madam," says Amy, "there's abundance of charity begins in that vice; and he is not so unacquainted with things as not to know that poverty is the strongest incentive; a temptation against which no virtue is powerful enough to stand out; he knows your condition as well as you do." "Well, and what then?" "Why then he knows too that you are young and handsome, and he has the surest bait in the world to take you with."

"Well, Amy," said I, "but he may find himself mistaken, too, in such a thing as that." "Why, madam," says Amy, "I hope you won't deny him if he should offer it."

"What d'ye mean by that, hussy?" said I; "no, I'd starve first."

"I hope not, madam, I hope you will be wiser; I'm sure if he will set you up, as he talks of, you ought to deny him nothing; and you will starve if you do not consent, that's certain."

"What, consent to lie with him for bread?—Amy," said I, "how can you talk so!"

"Nay, madam," says Amy, "I don't think you would for anything else; it would not be lawful for anything else; but for bread, madam—why nobody can starve—there's no bearing that, I'm sure."

"Ay," says I, "but if he would give me an estate to live on, he should not lie with me, I assure you."

"Why, look you, madam; if he would but give you enough to live easy upon, he should lie with me for it with all my heart."

"That's a token, Amy, of inimitable kindness to me," said I, "and I know how to value it: but there's more friendship than honesty in it, Amy."

"O madam," says Amy, "I'd do anything to get you out of this sad condition; as to honesty, I think honesty is out of the question when starving is the case—are not we almost starved to death?"

"I am indeed," said I, "and thou art for my sake; but to be a whore, Amy!—" and there I stopped.

"Dear madam," says Amy, "if I will starve for your sake, I will be a whore, or anything, for your sake—why, I would die for you, if I were put to it."

"Why, that's an excess of affection, Amy," said I, "I never met with before; I wish I may be ever in a condition to make you some returns suitable. But however, Amy, you shall not be a whore to him, to oblige him to be kind to me;—no, Amy, nor I won't be a whore to him, if he would give me much more than he is able to give me, or do for me."

"Why, madam," says Amy, "I don't say I will go and ask him; but I say, if he should promise to do so and so for you, and the condition was such that he would not serve you unless I would let him lie with me, he should lie with me as often as he would rather than you should not have his assistance. But this is but talk, madam; I don't see any need of such discourse, and you are of opinion that there will be no need of it."

"Indeed so I am, Amy; but," said I, "if there were, I tell you again, I'd die before I would consent, or before you should consent for my sake."

Hitherto I had not only preserved the virtue itself, but the virtuous inclination and resolution; and had I kept myself there, I had been happy, though I had perished of mere hunger; for without question, a woman ought rather to die than to prostitute her virtue and honour, let the temptation be what it will.

But to return to my story: he walked about the garden, which was, indeed, all in disorder, and overrun with weeds, because I had not been able to hire a gardener to do anything to it, no not so much as to dig up ground enough to sow a few turnips and carrots for family use. After he had viewed it, he came in, and sent Amy to fetch a poor man, a gardener, that used to help our man-servant, and carried him into the garden, and ordered him to do several things in it, to put it into a little order; and this took him up near an hour.

By this time I had dressed me as well as I could, for though I had good linen left still, yet I had but a poor head-dress, and no knots, but old fragments; no necklace, no ear-rings; all those things were gone long ago for mere bread.

However, I was tight and clean, and in better plight than he had seen me in a great while, and he looked extremely pleased to see me so; for he said I looked so disconsolate and so afflicted before, that it grieved him to see me; and he bid me pluck up a good heart, for he hoped to put me in a condition to live in the world, and be beholden to nobody.

I told him that was impossible, for I must be beholden to him or it, for all the friends I had in the world would not or could not do so much for me as that he spoke of. "Well, widow," says he, so he called me, and so indeed I was, in the worst sense that desolate word could be used in, "if you are beholden to me, you shall be beholden to nobody else."

By this time dinner was ready, and Amy came in to lay the cloth, and indeed it was happy there was none to dine but he and I, for I had but six plates left in the house, and but two dishes; however, he knew how things were, and bid me make no scruple about bringing out what I had. He hoped to see me in a better plight. He did not come, he said, to be entertained, but to entertain me, and comfort and encourage me. Thus he went on, speaking so cheerfully to me, and such cheerful things, that it was a cordial to my very soul to hear him speak.

Well, we went to dinner: I am sure I had not eaten a good meal hardly in a twelvemonth, at least—not of such a joint of meat as the loin of veal was. I ate, indeed, very heartily, and so did he, and made me drink three or four glasses of wine. In short, my spirits were lifted up to a degree I had not been used to, and I was not only cheerful but merry, and so he pressed me to be.

I told him I had a great deal of reason to be merry, seeing he had been so kind to me, and had given me hopes of recovering me from the worst circumstances that ever woman of any sort of fortune was sunk into; that he could not believe but what he had said to me was like life from the dead; that it was like recovering one sick from the brink of the grave; how I should ever make him a return in any way suitable, was what I had not yet had time to think of; I could only say that I should never forget it while I had life, and should be always ready to acknowledge it.

He said that was all he desired of me, that his utmost reward would be the satisfaction of having rescued me from misery; that he found he was obliging one that knew what gratitude meant; that he would make it his business to make me completely easy, first or last, if it lay in his power; and in the meantime, he bid me consider of anything that I thought he might do for me, for my advantage, and in order to make me perfectly easy.

After we had talked thus, he bid me be cheerful. "Come," says he, "lay aside these melancholy things, and let us be merry." Amy waited at the table, and she smiled and laughed, and was so merry she could hardly contain it, for the girl loved me to an excess hardly to be described; and it was such an unexpected thing to hear any one talk to her mistress, that the wench was beside herself almost, and as soon as dinner was over, Amy went up stairs, and put on her best clothes too, and came down dressed like a gentlewoman.

We sat together talking of a thousand things, of what had been, and what was to be, all the rest of the day, and in the evening he took his leave of me, with a thousand expressions of kindness and tenderness, and true affection to me, but offered not the least of what my maid Amy had suggested.

At his going away he took me in his arms, protesting an honest kindness to me; said a thousand kind things to me, which I cannot now recollect; and after kissing me twenty times or thereabouts, put a guinea into my hand, which he said was for my present supply, and told me that he would see me again before it was out; he also gave Amy half-a-crown.

When he was gone, "Well, Amy," said I, "are you convinced now that he is an honest as well as a true friend, and that there has been nothing, not the least appearance of anything, of what you imagined in his behaviour."—"Yes," says Amy, "I am, but I admire at it; he is such a friend as the world sure has not abundance of to show."

"I am sure," says I, "he is such a friend as I have long wanted, and as I have as much need of as any creature in the world has, or ever had;" and, in short, I was so overcome with the comfort of it, that I sat down and cried for joy a good while, as I had formerly cried for sorrow. Amy and I went to bed that night (for Amy lay with me) pretty early, but lay chatting almost all night about it, and the girl was so transported that she got up two or three times in the night and danced about the room in her shift; in short, the girl was half distracted with the joy of it; a testimony still of her violent affection for her mistress, in which no servant ever went beyond her.

We heard no more of him for two days, but the third day he came again; then he told me, with the same kindness, that he had ordered me a supply of household goods for the furnishing the house; that in particular he had sent me back all the goods that he had seized for rent, which consisted, indeed, of the best of my former furniture; "and now," says he, "I'll tell you what I have in my head for you for your present supply, and that is," says he, "that the house being well furnished, you shall let it out to lodgings for the summer gentry, by which you will easily get a good comfortable subsistence, especially seeing you shall pay me no rent for two years, nor after neither, unless you can afford it."

This was the first view I had of living comfortably indeed, and it was a very probable way, I must confess, seeing we had very good conveniences, six rooms on a floor, and three stories high. While he was laying down the scheme of my management came a cart to the door with a load of goods, and an upholsterer's man to put them up; they were chiefly the furniture of two rooms which he had carried away for his two years' rent, with two fine cabinets, and some pier glasses out of the parlour, and several other valuable things.

These were all restored to their places, and he told me he gave them me freely as a satisfaction for the cruelty he had used me with before; and the furniture of one room being furnished and set up, he told me he would furnish one chamber for himself, and would come and be one of my lodgers, if I would give him leave.

I told him he ought not to ask my leave, who had so much right to make himself welcome; so the house began to look in some tolerable figure, and clean; the garden also, in about a fortnight's time, began to look something less like a wilderness than it used to do; and he ordered me to put up a bill for letting rooms, reserving one for himself, to come to as he saw occasion.

When all was done to his mind, as to placing the goods, he seemed very well pleased, and we dined together again of his own providing; and when the upholsterer's man was gone, after dinner, took me by the hand; "Come now, madam," says he, "you must show me your house," (for he had a mind to see everything over again). "No, sir," said I, "but I'll go show you your house, if you please;" so we went up through all the rooms, and in the room which was appointed for himself, Amy was doing something; "Well, Amy," says he, "I intend to lie with you to-morrow night." "To-night, if you please, sir," says Amy, very innocently, "your room is quite ready." "Well, Amy," says he, "I am glad you are so willing." "No," says Amy, "I mean your chamber is ready to-night," and away she run out of the room ashamed enough; for the girl meant no harm, whatever she had said to me in private.

However he said no more then; but when Amy was gone he walked about the room and looked at everything, and taking me by the hand he kissed me, and spoke a great many kind affectionate things to me indeed; as of his measures for my advantage, and what he would do to raise me again in the world; told me that my afflictions, and the conduct I had shown in bearing them to such an extremity, had so engaged him to me, that he valued me infinitely above all the women in the world; that though he was under such engagements that he could not marry me (his wife and he had been parted for some reasons, which make too long a story to intermix with mine), yet that he would be everything else that a woman could ask in a husband; and with that he kissed me again and took me in his arms, but offered not the least uncivil action to me, and told me he hoped I would not deny him all the favours he should ask, because he resolved to ask nothing of me but what was fit for a woman of virtue and modesty, for such he knew me to be, to yield.

I confess the terrible pressure of my former misery, the memory of which lay heavy upon my mind, and the surprising kindness with which he had delivered me, and withal, the expectations of what he might still do for me, were powerful things, and made me have scarce the power to deny him anything he would ask; however, I told him thus, with an air of tenderness too, that he had done so much for me, that I thought I ought to deny him nothing; only I hoped and depended upon him, that he would not take the advantage of the infinite obligations I was under to him to desire anything of me, the yielding to which would lay me lower in his esteem than I desired to be; that as I took him to be a man of honour, so I knew he could not like me the better for doing anything that was below a woman of honesty and good manners to do.

He told me that he had done all this for me, without so much as telling me what kindness or real affection he had for me, that I might not be under any necessity of yielding to him in anything for want of bread; and he would no more oppress my gratitude now than he would my necessity before, nor ask anything, supposing he would stop his favours or withdraw his kindness, if he was denied; it was true, he said, he might tell me more freely his mind now than before, seeing I had let him see that I accepted his assistance, and saw that he was sincere in his design of serving me; that he had gone thus far to shew me that he was kind to me, but that now he would tell me that he loved me, and yet would demonstrate that his love was both honourable, and that what he should desire was what he might honestly ask, and I might honestly grant.

I answered, "that within these two limitations I was sure I ought to deny him nothing, and I should think myself not ungrateful only, but very unjust, if I should." He said no more, but I observed he kissed me more, and took me in his arms in a kind of familiar way, more than usual, and which once or twice put me in mind of my maid Amy's words; and yet, I must acknowledge, I was so overcome with his goodness to me in those things he had done, that I not only was easy at what he did, and made no resistance, but was inclined to do the like, whatever he had offered to do. But he went no further than what I have said, nor did he so much as offer to sit down on the bed-side with me, but took his leave, said he loved me tenderly, and would convince me of it by such demonstrations as should be to my satisfaction. I told him I had a great deal of reason to believe him, that he was full master of the house and of me, as far as was within the bounds we had spoken of, which I believed he would not break, and asked him if he would not lodge there that night.

He said he could not stay there that night, business required him in London, but added, smiling, that he would come the next day and take a night's lodging with me. I pressed him to stay that night, and told him I should be glad a friend so valuable should be under the same roof with me; and indeed I began at that time not only to be much obliged to him, but to love him too, and that in a manner that I had not been acquainted with myself.

O let no woman cast a reflection, but consider me generously delivered from trouble, and furnished with gratitude and just principles. This gentleman had freely and voluntarily delivered me from misery, from poverty, and rags; he had made me what I was, and put me into a way to be even more than I ever was, namely, to live happy and pleased, and on his bounty I depended. What could I say to this gentleman when he pressed me to yield to him, and argued the lawfulness of it? But of that in its place.

I pressed him again to stay that night, and told him it was the first completely happy night that I had ever had in the house in my life, and I should be very sorry to have it without his company, who was the cause and foundation of it all; that we would be innocently merry, but that it could never be without him; and, in short, I courted him so, that he said he could not deny me, but he would take his horse and go to London, do the business he had to do, which it seems was to pay a foreign bill that was due that night, and would else be protested, and that he would come back in three hours at furthest and sup with me; but bade me get nothing there, for since I was resolved to be merry, which was what he desired above all things, he would send me something from London, "and we will make it a wedding supper, my dear," says he; and with that word took me in his arms, and kissed me so vehemently, that I made no question but he intended to do everything else that Amy had talked of.

I started a little at the word wedding. "What do you mean, to call it by such a name?" says I, adding, "we will have a supper, but the other is impossible, as well on your side as mine;" he laughed—"Well," says he, "you shall call it what you will, but it may be the same thing, for I shall satisfy you it is not so impossible as you make it."

"I do not understand you," said I; "have not I a husband and you a wife?"

"Well, well," says he, "we will talk of that after supper;" so he rose up, gave me a kiss, and took his horse for London.

This kind of discourse had fired my blood, I confess, and I knew not what to think of it; it was plain now he intended to lie with me, but how he would reconcile it to a legal thing, like a marriage, that I could not imagine. We had both of us used Amy with so much intimacy, and trusted her with everything, having such unexampled instances of her fidelity, that he made no scruple to kiss me and say all these things to me before her; nor had he cared one farthing if I would have let him lie with me, to have had Amy there too all night. When he was gone—"Well, Amy," says I, "what will all this come to now? I am all in a sweat at him."—"Come to, madam," says Amy, "I see what it will come to, I must put you to bed to-night together." "Why you would not be so impudent, you jade you," says I, "would you?"—"Yes, I would," says she, "with all my heart, and think you both as honest as ever you were in your lives."

"What ails the slut to talk so?" said I, "honest! how can it be honest?"—"Why, I'll tell you, madam," says Amy, "I founded it as soon as I heard him speak, and it is very true too; he calls you widow, and such indeed you are, for as my master has left you so many years, he is dead to you; he is no husband; you are and ought to be free to marry who you will; and his wife being gone from him, and refusing to lie with him, then he is a single man again, as much as ever; and though you cannot bring the laws of the land to join you together, yet one refusing to do the office of a wife, and the other of a husband, you may certainly take one another fairly."

"Nay, Amy," says I, "if I could take him fairly, you may be sure I would take him above all the men in the world; it turned my very heart within me when I heard him say he loved me; how could it do otherwise, when you know what a condition I was in before, despised and trampled on by all the world—I could have took him in my arms and kissed him as freely as he did me, if it had not been for shame."

"Ay, and all the rest too," says Amy, "at the first word; I do not see how you can think of denying him anything; has he not brought you out of the devil's clutches, brought you out of the blackest misery that ever poor lady was reduced to? Can a woman deny such a man anything?"

"Nay, I do not know what to do, Amy," says I. "I hope he wont desire anything of that kind of me, I hope he will not attempt it; if he does, I know not what to say to him."

"Not ask you," says Amy, "depend upon it he will ask you, and you will grant it too; I am sure my mistress is no fool; come, pray madam, let me go air you a clean shift; do not let him find you in foul linen the wedding night."

"But that I know you to be a very honest girl, Amy," says I, "you would make me abhor you; why, you argue for the devil, as if you were one of his privy counsellors."

"It is no matter for that," says Amy, "I say nothing but what I think; you own you love this gentleman, and he has given you sufficient testimony of his affection to you; your conditions are alike unhappy, and he is of opinion that he may take another woman, his first wife having broke her honour, and living from him: and that though the laws of the land will not allow him to marry formally, yet that he may take another woman into his arms, provided he keeps true to the other woman as a wife; nay, he says it is usual to do so, and allowed by the custom of the place, in several countries abroad; and, I must own, I am of the same mind; else it is in the power of a whore, after she has jilted and abandoned her husband, to confine him from the pleasure as well as convenience of a woman all the days of his life, which would be very unreasonable, and, as things go, not tolerable to all people; and the like on your side, madam."

Had I now had my senses about me, and had my reason not been overcome by the powerful attraction of so kind, so beneficent a friend; had I consulted conscience and virtue, I should have repelled this Amy, however faithful and honest to me in other things, as a viper and engine to the devil; I ought to have remembered, that neither he or I, either by the laws of God or man, could come together upon any other terms than that of notorious adultery. The ignorant jade's argument, that he had brought me out of the hands of the devil, by which she meant the devil of poverty and distress, should have been a powerful motive to me not to plunge myself into the jaws of hell, and into the power of the real devil, in recompense for the deliverance. I should have looked upon all the good this man had done for me to have been the particular work of the goodness of Heaven, and that goodness should have moved me to a return of duty and obedience; I should have received the mercy thankfully, and applied it soberly to the praise and honour of my Maker; whereas, by this wicked course, all the bounty and kindness of this gentleman became a snare to me, was a mere bait to the devil's hook; I received his kindness at the dear expense of body and soul, mortgaging faith, religion, conscience, and modesty, for (as I may call it) a morsel of bread; or if you will, ruined my soul from a principle of gratitude, and gave myself up to the devil, to shew myself grateful to my benefactor. I must do the gentleman that justice as to say, I verily believe that he did nothing but what he thought lawful; and I must do that justice upon myself as to say, I did what my own conscience convinced me, at the very time I did it, was horribly unlawful, scandalous, and abominable.

But poverty was my share; dreadful poverty! The misery I had been in was great, such as would make the heart tremble at the apprehensions of its return; and I might appeal to any that has had any experience of the world, whether one so entirely destitute as I was of all manner of help, or friends, either to support me or to assist me to support myself, could withstand the proposal, not that I plead this as a justification of my conduct, but that it may move the pity even of those that abhor the crime.

Besides this, I was young, handsome, and, with all the mortifications I had met with, was vain, and that not a little; and, as it was a new thing, so it was a pleasant thing to be courted, caressed, embraced, and high professions of affection made to me, by a man so agreeable and so able to do me good.

Add to this, that if I had ventured to disoblige this gentleman, I had no friend in the world to have recourse to; I had no prospect, no, not of a bit of bread; I had nothing before me but to fall back into the same misery that I had been in before.

Amy had but too much rhetoric in this cause, she represented all those things in their proper colours, she argued them all with her utmost skill, and at last the merry jade, when she came to dress me, said, "Look you, madam, if you will not consent, tell him you will do as Rachael did to Jacob, when she could have no children, put her maid to bed to him; tell him you cannot comply with him, but there is Amy, he may ask her the question, she has promised me she will not deny you."

"And would you have me say so, Amy?" said I.

"No, madam, but I would really have you do so, besides, you are undone if you do not; and if my doing it would save you from being undone, as I said before, he shall, if he will; if he asks me I will not deny him, hang me if I do," says Amy.

"Well, I know not what to do," says I to Amy. "Do!" says Amy; "your choice is fair and plain; here you may have a handsome, charming gentleman, be rich, live pleasantly, and in plenty, or refuse him, and want a dinner, go in rags, live in tears, in short, beg and starve; you know this is the case, madam," says Amy, "I wonder how you can say you know not what to do."

"Well, Amy," says I, "the case is as you say, and I think verily I must yield to him; but then," said I, moved by conscience, "do not talk any more of your cant, of its being lawful that I ought to marry again, and such stuff as that; it is all nonsense," says I, "Amy, there is nothing in it, let me hear no more of that, for if I yield, it is in vain to mince the matter; I am a whore, Amy, neither better nor worse, I assure you."

"I do not think so, madam, by no means," says Amy, "I wonder how you can talk so;" and she run on with her argument of the unreasonableness that a woman should be obliged to live single, or a man to live single, in such cases as before. "Well, Amy," said I, "come let us dispute no more, for the longer I enter into that part, the greater my scruples will be; but if I let it alone, the necessity of my present circumstances is such, that I believe I shall yield to him, if he should importune me much about it, but I should be glad he would not do it at all, but leave me as I am."

"As to that, madam, you may depend," says

Amy, "he expects to have you for his bed-fellow to-night; I saw it plainly in his management all day, and at last he told you so too as plain, I think, as he could."—"Well, well, Amy," said I, "I do not know how to resist such a man that has done so much for me."—"I do not know how you should," says Amy.

Thus Amy and I canvassed the business between us; the jade prompted the crime, which I had but too much inclination to commit, that is to say, not as a crime, for I had nothing of the vice in my constitution; my spirits were far from being high, my blood had no fire in it to kindle the flame of desire; but the kindness and good humour of the man, and the dread of my own circumstances, concurred to bring me to the point, and I even resolved, before he asked, to give up my virtue to him, whenever he should put it to the question.

In this I was a double offender, whatever he was, for I was resolved to commit the crime, knowing and owning it to be a crime; he, if it was true as he said, was fully persuaded it was lawful, and in that persuasion he took his measures, and used all the circumlocutions which I am going to speak of.

About two hours after he was gone, came a Leadenhall basket woman, with a load of good things for the mouth, the particulars are not to the purpose, and brought orders to get supper by eight o'clock; however, I did not intend to begin to dress anything till I saw him; and he gave me time enough, for he came before seven, so that Amy, who had got one to help her, had everything ready in time.

We sat down to supper about eight, and were indeed very merry; Amy made us some sport, for she was a girl of spirit and wit, and with her talk she made us laugh very often, and yet the jade managed her wit with all the good manners imaginable.

But to shorten the story; after supper he took me up into his chamber, where Amy had made a good fire, and there pulled out a great many papers, and spread them upon a little table, and then took me by the hand, and after kissing me very much, he entered into a discourse of his circumstances, and of mine, how they agreed in some things exactly, for example, that I was abandoned by a husband in the prime of my youth and vigour, and he by a wife in his middle age, how the end of marriage was destroyed by the treatment we had either of us received, and it would be very hard that we should be tied by the formality of the contract, where the essence of it was destroyed; I interrupted him, and told him there was a vast difference between our circumstances, and that in the most essential part, namely, that he was rich and I was poor, that he was above the world, and I infinitely below it; that his circumstances were very easy, mine miserable, and this was an inequality the most essential that could be imagined. "As to that, my dear," says he, "I have taken such measures as shall make an equality still," and with that he showed me a contract in writing, wherein he engaged himself to me to cohabit constantly with me, to provide for me in all respects as a wife; and repeating in the preamble a long account of the nature and reason of our living together, and an obligation in the penalty of 7,000*l.* never to abandon me; and at last showed me a bond for 500*l.*, to be paid to me, or to my assigns, within three months after his death.

He read over these things to me, and then, in a most moving, affectionate manner, and in words not to be answered, he said, "Now, my dear, is not this sufficient? can you object anything against it? If not, as I believe you will not, then let us debate this matter no longer." With that he pulled out a silk purse, which had threescore guineas in it, and threw it into my lap, and concluded all the rest of his discourse with kisses and protestations of his love, of which indeed I had abundant proof.

Pity human frailty, you that read of a woman reduced in her youth and prime to the utmost misery and distress, and raised again as above, by the unexpected and surprising bounty of a stranger; I say pity her if she was not able, after all these things, to make any more resistance.

However, I stood out a little longer still; I asked him how he could, with any show of reason, expect that I should come into a proposal of such consequence the very first time it was moved to me? and that I ought, if I consented to it, to capitulate with him, that he should never upbraid me with easiness, and consenting too soon. He said, no; but on the contrary he would take it as a mark of the greatest kindness I could shew him. Then he went on to give reasons why there was no occasion to use the ordinary ceremony of delay, or to wait a reasonable time of courtship, which was only to avoid scandal; but, as this was private, it had nothing of that nature in it; that he had been courting me some time, by the best of courtship, viz. doing acts of kindness to me; and that he had given testimonies of his sincere affection to me, by deeds, not by flattering trifles, and the usual courtship of words, which were often found to have very little meaning; that he took me not as a mistress, but as a wife, and protested it was clear to him he might lawfully do it, and that I was perfectly at liberty; and assured me, by all that was possible for an honest man to say, that he would treat me as a wife as long as he lived; in a word, he conquered all the little resistance I intended to make; he protested he loved me above all the world, and begged I would for once believe him; that he had never deceived me, and never would, but would make it his study to make my life comfortable and happy, and to make me forget the misery I had gone through. I stood still awhile and said nothing, but seeing him eager for my answer, I smiled, and looking up at him—"And must I then," said I, "say yes, at first asking? must I depend upon your promise? why, then," says I, "upon the faith of that promise, and in the sense of that inexpressible kindness you have shown to me, you shall be obliged, and I am wholly yours to the end of my life; and with that I took his hand, which held me by the hand, and gave it a kiss.

And thus, in gratitude for the favours I received from a man, was all sense of religion and duty to God, all regard to virtue and honour, given up at once, and we were to call one another man and wife, who, in the sense of the laws, both of God and our country, were no more than two adulterers,—in short, a whore and a rogue; nor, as I have said above, was my conscience silent in it, though it seems his was; for I sinned with open eyes, and thereby had a double guilt upon me; as I always said his notions were of another kind, and he either was before of the opinion, or argued himself into it, now that we were both free, and might lawfully marry.

But I was quite of another side, nay, and my judgment was right, but my circumstances were my temptation; the terrors behind me looked blacker than the terrors before me; and the dreadful argument of wanting bread, and being run into the horrible distresses I was in before, mastered all my resolution, and I gave myself up as above.

The rest of the evening was spent very agreeably to me; he was perfectly good humoured, and was at that time merry; then he made Amy dance with him, and I told him I would put Amy to bed to him. Amy said, with all her heart, she never had been a bride in her life; in short, he made the girl so merry that had he not been to lie with me the same night I believe he would have played the fool with Amy for half an hour, and the girl would no more have refused him than I intended to do; yet before I had always found her a very modest wench as any I ever saw in all my life; but, in short, the mirth of that night, and a few more such afterwards, ruined the girl's modesty for ever, as shall appear by and by in its place.

So far does fooling and toying sometimes go, that I know nothing a young woman has to be more cautious of; so far had this innocent girl gone in jesting between her and I, and in talking that she would let him lie with her, if he would but be kinder to me, that at last she let him lie with her in earnest; and so empty was I now of all principle, that I encouraged the doing it almost before my face.

I say but too justly that I was empty of principle, because as above I had yielded to him, not as deluded to believe it lawful, but as overcome by his kindness, and terrified at the fear of my own misery if he should leave me. So, with my eyes open, and with my conscience, as I may say, awake, I sinned, knowing it to be a sin, but having no power to resist. When this had thus made a hole in my heart, and I was come to such a height as to transgress against the light of my own conscience, I was then fit for any wickedness, and conscience left off speaking when it found it could not be heard.

But, to return to our story. Having consented as above to his proposal, we had not much more to do. He gave me my writings, and the bond for my maintenance during his life, and for five hundred pounds after his death. And so far was he from abating his affection to me afterwards, that two years after we were thus, as he called it, married, he made his will, and gave me a thousand pounds more, and all my household stuff, plate, &c., which was considerable too.

Amy put us to bed, and my new friend, I cannot call him husband, was so well pleased with Amy for her fidelity and kindness to me, that he paid her all the arrears of her wages that I owed her, and gave her five guineas over; and had it gone no farther, Amy had richly deserved what she had; for never was a maid so true to a mistress in such dreadful circumstances as I was in, nor was what followed more her own fault than mine, who led her almost into it at first, and quite into it at last; and this may be a farther testimony what a hardness of crime I was now arrived to, which was owing to the conviction that was from the beginning upon me that I was a whore, not a wife; nor could I ever frame my mouth to call him husband, or to say my husband when I was speaking of him.

We lived, surely, the most agreeable life, the grand exception only excepted, that ever two lived together. He was the most obliging gentlemanly man, and the most tender of me, that ever woman gave herself up to: nor was there ever the least interruption to our mutual kindness, no, not to the last day of his life. But I must bring Amy's disaster in at once, that I may have done with her.

Amy was dressing me one morning, for now I had two maids, and Amy was my chambermaid. "Dear madam," says Amy, "what, ain't you with child yet?"—"No, Amy," says I, "nor any sign of it."

"Law, madam," says Amy, "what have you been doing? Why, you have been married a year and a half. I warrant you, master would have got me with child twice in that time."—"It may be so, Amy," says I, "let him try, can't you?"—"No," says Amy, "you'll forbid it now; before I told you he should with all my heart; but I won't now, now he's all your own."—"O," says I, "Amy, I'll freely give you my consent. It will be nothing at all to me. Nay, I will put you to bed to him myself one night or other, if you are willing."—"No, madam, no," says Amy, "not now he's yours."

"Why, you fool you," says I, "don't I tell you I'll put you to bed to him myself?"—"Nay, nay," says Amy, "if you put me to bed to him, that is another case. I believe I shall not rise again very soon."—"I'll venture that, Amy," says I.

After supper that night, and before we were risen from the table, I said to him, Amy being by, "Hark ye, Mr —, do you know that you are to lie with Amy to-night?"—"No, not I," says he; but turns to Amy, "Is it so, Amy?" says he.—"No, Sir," says she. "Nay, don't say no, you fool. Did not I promise to put you to bed to him?" But the girl said "No," still, and it passed off.

At night, when we came to go to bed, Amy came into the chamber to undress me, and her master slipped into bed first; then I began, and told him all that Amy had said about my not being with child, and of her being with child twice in that time. "Ay, Mrs Amy," says he, "I believe so too: come hither, and we will try." But Amy did not go. "Go, you fool," says I, "can't you? I'll freely give you both leave." But Amy would not go. "Nay, you whore," says I, "but you said, if I would put you to bed, you would with all your heart." And with that, I sat her down, pulled off her stockings and shoes, and all her clothes, piece by piece, and led her to the bed to him. "Here," says I, "try what you can do with your maid Amy." She pulled back a little, would not let me pull off her clothes at first, but it was hot weather, and she had not many clothes on, and particularly no stays on; and at last, when she saw I was in earnest, she let me do what I would. So I fairly stripped her, and then I threw open the bed, and thrust her in.

I need say no more. This is enough to convince any body that I did not think him my husband, and that I had cast off all principle, and all modesty, and had effectually stifled conscience.

Amy, I dare say, began now to repent, and would fain have got out of bed again; but he said to her, "Nay, Amy, you see your mistress has put you to bed, 'tis all her doing, you must blame her." So he held her fast, and the wench being naked in the bed with him, it was too late to look back, so she lay still and let him do what he would with her.

Had I looked upon myself as a wife, you cannot suppose I would have been willing to have let my husband lie with my maid, much less before my face, for I stood by all the while; but as I thought myself a whore, I cannot say but that it was something designed in my thoughts, that my maid should be a whore too, and should not reproach me with it.

Amy, however, less vicious than I, was grievously out of sorts the next morning, and cried and took on most vehemently; that she was ruined and undone, and there was no pacifying her; she was a whore, a slut, and she was undone! undone! and cried almost all day. I did all I could to pacify her. "A whore," says I, "well, and am not I a whore as well as you?" "No, no," says Amy, "no, you are not, for you are married."—"Not I, Amy," says I, "I don't pretend to it. He may marry you to-morrow, if he will, for anything I could do to hinder it. I am not married. I do not look upon it as anything." Well, all did not pacify Amy, but she cried two or three days about it; but it wore off by degrees.

But the case differed between Amy and her master exceedingly; for Amy retained the same kind temper she always had: but, on the contrary, he was quite altered, for he hated her heartily, and could, I believe, have killed her after it, and he told me so, for he thought this a vile action; whereas what he and I had done he was perfectly easy in, thought it just, and esteemed me as much his wife as if we had been married from our youth, and had neither of us known any other; nay, he loved me, I believe, as entirely as if I had been the wife of his youth. Nay, he told me it was true, in one sense, that he had two wives, but that I was the wife of his affection, the other the wife of his aversion.

I was extremely concerned at the aversion he had taken to my maid Amy, and used my utmost skill to get it altered; for though he had, indeed, debauched the wench, I knew that I was the principal occasion of it; and as he was the best humoured man in the world, I never gave it over till I prevailed with him to be easy with her, and as I had now become the devil's agent, to make others as wicked as myself, I brought him to lie with her again several times after that, till at last, as the poor girl said, so it happened, and she was really with child.

She was terribly concerned at it, and so was he too. "Come, my dear," says I, "when Rachel put her handmaid to bed to Jacob, she took the children as her own. Do not be uneasy; I will take the child as my own. Had not I a hand in the frolic of putting her to bed to you? It was my fault as much as yours." So I called Amy, and encouraged her too, and told her that I would take care of the child and her too, and added the same argument to her. "For," says I, "Amy, it was all my fault; did not I drag your clothes off your back, and put you to bed to him." Thus I that had, indeed, been the cause of all the wickedness between them, encouraged them both, when they had any remorse about it, and rather prompted them to go on with it, than to repent of it.

When Amy grew big, she went to a place I had provided for her, and the neighbours knew nothing but that Amy and I were parted. She had a fine child indeed, a daughter, and we had it nursed, and Amy came again in about half a year to live with her old mistress; but neither my gentleman, or Amy either, cared for playing that game over again; for, as he said, the jade might bring him a house full of children to keep.

We lived as merrily and as happily after this as could be expected, considering our circumstances; I mean as to the pretended marriage, &c.; and as to that my gentleman had not the least concern about him for it. But as much as I was hardened, and that was as much as I believe ever any wicked creature was, yet I could not help it, there was and would be hours of intervals, and of dark reflections which came involuntarily in, and thrust in sighs into the middle of all my songs; and there would be sometimes a heaviness of heart which intermingled itself with all my joy, and which would often fetch a tear from my eye. And let others pretend what they will, I believe it impossible to be otherwise with anybody. There can be no substantial satisfaction in a life of known wickedness; conscience will and does often break in upon them at particular times, let them do what they will to prevent it.

But I am not to preach but to relate, and whatever loose reflections were, and how often soever those dark intervals came on, I did my utmost to conceal them from him; ay, and to suppress and smother them too in myself; and as to outward appearance, we lived as cheerfully and as agreeably as it was possible for any couple in the world to live.

After I had thus lived with him something above two years, truly I found myself with child too; my gentleman was mightily pleased at it, and nothing could be kinder than he was in the preparations he made for me, and for my lying in, which was, however, very private, because I cared for as little company as possible; nor had I kept up my neighbourly acquaintance, so that I had nobody to invite upon such an occasion.

I was brought to bed very well (of a daughter too, as well as Amy), but the child died at six weeks old, so all that work was to do over again, that is to say, the charge, the expense, the travail, &c.

The next year I made him amends, and brought him a son, to his great satisfaction; it was a charming child, and did very well. After this, my husband, as he called himself, came to me one evening, and told me he had a very difficult thing happened to him, which he knew not what to do in, or how to resolve about, unless I would make him easy; this was, that he must go over to France for about two months.

"Well, my dear," says I, "and how shall I make you easy?"

"Why, by consenting to let me go," says he, "upon which condition, I will tell you the occasion of my going, that you may judge of the necessity there is for it on my side;" then to make me easy in his going, he told me he would make his will before he went, which should be to my full satisfaction.

I told him the last part was so kind that I could not decline the first part, unless he would give me leave to add, that if it was not putting him to an extraordinary expense. I would go over along with him.

He was so pleased with this offer that he told me he would give me full satisfaction for it, and accept of it too; so he took me to London with him the next day, and there he made his will, and shewed it to me, and sealed it before proper witnesses, and then gave it to me to keep. In this will he gave me a thousand pounds to a person that we both knew very well, in trust, to pay it, with the interest from the time of his decease, to me or my assigns; then he willed the payment of my jointure, as he called it, viz., his bond of a hundred pounds after his death; also he gave me all my household stuff, plate, &c.

This was a most engaging thing for a man to do to one under my circumstances; and it would have been hard, as I told him, to deny him anything, or to refuse to go with him any where. So we settled everything as well as we could, left Amy in the house, and for his other business, which was in jewels, he had two men he entrusted, whom he had good security for, who managed for him, and corresponded with him.

Things being thus concerted, we went away to France, arrived safe at Calais, and by easy journies came in eight days more to Paris, where we lodged in the house of an English merchant of his acquaintance, and were very courteously entertained.

My gentleman's business was with some persons of the first rank, and to whom he had sold some jewels of very great value, and received a great sum of money in specie; and, as he told me privately, he gained 3,000 pistoles by his bargain, but would not suffer the most intimate friend he had there to know what he had received; for it is not so safe a thing in Paris to have a great sum of money in keeping as it might be in London.

We made this journey much longer than we intended, and my gentleman sent for one of his managers in London to come over to Paris with some diamonds, and sent him back to London again to fetch more; then other business fell into his hands so unexpectedly, that I began to think we should take up our constant residence there, which I was not very averse to, it being my native country, and I spoke the language perfectly well, so that we took a good house in Paris, and lived very well there; and I sent for Amy to come over to me, for I lived gallantly, and my gentleman was two or three times going to keep me a coach, but I declined it, especially at Paris; but as they have those conveniences by the day there, at a certain rate, I had an equipage provided for me whenever I pleased, and I lived here in very good figure, and might have lived higher if I pleased.

But in the middle of all this felicity, a dreadful disaster befel me, which entirely unhinged all my affairs, and threw me back into the same state of life that I was in before; with this one happy exception, however, that whereas before I was poor, even to misery, now I was not only provided for, but very rich.

My gentleman had the name in Paris for a very rich man, and, indeed, he was so, though not so immensely rich as people imagined; but that which was fatal to him, was, he generally carried a shagreen case in his pocket, especially when he went to court, or the houses of any of the princes of the blood, in which he had jewels of very great value.

It happened one day, that being to go to Versailles to wait upon the Prince of ———, he came up into my chamber in the morning, and laid out his jewel case, because he was not going to show any jewels, but to get a foreign bill accepted, which he had received from Amsterdam; so when he gave me the case, he said, "My dear, I think I need not carry this with me, because it may be I may not come back till night, and it is too much to venture." I returned, "Then, my dear, you shall not go." "Why?" says he. "Because, as they are too much for you, so you are too much for me to venture, and you shall not go, unless you will promise me not to stay so as to come back in the night."

"I hope there's no danger," said he, "seeing I have nothing about me of any value; and therefore, lest I should, take that too," says he, and gives me his gold watch, and a rich diamond, which he had in a ring, and always wore on his finger.

"Well, but my dear," says I, "you make me more uneasy now than before: if you apprehend no danger, why do you use this caution? and if you apprehend there is danger, why do you go at all?"

"There is no danger," says he, "if I do not stay late, and I do not design to do so."

"Well, but promise me then that you will not," says I, "or else I cannot let you go."

"I will not indeed, my dear," says he, "unless I am obliged to it; I assure you I do not intend it; but if I should, I am not worth robbing now, for I have nothing about me but about six pistoles in my little purse, and that little ring," showing me a small diamond ring, worth about ten or twelve pistoles, which he put upon his finger, in the room of the rich one he usually wore.

I still pressed him not to stay late, and he said he would not. "But if I am kept late," says he. "beyond my expectation, I will stay all night, and come next morning." This seemed a very good caution; but still my mind was very uneasy about him, and I told him so, and entreated him not to go; I told him I did not know what might be the reason, but that I had a strange terror upon my mind about his going, and that, if he did go, I was persuaded some harm would attend him; he smiled, and returned, "Well, my dear, if it should be so, you are now richly provided for, all that I have here I give to you." And with that he takes up the casket or case, "Here," says he, "hold your hand, there is a good estate for you in this case; if anything happens to me it is all your own, I give it you for yourself;" and with that he put the casket, the fine ring, and his gold watch all into my hands, and the key of his scrutoire besides, adding, "And in my scrutoire there is some money, it is all your own."

I started at him as if I was frightened, for I thought all his face looked like a death's head; and then, immediately, I thought I perceived his head all bloody, and then his clothes looked bloody too, and immediately it all went off, and he looked as he really did; immediately I fell a-crying, and hung about him,—“My dear,” said I, “I am frightened to death, you shall not go, depend upon it some mischief will befall you.” I did not tell him how my vapourish fancy had represented him to me, that I thought was not proper; besides, he would only have laughed at me, and would have gone away with a jest about it; but I pressed him seriously not to go that day, or, if he did, to promise me to come home to Paris again by day-light. He looked a little graver then than he did before, told me he was not apprehensive of the least danger, but if there was, he would either take care to come in the day, or, as he said before, would stay all night.

But all these promises came to nothing, for he was set upon in the open day, and robbed by three men on horseback, masked, as he went; and one of them, who it seems rifled him while the rest stood to stop the coach, stabbed him in the body with a sword, so that he died immediately. He had a footman behind the coach, whom they knocked down with the stock, or butt-end of a carbine. They were supposed to kill him because of the disappointment they met with in not getting his case or casket of diamonds, which they knew he carried about him; and this was supposed, because, after they killed him, they made the coachman drive out of the road a long way over the heath, till they came to a convenient place, where they pulled him out of the coach and searched his clothes more narrowly than they could do while he was alive.

But they found nothing but his little ring, six pistoles, and the value of about seven livres in small moneys.

This was a dreadful blow to me, though I cannot say I was so surprised as I should otherwise have been, for all the while he was gone my mind was oppressed with the weight of my own thoughts, and I was so sure that I should never see him any more, that I think nothing could be like it. The impression was so strong, that I think nothing could make so deep a wound that was imaginary; and I was so dejected and disconsolate, that when I received the news of his disaster, there was no room for any extraordinary alteration in me. I cried all that day, eat nothing, and only waited, as I might say, to receive the dismal news, which I had brought to me about five o'clock in the afternoon.

I was in a strange country, and though I had a pretty many acquaintances, had but very few friends that I could consult on this occasion. All possible inquiry was made after the rogues that had been thus barbarous, but nothing could be heard of them; nor was it possible that the footman could make any discovery of them by his description, for they knocked him down immediately, so that he knew nothing of what was done afterwards. The coachman was the only man that could say anything, and all his account amounted to no more than this, that one of them had soldier's clothes, but he could not remember the particulars of his mounting, so as to know what regiment he belonged to; and as to their faces, that he could know nothing of, because they had all of them masks on.

I had him buried as decently as the place would permit a protestant stranger to be buried, and made some of the scruples and difficulties on that account easy, by the help of money to a certain person, who went impudently to the curate of the parish of St Sulpitius, in Paris, and told him, that the gentleman that was killed was a catholic; that the thieves had taken from him a cross of gold, set with diamonds, worth 6,000 livres; that his widow was a catholic, and had sent by him 60 crowns to the church of —, for masses to be said for the repose of his soul. Upon all which, though not one word of it was true, he was buried with all the ceremonies of the Roman church.

I think I almost cried myself to death for him, for I abandoned myself to all the excesses of grief; and indeed I loved him to a degree inexpressible; and considering what kindness he had shown me at first, and how tenderly he had used me to the last, what could I do less?

Then the manner of his death was terrible and frightful to me, and, above all, the strange notices I had of it. I had never pretended to the second-sight, or anything of the kind, but certainly if any one ever had such a thing, I had it at this time, for I saw him as plainly in all those terrible shapes as above—first, as a skeleton, not dead only, but rotten and wasted; secondly, as killed, and his face bloody; and thirdly, his clothes bloody, and all within the space of one minute, or indeed of a very few moments.

These things amazed me, and I was a good while as one stupid; however, after some time I began to recover and look into my affairs. I had the satisfaction not to be left in distress or in danger of poverty. On the contrary, besides what he had put into my hands fairly in his lifetime, which amounted to a very considerable value, I found above 700 pistoles in gold in his scrutoire, of which he had given me the key; and I found foreign bills accepted for about 12,000 livres, so that, in a word, I found myself possessed of almost 10,000*l.* sterling in a very few days after the disaster.

The first thing I did upon this occasion was to send a letter to my maid, as I still called her, Amy, wherein I gave her an account of my disaster, how my husband, as she called him (for I never called him so) was murdered; and as I did not know how his relations, or his wife's friends, might act upon that occasion, I ordered her to convey away all the plate, linen, and other things of value, and to secure them in a person's hands that I directed her to, and then to sell or dispose of the furniture of the house, if she could, and so, without acquainting anybody with the reason of her going, withdraw; sending notice to his head manager at London, that the house was quitted by the tenant, and they might come and take possession of it for the executors. Amy was so dexterous, and did her work so nimbly, that she gutted the house, and sent the key to the said manager, almost as soon as he had notice of the misfortune that befel their master.

Upon their receiving the surprising news of his death, the head manager came over to Paris, and came to the house; I made no scruple of calling myself Madame ———, the widow of Monsieur ———, the English jeweller; and as I spoke French naturally, I did not let him know but that I was his wife, married in France, and that I had not heard that he had any wife in England, but pretended to be surprised, and exclaimed against him for so base an action; and that I had good friends in Poictou, where I was born, who would take care to have justice done me in England out of his estate.

I should have observed that, as soon as the news was public, of a man being murdered, and that he was a jeweller, fame did me the favour to publish presently, that he was robbed of his casket of jewels, which he always carried about him. I confirmed this, among my daily lamentations for his disaster, and added, that he had with him a fine diamond ring, which he was known to wear frequently about him, valued at 100 pistoles, a gold watch, and a great quantity of diamonds of inestimable value in his casket; which jewels he was carrying to the Prince of ———, to show some of them to him; and the prince owned that he had spoken to him to bring some such jewels, to let him see them. But I sorely repented this part afterwards, as you shall hear.

This rumour put an end to all inquiry after his jewels, his ring, or his watch; and as for the 700 pistoles, that I secured. For the bills that were in hand, I owned I had them, but that as, I said, I brought my husband 30,000 livres portion, I claimed the said bills, which came not to above 12,000 livres, for my amende; and this, with the plate, and the household stuff, was the principal of all his estate which they could come at. As to the foreign bill, which he was going to Versailles to get accepted, it was really lost with him; but his manager who had remitted the bill to him, by way of Amsterdam, bringing over the second bill, the money was saved, as they call it, which would otherwise have been also gone; the thieves who robbed and murdered him, were to be sure afraid to send anybody to get the bill accepted, for that would undoubtedly have discovered them.

By this time my maid Amy was arrived, and she gave me an account of her management, and how she had secured everything, and that she had quitted the house, and sent the key to the head manager of his business, and let me know how much she made of everything, very punctually and honestly.

I should have observed, in the account of his dwelling with me so long at ———, that he never passed for anything there but a lodger in the house; and though he was landlord, that did not alter the case. So that at his death, Amy coming to quit the house, and give them the key, there was no affinity between that and the case of their master who was newly killed.

I got good advice at Paris from an eminent lawyer, a counsellor of the parliament there, and laying my case before him, he directed me to make a process in dower upon the estate, for making good my new fortune upon matrimony, which accordingly I did; and, upon the whole, the manager went back to England well satisfied that he had gotten the unaccepted bill of exchange, which was for two thousand five hundred pounds, with some other things, which together amounted to seventeen thousand livres; and thus I got rid of him.

I was visited with great civility on this sad occasion of the loss of my husband, as they thought him, by a great many ladies of quality. And the Prince of ———, to whom it was reported he was carrying the jewels, sent his gentleman with a handsome compliment of condolence to me; and his gentleman, whether with or without order, hinted as if his highness did intend to have visited me himself, but that some accident, which he made a long story of, had prevented him.

By the concourse of ladies and others that thus came to visit me, I began to be much known; and as I did not forget to set myself out with all possible advantage, considering the dress of a widow, which in those days was a most frightful thing; I say, as I did this from my own vanity, for I was not ignorant that I was very handsome; I say, on this account I was soon made very public, and was known by the name of la belle veuve de Poictou, or the pretty widow of Poictou. As I was very well pleased to see myself thus handsomely used in my affliction, it soon dried up all my tears; and though I appeared as a widow, yet, as we say in England, it was a widow comforted. I took care to let the ladies see, that I knew how to receive them, and that I was not at a loss how to behave to any of them; and in short I began to be very popular there; but I had an occasion afterwards which made me decline that kind of management, as you shall hear presently.

About four days after I had received the compliments of condolence from the Prince ———, the gentleman he had sent before came to tell me that his highness was coming to give me a visit. I was indeed surprised at that, and perfectly at a loss how to behave. However, as there was no remedy, I prepared to receive him as I could. It was not many minutes after, but he was at the door, and came in, introduced by his own gentleman, as above, and afterwards by my woman Amy.

He treated me with abundance of civility, and condoled handsomely the loss of my husband, and likewise the manner of it. He told me he understood he was coming to Versailles to himself, to show him some jewels; that it was true that he had discoursed with him about jewels, but could not imagine how any villains should hear of his coming at that time with them; that he had not ordered him to attend with them at Versailles, but told him that he would come to Paris by such a day, so that he was no way accessory to the disaster. I told him gravely I knew very well that all his highness had said of that part was true: that these villains knew his profession, and knew, no doubt, that he always carried a casket of jewels about him, and that he always wore a diamond ring on his finger worth a hundred pistoles, which report had magnified to five hundred; and that if he had been going to any other place, it would have been the same thing. After this his highness rose up to go, and told me he had resolved however to make me some reparation; and with these words put a silk purse into my hand with a hundred pistoles, and told me he would make me a further compliment of a small pension, which his gentleman would inform me of.

You may be sure I behaved with a due sense of so much goodness, and offered to kneel to kiss his hand, but he took me up and saluted me, and sat down again (though before he made as if he was going away), making me sit down by him.

He then began to talk with me more familiarly; told me he hoped I was not left in bad circumstances; that Mr — was reputed to be very rich, and that he had gained lately great sums by some jewels, and he hoped, he said, that I had still a fortune agreeable to the condition I had lived in before.

I replied, with some tears which I confess were a little forced, that I believed if Mr — had lived, we should have been out of danger of want, but that it was impossible to estimate the loss which I had sustained, besides that of the life of my husband. That, by the opinion of those that knew something of his affairs, and of what value the jewels were which he intended to have shown to his highness, he could not have less about him than the value of a hundred thousand livres. That it was a fatal blow to me, and to his whole family, especially that they should be lost in such a manner.

His highness returned, with an air of concern, that he was very sorry for it; but he hoped, if I settled in Paris, I might find ways to restore my fortune; at the same time he complimented me upon my being very handsome, as he was pleased to call it, and that I could not fail of admirers. I stood up and humbly thanked his highness, but told him I had no expectations of that kind; that I thought I should be obliged to go over to England, to look after my husband's effects there, which I was told were considerable; but that I did not know what justice a poor stranger would get among them; and as for Paris, my fortune being so impaired, I saw nothing before me but to go back to Poictou to my friends, where some of my relations, I hoped, might do something for me, and added, that one of my brothers was an abbot at —, near Poitiers.

He stood up, and taking me by the hand, led me to a large looking-glass which made up the pier in the front of the parlour, "Look there, madam," said he, "is it fit that that face," pointing to my figure in the glass, "should go back to Poictou? No, madam," says he, "stay and make some gentleman of quality happy, that may in return make you forget all your sorrows; and with that he took me in his arms, and kissing me twice, told me he would see me again, but with less ceremony.

Some little time after this, but the same day, his gentleman came to me again, and with great ceremony and respect, delivered me a black box tied with a scarlet ribband, and sealed with a noble coat of arms, which I suppose was the prince's. There was in it a grant from his highness, or an assignment, I know not which to call it, with a warrant to his banker to pay me two thousand livres a year, during my stay in Paris, as the widow of Monsieur —, the jeweller, mentioning the horrid murder of my late husband as the occasion of it, as above.

I received it with great submission, and expressions of being infinitely obliged to his master, and of my showing myself on all occasions his highness's most obedient servant; and after giving my most humble duty to his highness, with the utmost acknowledgements of the obligation, &c. I went to a little cabinet, and taking out some money, which made a little sound in taking it out, offered to give him five pistoles.

He drew back, but with the greatest respect, and told me he humbly thanked me, but that he durst not take a farthing; that his highness would take it so ill of him, he was sure he would never see his face more; but that he would not fail to acquaint his highness what respect I had offered; and added, "I assure you, madam, you are more in the good graces of my master, the Prince of —, than you are aware of; and I believe you will hear more of him."

Now I began to understand him, and resolved if his highness did come again, he should see me under no disadvantage, if I could help it. I told him, if his highness did me the honour to see me again, I hoped he would not let me be surprised as I was before; that I would be glad to have some little notice of it, and would be obliged to him if he would procure it me. He told me, he was very sure that when his highness intended to visit me, he should be sent before, to give me notice of it, and that he would give me as much warning of it as possible.

He came several times after this, on the same errand, that is, about the settlement, the grant requiring several things yet to be done, for making it payable without going every time to the prince again for a fresh warrant. The particulars of this part I did not understand; but as soon as it was finished, which was above two months, the gentleman came one afternoon, and said his highness designed to visit me in the evening; but desired to be admitted without ceremony.

I prepared not my rooms only, but myself; and when he came in there was nobody appeared in the house but his gentleman and my maid Amy, and of her I bid the gentleman acquaint his highness that she was an English woman; that she did not understand a word of French, and that she was one also that might be trusted.

When he came into my room, I fell down at his feet, before he could come to salute me, and with words that I had prepared full of duty and respect, thanked him for his bounty and goodness to a poor desolate woman, oppressed under the weight of so terrible a disaster, and refused to rise till he would allow me the honour to kiss his hand.

"Levez-vous donc," says the prince, taking me in his arms, "I design more favours for you than this trifle;" and going on, he added, "you shall for the future find a friend where you did not look for it, and I resolve to let you see how kind I can be to one who is to me the most agreeable creature on earth."

I was dressed in a kind of half mourning, had turned off my weeds, and my head, though I had yet no ribbands nor lace, was so dressed as failed not to set me out with advantage enough, for I began to understand his meaning: and the prince professed I was the most beautiful creature on earth. "And where have I lived," says he, "and how ill have I been served that I should never till now be shown the finest woman in France?"

This was the way in all the world the most likely to break in upon my virtue if I had been mistress of any, for I was now become the vainest creature upon earth, and particularly of my beauty, which, as other people admired, so I became every day more foolishly in love with myself than before.

He said some very kind things to me after this, and sat down with me for an hour or more, when getting up, and calling his gentleman by name, he threw open the door. "A boire," says he, upon which his gentleman immediately brought up a little table covered with a fine damask cloth, the table no bigger than he could bring in his two hands, but upon it was set two decanters, one of champagne and the other of water, six silver plates, and a service of fine sweetmeats in fine China dishes, on a set of rings standing up about twenty inches high, one above another. Below were three roasted partridges and a quail. As soon as his gentleman had set it all down, he ordered him to withdraw. "Now," says the prince, "I intend to sup with you."

When he had sent away his gentleman, I stood up and offered to wait on his highness, while he eat, but he positively refused, and told me, "No, to-morrow you shall be the widow of Monsieur —, the jeweller, but to-night you shall be my mistress. Therefore, sit here," says he, "and eat with me, or I will get up and serve."

I would then have called up my woman Amy, but I thought that would not be proper neither; so I made my excuse that since his highness would not let his own servant wait, I would not presume to let my woman come up; but if he would please to let me wait, it would be my honour to fill his highness's wine; but, as before, he would by no means allow me. So we sat and eat together.

"Now, madam," says the prince, "give me leave to lay aside my character; let us talk together with the freedom of equals; my quality sets me at a distance from you, and makes you ceremonious; your beauty exalts you to more than an equality. I must then treat you as lovers do their mistresses, but I cannot speak the language; it is enough to tell you how agreeable you are to me, how I am surprised at your beauty, and resolve to make you happy, and to be happy with you."

I knew not what to say to him for a good while, but blushed, and looking up towards him, said I was already made happy in the favour of a person of such rank, and had nothing to ask of his highness but that he would believe me infinitely obliged.

After he had eaten, he poured the sweetmeats into my lap; and the wine being out, he called his gentleman again to take away the table, who, at first, only took the cloth and the remains of what was to eat, away; and laying another cloth, set the table on one side of the room with a noble service of plate on it, worth at least 200 pistoles. Then, having set the two decanters again upon the table, filled, as before, he withdrew, for I found the fellow understood his business very well, and his lord's business too.

About half an hour after, the prince told me that I offered to wait a little before, but if I would now take the trouble, he would give me leave to give him some wine; so I went to the table, filled a glass of wine, and brought it to him on a fine salver, which the glasses stood on, and brought the bottle or decanter of water in my other hand, to mix it as he thought fit.

He smiled, and bid me look on that salver, which I did, and admired it much, for it was a very fine one indeed. "You may see," said he, "I resolve to have more of your company, for my servant shall leave you that plate for my use." I told him I believed his highness would not take it ill that I was not furnished fit to entertain a person of his rank, and that I would take great care of it, and value myself infinitely upon the honour of his highness's visit.

It now began to grow late, and he began to take notice of it. "But," says he, "I cannot leave you; have you not a spare lodging for one night? I told him I had but a homely lodging to entertain such a guest. He said something exceeding kind on that head, but not fit to repeat, adding, that my company would make him amends.

About midnight he sent his gentleman on an errand, after telling him aloud that he intended to stay here all night. In a little time his gentleman brought him a night-gown, slippers, two caps, a neckcloth, and shirt, which he gave me to carry into his chamber, and sent his man home; and then, turning to me, said I should do him the honour to be his chamberlain of the household and his dresser also. I smiled, and told him I would do myself the honour to wait on him upon all occasions.

About one in the morning, while his gentleman was yet with him, I begged leave to withdraw, supposing he would go to bed; but he took the hint, and said, "I am not going to bed yet, pray let me see you again."

I took this time to undress me, and to come in a new dress, which was in a manner une dishabille, but so fine, and all about me so clean and so agreeable, that he seemed surprised. "I thought," says he, "you could not have dressed to more advantage than you had done before; but now," says he, "you charm me a thousand times more, if that be possible."

"It is only a loose habit, my lord," said I, "that I may the better wait on your highness." He pulled me to him. "You are perfectly obliging," says he, "and," sitting on the bed-side, "now you shall be a princess, and know what it is to oblige the most grateful man alive:" and, with that, he took me in his arms. I can go no further in the particulars of what passed at that time, but it ended in this, that, in short, I lay with him all that night.

I have given you the whole detail of this story to lay it down as a black scheme of the way how unhappy women are ruined by great men; for though poverty and want is an irresistible temptation to the poor, vanity and great things are as irresistible to others. To be courted by a prince, and by a prince who was first a benefactor and then an admirer; to be called handsome, the finest woman in France, and to be treated as a woman fit for the bed of a prince; these are things a woman must have no vanity in her, nay, no corruption in her, that is not overcome by it; and my case was such that, as before, I had enough of both.

I had now no poverty attending me; on the contrary, I was mistress of ten thousand pounds before the prince did anything for me. Had I been mistress of my resolution; had I been less obliging, and rejected the first attack, all had been safe; but my virtue was lost before, and the devil, who had found the way to break in upon me by one temptation, easily mastered me now by another; and I gave myself up to a person, who, though a man of high dignity, was yet the most tempting and obliging that ever I met with in my life.

I had the same particulars to insist upon here with the prince as I had with my gentleman before. I hesitated much at consenting at first asking, but the prince told me princes did not court like other men; that they brought more powerful arguments; and he very prettily added, that they were sooner repulsed than other men, and ought to be sooner complied with; intimating, though very genteely, that after a woman had positively refused him once, he could not, like other men, wait with importunities and stratagems, and laying long sieges; but as such men as he stormed warmly, so, if repulsed, they made no second attacks: and, indeed, it was reasonable; for as it was below their rank to be long battering a woman's constancy, so they ran greater hazards in being exposed in their amours than other men did.

I took this for a satisfactory answer, and told his highness that I had the same thoughts in respect to the manner of his attacks; for that his person and his arguments were irresistible; that a person of his rank, and a munificence so unbounded, could not be withstood; that no virtue was proof against him, except such as was able to suffer martyrdom; that I thought it impossible I could be overcome, but that now I found it impossible I should not be overcome; that so much goodness, joined with so much greatness, would have conquered a saint; and that I confess he had the victory over me, by a merit infinitely superior to the conquest he had made.

He made me a most obliging answer; told me abundance of fine things, which still flattered my vanity, till at last I began to have pride enough to believe him, and fancied myself a fit mistress for a prince.

As I had thus given the prince the last favour, and he had all the freedom with me that it was possible for me to grant, so he gave me leave to use as much freedom with him another way, and that was to have everything of him I thought fit to command; and yet I did not ask of him with an air of avarice, as if I was greedily making a penny of him, but I managed him with such art that he generally anticipated my demands. He only requested of me that I would not think of taking another house, as I had intimated to his highness I intended to do, not thinking it good enough to receive his visits in; but he said my house was the most convenient that could possibly be found in all Paris for an amour, especially for him, having a way out into three streets, and not overlooked by any neighbours, so that he could pass and repass without observation; for one of the back ways opened into a narrow dark alley, which alley was a thoroughfare or passage out of one street into another; and any person that went in or out by the door had no more to do but to see that there was nobody following him in the alley before he went in at the door. This request I knew was reasonable, and therefore I assured him I would not change my dwelling, seeing his highness did not think it too mean for me to receive him in.

He also desired me that I would not take any more servants, or set up any equipage, at least for the present; for that it would then be immediately concluded I had been left very rich, and then I should be thronged with the impertinence of admirers, who would be attracted by the money, as well as by the beauty of a young widow, and he should be frequently interrupted in his visits; or that the world would conclude I was maintained by somebody, and would be indefatigable to find out the person; so that he should have spies peeping at him every time he went out or in, which it would be impossible to disappoint; and that he should presently have it talked over all the toilets in Paris that the Prince de — had got the jeweller's widow for a mistress.

This was too just to oppose, and I made no scruple to tell his highness that since he had stooped so low as to make me his own, he ought to have all the satisfaction in the world; that I was all his own; that I would take all the measures he should please to direct me to avoid the impertinent attacks of others; and that, if he thought fit, I would be wholly within doors, and have it given out that I was obliged to go to England to solicit my affairs there, after my husband's misfortunes, and that I was not expected there again for at least a year or two. This he liked very well, only he said that he would by no means have me confined; that it would injure my health, and that I should then take a country house in some village, a good way from the city, where it should not be known who I was, and that he should be there sometimes to divert me.

I made no scruple of the confinement, and told his highness no place could be a confinement where I had such a visitor, and so I put off the country house, which would have been to remove myself further from him, and have less of his company; so I made the house be, as it were, shut up. Amy, indeed, appeared, and when any of the neighbours or servants enquired, she answered, in broken French, that I was gone to England to look after my affairs, which presently went current through the streets about us. For you are to note, that the people of Paris, especially the women, are the most busy and impertinent inquirers into the conduct of their neighbours, especially that of a single woman, that are in the world, though there are no greater intriguers in the universe than themselves; and perhaps that may be the reason of it, for it is an old but a sure rule, that,—

"When deep intrigues are close and shy,
The guilty are the first that spy."

Thus his highness had the most easy, and yet the most undiscoverable access to me imaginable, and he seldom failed to come two or three nights in a week, and sometimes stayed two or three nights together. Once he told me he was resolved I should be weary of his company, and that he would learn to know what it was to be a prisoner; so he gave out among his servants that he was gone to ——— where he often went a hunting, and that he should not return under a fortnight; and that fortnight he stayed wholly with me, and never went out of my doors.

Never woman, in such a station, lived a fortnight in so complete a fulness of human delight; for to have the entire possession of one of the most accomplished princes in the world, and of the politest best-bred man; to converse with him all day, and as he professed, charm him all night; what could be more inexpressibly pleasing, and especially to a woman of a vast deal of pride, as I was?

To finish the felicity of this part, I must not forget that the devil had played a new game with me, and prevailed with me to satisfy myself with this amour, as a lawful thing; that a prince of such grandeur and majesty, so infinitely superior to me, and one who had made such an introduction by an unparalleled bounty, I could not resist: and therefore, that it was very lawful for me to do it, being at this time perfectly single, and unengaged to any other man, as I was, most certainly, by the unaccountable absence of my first husband, and the murder of my gentleman who went for my second.

It cannot be doubted but that I was the easier to persuade myself of the truth of such a doctrine as this, when it was so much for my ease, and for the repose of my mind, to have it be so.

"In things we wish, 'tis easy to deceive,
What we would have we willingly believe."

Besides, I had no casuists to resolve this doubt; the same devil that put this into my head bade me go to any of the Romish clergy, and, under the pretence of confession, state the case exactly, and I should see they would either resolve it to be no sin at all, or absolve me upon the easiest penance. This I had a strong inclination to try, but I know not what scruple put me off to it, for I could never bring myself to like having to do with those priests; and though it was strange that I, who had thus prostituted my chastity, and given up all sense of virtue, in two such particular cases, living a life of open adultery, should scruple anything; yet so it was. I argued with myself that I could not be a cheat in anything that was esteemed sacred; that I could not be of one opinion, and then pretend myself to be of another; nor could I go to confession, who knew nothing of the manner of it, and should betray myself to the priest to be an Hugonot, and then might come into trouble; but, in short, though I was a whore, yet I was a Protestant whore, and could not act as if I was Popish, upon any account whatsoever.

But, I say, I satisfied myself with the surprising occasion, that, as it was all irresistible, so it was all lawful; for that heaven would not suffer us to be punished for that which it was not possible for us to avoid; and with these absurdities I kept conscience from giving me any considerable disturbance in all this matter; and I was as perfectly easy as to the lawfulness of it, as if I had been married to the prince, and had had no other husband: so possible is it for us to roll ourselves up in wickedness, till we grow invulnerable by conscience; and that sentinel once dozed, sleeps fast, not to be awakened while the tide of pleasure continues to flow, or till something dark and dreadful brings us to ourselves again.

I have, I confess, wondered at the stupidity that my intellectual part was under all that while; what lethargic fumes dozed the soul; and how it was possible that I, who in the case before, where the temptation was many ways more forcible, and the arguments stronger, and more irresistible, was yet under a continued inquietude, on account of the wicked life I led, could now live in the most profound tranquillity, and with an uninterrupted peace, nay, even rising up to satisfaction and joy, and yet in a more palpable state of adultery than before; for before, my gentleman, who called me wife, had the pretence of his wife being parted from him, refusing to do the duty of her office as a wife to him. As for me, my circumstances were the same; but as for the prince, as he had a fine and extraordinary lady, or princess, of his own, so he had two or three mistresses more besides me, and made no scruple of it at all.

However, I say, as to my own part, I enjoyed myself in perfect tranquillity; and as the prince was the only deity I worshipped, so I was really his idol; and however it was with his princess, I assure you his other mistresses found a sensible difference, and though they could never find me out, yet I had good intelligence that they guessed very well that their lord had got some new favourite that robbed them of his company, and, perhaps, of some of his usual bounty too. And now I must mention the sacrifices he made to his idol, and they were not a few, I assure you.

As he loved like a prince, so he rewarded like a prince, for though he declined my making a figure, as above, he let me see that he was above doing it for the saving the expense of it, and so he told me, and that he would make it up in other things. First of all, he sent me a toilet, with the appurtenances of silver, even so much as the frame of the table; and then for the house he gave me the table, or sideboard of plate I mentioned above, with all things belonging to it, of massy silver, so that, in short, I could not for my life study to ask him for anything of plate which I had not.

He could then accommodate me in nothing more but jewels and clothes, or money for clothes; he sent his gentleman to the mercer's, and bought me a suit, or whole piece, of the finest brocaded silk, figured with gold, and another with silver, and another of crimson, so that I had three suits of clothes, such as the queen of France would not have disdained to have worn at that time; yet I went out nowhere; but as those were for me to put on when I went out of mourning, I dressed myself in them, one after another, always when his highness came to see me.

I had no less than five several morning dresses besides these, so that I need never be seen twice in the same dress; to these he added several parcels of fine linen and of lace, so much that I had no room to ask for more, or, indeed, for so much.

I took the liberty once, in our freedoms, to tell him he was too bountiful, and that I was too chargeable to him for a mistress, and that I would be his faithful servant at less expense to him; and that he not only left me no room to ask him for anything, but that he supplied me with such a profusion of good things that I scarce could wear them, or use them unless I kept a great equipage, which he knew was no way convenient for him or for me: he smiled, and took me in his arms, and told me he was resolved, while I was his, I should never be able to ask him for anything, but that he would be daily asking new favours of me.

After we were up, (for this conference was in bed) he desired I would dress me in the best suit of clothes I had. It was a day or two after the three suits were made and brought home. I told him, if he pleased, I would rather dress me in that suit which I knew he liked best. He asked me how I could know that before he had seen them. I told him I would presume for once to guess at his fancy by my own; so I went away and dressed me in the second suit, brocaded with silver, and returned in full dress, with a suit of lace upon my head, which would have been worth in England £200 sterling; and I was every way set out as well as Amy could dress me, who was a very genteel dresser too. In this figure I came to him, out of my dressing room, which opened with folding doors into his bedchamber.

He sat as one astonished a good while, looking at me, without speaking a word, till I came quite up to him, kneeled on one knee to him, and almost, whether he would or no, kissed his hand. He took me up, and stood up himself, but was surprised when, taking me in his arms, he perceived tears to run down my cheeks. "My dear," says he, aloud, "what mean these tears?"—"My lord," said I, after some little check, for I could not speak presently, "I beseech you to believe me, they are not tears of sorrow, but tears of joy. It is impossible for me to see myself snatched from the misery I was fallen into, and at once to be in the arms of a prince of such goodness, such immense bounty, and be treated in such a manner; it is not possible, my lord," said I, "to contain the satisfaction of it; and it will break out in an excess in some measure proportioned to your immense bounty, and to the affection which your highness treats me with, who am so infinitely below you."

It would look a little too much like a romance here to repeat all the kind things he said to me on that occasion, but I cannot omit one passage; as he saw the tears drop down my cheeks, he pulls out a fine cambric handkerchief, and was going to wipe the tears off, but checked his hand, as if he was afraid to deface something; nay, he checked his hand, and tossed the handkerchief to me to do it myself. I took the hint immediately, and with a kind of pleasant disdain, "How, my lord," said I, "have you kissed me so often, and don't you know whether I am painted or not? Pray let your highness satisfy yourself that you have no cheats put upon you; for once let me be vain enough to say, I have not deceived you with false colours." With this, I put a handkerchief into his hand, and taking his hand into mine, I made him wipe my face so hard that he was unwilling to do it, for fear of hurting me.

He appeared surprised more than ever, and swore, which was the first time that I had heard him swear from my first knowing him, that he could not have believed there was any such skin without paint in the world. "Well, my lord," said I, "your highness shall have a further demonstration than this; as to that which you are pleased to accept for beauty, it is the mere work of nature;" and with that I stepped to the door, and rung a little bell for Amy, and bid her bring me a cup full of hot water, which she did; and when it was come, I desired his highness to feel if it was warm, which he did, and I immediately washed my face all over with it before him. This was, indeed, more than satisfaction, that is to say, than believing, for it was an undeniable demonstration, and he kissed my cheeks and breasts a thousand times, with expressions of the greatest surprise imaginable.

Nor was I a very indifferent figure as to shape; though I had two children by my gentleman, and six by my true husband, I say, I was no despicable shape; and my prince (I must be allowed the vanity to call him so) was taking his view of me as I walked from one end of the room to the other. At last he leads me to the darkest part of the room, and standing behind me, bid me hold up my head, when putting both his hands round my neck, as if he was spanning my neck, to see how small it was, for it was long and small, he held my neck so long and so hard in his hand, that I complained he hurt me a little. What he did it for, I knew not, nor had I the least suspicion but that he was spanning my neck; but when I said he hurt me, he seemed to let me go, and in a half a minute more led me to a pier glass, and behold I saw my neck clasped with a fine necklace of diamonds; whereas I felt no more what he was doing than if he had really done nothing at all, nor did I suspect it in the least. If I had an ounce of blood in me that did not fly up in my face, neck, and breasts, it must be from some interruption in the vessels. I was all on fire with the sight, and began to wonder what it was that was coming to me.

However, to let him see that I was not unqualified to receive benefits, I turned about: "My lord," says I, "your highness is resolved to conquer, by your bounty the very gratitude of your servants; you will leave no room for anything but thanks, and make those thanks useless too, by their bearing no proportion to the occasion."

"I love, child," says he, "to see everything suitable. A fine gown and petticoat, a fine laced head, a fine face and neck and no necklace, would not have made the object perfect. But why that blush, my dear?" says the prince. "My lord," said I, "all your gifts call for blushes, but above all I blush to receive what I am so little able to merit, and may become so ill also."

Thus far I am a standing mark of the weakness of great men in their vice, that value not squandering away immense wealth upon the most worthless creatures; or, to sum it up in a word, they raise the value of the object which they pretend to pitch upon by their fancy. I say, raise the value of it at their own expense; give vast presents for a ruinous favour which is so far from being equal to the price, that nothing will at last prove more absurd than the cost men are at to purchase their own destruction.

I could not, in the height of all these fine doings, I say, I could not be without some just reflection, though conscience was, as I said, dumb as to any disturbance it gave me in my wickedness. My vanity was fed up to such a height, that I had no room to give way to such reflections. But I could not but sometimes look back with astonishment at the folly of men of quality, who, immense in their bounty as in their wealth, give to a profusion and without bounds to the most scandalous of our sex, for granting them the liberty of amusing themselves and ruining both.

I, that knew what this carcase of mine had been but a few years before; how overwhelmed with grief, drowned in tears, frightened with the prospect of beggary, and surrounded with rags and fatherless children, that was pawning and selling the rags that covered me for a dinner, and sat on the ground despairing of help, and expecting to be starved till my children were snatched from me to be kept by the parish; I, that was after this a whore for bread, and abandoning conscience and virtue, lived with another woman's husband; I that was despised by all my relations and my husband's too; I, that was left so entirely desolate, friendless, and helpless, that I knew not how to get the least help to keep me from starving; that I should be caressed by a prince, for the honour of having the scandalous use of my prostituted body, common before to his inferiors, and perhaps would not have denied one of his footmen but a little while before, if I could have got my bread by it.

I say, I could not but reflect upon the brutality and blindness of mankind; that because nature had given me a good skin and some agreeable features, should suffer that beauty to be such a bait to appetite, as to do such sordid unaccountable things to obtain the possession of it.

It is for this reason that I have so largely set down the particulars of the caresses I was treated with by the jeweller, and also by this prince. Not to make the story an incentive to the vice, which I am now such a sorrowful penitent for being guilty of, (God forbid any should make so vile a use of so good a design,) but to draw the just picture of a man enslaved to the rage of his vicious appetite; how he defaces the image of God in his soul; dethrones his reason, causes conscience to abdicate the possession, and exalts sense into the vacant throne; how he deposes the man and exalts the brute.

Oh! could we hear now the reproaches this great man afterwards loaded himself with, when he grew weary of this admired creature, and became sick of his vice! how profitable would the report of them be to the reader of this story; but had he himself also known the dirty history of my actings upon the stage of life, that little time I had been in the world, how much more severe would those reproaches have been upon himself, but I shall come to this again.

I lived in this gay sort of retirement almost three years, in which time no amour of such a kind, sure, was ever carried up so high. The prince knew no bounds to his munificence; he could give me nothing either for my wearing, or using, or eating, or drinking, more than he had done from the beginning.

His presents were after that in gold, and very frequent and large, often a hundred pistoles, never less than fifty at a time; and I must do myself the justice, that I seemed rather backward to receive, than craving and encroaching; not that I had not an avaricious temper, nor was it that I did not foresee that this was my harvest in which I was to gather up, and that it would not last long; but it was that really his bounty always anticipated my expectations, and even my wishes; and he gave me money so fast, that he rather poured it in upon me than left me room to ask it; so that before I could spend fifty pistoles, I had always a hundred to make it up.

After I had been near a year and a half in his arms as above, or thereabouts, I proved with child. I did not take any notice of it to him till I was satisfied that I was not deceived; when one morning early, when we were in bed together, I said to him, "My lord, I doubt your highness never gives yourself leave to think what the case should be, if I should have the honour to be with child by you."—"Why, my dear," says he, "we are able to keep it if such a thing should happen. I hope you are not concerned about that."—"No, my lord," said I, "I should think myself very happy if I could bring your highness a son; I should hope to see him a lieutenant-general of the king's armies by the interest of his father, and by his own merit."—"Assure yourself, child," says he, "if it should be so, I will not refuse owning him for my son, though it be as they call it, a natural son; and shall never slight or neglect him for the sake of his mother." Then he began to importune me to know if it were so, but I positively denied it so long, till at last I was able to give him the satisfaction of knowing it himself by the motion of the child within me.

He professed himself overjoyed at the discovery, but told me that now it was absolutely necessary for me to quit the confinement which, he said, I had suffered for his sake, and to take a house somewhere in the country, in order for health as well as for privacy, against my lying-in. This was quite out of my way, but the prince, who was a man of pleasure, had, it seems, several retreats of this kind, which he had made use of, I suppose, upon like occasions; and so leaving it, as it were, to his gentleman, he provided a very convenient house, about four miles south of Paris, at the village of —, where I had very agreeable lodgings, good gardens, and all things very easy to my content; but one thing did not please me at all, viz. that an old woman was provided, and put into the house to furnish everything necessary to my lying-in, and to assist at my travail.

I did not like this old woman at all; she looked so like a spy upon me, or (as sometimes I was frightened to imagine) like one set privately to dispatch me out of the world, as might best suit with the circumstances of my lying-in; and when his highness came the next time to see me, which was not many days, I expostulated a little on the subject of the old woman; and by the management of my tongue, as well as by the strength of my reasoning, I convinced him that it would not be at all convenient; that it would be the greater risk on his side; and at first or at last it would certainly expose him and me also. I assured him that my servant, being an English woman, never knew to that hour who his highness was; that I always called him the Count de Clerac, and that she knew nothing else of him, nor ever should; that if he would give me leave to choose proper persons for my use, it should be so ordered, that not one of them should know who he was, or perhaps ever see his face; and that for the reality of the child that should be born, his highness who had alone been at the first of it, should, if he pleased, be present in the room all the time, so that he would need no witnesses on that account.

This discourse fully satisfied him, so that he ordered his gentleman to dismiss the old woman the same day, and without any difficulty I sent my maid Amy to Calais, and thence to Dover, where she got an English midwife and nurse, to come over on purpose to attend an English lady of quality, as they stiled me, for four months certain.

This midwife Amy had agreed to pay a hundred guineas to, and bear her charges to Paris and back again to Dover. The poor woman that was to be my nurse had twenty pounds, and the same charges as the other.

I was very easy when Amy returned, and the more because she brought with the midwife a good motherly sort of a woman, who was to be her assistant, and would be very helpful on occasion; and bespoke a man-midwife at Paris too, if there should be any necessity for his help. Having thus made provision for everything, the count, for so we all called him in public, came as often to see me as I could expect, and continued exceeding kind, as he had always been. One day, conversing together upon the subject of my being with child, I told him how all things were in order, but that I had a strange apprehension that I should die with that child. He smiled, "So all ladies say, my dear," says he, "when they are with child."—"Well, however, my lord," said I, "it is but just that care should be taken that what you have bestowed in your excess of bounty upon me should not be lost;" and upon this I pulled a paper out of my bosom, folded up, but not sealed, and I read it to him, wherein I had ordered that all the plate and jewels, and fine furniture which his highness had given me, should be restored to him by my woman, and the keys be immediately delivered to his gentleman, in case of disaster.

Then I recommended my woman, Amy, to his favour for a hundred pistoles, on condition she gave up the keys as above to his gentleman, and his gentleman's receipt for them. When he saw this, "My dear child," said he, and took me in his arms, "what! have you been making your will and disposing of your effects? Pray who do you make your universal heir?"—"So far as to do justice to your highness, in case of mortality, I have, my lord," said I, "and who should I dispose the valuable things to, which I have had from your hand as pledges of your favour and testimonies of your bounty, but to the giver of them? If the child should live, your highness will, I do not question, act like yourself in that part, and I shall have the utmost satisfaction that it will be well used by your direction."

I could see he took this very well. "I have forsaken all the ladies in Paris," says he, "for you, and I have lived every day since I knew you to see that you know to merit all that a man of honour can do for you. Be easy, child, I hope you will not die, and all you have is your own, to do with it what you please."

I was then within about two months of my time, and that soon wore off. When I found my time was come, it fell out very happily that he was in the house, and I entreated he would continue a few hours in the house, which he agreed to. They called his highness to come into the room, if he pleased, as I had offered and had desired him; and I sent word I would make as few cries as possible to prevent disturbing him. He came into the room once, and called to me to be of good courage, it would soon be over, and then he withdrew again; and in about half an hour more Amy carried him the news that I was delivered, and had brought him a charming boy. He gave her ten pistoles for her news, stayed till they had adjusted things about me, and then came into the room again, cheered me and spoke kindly to me, and looked on the child, then withdrew, and came again the next day to visit me.

Since this, and when I have looked back upon these things with eyes unpossessed with crime, when the wicked part has appeared in its clearer light, and I have seen it in its own natural colours, when no more blinded with the glittering appearances, which at that time deluded me, as in like cases, if I may guess at others by myself, too much possessed the mind. I say, since this, I have often wondered with what pleasure or satisfaction the prince could look upon the poor innocent infant, which, though his own, and that he might that way have some attachment in his affections to it, yet must always afterwards be a remembrance to him of his most early crime, and, which was worse, must bear upon itself, unmerited, an eternal mark of infamy, which should be spoken of, upon all occasions, to its reproach, from the folly of its father and wickedness of its mother.

Great men are indeed delivered from the burden of their natural children, or bastards, as to their maintenance. This is the main affliction in other cases, where there is no substance sufficient without breaking into the fortunes of the family. In those cases, either a man's legitimate children suffer, which is very unnatural, or the unfortunate mother of that illegitimate birth, a dreadful alternative, either of being turned off with her child, and be left to starve, &c., or of seeing the poor infant packed off with a piece of money to some of those she-butchers, who take children off their hands, as it is called, that is to say, starve them, and in a word, murder them.

Great men, I say, are delivered from this burden, because they are always furnished to supply the expense of their out of the way offspring, by making little assignments upon the bank of Lyons, or the Town-house of Paris, and settling those sums, to be received for the maintenance of such expense as they see cause.

Thus, in the case of this child of mine, while he and I conversed, there was no need to make any appointment as an appendage or maintenance for the child or its nurse, for he supplied me more than sufficiently for all those things; but afterwards, when time, and a particular circumstance, put an end to our conversing together, as such things always meet with a period, and generally break off abruptly, I say, after that, I found he appointed the children a settled allowance, by an assignment of annual rent upon the bank of Lyons, which was sufficient for bringing them handsomely, though privately, up in the world, and that not in a manner unworthy of their father's blood, though I came to be sunk and forgotten in the case; nor did the children ever know anything of their mother to this day, other than as you may have an account hereafter.

But to look back to the particular observation I was making, which I hope may be of use to those who read my story, I say it was something wonderful to me to see this person so exceedingly delighted at the birth of this child, and so pleased with it; for he would sit and look at it, and with an air of seriousness sometimes, a great while together, and particularly, I observed, he loved to look at it when it was asleep.

It was indeed a lovely, charming child, and had a certain vivacity in its countenance that is far from being common to all children so young, and he would often say to me, that he believed there was something extraordinary in the child, and he did not doubt but he would come to be a great man.

I could never hear him say so, but though secretly it pleased me, yet it so closely touched me another way that I could not refrain sighing, and sometimes tears; and one time in particular it so affected me that I could not conceal it from him; but when he saw tears run down my face there was no concealing the occasion from him; he was too importunate to be denied in a thing of that moment, so I frankly answered: "It sensibly affects me, my lord," said I, "that whatever the merit of this little creature may be, he must always have a bend on his arms. The disaster of his birth will be always, not only a blot to his honour, but a bar to his fortunes in the world. Our affections will still be ever his affliction, and his mother's crime be the son's reproach; the blot can never be wiped out by the most glorious actions; nay, if it lives to raise a family," said I, "the infamy must descend even to its innocent posterity."

He took the thought, and sometimes told me afterwards that it made a deeper impression on him than he discovered to me at that time; but for the present he put it off with telling me these things could not be helped; that they served for a spur to the spirits of brave men, inspired them with the principles of gallantry, and prompted them to brave actions; that though it might be true that the mention of illegitimacy might attend the name, yet that personal virtue placed a man of honour above the reproach of his birth; that, as he had no share in the offence, he could have no concern at the blot; when, having by his own merit placed himself out of the reach of scandal, his fame should drown the memory of his beginning.

That as it was usual for men of quality to make such little escapes, so the number of their natural children were so great, and they generally took such good care of their education, that some of the greatest men in the world had a bend in their coat of arms, and that it was of no consequence to them, especially when their fame began to rise upon the basis of their acquired merit; and upon this he began to reckon up to me some of the greatest families in France and in England also.

This carried off our discourse for a time; but I went further with him once, removing the discourse from the part attending our children to the reproach which those children would be apt to throw upon us, their originals; and, when speaking a little too feelingly on the subject, he began to receive the impression a little deeper than I wished he had done. At last he told me I had almost acted the confessor to him; that I might, perhaps, preach a more dangerous doctrine to him than we should either of us like, or than I was aware of; "For, my dear," says he, "if once we come to talk of repentance, we must talk of parting."

If tears were in my eyes before, they now flowed too fast to be restrained, and I gave him but too much satisfaction by my looks that I had yet no reflections upon my mind strong enough to go that length, and that I could no more think of parting than he could.

He said a great many kind things, which were great, like himself; and, extenuating our crime, intimated to me that he could no more part with me than I could with him; so we both, as I may say, even against our light, and against our conviction, concluded to sin on; indeed, his affection to the child was one great tie to him, for he was extremely fond of it.

This child lived to be a considerable man. He was first an officer of the Garde du Corps of France, and afterwards colonel of a regiment of dragoons in Italy; and on many extraordinary occasions showed that he was not unworthy such a father, but many ways deserving a legitimate birth, and a better mother, of which hereafter.

I think I may say now that I lived indeed like a queen; or, if you will have me confess, that my condition had still the reproach of a whore; I may say I was, sure, the queen of whores; for no woman was ever more valued or more caressed by a person of such quality only in the station of a mistress. I had, indeed, one deficiency which women in such circumstances seldom are chargeable; namely, I craved nothing of him. I never asked him for anything in my life, nor suffered myself to be made use of, as is too much the custom of mistresses, to ask favours for others. His bounty always prevented me in the first, and my strict concealing myself in the last, which was no less to my convenience than to his.

The only favour I ever asked of him was for his gentleman, whom he had all along entrusted with the secret of our affair, and who once so much offended him by some omissions in his duty that he found it very hard to make his peace. He came and laid his case before my woman Amy, and begged her to speak to me to intercede for him, which I did, and on my account he was received again and pardoned, for which the grateful dog requited me by getting to bed to his benefactress, Amy, at which I was very angry; but Amy generously acknowledged that it was her fault as much as his; that she loved the fellow so much that she believed if he had not asked her she should have asked him; I say this pacified me, and I only obtained of her that she should not let him know that I knew it.

I might have interspersed this part of my story with a great many pleasant parts and discourses which happened between my maid Amy and me, but I omit them on account of my own story, which has been so extraordinary. However, I must mention something as to Amy and her gentleman.

I inquired of Amy upon what terms they came to be so intimate, but Amy seemed backward to explain herself. I did not care to press her upon a question of that nature, knowing that she might have answered my question with a question, and have said,—“Why, how did you and the prince come to be so intimate?” so I left off further inquiring into it, till, after some time, she told it me all freely of her own accord, which, to cut it short, amounted to no more than this, that, like mistress like maid, as they had many leisure hours together below, while they waited respectively when his lord and I were together above; I say, they could hardly avoid the usual question one to another; namely, why might not they do the same thing below that we did above?

On that account, indeed, as I said above, I could not find in my heart to be angry with Amy. I was, indeed, afraid the girl would have been with child too, but that did not happen, and so there was no hurt done; for Amy had been harrassed before, as well as her mistress, and by the same party too, as you have heard.

After I was up again, and my child provided with a good nurse, and, withal, winter coming on, it was proper to think of coming to Paris again, which I did; but as I had now a coach and horses, and some servants to attend me, by my lord's allowance, I took the liberty to have them come to Paris sometimes, and so to take a tour into the gardens of the Thuilleries, and other pleasant places of the city. It happened one day that my prince (if I may call him so) had a mind to give me some diversion, and to take the air with me; but, that he might do it and not be publicly known, he comes to me in a coach of the Count de , a great officer of the court, attended by his liveries also; so that, in a word, it was impossible to guess by the equipage who I was, or whom I belonged to; also that I might be the more effectually concealed, he ordered me to be taken up at a mantua-maker's house, where he sometimes came, whether upon other amours or not was no business of mine to inquire. I knew nothing whither he intended to carry me; but when he was in the coach with me, he told me he had ordered his servant to go to court with me, and he would show me some of the beau monde. I told him I cared not where I went while I had the honour to have him with me; so he carried me to the fine palace of Meudon, where the Dauphin then was, and where he had some particular intimacy with one of the Dauphin's domestics, who procured a retreat for me in his lodgings while we stayed there, which was three or four days.

While I was there the king happened to come from Versailles, and, making but a short stay, visited Madame the Dauphiness, who was then living. The prince was here incognito, only because of his being with me, and, therefore, when he heard that the king was in the gardens, he kept close within the lodgings; but the gentleman in whose lodgings we were, with his lady and several others, went out to see the king, and I had the honour to be asked to go with them.

After we had seen the king, who did not stay long in the gardens, we walked up the broad terrace, and, crossing the hall towards the great stair-case, I had a sight which confounded me at once, as I doubt not it would have done any woman in the world. The horse guards, or, what they call there, the gens d'armes, had, upon some occasion, been either upon duty, or been reviewed, or something (I did not understand that part) was the matter, that occasioned their being there, I know not what; but, walking the guard-chamber, and with his jack-boots on, and the whole habit of the troop, as it is worn when our horse guards are upon duty, as they call it, at St James's Park; I say, there, to my inexpressible confusion, I saw Mr *, my first husband, the brewer.

I could not be deceived; I passed so near him that I almost brushed him with my clothes, and looked him full in the face; but, having my fan before my face, so that he could not know me. However, I knew him perfectly well, and I heard him speak, which was a second way of knowing him. Besides being, you may be sure, astonished and surprised at such a sight, I turned about after I had passed him some steps, and, pretending to ask the lady that was with me some questions, I stood as if I had viewed the Great Hall, the outer Guard Chamber, and some other things; but I did it to take a full view of his dress, that I might further inform myself.

While I stood thus amusing the lady that was with me with questions, he walked, talking with another man of the same cloth, back again, just by me; and to my particular satisfaction, or dissatisfaction, take it which way you will, I heard him speak English, the other being, it seems, an Englishman.

I then asked the lady some other questions: “Pray, madam,” says I, “what are these troopers here; are they the king's guards?”—“No,” says she, “they are the gens d'armes; a small detachment of them, I suppose, attended the king to-day, but they are not his Majesty's ordinary guard.” Another lady that was with her said, “No, madam, it seems that this is not the case; for I heard them saying, the gens d'armes were here to-day by special order, some of them being to march towards the Rhine, and these attend for orders; but they go back to-morrow to Orleans, where they are expected."

This satisfied me in part, but I found means after this to inquire whose particular troop it was that the gentlemen that were here belonged to; and with that I heard they would all be at Paris the week after.

Two days after we returned for Paris, when I took occasion to speak to my lord, that I heard the gens d'armes were to be in the city the next week, and I should be charmed with seeing them march if they came in a body. He was so obliging in such things that I need but name a thing of that kind and it was done; so he ordered his gentleman (I should now call him him Amy's gentleman) to get me a place in a certain house where I might see them march.

As he did not appear with me on this occasion, so I had the liberty of taking my woman, Amy, with me, and stood where we were very well accommodated for the observation which I was to make. I told Amy what I had seen, and she was as forward to make the discovery as I was to have her, and almost as much surprised at the thing itself. In a word, the gens d'armes entered the city, as was expected, and made a most glorious show indeed, being new clothed and armed, and being to have their standards blessed by the Archbishop of Paris on this occasion, they indeed looked very gay; and as they marched very leisurely, I had time to take as critical a view, and make as nice a search among them as I pleased. Here, in a particular rank, eminent for one monstrous sized man on the right, here, I say, I saw my gentleman again, and a very handsome jolly fellow he was as any in the troop, though not so monstrous large as that great one I speak of who, it seems, was, however, a gentleman of a very good family in Gascoigne, and was called the giant of Gascoigne.

It was a kind of good fortune to us, among the other circumstances of it, that something caused the troop to halt in their march, a little before that particular rank came right against that window which I stood in, so that then we had occasion to take our full view of him, at a small distance, and so as not to doubt of his being the same person.

Amy, who thought she might, on many accounts, venture with more safety to be particular than I could, asked her gentleman how a particular man, who she saw there among the gens d'armes might be inquired after and found out; she having seen an Englishman riding there who was supposed to be dead in England for several years before she came out of London, and that his wife had married again. It was a question the gentleman did not well understand how to answer; but another person that stood by told her if she would tell him the gentleman's name, he would endeavour to find him out for her, and asked her, jestingly, if he was her lover? Amy put that off with a laugh, but still continued her inquiry, and in such a manner as the gentleman easily perceived she was in earnest, for he left bantering, and asked her in which part of the troop he rode. She foolishly told him his name, which she should not have done; and pointing to the cornet that troop carried, which was not then quite out of sight, she let him early know whereabouts he rode, only she could not name the captain. However, he gave her such directions afterwards that, in short, Amy, who was an indefatigable girl, found him out. In seems he had changed his name, not supposing any inquiry would be made after him here; but, I say, Amy found him out, and went boldly to his quarters, asked for him, and he came out to her immediately.

I believe I was not more confounded at my first seeing him at Meudon then he was at seeing Amy. He started and turned pale as death; Amy believed if he had seen her at first, in any convenient place for so villainous a purpose, he would have murdered her.

But he started, as I said before, and asked in English, with an admiration, "What are you?" "Sir," says she, "dost you know me?"—"Yes," says he, "I knew you when you were alive, but what you are now (whether ghost or substance) I know not."—"Be not afraid, sir, of that," says Amy, "I am the same Amy that I was in your service, and do not speak to you now for any hurt, but that I saw you accidentally yesterday ride among the soldiers, I thought you might be glad to hear from your friends at London."—"Well, Amy," says he, "then (having a little recovered himself) how does everybody do? What! is your mistress here?" Thus they began:

Amy. My mistress, sir, alas! Not the mistress you mean, poor gentlewoman, you left her in a sad condition.

Gent. Why that is true, Amy, but it could not be helped; I was in a sad condition myself.

Amy. I believe so, indeed, sir, or else you had not gone away as you did; for it was a very terrible condition you left them all in, that I must say.

Gent. What did they do after I was gone?

Amy. Do, sir! very miserably you may be sure; how could it be otherwise?

Gent. Well, that is true indeed; but you may tell me, Amy, what became of them, if you please; for though I went so away, it was not because I did not love them all very well, but because I could not bear to see the poverty that was coming upon them, and which it was not in my power to help; what could I do?

Amy. Nay, I believe so, indeed, and I have heard my mistress say, many times, she did not doubt but your affliction was as great as her's, almost, wherever you were.

Gent. Why, did she believe I was alive, then?

Amy. Yes, sir, she always said she believed you were alive, because she thought she would have heard something of you had you been dead.

Gent. Ay, ay, my perplexity was very great, indeed, or else I had never gone away.

Amy. It was very cruel though to the poor lady, sir, my mistress; she almost broke her heart for you at first, for fear of what might befall you, and at least because she could not hear from you.

Gent. Alas! Amy, what could I do? Things were driven to the last extremity before I went; I could have done nothing but help to starve them all if I had stayed; and beside I could not bear to see it,

Amy. You know, sir, that I can say little to what passed before, but I was a melancholy witness to the sad distresses of my poor mistress so long as I stayed with her, and which would grieve your heart to hear them.*

Gent. Well, Amy, I have heard enough so far, what did she do afterwards?

Amy. I can't give you any further account, sir; my mistress would not let me stay with her any longer; for she said she could neither pay me or subsist me. I told her I would serve her without any wages, but I could not live without victuals, you know; so I was forced to leave her, poor lady, sore against my will, and I heard afterwards, that the landlord seized her goods, so she was turned out of doors: for as I went by the door, about a month after, I saw the house shut up; and about a fortnight after that there were workmen fitting it up, as I suppose for a new tenant; but none of the neighbours could tell me what was become of my poor mistress, only that they said she was so poor that it was next to begging; that some of the neighbouring gentlefolks relieved her, or that else she must have starved."

Then she went on, and told him that after that they never heard any more of (me) her mistress, but that she had been seen once or twice in the city, very shabby, and poor in clothes, and it was thought she worked with her needle for her bread.

All this the jade said with so much cunning, and managed and humoured it so well, and wiped her eyes and cried so artificially, that he took it all as it was intended he should, and once or twice she saw tears in his eyes too. He told her it was a moving, melancholy story, and it had almost broke his heart at first, but that he was driven to the last extremity, and could do nothing but stay and see them all starve, which he could not bear the thoughts of, but should have pistoled himself if any such thing had happened while he was there; that he left (me) his wife, all the money he had in the world but 25*l.*, which was as little as he could take with him to seek his fortune in the world. He could not doubt but that his relations, seeing they were all rich, would have taken the poor children off, and not let them come to the parish; and that his wife was young and handsome, and he thought might marry again, perhaps, to her advantage; and for that very reason he never wrote to her, or let her know he was alive, that she might in a reasonable term of years marry, and perhaps mend her fortunes; that he resolved never to claim her, because he should rejoice to hear that she had settled to her mind; and that he wished there had been a law made to empower a woman to marry if her husband was not heard of in so long a time; which time, he thought, should not be above four years, which was long enough to send word in to a wife or family from any part of the world.

* Here she told my whole story to the time that the parish took off one of my children, and which she perceived very much affected him; and he shook his head, and said some things very bitter when he heard of the cruelty of his own relations to me.

Amy said she could say nothing to that, but this, that she was satisfied her mistress would marry nobody unless she had certain intelligence that he had been dead from somebody that saw him buried; "but, alas," says Amy, "my mistress was reduced to such dismal circumstances that nobody would be so foolish to think of her, unless it had been somebody to go a begging with her."

Amy, then, seeing him so perfectly deluded, made a long and lamentable outcry how she had been deluded away to marry a poor footman; "for he is no worse or better," says she, "though he calls himself a lord's gentleman, and here," says Amy, "he has dragged me over into a strange country to make a beggar of me;" and then she falls a howling again, and snivelling, which by the way, was all hypocrisy, but acted it so to the life as perfectly deceived him, and he gave credit to every word of it.

"Why, Amy," says he, "you are very well dressed, you do not look as if you were in danger of being a beggar."—"Ay, hang 'em," says Amy, "they love to have fine clothes here, if they have never a smock under them; but I love to have money in cash, rather than a chest full of fine clothes. Besides, sir," says she, "most of the clothes I have were given me in the last place I had, when I went away from my mistress."

Upon the whole of the discourse, Amy got out of him what condition he was in, and how he lived, upon her promise to him that if ever she came to England, and should see her old mistress, she should not let her know that he was alive. "Alas! sir," says Amy, "I may never come to see England again as long as I live, and it would be ten thousand to one whether I shall see my old mistress, for how should I know which way to look for her, or what part of England she may be in, not I," says she; "I don't so much as know how to inquire for her; and if I should," says Amy, "ever be so happy as to see her, I would not do her so much mischief as to tell her where you were, sir, unless she was in a condition to help herself and you too." This further deluded him, and made him entirely open in his conversing with her. As to his own circumstances, he told her, she saw him in the highest preferment he had arrived to, or was ever like to arrive at; for having no friends or acquaintance in France, and which was worse, no money, he never expected to rise; that he could have been made a lieutenant to a troop of light horse but the week before, by the favour of an officer in the gens d'armes, who was his friend; but that he must have found 8,000 livres to have paid for it, to the gentleman who possessed it, and had leave given him to sell. "But where could I get 8,000 livres," says he, "that never have been master of 500 livres ready money at a time, since I came into France."

"O dear! sir," says Amy, "I am very sorry to hear you say so; I fancy if you once got up to some preferment, you would think of my old mistress again, and do something for her; poor lady," says Amy, "she wants it, to be sure," and then she falls a crying again; "it is a sad thing, indeed," says she, "that you should be so hard put to it for money, when you had got a friend to recommend you, and should lose it for want of money."—"Ay, so it was, Amy, indeed," says he; "but what can a stranger do that has neither money nor friends?" Here Amy puts in again on my account: "Well," says she, "my poor mistress has had a loss, though she knows nothing of it; O dear! how happy it would have been; to be sure, sir, you would have helped her all you could."—"Aye," says he, "Amy, so I would with all my heart; and even as I am, I would send her some relief, if I thought she wanted it; only letting her know I was alive might do her some prejudice, in case of her settling or marrying anybody."

"Alas," says Amy, "Marry! who will marry her in the poor condition she is in?" And so their discourse ended for that time.

All this was mere talk on both sides, and words of course; for on further inquiry, Amy found that he had no such offer of a lieutenant's commission, or anything like it; and that he rambled in his discourse from one thing to another: but of that in its place.

You may be sure that this discourse, as Amy at first related it, was moving to the last degree upon me; and I was once going to send him the 8,000 livres to purchase the commission he had spoken of; but as I knew his character better than anybody, I was willing to search a little further into it; and so I set Amy to inquire of some other of the troop, to see what character he had, and whether there was anything in the story of a lieutenant's commission or no.

But Amy soon came to a better understanding of him, for she presently learned that he had a most scoundrel character; that there was nothing of weight in anything he said; but that he was in short a mere sharper, one that would stick at nothing to get money, and that there was no depending on anything he said; and that more especially about the lieutenant's commission, she understood that there was nothing in it, but they told her how he had often made use of that sham to borrow money, and move gentlemen to pity him and lend him money, in hopes to get him preferment; that he had reported that he had a wife and five children in England, whom he maintained out of his pay, and by these shifts had run into debt in several places, and upon several complaints of such things, he had been threatened to be turned out of the gens d'armes, and that in that he was not to be believed in anything he said, or trusted on any account.

Upon this information Amy began to cool in her further meddling with him, and told me it was not safe for me to attempt doing him any good, unless I resolved to put him upon suspicions and inquiries which might be to my ruin, in the condition I was now.

I was soon confirmed in this part of his character, for the next time that Amy came to talk with him, he discovered himself more effectually; for while she had put him in hopes of procuring one to advance the money for the lieutenant's commission for him upon easy conditions, he by degrees dropped the discourse, then pretended that it was too late, and that he could not get it, and then descended to ask poor Amy to lend him 500 pistoles.

Amy pretended poverty; that her circumstances were but mean, and that she could not raise such a sum; and this she did, to try him to the utmost; he descended to 300, then to 100, then to 50, and then to a pistole, which she lent him, but he never intending to pay it, played out of her sight as much as he could; and thus being satisfied that he was the same worthless thing he had ever been, I threw off all thoughts of him; whereas, had he been a man of any sense, and of any principle of honour, I had it in my thoughts to retire to England again, send for him over, and have lived honestly with him. But as a fool is the worst of husbands to do a woman good, so a fool is the worst husband a woman can do good to. I would willingly have done him good, but he was not qualified to receive it or make the best use of it. Had I sent him ten thousand crowns instead of ten thousand livres, and sent it with express condition that he should immediately have bought himself the commission he talked of with part of the money, and have sent some of it to relieve the necessities of his poor miserable wife at London, and to prevent his children to be kept by the parish, it was evident he would have been still but a private trooper, and his wife and children would still have starved at London, or been kept of mere charity, as, for aught he knew, they then were.

Seeing, therefore, no remedy, I was obliged to withdraw my hand from him, that had been my first destroyer, and reserve the assistance that I intended to have given him for another more desirable opportunity. All that I had now to do was to keep myself out of his sight, which was not very difficult for me to do, considering in what station he lived.

Amy and I had several consultations then upon the main question, namely, how to be sure never to chop upon him again by chance, and to be surprised into a discovery, which would have been a fatal discovery indeed. Amy proposed that we should always take care to know where the gens d'armes were quartered, and thereby effectually avoid them, and this was one way.

But this was not so as to be fully to my satisfaction; no ordinary way of inquiring where the gens d'armes were quartered was sufficient for me; but I found out a fellow who was completely qualified for the work of a spy (for France has plenty of such people). This man I employed to be a constant and particular attendant upon his person and motions; and he was especially employed and ordered to haunt him as a ghost; that he should scarce let him be ever out of his sight. He performed this to a nicety, and failed not to give me a perfect journal of all his motions from day to day, and, whether for his pleasure or his business, was always at his heels.

This was somewhat expensive, and such a fellow merited to be well paid, but he did his business so exquisitely punctual, that this poor man scarce went out of the house without my knowing the way he went, the company he kept, when he went abroad, and when he stayed at home.

By this extraordinary conduct I made myself safe, and so went out in public or stayed at home, as I found he was or was not in a possibility of being at Paris, at Versailles, or any place I had occasion to be at. This, though it was very chargeable, yet as I found it absolutely necessary, so I took no thought about the expense of it, for I knew I could not purchase my safety too dear.

By this management I found an opportunity to see what a most insignificant, unthinking life the poor indolent wretch, who, by his unactive temper, had at first been my ruin, now lived; how he only rose in the morning to go to bed at night; that saving the necessary motion of the troops, which he was obliged to attend, he was a mere motionless animal, of no consequence in the world; that he seemed to be one who, though he was indeed alive, had no manner of business in life, but to stay to be called out of it; he neither kept any company, minded any sport, played at any game, or indeed did anything of moment; but in short sauntered about like one that was not two livres value, whether dead or alive; that when he was gone, would leave no remembrance behind him that ever he was here; that if ever he did anything in the world to be talked of, it was only to get five beggars and starve his wife. The journal of his life, which I had constantly sent me every week, was the least significant of anything of its kind that was ever seen; as it had really nothing of earnest in it, so it would make no jest to relate it. It was not important enough so much as to make the reader merry withal, and for that reason I omit it.

Yet this nothing-doing wretch was I obliged to watch and guard against, as the only thing that was capable of doing me hurt in the world. I was to shun him as we would shun a spectre, even the devil, if he was actually in our way; and it cost me after the rate of 150 livres a month, and very cheap too, to have this creature constantly kept in view; that is to say, my spy undertook never to let him be out of his sight an hour, but so as that he could give an account of him, which was much the easier to be done, considering his way of living; for he was sure that, for whole weeks together, he would be ten hours of the day half asleep on a bench at a tavern door where he quartered, or drunk within the house. Though this wicked life he led sometimes moved me to pity him, and to wonder how so well-bred and gentlemanly a man as he once was could degenerate into so useless a thing as he now appeared, yet at the same time it gave me most contemptible thoughts of him, and made me often say I was a warning for all the ladies of Europe against marrying of fools: a man of sense falls in the world and gets up again, and a woman has some chance for herself; but with a fool, once fallen and ever undone; once in the ditch and die in the ditch; once poor, and sure to starve.

But it is time to have done with him; once I had nothing to hope for but to see him again; now my only felicity was, if possible, never to see him, and, above all, to keep him from seeing me, which, as above, I took effectual care of.

I was now returned to Paris (my little son of honour, as I called him, was left at my last country seat) at the prince's request; thither he came to me as soon as I arrived, and told me he came to give me joy of my return, and to make his acknowledgement for having given him a son. I thought, indeed, he had been going to give me a present, and so he did the next day, but in what he said then he only jested with me. He gave me his company all the evening, supped with me about midnight, and did me the honour, as I then called it, to lodge me in his arms all the night, telling me, in jest, that the best thanks for a son born was giving the pledge for another.

But as I hinted, so it was; the next morning he laid me down on my toilet a purse with three hundred pistoles. I saw him lay it down, and understood what he meant, but I took no notice of it till I came to it, as it were, casually; then I gave a great cry out, and fell a scolding in my way, for he gave me all possible freedom of speech on such occasions. I told him he was unkind, that he would never give me an opportunity to ask him for anything; that he forced me to blush by being too much obliged, and the like; all which I knew was very agreeable to him, for as he was bountiful beyond measure, so he was infinitely obliged by my being so backward to ask any favours; and I was even with him, for I never asked him for a farthing in my life.

Upon this rallying him, he told me I had either perfectly studied the art of humour, or else, what was the greatest difficulty to others was natural to me, adding, that nothing could be more obliging to a man of honour than not to be soliciting and craving.

I told him nothing could be craving upon him; that he left no room for it; that I hoped he did not give merely to avoid the trouble of being importuned; and that he might depend upon it, I should be reduced very low indeed before I offered to disturb him that way.

He said a man of honour ought always to know what he ought to do; and as he did nothing but what he knew was reasonable, he gave me leave to be free with him, if I wanted anything; that he had too much value for me to deny me anything, if I asked, but that it was infinitely agreeable to him to hear me say that what he did was to my satisfaction.

We strained compliments thus a great while, and as he had me in his arms most part of the time, so upon all my expressions of his bounty to me he put a stop to me with his kisses, and would admit me to go on no further.

I should in this place mention, that this prince was not a subject of France, though at that time he resided at Paris, and was much at court, where I suppose he had or expected some considerable employment. But I mention it on this account; that a few days after this, he came to me and told me he was come to bring me not the most welcome news that ever I had heard from him in his life. I looked at him a little surprised, but he returned, "Do not be uneasy; it is as unpleasant to me as to you, but I come to consult with you about it, and see if it cannot be made a little easy to us both."

I seemed still more concerned and surprised; at last he said it was that he believed he should be obliged to go into Italy, which, though otherwise it was very agreeable to him, yet his parting with me made it a very dull thing but to think of.

I sat mute, as one thunderstruck, for a good while; and it presently occurred to me, that I was going to lose him, which, indeed, I could but ill bear the thoughts of; and as he told me I turned pale. "What is the matter?" said he, hastily, "I have surprised you indeed;" and stepping to the sideboard, fills a dram of cordial water, which was of his own bringing, and comes to me. "Be not surprised," said he, "I'll go nowhere without you," adding several other things so kind as nothing could exceed it.

I might indeed turn pale, for I was very much surprised at first, believing that this was, as it often happens in such cases, only a project to drop me, and break off an amour which he had now carried on so long; and a thousand thoughts whirled about my head in the few moments while I was kept in suspense, for they were but a few. I say I was indeed surprised, and might, perhaps, look pale; but I was not in any danger of fainting, that I knew of.

However, it not a little pleased me to see him so concerned and anxious about me; but I stopped a little when he put the cordial to my mouth, and taking the glass in my hand, I said, "My lord, your words are infinitely more of a cordial to me than this citron; for as nothing can be a greater affliction than to lose you, so nothing can be a greater satisfaction than the assurance that I shall not have that misfortune."

He made me sit down, and sat down by me, and after saying a thousand kind things to me, he turns upon me with a smile; "Why, will you venture yourself to Italy with me?" says he. I stopped awhile, and then answered that I wondered he would ask me that question, for I would go anywhere in the world, or all over the world, wherever he should desire me, and give me the felicity of his company.

Then he entered into a long account of the occasion of his journey, and how the king had engaged him to go, and some other circumstances which are not proper to enter into here; it being by no means proper to say anything that might lead the reader into the least guess at the person.

But to cut short this part of the story, and the history of our journey and stay abroad, which would almost fill up a volume of itself, I say, we spent all that evening in cheerful consultations about the manner of our travelling, the equipage and figure he should go in, and in what manner I should go. Several ways were proposed, but none seemed feasible, till at last I told him I thought it would be so troublesome, so expensive, and so public, that it would be many ways inconvenient to him; and though it was a kind of death to me to lose him, yet rather than very much perplex his affairs, I would submit to anything.

At the next visit I filled his head with the same difficulties, and then at last came over him with a proposal that I would stay in Paris, or where else he should direct; and when I heard of his safe arrival would come away by myself and place myself as near him as I could.

This gave him no satisfaction at all; nor would he hear any more of it; but if I durst venture myself, as he called it, such a journey, he would not lose the satisfaction of my company; and, as for the expense, that was not to be named, neither, indeed, was there room to name it, for I found that he travelled at the king's expense, as well for himself as for all his equipage, being on some secret service of the last importance.

But after several debates between ourselves he came to this resolution, namely, that he would travel incognito, and so should avoid all public notice, either of himself or who went with him; and that then he should not only carry me with him, but have a perfect leisure of enjoying my agreeable company (as he was pleased to call it) all the way.

This was so obliging that nothing could be more so; upon this foot, he immediately set to work to prepare things for his journey; and, by his directions, so did I too; but now I had a terrible difficulty upon me, and which way to get over it I knew not; and that was, in what manner to take care of what I had to leave behind me. I was rich, as I have said, very rich, and what to do with it I knew not, or who to leave in trust I knew not. I had nobody but Amy in the world, and to travel without Amy was very uncomfortable; or to leave all I had in the world with her, and, if she miscarried, be ruined at once, was still a frightful thought; for Amy might die, and whose hands the things might fall into I knew not. This gave me great uneasiness, and I knew not what to do; for I could not mention it to the prince, lest he should see that I was richer than he thought I was.

But the prince made all this easy to me; for, in concerting measures for our journey, he started the thing himself, and asked me merrily one evening who I would trust with all my wealth in my absence.

"My wealth, my lord," said I, "except what I owe to your goodness, is but small; but yet, that little, I confess, causes some thoughtfulness; because I have no acquaintance in Paris that I dare trust with it, nor anybody but my woman to leave in the house; and how to do without her upon the road I do not well know."

"As to the road, be not concerned," says the prince, "I'll provide you servants to your mind; and as to your woman, if you can trust her, leave her here, and I'll put you in a way how to secure things as well as if you were at home." I bowed and told him I could not be put into better hands than his own, and that, therefore, I would govern all my measures by his directions; so we talked no more of it that night.

The next day he sent me in a great iron chest, so large that it was as much as six lusty fellows could get up the steps into the house; and in this I put, indeed, all my wealth; and for my safety he ordered a good honest old man and his wife to be in the house with her, to keep her company, and a maid-servant and boy; so that there was a good family, and Amy was madam, the mistress of the house.

Things being thus secured, we set out incognito, as he called it; but we had two coaches and six horses, two chaises, and about eight men-servants on horseback, all very well armed.

Never was woman better used in this world that went upon no other account than I did. I had three women-servants to wait on me, one whereof was an old Madam , who thoroughly understood her business, and managed everything as if she had been major domo; so I had no trouble. They had one coach to themselves, and the prince and I in the other; only that sometimes, where he knew it necessary, I went into their coach, and one particular gentleman of the retinue rode with him.

I shall say no more of the journey than that when we came to those frightful mountains, the Alps, there was no travelling in our coaches, so he ordered a horse-litter, but carried by mules, to be provided for me, and himself went on horseback to Lyons. The coaches went some other way back. Then we had coaches hired at Turin, which met us at Suza; so that we were accommodated again, and went by easy journeys afterwards to Rome, where his business, whatever it was, called him to stay some time, and from thence to Venice.

He was as good as his word, indeed; for I had the pleasure of his company, and, in a word, engrossed his conversation almost all the way. He took delight in showing me everything that was to be seen, and particularly in telling me something of the history of everything he showed me.

What valuable pains were here thrown away upon one whom he was sure, at last, to abandon with regret! How below himself did a man of quality and of a thousand accomplishments behave in all this! 'Tis one of my reasons for entering into this part, which would otherwise not be worth relating. Had I been a daughter or a wife, of whom it might be said that he had a just concern in their instruction or improvement, it had been an admirable step; but all this to a whore—to one whom he carried with him upon no account that could be rationally agreeable, and none but to gratify the meanest of human frailties—this was the wonder of it. But such is the power of a vicious inclination. Whoring was, in a word, his darling crime, the worst excursion he made, for he was otherwise one of the most excellent persons in the world. No passions, no furious execrations, no ostentatious pride; the most humble, courteous, affable person in the world. Not an oath, not an indecent word, or the least blemish in behaviour, was to be seen in all his conversation, except as before excepted; and it has given me occasion for many dark reflections since to look back and think that I should be the snare of such a person's life; that I should influence him to so much wickedness, and that I should be the instrument in the hand of the devil to do him so much prejudice.

We were near two years upon this grand tour, as it may be called, during most of which I resided at Rome or at Venice, having only been twice at Florence and once at Naples. I made some very diverting and useful observations in all these places, and particularly of the conduct of the ladies; for I had opportunity to converse very much among them, by the help of the old witch that travelled with us; she had been at Naples and at Venice, and had lived in the former several years, where, as I found, she had lived but a loose life, as indeed the women of Naples generally do; and, in short, I found she was fully acquainted with all the intriguing arts of that part of the world.

Here my lord bought me a little female Turkish slave, who, being taken at sea by a Maltese man of war, was brought in there, and of her I learnt the Turkish language, their way of dressing and dancing, and some Turkish, or rather Moorish, songs, of which I made use to my advantage, on an extraordinary occasion, some years after, as you shall hear in its place. I need not say I learnt Italian too, for I got pretty well mistress of that before I had been there a year; and as I had leisure enough, and loved the language, I read all the Italian books I could come at.

I began to be so in love with Italy, especially with Naples and Venice, that I could have been very well satisfied to have sent for Amy and have taken up my residence there for life.

As to Rome, I did not like it all. The swarms of ecclesiastics of all kinds on one side, and the scoundrel rabbles of the common people on the other, make Rome the most unpleasant place in the world to live in; the innumerable number of valets, lacquies, and other servants is such, that they used to say that there are very few of the common people in Rome but what have been footmen, or porters, or grooms to cardinals or foreign ambassadors. In a word, they have an air of sharpening and cozening, quarrelling, and scolding upon their general behaviour; and when I was there, the footmen made such a broil between two great families in Rome, about which of their coaches (the ladies being in their coaches on either side) should give way to the other, that there was about thirty people wounded on both sides, five or six killed outright, and both the ladies frightened almost to death.

But I have no mind to write the history of my travels on this side of the world, at least not now—it would be too full of variety.

I must not, however, omit that the prince continued in all this journey the most kind, obliging person to me in the world, and so constant, that though we were in a country where it is well known all manner of liberties are taken, I am yet well assured he neither took the liberty he knew he might have, nor so much as desired it.

I have often thought of this noble person on that account; had he been but half so true, so faithful, and constant to the best lady in the world, I mean his princess, how glorious a virtue had it been in him! and how free had he been from those just reflections which touched him in her behalf when it was too late!

We had some very agreeable conversations upon this subject, and once he told me, with a kind of more than ordinary concern upon his thoughts, that he was greatly beholden to me for taking this hazardous and difficult journey, for that I had kept him honest. I looked up in his face, and coloured as red as fire: "Well, well," says he, "do not let that surprise you; I do say you have kept me honest."—"My lord," said I, "it is not for me to explain your words, but I wish I could turn them my own way; I hope," said I, "and believe we are both as honest as we can be in our circumstances."—"Ay, ay," said he, "and honestest than I doubt I should have been if you had not been with me. I cannot say but if you had not been here I should have wandered among the gay world here, in Naples, and in Venice too, for it is not such a crime here as it is in other places; but I protest," says he, "I have not touched a woman in Italy but yourself, and more than that, I have not so much as had any desire to it, so that, I say, you have kept me honest."

I was silent, and was glad that he interrupted me, or kept me from speaking, with kissing me, for I really knew not what to say. I was once going to say, that if his lady, the princess, had been with him, she would, doubtless, have had the same influence upon his virtue, with infinitely more advantage to him; but I considered this might give him offence, and besides, such things might have been dangerous to the circumstance I stood in, so it passed off. But I must confess I saw that he was quite another man as to women, than I understood he had always been before; and it was a particular satisfaction to me, that I was thereby convinced that what he said was true, and that he was, as I may say, all my own.

I was with child again in this journey, and lay in at Venice but was not so happy as before. I brought him another son, and a very fine boy it was, but it lived not above two months; nor, after the first touches of affection (which are usual, I believe, to all mothers) were over, was I sorry the child did not live, the necessary difficulties attending it in our travelling being considered.

After these several perambulations, my lord told me his business began to close, and we would think of returning to France, which I was very glad of, but principally on account of my treasure I had there, which, as you have heard, was very considerable. It is true, I had letters very frequently from my maid Amy, with accounts that everything was very safe, and that was very much to my satisfaction. However, as the prince's negotiations were at an end, and he was obliged to return, I was very glad to go, so we returned from Venice to Turin, and in the way I saw the famous city of Milan. From Turin we went over the mountains again, as before, and our coaches met us at Pont a Voisin, between Chambery and Lyons; and so, by easy journies, we arrived safe at Paris, having been absent about two years, wanting about eleven days as before.

I found the little family we left just as we left them, and Amy cried for joy when she saw me, and I almost did the same.

The prince took his leave of me the night before, for, as he told me, he knew he should be met upon the road by several persons of quality, and perhaps by the princess herself, so we lay at two different inns that night, lest some should come quite to the place, as indeed it happened.

After this I saw him not for above twenty days, being taken up in his family, and also with business; but he sent me his gentleman to tell me the reason of it, and bid not be uneasy, and that satisfied me effectually.

In all this affluence of my good fortune, I did not forget that I had been rich and poor once already, alternately, and that I ought to know that the circumstances I was now in were not to be expected to last always; that I had one child, and expected another; and if I had bred often, it would something impair me in the great article that supported my interest, I mean what he called beauty; that as that declined, I might expect the fire would abate, and the warmth with which I was now so caressed would cool, and in time, like the other mistresses of great men, I might be dropped again; and that, therefore, it was my business to take care I should fall as softly as I could.

I say I did not forget, therefore, to make as good provision for myself as if I had had nothing to have subsisted upon but what I now gained; whereas I had not less than ten thousand pounds, as I said above, which I had amassed, or rather secured, out of the ruins of my faithful friend the jeweller, and which he, little thinking of what was so near him when he went out, told me, though in a kind of jest, was all my own, if he was knocked on the head, and which, upon that title, I took care to preserve.

My greatest difficulty now was how to secure my wealth, and to keep what I had got; for I had greatly added to this wealth by the generous bounty of the prince, and the more by the private retired manner of living, which he rather desired for privacy than parsimony; for he supplied me for a more magnificent way of life than I desired, if it had been proper.

I shall cut short the history of this prosperous wickedness with telling you I brought him a third son, within little more than eleven months after our return from Italy; that I now lived a little more openly, and went by a particular name which he gave me abroad, but which I must omit, namely, the Countess de ———; and had coaches and servants, suitable to the quality he had given me the appearance of; and which is more than usually happens in such cases, this held eight years from the beginning, during which time, as I had been very faithful to him, so I must say as above, that whereas he usually had two or three women, whom he kept privately, he had not in all that time meddled with any of them, but that I had so perfectly engrossed him that he dropped them all; not, perhaps, that he saved much by it, for I was a very chargeable mistress to him, but it was all owing to his particular affection to me, not to my extravagance, for, as I said, he never gave me leave to ask for anything, but forcing his favours and presents farther than I expected, and so fast that I could not have the assurance to make the least mention of desiring more. Nor did I speak this of my own guess, I mean about this constancy to me, and his quitting all other women; but the old harridan, as I may call her, whom he made the guide of our travelling, and who was a strange old creature, told me a thousand stories of his gallantry, as she called it, and how, as he had no less than three mistresses at one time, and as I found, all of her procuring, he had of a sudden dropped them all, and that he was entirely lost to both her and them; that they did believe he had fallen into some new hands, but she could never hear who, or where, till he sent for her to go this journey; and then the old hag complimented me upon his choice; that she did not wonder I had so engrossed him; so much beauty, &c., and there she stopped.

Upon the whole, I found by her, what was you may be sure to my particular satisfaction, viz., that, as above, I had him all my own. But the highest tide has its ebb; and in all things of this kind, there is a reflux which sometimes also is more impetuously violent than the first aggression. My prince was a man of vast fortune, though no sovereign, and therefore there was no probability that the expense of keeping a mistress could be injurious to him, as to his estate. He had also several employments, both out of France as well as in it; for, as above, I say he was not a subject of France, though he lived in that court. He had a princess, a wife, with whom he had lived several years, and a woman (so the voice of fame reported) the most valuable of her sex, of birth equal to him, if not superior, and of fortune proportionable; but in beauty, wit, and a thousand good qualities, superior, not only to most women, but even to all her sex; and as to her virtue, the character which was most justly her due, was that of, not only the best of princesses, but even the best of women.

They lived in the utmost harmony (as with such a princess it was impossible to be otherwise) but yet the princess was not insensible that her lord had his foibles, that he did make some excursions, and particularly that he had one favourite mistress, who sometimes engrossed him more than she (the princess) could wish, or be easily satisfied with. However, she was so good, so generous, so truly kind a wife, that she never gave him any uneasiness on this account, except so much as must arise from his sense of her bearing the affront of it with such patience, and such a profound respect for him as was in itself enough to have reformed him, and did sometimes shock his generous mind, so as to keep him at home, as I may call it, a great while together; and it was not long before I not only perceived it by his absence, but really got a knowledge of the reason of it, and once or twice he even acknowledged it to me.

It was a point that lay not in me to manage. I made a kind of motion, once or twice, to him, to leave me, and keep himself to her, as he ought by the laws and rites of matrimony to do, and argued the generosity of the princess too, to persuade him; but I was a hypocrite, for had I prevailed with him really to be honest, I had lost him, which I could not bear the thoughts of; and he might easily see I was not in earnest. One time in particular, when I took upon me to talk at this rate, I found when I argued so much for the virtue and honour, the birth, and above all, the generous usage he found in the person of the princess with respect to his private amours, and how it should prevail upon him, &c., I found it began to affect him, and he returned, "And do you indeed," says he, "persuade me to leave you? Would you have me think you sincere?" I looked up in his face, smiling. "Not for any other favourite, my lord," said I; "that would break my heart; but for madam the princess!" said I, and then I could say no more, tears followed, and I sat silent awhile. "Well," said he, "if ever I do leave you, it shall be on the virtuous account, it shall be for the princess; I assure you it shall be for no other woman."—"That's enough, my lord," said I, "there I ought to submit; and while I am assured it shall be for no other mistress, I promise your highness I will not repine; or that, if I do, it shall be a silent grief; it shall not interrupt your felicity."

All this while I said I knew not what, and said what I was no more able to do than he was able to leave me, which, at that time, he owned he could not do, no, not for the princess herself.

But another turn of affairs determined this matter, for the princess was taken very ill, and in the opinion of all her physicians, very dangerously so. In her sickness she desired to speak with her lord, and to take her leave of him. At this grievous parting, she said so many passionate kind things to him, lamented that she had left him no children (she had three, but they were dead), hinted to him that it was one of the chief things which gave her satisfaction in death, as to this world, that she should leave him room to have heirs to his family, by some princess that should supply her place; with all humility, but with a christian earnestness, recommended it to him to do justice to such princess, whoever it should be, from whom, to be sure, he would expect justice; that is to say, to keep to her singly, according to the solemnest part of the marriage covenant; humbly asked his highness's pardon, if she had any way offended him; and appealing to heaven, before whose tribunal she was to appear, that she had never violated her honour or her duty to him; and praying to Jesus and the Blessed Virgin for his highness; and thus, with the most moving and most passionate expressions of her affection to him, took her last leave of him, and died the next day.

This discourse, from a princess so valuable in herself and so dear to him, and the loss of her following so immediately after, made such deep impressions on him that he looked back with detestation upon the former part of his life, grew melancholy and reserved, changed his society and much of the general conduct of his life, resolved on a life regulated most strictly by the rules of virtue and piety, and, in a word, was quite another man.

The first part of his reformation was a storm upon me; for, about ten days after the princess's funeral, he sent a message to me by his gentleman, intimating, though in very civil terms, and with a short preamble or introduction, that he desired I would not take it ill that he was obliged to let me know that he could see me no more. His gentleman told me a long story of the new regulation of life his lord had taken up, and that he had been so afflicted for the loss of his princess, that he thought it would either shorten his life, or he would retire into some religious house, to end his days in solitude.

I need not direct anybody to suppose how I received this news. I was, indeed, exceedingly surprised at it, and had much ado to support myself when the first part of it was delivered, though the gentleman delivered his errand with great respect, and with all the regard to me that he was able, and with a great deal of ceremony; also telling me how much he was concerned to bring me such a message.

But when I heard the particulars of the story at large, and especially that of the lady's discourse to the prince, a little before her death, I was fully satisfied; I knew very well he had done nothing but what any man must do that had a true sense upon him of the justice of the princess's discourse to him, and of the necessity there was of his altering his course of life, if he intended to be either a Christian or an honest man. I say, when I heard this, I was perfectly easy; I confess it was a circumstance that might be reasonably expected should have wrought something upon me; I that had so much to reflect upon more than the prince; that had now no more temptations of poverty, or of the powerful motive which Amy used with me, namely, comply and live, deny and starve. I say, I that had no poverty to introduce vice, but was grown, not only well supplied, but rich, and not only rich, but was very rich; in a word, richer than I knew how to think of, for the truth of it was, that thinking of it sometimes almost distracted me, for want of knowing how to dispose of it, and for fear of losing it all again by some cheat or trick, not knowing anybody that I could commit the trust of it to.

Besides I should add, at the close of this affair, that the prince did not, as I may say, turn me off rudely, and with disgust, but with all the decency and goodness peculiar to himself, and that could consist with a man reformed and struck with the sense of his having abused so good a lady as the late princess had been; nor did he send me away empty, but did everything like himself; and in particular, ordered his gentleman to pay the rent of the house and all the expense of his two sons; and to tell me how they were taken care of, and where; and also that I might at all times inspect the usage they had, and if I disliked anything, it should be rectified; and having thus finished everything, he retired into Lorraine, or somewhere that way, where he had an estate, and I never heard of him more, I mean not as a mistress.

Now I was at liberty to go to any part of the world, and take care of my money myself. The first thing that I resolved to do was to go directly to England, for there, I thought, being among my country-folks (for I esteemed myself an English woman though I was born in France) I could better manage things than in France; at least, that I should be in less danger of being circumvented and deceived; but how to get away with such a treasure as I had with me was a difficult point, and what I was greatly at a loss about.

There was a Dutch merchant in Paris that was a person of great reputation for a man of substance and of honesty, but I had no manner of acquaintance with him, nor did I know how to get acquainted with him, so as to discover my circumstances to him, but at last I employed my maid, Amy, such I must be allowed to call her, notwithstanding what has been said of her, because she was in the place of a maid servant, I say I employed my maid, Amy, to go to him, and she got a recommendation to him from somebody else, I knew not who, so that she got access to him well enough.

But now was my case as bad as before, for when I came to him what could I do? I had money and jewels to a vast value, and I might leave all those with him; that I might, indeed, do; and so I might with several other merchants in Paris, who would give me bills for it, payable at London, but then I ran a hazard of my money; and I had nobody at London to send the bills to, and so to stay till I had an account that they were accepted; for I had not one friend in London that I could have recourse to, so that, indeed, I knew not what to do.

In this case I had no remedy but that I must trust somebody; so I sent Amy to this Dutch merchant, as I said above. He was a little surprised when Amy came to him, and talked to him of remitting a sum of about 12,000 pistoles to England, and began to think she came to put some cheat upon him; but when he found that Amy was but a servant, and that I came to him myself, the case was altered.

When I came to him myself I presently saw such a plainness in his dealing, and such honesty in his countenance, that I made no scruple to tell him my whole story; viz., that I was a widow, that I had some jewels to dispose of, and also some money, which I had a mind to send to England, and to follow there myself; but being but a woman, and having no correspondence in London, or anywhere else, I knew not what to do, or how to secure my effects.

He dealt very candidly with me, but advised me, when he knew my case so particularly, to take bills upon Amsterdam, and to go that way to England; for that I might lodge my treasure in the bank there, in the most secure manner in the world, and there he could recommend me to a man who perfectly understood jewels, and would deal faithfully with me in the disposing of them.

I thanked him, but scrupled very much the travelling so far in a strange country, and especially with such a treasure about me; that whether known or concealed I did not know how to venture with it. Then he told me he would try to dispose of them there, that is, at Paris, and convert them into money, and to get me bills for the whole. In a few days he brought a Jew to me, who pretended to buy the jewels. As soon as the Jew saw the jewels I saw my folly, and it was ten thousand to one but I had been ruined, and perhaps put to death in as cruel a manner as possible; and I was put in such a fright by it, that I was once upon the point of flying for my life, and leaving the jewels and money too, in the hands of the Dutchman, without any bills or anything else. The case was thus.

As soon as the Jew saw the jewels, he falls a jabbering, in Dutch or Portuguese, to the merchant, and I could presently perceive that they were in some great surprise. The Jew held his hands, looked at me with some horror, then talked Dutch again, and put himself into a thousand shapes, twisting his body, and wringing up his face this way and that way, in his discourse; stamping with his feet, and throwing abroad his hands, as if he was not in a rage only, but in a great fury. Then he would turn and give a look at me, like the devil. I thought I never saw any thing so frightful in my life.

At length I put in a word, "Sir," says I to the Dutch merchant, "what is all this discourse to my business? What is this gentleman in all these passions about? I wish, if he is to treat with me, he would speak that I may understand him; or if you have business of your own between you that is to be done first, let me withdraw, and I will come again when you are at leisure."

"No, no, madam," says the Dutchman, very kindly, "you must not go; all our discourse was about you and your jewels, and you shall hear it presently; it concerns you very much, I assure you."—"Concern me," says I, "what can it concern me so much as to put this gentleman into such agonies, and what makes him give such devil's looks as he does? Why, he looks as if he would devour me."

The Jew understood me presently, continuing in a kind of rage, and spoke in French, "Yes, madam, it does concern you much, very much, very much," repeating the words, shaking his head; and then turning to the Dutchman, "Sir," says he, "pray tell her what is the case?"—"No," says the merchant, "not yet, let us talk a little further of it by ourselves;" upon which they withdrew into another room, where still they talked very high, but in a language I did not understand. I began to be a little surprised at what the Jew had said, you may be sure, and eager to know what he meant, and was very impatient till the Dutch merchant came back, and that so impatient, that I called one of his servants to let him know I desired to speak with him. When he came in, I asked his pardon for being so impatient, but told him I could not be easy till he had told me what the meaning of all this was. "Why, madam," says the Dutch merchant, "the meaning is what I am surprised at too. This man is a Jew, and understands jewels perfectly well, and that was the reason I sent for him, to dispose of them to him for you; but as soon as he saw them, he knew the jewels very distinctly, and flying out in a passion, as you see he did, told me that they were the very parcel of jewels which the English jeweller had about him, who was robbed going to Versailles, about eight years ago, to show them the Prince de —, and that it was for these very jewels that the poor gentleman was murdered; and he is in all this agony to make me ask you how you came by them; and he says you ought to be charged with the robbery and murder, and put to the question to discover who were the persons that did it, that they might be brought to justice." While he said this the Jew came impudently back into the room without calling, which a little surprised me again.

The Dutch merchant spoke very good English, and he knew that the Jew did not understand English at all, so he told me the latter part in English, at which I smiled, which put the Jew into his mad fit again, and, shaking his head and making his devil's faces again, he seemed to threaten me for laughing, saying in French this was an affair I should have little reason to laugh at, and the like. At this I laughed again, and flouted him, letting him see that I scorned him; and, turning to the Dutch merchant,—“Sir,” says I, “that these jewels were belonging to Mr , the English jeweller (naming his name readily); in that,” says I, “this person is right; but that I should be questioned how I came to have them, is a token of his ignorance, which, however, he might have managed with a little more manners till I had told him who I am; and both he and you too will be more easy in that part, when I should tell you that I am the unhappy widow of that Mr , who was so barbarously murdered going to Versailles; and that he was not robbed of these jewels, but of others; Mr  having left these behind him with me lest he should be robbed. Had I, sir, come otherwise by them, I should not have been weak enough to have exposed them to sale here, where the thing was done, but have carried them further off.”

This was an agreeable surprise to the Dutch merchant, who, being an honest man himself, believed everything I said, which, indeed, being literally true, except the deficiency of my marriage, I spoke with such an unconcerned easiness, that it might plainly be seen I had no guilt upon me, as the Jew suggested.

The Jew was confounded when he heard that I was the jeweller's wife; but as I had raised his passion with saying he looked at me with the devil's face, he studied mischief in his heart, and answered, that should not serve my turn; so called the Dutchman out again, when he told him that he resolved to prosecute this matter further.

There was one kind chance in this affair, which, indeed, was my deliverance, and that was, that the fool could not restrain his passion, but must let it fly to the Dutch merchant, to whom, when they withdrew a second time, he told that he would bring a process against me for the murder, and that it should cost me dear for using him at that rate; and away he went, desiring the Dutch merchant to tell him when I would be there again. Had he suspected that the Dutchman would have communicated the particulars to me he would never have been so foolish as to have mentioned that part to him.

But the malice of his thoughts anticipated him, and the Dutch merchant was so good as to give me an account of his design, which, indeed, was wicked enough in its nature; but to me it would have been worse than otherwise it would to another; for, upon examination, I could not have proved myself to be the wife of the jeweller, so the suspicion might have been carried on with the better face; and then I should also have brought all his relations in England upon me, who, finding by the proceedings that I was not his wife, but a mistress, or, in English, a whore, would have immediately laid claim to the jewels, as I had owned them to be his.

This thought immediately rushed into my head as soon as the Dutch merchant had told me what wicked things were in the head of that cursed Jew, and the villain (for so I must call him) convinced the Dutch merchant that he was in earnest, by an expression which showed the rest of his design, and that was a plot to get the rest of the jewels into his hand.

When first he hinted to the Dutchman that the jewels were such a man's, meaning my husband, he made wonderful exclamations on account of their having been concealed so long; where must they have lain; and what was the woman that brought them? and that she (meaning me) ought to be immediately apprehended and put into the hands of justice; and this was the time that, as I said, he made such horrid gestures and looked at me so like a devil.

The merchant, hearing him talk at that rate, and seeing him in earnest, said to him,—“Hold your tongue a little, this is a thing of consequence; if it be so, let you and I go into the next room and consider of it there;” and so they withdrew, and left me.

Here, as before, I was uneasy, and called him out, and, having heard how it was, gave him that answer, that I was his wife, or widow, which the malicious Jew said should not serve my turn; and then it was that the Jew called the merchant out again; and in this time of his withdrawing, the merchant, finding that he was really in earnest, counterfeited a little to be of his mind, and entered into proposals with him for the thing itself.

In this they agreed to go to an advocate, or counsel, for directions how to proceed, and to meet again the next day, against which time the merchant was to appoint me to come again with the jewels, in order to sell them: "No," says the merchant, "I will go further with her than so; I will desire her to leave the jewels with me, to show to another person, in order to get the better price for them." "That is right," says the Jew, "and I'll engage she shall never be mistress of them again; they shall either be seized by us, in the king's name, or she shall be glad to give them up to us to prevent her being put to the torture."

The merchant said yes to everything he offered, and they agreed to meet the next morning about it, and I was to be persuaded to leave the jewels with them, and come to them the next day at four o'clock, in order to make a good bargain for them, and on these conditions they parted; but the honest Dutchman, filled with indignation at the barbarous design, came directly to me, and told me the whole story:—"And now, madam," says he, "you are to consider immediately what you have to do."

I told him, if I was sure to have justice, I would not fear all that such a rogue could do to me; but how such things were carried on in France I knew not. I told him the greatest difficulty would be to prove our marriage, for that it was done in England, and in a remote part of England too, and, which was worse, it would be hard to produce authentic vouchers of it, because we were married in private. "But, as to the death of your husband, madam, what can be said to that?" said he. "Nay," said I, "what can they say to it? In England," added I, "if they would offer such an injury to any one, they must prove the fact, or give just reason for their suspicions. That my husband was murdered, that every one knows; but that he was robbed, or of what, or how much, that none knows, no, not myself; and why was I not questioned for it then? I have lived in Paris ever since, lived publicly, and no man had yet the impudence to suggest such a thing of me."

"I am fully satisfied of that," says the merchant; "but as this is a rogue, who will stick at nothing, what can we say? And who knows what he may swear? Suppose he should swear that he knows your husband had those particular jewels with him the morning when he went out, and that he showed them to him, to consider their value, and what price he should ask the Prince de  for them."

"Nay, by the same rule," said I, "he may swear that I murdered my husband, if he finds it for his turn."—"That is true," said he, "and if he should do so, I do not see what could save you; but," added he, "I have found out his more immediate design; his design is to have you carried to the Châtelet, that the suspicion may appear just, and to get the jewels out of your hands, if possible; then, at last, to drop the prosecution, on your consenting to quit the jewels to him; and how you will do to avoid this is the question which I would have you consider of."

"My misfortune, sir," said I, "is that I have no time to consider, and I have no person to consider with, or advise about it. I find that innocence may be oppressed by such an impudent fellow as this; he that does not value perjury has any man's life at his mercy; but, sir," said I, "is the justice such here, that while I may be in the hands of the public, and under prosecution, he may get hold of my effects, and get my jewels into his hands?"

"I don't know," says he, "what may be done in that case, but if not he, if the court of justice should get hold of them, I do not know but you may find it as difficult to get them out of their hands again as his, at least it may cost you half as much as they are worth; so I think it would be a much better way to prevent their coming at them at all."

"But what course can I take to do that," says I, "now they have got notice that I have them? If they get me into their hands, they will oblige me to produce them, or perhaps sentence me to prison till I do."

"Nay," says he, "as this brute says, too, put you to the question, that is to the torture, on the pretence of making you confess who were the murderers of your husband."

"Confess!" said I, "how can I confess what I know nothing of?"

"If they come to have you on the rack," said he, "they will make you confess you did it yourself whether you did it or no, and then you are cast."

The very rack frightened me to death almost, and I had no spirit left in me. "Did it myself," said I, "that's impossible!"

"No, madam," says he, "'tis far from impossible; the most innocent people in the world have been forced to confess themselves guilty of what they never heard of, much less had any hand in."

"What then must I do," said I, "what would you advise me to?"

"Why," says he, "I would advise you to be gone; you intended to go away in four or five days, and you may as well go in two days; and if you can do so, I shall manage it so that he shall not suspect your being gone for several days." Then he told me how the rogue would have me ordered to bring the jewels the next day for sale; and that then he would have me apprehended; how he made the Jew believe he would join with him in his design, and that he (the merchant) would get the jewels into his hands. "Now," says the merchant, "I will give you bills for the money you desired immediately, and such as shall not fail of being paid; take your jewels with you, and go this very evening to St Germain en Lay; I'll send a man thither with you, and from thence he shall guide you tomorrow to Rouen, where there lies a ship of mine, just ready to sail for Rotterdam; you shall have your passage in that ship on my account, and I will send orders for him to sail as soon as you are on board, and a letter to my friend at Rotterdam to entertain and take care of you."

This was too kind an offer for me, as things stood, not to be accepted, and be thankful for; and as to going away I had prepared everything for parting, so that I had little to do but go back, take two or three boxes and bundles, and such things, and my maid Amy, and be gone.

Then the merchant told me the measures he had resolved to take to delude the Jew, while I made my escape, which were very well contrived indeed. "First," said he, "when he comes to-morrow I shall tell him that I proposed to you to leave the jewels with me, as we agreed, but that you said you would come and bring them in the afternoon, so that we must stay for you till four o'clock; but then, at that time, I will show a letter from you, as if just come in, wherein you shall excuse your not coming, for that some company came to visit you, and prevented you; but that you desire me to take care that the gentleman be ready to buy your jewels; and that you will come to-morrow at the same hour, without fail.

"When to-morrow comes, we shall wait at the time, but you not appearing, I shall seem most dissatisfied, and wonder what can be the reason; and so we shall agree to go the next day to get out a process against you; but the next day in the morning, I'll send to give him notice that you have been at my house, but he not being there you have made another appointment, and that I desire to speak with him. When he comes I'll tell him that you appear perfectly blind as to your danger, and that you appeared much disappointed that he did not come, though you could not meet the night before: and obliged me to have him here to-morrow at three o'clock. When to-morrow comes," says he, "you shall send word that you are taken so ill that you cannot come out for that day, but that you will not fail the next; and the next day you shall neither come nor send, nor let us ever hear any more of you; for by that time you shall be in Holland, if you please."

I could not but approve of all his measures, seeing they were so well contrived, and in so friendly a manner, for my benefit; and as he seemed to be so very sincere, I resolved to put my life in his hands. Immediately I went to my lodgings, and sent away Amy with such bundles as I had prepared for my travelling. I also sent several parcels of my fine furniture to the merchant's house to be laid up for me, and bringing the key of my lodgings with me, I came back to his house. Here we finished our matters of money, and I delivered into his hands seven thousand eight hundred pistoles in bills and money, a copy of an assignment on the town house of Paris, for four thousand pistoles, at 3 per cent. interest attested, and a procuration for receiving the interest half-yearly, but the original I kept myself.

I could have trusted all I had with him, for he was perfectly honest, and had not the least view of doing me any wrong. Indeed, after it was so apparent that he had, as it were, saved my life, or, at least, saved me from being exposed or ruined,—after this, I say, how could I doubt him anything?

When I came to him he had everything ready as I wanted, and as he had proposed. As to my money, he gave me first of all an accepted bill, payable at Rotterdam, for four thousand pistoles, and drawn from Genoa upon a merchant at Rotterdam, payable to a merchant at Paris, and endorsed by him to my merchant; this he assured me would be punctually paid, and so it was, to a day: the rest I had in other bills of exchange, drawn by himself upon other merchants in Holland. Having secured my jewels too, as well as I could, he sent me away the same evening in a friend's coach, which he had procured for me, to St Germain's, and the next morning to Rouen. He also sent a servant of his own, on horseback, with me, who provided everything for me, and who carried his orders to the captain of the ship, which lay about three miles below Rouen, on the river, and by his direction I went immediately on board. The third day after I was on board the ship went away, and we were out at sea the next day after that; and thus I took my leave of France, and got clear of an ugly business, which, had it gone on, might have ruined me, and sent me back as naked to England as I was a little before I left it.

And now Amy and I were at leisure to look upon the mischiefs that we had escaped; and had I had any religion, or any sense of a Supreme Power managing, directing, and governing both causes and events of this world, such a case as this would have given anybody room to have been very thankful to the Power who had not only put such a treasure into my hands, but given me such an escape from the ruin that threatened me; but I had none of those things about me; I had, indeed, a grateful sense upon my mind, of the generous friendship of my deliverer, the Dutch merchant, by whom I was so faithfully served, and by whom, as far as relates to second causes, I was preserved from destruction.

I say, I had a grateful sense upon my mind of his kindness and faithfulness to me, and I resolved to shew him some testimony of it, as soon as I came to the end of my rambles. I had paper indeed, for my money, and he had shewed himself very good to me, in conveying me away, as above; but I had not seen the end of things yet, for unless the bills were paid, I might still be a greater loser by my Dutchman, and he might, perhaps, have contrived all that affair of the Jew to put me in a fright, and get me to run away, and that, as if it were to save my life; that if the bills should be refused, I was cheated with a witness, and the like. But these were but surmises, and, indeed, were perfectly without cause, for the honest man acted as honest men always do, with an upright and disinterested principle, and with a sincerity not often to be found in the world. What gain he made by the exchange was just, and was nothing but what was his due, and was in the way of his business; but otherwise he made no advantage of me at all.

When I passed in the ship between Dover and Calais, and saw beloved England once more under my view; England, which I counted my native country, being the place I was bred in, though not born there; a strange kind of joy possessed my mind, and I had such a longing desire to be there that I would have given the master of the ship twenty pistoles to have stood over and set me on shore in the Downs; and when he told me he could not do it, that is, that he durst not do it, if I would have given him an hundred pistoles, I secretly wished that a storm would rise that might drive the ship over to the coast of England, whether they would or not, that I might be set on shore anywhere upon English ground.

This wicked wish had not been out of my thoughts above two or three hours, but the master steering away to the north, as was his course to do, we lost sight of land on that side, and only had the Flemish shore in view on our right hand, or, as seamen call it, the starboard side; and then, with the loss of the sight, the wish for landing in England abated, and I considered how foolish it was to wish myself out of the way of my business; that if I had been on shore in England, I must go back to Holland on account of my bills, which were so considerable, and having no correspondence there, that I could not have managed it without going myself. But we had not been out of sight of England many hours before the weather began to change, the winds whistled and made a noise, and the seamen said to one another that it would blow hard at night. It was then about two hours before sunset, and we were passed by Dunkirk, and I think they said we were in sight of Ostend; but the wind grew high, and the sea swelled, and all things looked terrible, especially to us that understood nothing but just what we saw before us; in short, night came on, and very dark it was, the winds freshened and blew harder and harder, and about two hours within night it blew a terrible storm.

I was not quite a stranger to the sea, having come from Rochelle to England when I was a child, and gone from London, by the river Thames, to France afterwards, as I have said. But I began to be alarmed a little with the terrible clamour of the men over my head, for I had never been in a storm, and so had never seen the like, or heard it; and once offering to look out at the door of the steerage, as they called it, it struck me with such horror—the darkness, the fierceness of the wind, the dreadful height of the waves, and the hurry the Dutch sailors were in, whose language I did not understand one word of, neither when they cursed or when they prayed—I say, all these things together filled me with terror, and, in short, I began to be very much frightened.

When I was come back into the great cabin, there sat Amy, who was very sea-sick, and I had a little before given her a sup of cordial water to help her stomach. When Amy saw me come back and sit down without speaking, for so I did, she looked two or three times up at me, and at last she came running to me. "Dear madam," says she, "what is the matter? What makes you look so pale? Why, you an't well—what is the matter?" I said nothing still, but held up my hands two or three times. Amy doubled her importunities; upon that I said no more but "Step to the steerage door, and look out as I did;" so she went away immediately, and looked too, as I had bidden her, but the poor girl came back again in the greatest amazement and horror that ever I saw any poor creature in, wringing her hands and crying out she was undone! She was undone! She should be drowned! They were all lost! Thus she ran about the cabin like a mad thing, and as perfectly out of her senses as any one in such a case could be supposed to be. I was frightened myself, but when I saw the girl in such a terrible agony, it brought me a little to myself, and I began to talk to her, and put her in a little hope. I told her there was many a ship in a storm that was not cast away, and I hoped we should not be drowned; that it was true the storm was very dreadful, but I did not see that the seamen were so much concerned as we were, and so I talked to her as well as I could, though my heart was full enough of it, as well as Amy's; and death began to stare me in my face, ay, and something else too, that was to say, conscience, and my mind was very much disturbed; but I had nobody to comfort me, but Amy, being in so much worse a condition, that is to say, so much more terrified at the storm than I was, I had something to do to comfort her. She was, as I have said, like one distracted, and went raving about the cabin, crying out she was undone! undone! she should be drowned, and the like; and at last, the ship giving a jerk, by the force, I suppose, of some violent wave, it threw poor Amy quite down, for she was weak enough before with being sea-sick, and as it threw her forward the poor girl struck her head against the bulk-head, as the seamen call it, of the cabin, and laid her as dead as a stone upon the floor or deck, that is to say, she was so to all appearance.

I cried out for help, but it had been all one to have cried out on the top of a mountain where nobody had been within five miles of me, for the seamen were so engaged, and made so much noise, that nobody heard me or came near me. I opened the great cabin door, and looked into the steerage to cry for help, but there, to increase my fright, were two seamen on their knees at prayers, and only one man who steered, and he made a groaning noise too, which I took to be saying his prayers, but it seems it was answering to those above, when they called to him to tell him which way to steer.

Here was no help for me, or for poor Amy, and there she lay so still and in such a condition that I did not know whether she was dead or alive. In this fright I went to her, and lifted her a little way up, setting her on the deck, with her back to the boards of the bulk-head; and I got a bottle out of my pocket, and I held it to her nose, rubbed her temples, and what else I could do, but still Amy shewed no signs of life, till I felt for her pulse, but could hardly distinguish her to be alive. However, after a great while, she began to revive, and in about half an hour she came to herself, but remembered nothing at first of what had happened to her for a good while more.

When she recovered more fully, she asked me where she was. I told her she was in the ship yet, but God knows how long it might be. "Why, madam," says she, "is not the storm over?" "No, no, Amy," says I. "Why, madam," says she, "it was calm just now," (meaning when she was in the swooning fit occasioned by her fall). "Calm, Amy," says I, "it is far from being calm; it may be it will be calm by and by, when we are all drowned, and gone to heaven." "Heaven, madam," says she, "what makes you talk of Heaven? I go to Heaven! No, no—if I am drowned I am damned! Don't you know what a wicked creature I have been? I have been a whore to two men, and have lived a wretched abominable life of vice and wickedness for fourteen years. O madam, you know it, and God knows it, and now I am to die—to be drowned! Oh! what will become of me? I am undone for ever! ay, madam, for ever! to all eternity! Oh! I am lost! I am lost! If I am drowned, I am lost for ever!"

All these, you will easily suppose, must be so many stabs into the very soul of one in my own case. It immediately occurred to me, Poor Amy! what art thou that I am not? What hast thou been that I have not been? Nay, I am guilty of my own sin and thine too. Then it came to my remembrance that I had not only been the same with Amy, but that I had been the devil's instrument to make her wicked; that I had stript her, and prostituted her to the very man that I had been naught with myself; that she had but followed me, I had been her wicked example; I had led her into all; and that as we had sinned together, now we were likely to sink together.

All this repeated itself to my thoughts at that very moment, and every one of Amy's cries sounded thus in my ears; "I am the wicked cause of it all! I have been thy ruin, Amy! I have brought thee to this, and now thou art to suffer for the sin I have enticed thee to; and if thou art lost for ever, what must I be? What must be my portion?"

It is true, this difference was between us, that I said all these things within myself, and sighed, and mourned inwardly; but Amy, as her temper was more violent, spoke aloud, and cried, and called out aloud like one in agony.

I had but small encouragement to give her, and indeed could say but very little, but I got her to compose herself a little, and not let any of the people of the ship understand what she meant or what she said; but even in her greatest composure she continued to express herself with the utmost dread and terror on account of the wicked life she had lived, and crying out she should be damned, and the like, which was very terrible to me, who knew what condition I was in myself.

Upon these serious considerations I was very penitent too for my former sins, and cried out, though softly, two or three times, "Lord have mercy upon me;" to this I added abundance of resolutions of what a life I would live, if it should please God but to spare my life but this one time; how I would live a single and virtuous life, and spend a great deal of what I had thus wickedly got, in acts of charity and doing good.

Under these dreadful apprehensions I looked back on the life I had led with the utmost contempt and abhorrence. I blushed, and wondered at myself how I could act thus, how I could divest myself of modesty and honour, and prostitute myself for gain, and I thought that if it should please God to spare me this one time from death, it could not be possible I should be the same creature again.

Amy went further—she prayed, she resolved, she vowed to lead a new life, if God would spare her but this time. It now began to be day-light, for the storm held all night long, and it was some comfort to see the light of another day, which indeed none of us expected; but the sea went mountains high, and the noise of the water was as frightful to us as the sight of the waves; nor was any land to be seen, nor did the seamen know whereabouts they were. At last, to our great joy, they made land, which was in England, and on the coast of Suffolk; and the ship being in the utmost distress, they ran for the shore, at all hazards, and with great difficulty, got into Harwich, where they were safe, as to the danger of death; but the ship was so full of water, and so much damaged, that if they had not laid her on shore the same day, she would have sunk before night, according to the opinion of the seamen, and of the workmen on shore too, who were hired to assist them in stopping their leaks.

Amy was revived as soon as she heard they had espied land, and went out upon the deck, but she soon came in again to me: "Oh, Madam," says she, "there's the land indeed to be seen. It looks like a ridge of clouds, and may be all a cloud for aught I know; but if it be land, it is a great way off, and the sea is in such a combustion, we shall all perish before we can reach it. It is the most dreadful sight to look at the waves that ever was seen. Why, they are as high as mountains, we shall certainly be all swallowed up, for all the land is so near."

I had conceived some hope, that if they saw land we should be delivered; and I told her she did not understand things of that nature; that she might be sure if they saw land they would go directly towards it, and would make into some harbour; but it was, as Amy said, a frightful distance to it. The land looked like clouds, and the sea went as high as mountains, so that no hope appeared in the seeing the land, but we were in fear of foundering before we could reach it. This made Amy so desponding still, but as the wind, which blew from the east, or that way, drove us furiously towards the land, so when, about half an hour after, I stepped to the steerage door and looked out, I saw the land much nearer than Amy represented it, so I went in and encouraged Amy again, and indeed was encouraged myself.

In about half an hour, or something more, we saw, to our infinite satisfaction, the open harbour of Harwich, and the vessel standing directly towards it, and in a few minutes more the ship was in smooth water, and thus I had, though against my will, and contrary to my true interest, what I wished for, to be driven away to England, though it was by a storm.

Nor did this incident do either Amy or me much service, for the danger being over, the fears of death vanished with it, ay, and our fear of what was beyond death also. Our sense of the life we had lived went off, and with our return to life, our wicked taste of life returned, and we were both the same as before, if not worse. So certain it is, that the repentance which is brought about by the mere apprehensions of death, wears off as those apprehensions wear off, and death-bed repentance, or storm repentance, which is much the same, is seldom true.

However, I do not tell you that this was all at once neither; the fright we had at sea lasted a little while afterwards, at least the impression was not quite blown off as soon as the storm, especially poor Amy, as soon as she set her foot on shore, she fell flat upon the ground and kissed it, and gave God thanks for her deliverance from the sea; and turning to me when she got up,—“I hope, madam,” says she, “you will never go upon the sea again.”

I know not what ailed me, not I; but Amy was much more penitent at sea, and much more sensible of her deliverance when she landed and was safe, than I was. I was in a kind of stupidity, I know not well what to call it; I had a mind full of horror in the time of the storm, and saw death before me as plainly as Amy, but my thoughts got no vent, as Amy's did. I had a silent, sullen kind of grief, which could not break out either in words or tears, and which was therefore much the worse to bear.

I had a terror upon me for my wicked life past, and firmly believed I was going to the bottom, launching into death, where I was to give an account of all my past actions; and in this state, and on that account, I looked back upon my wickedness with abhorrence, as I have said above; but I had no sense of repentance from the true motive of repentance; I saw nothing of the corruption of nature, the sin of my life, as an offence against God, as a thing odious to the holiness of his being, as abusing his mercy, and despising his goodness. In short, I had no thorough effectual repentance, no sight of my sins in their proper shape, no view of a Redeemer, or hope in him. I had only such a repentance as a criminal has at the place of execution, who is sorry, not that he has committed the crime, as it is a crime, but sorry that he is to be hanged for it.

It is true Amy's repentance wore off too, as well as mine, but not so soon. However, we were both very grave for a time.

As soon as we could get a boat from the town, we went on shore, and immediately went to a public-house in the town of Harwich, where we were to consider seriously what was to be done, and whether we should go up to London or stay till the ship was refitted, which, they said, would be a fortnight, and then go for Holland, as we intended, and as business required.

Reason directed that I should go to Holland, for there I had all my money to receive, and there I had persons of good reputation and character to apply to, having letters to them from the honest Dutch merchant at Paris, and they might perhaps give me a recommendation again to merchants in London, and so I should get acquainted with some people of figure, which was what I loved; whereas now I knew not one creature in the whole city of London, or anywhere else, that I could go and make myself known to. Upon these considerations I resolved to go to Holland, whatever came on it.

But Amy cried and trembled, and was ready to fall into fits when I did but mention going upon the sea again, and begged of me not to go, or if I would go, that I would leave her behind, though I was to send her a-begging. The people of the inn laughed at her, and jested with her, asked her if she had any sins to confess that she was ashamed should be heard, and whether she was troubled with an evil conscience; told her if she came to sea, to be in a storm, if she had lain with her master she would certainly tell her mistress of it, and that it was a common thing for poor maids to confess all the young men they had lain with; that there was one poor girl that went over with her mistress, whose husband was a linen-draper in Gracechurch street, in the city of London, who confessed in the terror of a storm that she had lain with her master, and all the apprentices too, so often, and in such and such places, and made the poor mistress, when she returned to London, fly at her husband and make such a stir as was indeed the ruin of the whole family. Amy could bear all this well enough, for though she had indeed lain with her master, it was with her mistress's knowledge and consent, and which was worse, it was her mistress's own doing. I record it to the reproach of my own vice, and to expose the excesses of such wickedness as they deserve to be exposed.

I thought Amy's fear would have been over by the time the ship would be gotten ready, but I found the girl was rather worse and worse; and when I came to the point that we must go on board or lose the passage, Amy was so terrified that she fell into fits, so the ship went away without us.

But my going being absolutely necessary, as above, I was obliged to go in the packet-boat some time after, and leave Amy behind at Harwich, but with directions to go to London, and stay there to receive letters and orders from me what to do. Now I was become, from a lady of pleasure, a woman of business, and of great business too, I assure you.

I got me a servant at Harwich to go over with me, who had been at Rotterdam, knew the place, and spoke the language, which was a great help to me, and away I went. I had a very quick passage and pleasant weather, and, coming to Rotterdam, soon found out the merchant to whom I was recommended, who received me with extraordinary respect. And first he acknowledged the accepted bill for 4,000 pistoles, which he afterwards paid punctually; other bills that I had also payable at Amsterdam he procured to be received for me; and whereas one of the bills for 1,200 crowns was protested at Amsterdam, he paid it me himself for the honour of the indorser, as he called it, which was my friend the merchant at Paris.

There I entered into a negotiation by his means for my jewels, and he brought me several jewellers to look on them, and particularly one to value them, and to tell me what every particular was worth. This was a man who had great skill in jewels, but did not trade at that time, and he was desired by the gentleman that I was with to see that I might not be imposed upon.

All this work took me up near half a year, and by managing my business thus myself, and having large sums to do with, I became as expert in it as any she-merchant of them all. I had credit in the bank for a large sum of money, and bills and notes for much more.

After I had been here about three months my maid Amy writes me word that she had received a letter from her friend, as she called him, that, by the way, was the prince's gentleman, that had been Amy's extraordinary friend, indeed; for Amy owned to me he had lain with her a hundred times, that is to say, as often as he pleased, and perhaps in the eight years that that affair lasted, it might be a great deal oftener. This was what she called her friend, whom she corresponded with upon this particular subject; and among other things sent her this particular news, that my extraordinary friend, my real husband, who rode in the gens d'armes, was dead, that he was killed in a rencounter, as they call it, or accidental scuffle among the troopers; and so the jade congratulated me upon my being now a real free woman. "And now, madam," says she at the end of her letter, "you have nothing to do but to come hither, and set up a coach and a good equipage, and if beauty and a good fortune won't make you a duchess, nothing will." But I had not fixed my measures yet. I had no inclination to be a wife again. I had had such bad luck with my first husband, I hated the thoughts of it. I found that a wife is treated with indifference, a mistress with a strong passion; a wife is looked upon as but an upper servant, a mistress is a sovereign; a wife must give up all she has, have every reserve she makes for herself be thought hard of, and be upbraided with her very pin-money; whereas a mistress makes the saying true, that what the man has is hers, and what she has is her own; the wife bears a thousand insults, and is forced to sit still and bear it, or part, and be undone; a mistress insulted helps herself immediately, and takes another.

These were my wicked arguments for whoring, for I never set against them the difference another way, I may say, every other way; how that, first, a wife appears boldly and honourably with her husband, lives at home and possesses his house, his servants, his equipages, and has a right to them all, and to call them her own; entertains his friends, owns his children, and has the return of duty and affection from them, as they are here her own, and claims upon his estate, by the custom of England, if he dies and leaves her a widow.

The whore sculks about in lodgings, is visited in the dark, disowned upon all occasions before God and man; is maintained, indeed, for a time, but is certainly condemned to be abandoned at last, and left to the miseries of fate, and her own just disaster. If she has any children, her endeavour is to get rid of them, and not maintain them; and if she lives, she is certain to see them all hate her, and be ashamed of her; while the vice rages, and the man is in the devil's hands, she has him; and while she has him, she makes a prey of him; but if he happens to fall sick, if any disaster befalls him, the cause of all lies upon her. He is sure to lay all his misfortunes at her door; and if once he comes to repentance, or makes but one step towards a reformation, he begins with her, leaves her, uses her as she deserves, hates her, abhors her, and sees her no more; and that with this never-failing addition, namely, that the more sincere and unfeigned his repentance is, the more earnestly he looks up and the more effectually he looks in, the more his aversion to her increases, and he curses her from the bottom of his soul; nay, it must be from a kind of excess of charity, if he so much as wishes God may forgive her.

The opposite circumstances of a wife and a whore are such, and so many, and I have since seen the difference with such eyes, as I could dwell upon the subject a great while; but my business is history. I had a long scene of folly yet to run over. Perhaps the moral of all my story may bring me back again to this point; and if it does, I shall speak of it fully.

While I continued in Holland I received several letters from my friend (so I had good reason to call him), the merchant in Paris, in which he gave me a further account of the conduct of that rogue the Jew, and how he acted after I was gone; how impatient he was while the said merchant kept him in suspense, expecting me to come again; and how he raged when he found I came no more.

It seems, after he found I did not come, he found out, by his unwearied inquiry, where I had lived; and that I had been kept as a mistress to some great person, but he could never learn by whom, except that he learned the colour of his livery. In pursuit of this inquiry he guessed at the right person, but could not make it out, or offer any positive proof of it, but he found out the prince's gentleman, and talked so saucily to him of it, that the gentleman treated him, as the French call it, a coup de baton; that is to say, caned him very severely, as he deserved; and that not satisfying him, or curing his insolence, he was met one night late upon the Pont Neuf, in Paris, by two men, who muffling him up in a great cloak, carried him into a more private place, and cut off both his ears, telling him, it was for talking impudently of his superiors; adding, that he should take care to govern his tongue better, and behave with more manners, or the next time they would cut his tongue out of his head.

This put a check to his sauciness that way; but he comes back to the merchant, and threatened to begin a process against him for corresponding with me, and being accessory to the murder of the jeweller, &c.

The merchant found by his discourse, that he supposed I was protected by the said Prince de —, nay, the rogue said, he was sure I was in his lodgings at Versailles; for he never had so much as the least intimation of the way I was really gone; but that I was there he was certain, and certain that the merchant was privy to it. The merchant bade him defiance; however, he gave him a great deal of trouble, and put him to a great charge, and had like to have brought him in for a party to my escape, in which case he would have been obliged to have produced me, and that in the penalty of some capital sum of money.

But the merchant was too many for him another way, for he brought an information against him for a cheat; wherein, laying down the whole fact, how he intended falsely to accuse the widow of the jeweller for the supposed murder of her husband; that he did it purely to get the jewels from her; and that he offered to bring him (the merchant) in, to be confederate with him, and to share the jewels between them; proving also his design to get the jewels into his hands, and then to have dropped the prosecution, upon condition of my quitting the jewels to him. Upon this charge he got him laid by the heels, so he was sent to the Conciergerie, that is to say, to Bridewell, and the merchant cleared. He got out of jail in a little while, though not without the help of money, and continued teasing the merchant a long while, and at last threatened to assassinate and murder him; so the merchant, who, having buried his wife about two months before, was now a single man, and not knowing what such a villain might do, thought fit to quit Paris, and come away to Holland also.

It is most certain, that speaking of originals, I was the source and spring of all that trouble and vexation to this honest gentleman; and as it was afterwards in my power to have made him full satisfaction, and did not, I cannot say but I added ingratitude to all the rest of my follies; but of that I shall give a fuller account presently.

I was surprised one morning, when being at the merchant's house whom he had recommended me to in Rotterdam, and being busy in his counting house, managing my bills, and preparing to write a letter to him to Paris, I heard a noise of horses at the door, which is not very common in a city where everybody passes by water; but he had, it seems, ferried over the Maze from Williamstadt, and so came to the very door, and I soon after saw a gentleman alight and come in at the gate. I knew nothing and expected nothing, to be sure, of the person; but, as I say, I was surprised, and indeed more than ordinarily surprised, when coming near to me, I saw it was my merchant of Paris, my benefactor, and indeed, my deliverer.

I confess it was an agreeable surprise to me, and I was exceeding glad to see him, who was so honourable and so kind to me, and who indeed had saved my life. As soon as he saw me he ran to me, took me in his arms, and kissed me with a freedom that he never offered to take with me before: "Dear madam," says he, "I am glad to see you safe in this country; if you had stayed two days longer in Paris you had been undone." I was so glad to see him that I could not speak a good while, and I burst out into tears without speaking a word for a minute, but I recovered that disorder, and said, "The more, sir, is my obligation to see you that had saved my life;" and added, "I am glad to see you here, that I may consider how to balance an account in which I am so much your debtor."—"You and I will adjust that matter easily," says he, "now we are so near together; pray, where do you lodge?" says he.

"In a very honest, good house," said I, "where that gentleman, your friend, recommended me," pointing to the merchant in whose house we then were.

"And where you may lodge too, sir," says the gentleman, "if it suits with your business, and your other conveniencies."

"With all my heart," says he; "then, madam," adds he, turning to me, "I shall be near you, and have time to tell you a story which will be very long, and yet many ways very pleasant to you; how troublesome that devilish fellow, the Jew has been to me on your account, and what a hellish snare he had laid for you, if he could have found you."

"I shall have leisure too, sir," said I, "to tell you all my adventures since that; which have not been a few, I assure you."

In short, he took up his lodgings in the same house where I lodged, and the room he lay in opened, as he was wishing it would, just to my lodging-room, so we could almost call out of bed to one another, and I was not at all shy of him on that score, for I believed him perfectly honest; and so indeed he was, and if he had not, that article was at present no part of my concern.

It was not till two or three days, and after his first hurry of business were over, that we began to enter into the history of our affairs on every side, but when we began, it took up all our conversation for almost a fortnight. First I gave him a particular account of everything that happened material upon my voyage, and how we were driven into Harwich by a very terrible storm, how I had left my woman behind me, so frightened with the danger she had been in, that she durst not venture to set her foot into a ship again, and that I had not come myself, if the bills I had of him had not been payable in Holland; but that money, he might see, would make a woman go anywhere.

He seemed to laugh at all our womanish fears upon the occasion of the storm, telling me it was nothing but what was very ordinary in those seas, but that they had harbours on every coast so near, that they were seldom in danger of being lost; "for indeed," says he, "if they cannot fetch one coast they can always stand away for another, and run afore it," as he called it, "for one side or other." But when I came to tell him what a crazy ship it was, and how, even when they had got into Harwich, and into smooth water, they were fain to run the ship on shore, or she would have sunk in the harbour; and that I looked out at the cabin door, and saw one Dutchman upon his knees here, and another there, at prayers, then indeed he acknowledged I had reason to be alarmed; but smiling, added, "but you, madam," says he, "are so good a lady, and so pious, you would but have gone to heaven a little the sooner. The difference had not been much to you."

I confess, when he said this, it made all the blood turn in my veins, and I thought I should have fainted. "Poor gentleman!" thought I, "you know little of me; what would I give to be really what you really think me to be!" He perceived the disorder, but said nothing till I spoke; when, shaking my head, "O, sir," said I, "death in any shape has some terror in it, but in the frightful figure of a storm at sea, and a sinking ship, it comes with a double, a treble, and indeed an inexpressible horror; and if I were that saint you think me to be (which God knows I am not), it is still very dismal; I desire to die in a calm, if I can." He said a great many good things, and very prettily ordered his discourse between serious reflection and compliment, but I had too much guilt to relish it as it was meant, so I turned it off to something else, and talked of the necessity I had on me to come to Holland, but I wished myself safe on shore in England again.

He said he was glad I had such an obligation upon me to come over into Holland, but hinted that he was so interested in my welfare, and besides had such further designs upon me, that if I had not so happily been found in Holland, he was resolved to have gone to England to see me, and that it was one of the principal reasons for his leaving Paris.

I told him I was extremely obliged to him for so far interesting himself in my affairs, but that I had been so far his debtor before, that I knew not how anything could increase it; for I owed my life to him already, and I could not be in debt for anything more valuable than that. He answered in the most obliging manner possible, that he would put it in my power to pay that debt, and all the obligation besides that ever he had or should be able to lay upon me.

I began to understand him now, and to see plainly that he resolved to make love to me; but I would by no means seem to take the hint, and besides I knew that he had a wife with him in Paris; and I had just then, indeed, no gust for any more intriguing; however, he surprised me into a sudden notice of the thing a little while after, by saying something in his discourse that he did, as he said, in his wife's days. I started at that word—"What mean you by that, sir?" said I; "have you not a wife in Paris?"—"No, madam, indeed," said he, "my wife died the beginning of September last;" which it seems was but a little after I came away.

We lived in the same house all this while; and as we lodged not far off one another, opportunities were not wanting of as near an acquaintance as we might desire; nor have such opportunities the least agency in vicious minds to bring to pass even what they might not intend at first.

However, though he courted me at so much distance, yet his pretensions were very honourable; and as I had before found him a most disinterested friend, and perfectly honest in his dealings, even when I trusted him with all I had, so now I found him strictly virtuous, till I made him otherwise myself, even almost whether he would or no, as you shall hear.

It was not long after our former discourse when he repeated what he had insinuated before, namely that he had yet a design to lay before me, which, if I would agree to his proposals, would more than balance all accounts between us. I told him I could not reasonably deny him anything; and except one thing, which I hoped and believed he would not think of, I should think myself very ungrateful if I did not do everything for him that lay in my power.

He told me what he should desire of me would be fully in my power to grant, or else he should be very unfriendly to offer it, and still all this while he declined making the proposal, as he called it, and so for that time we ended our discourse, turning it off to other things; so that, in short, I began to think he might have met with some disaster in his business, and might have come away from Paris in some discredit, or had had some blow on his affairs in general; and as really I had kindness enough to have parted with a good sum to have helped him, and was in gratitude bound to have done so, he having so effectually saved to me all I had; so I resolved to make him the offer the first time I had an opportunity, which two or three days after offered itself very much to my satisfaction.

He had told me at large, though on several occasions, the treatment he had met with from the Jew, and what expense he had put him to; how at length he had cast him, as above, and had recovered good damage of him, but that the rogue was unable to make him any considerable reparation. He had told me also how the Prince d'—'s gentleman had resented his treatment of his master; and how he had caused him to be used upon the Pont Neuf, &c. as I have mentioned above, which I laughed at most heartily.

"It is pity," said I, "that I should sit here and make that gentleman no amends; if you would direct me, sir," said I, "how to do it, I would make him a handsome present, and acknowledge the justice he had done to me as well as to the Prince, his master." He said he would do what I directed in it; so I told him I would send him 500 crowns. "That's too much," said he, "for you are but half interested in the usage of the Jew; it was on his master's account he corrected him, not on yours." Well, however, we were obliged to do nothing in it, for neither of us knew how to direct a letter to him, or to direct anybody to him; so I told him I would leave it till I came to England, for that my woman, Amy, corresponded with him, and that he had made love to her.

"Well but, sir," said I, "as in requital for his generous concern for me, I am careful to think of him; it is but just that what expense you have been obliged to be at, which was all on my account, should be repaid you, and therefore," said I, "let me see —" and there I paused and began to reckon up what I had observed from his own discourse it had cost him in the several disputes and hearings which he had with that dog of a Jew, and I cast them up at something above 2,130 crowns; so I pulled out some bills which I had upon a merchant in Amsterdam, and a particular account in bank, and was looking on them in order to give them to him.

When he seeing evidently what I was going about, interrupted me with some warmth, and told me he would have nothing of me on that account, and desired I would not pull out my bills and papers on that score; that he had not told me the story on that account, or with any such view; that it had been his misfortune first to bring that ugly rogue to me, which, though it was with a good design, yet he would punish himself with the expense he had been at, for his being so unlucky to me; that I could not think so hard of him as to suppose he would take money of me, a widow, for serving me, and doing acts of kindness to me in a strange country, and in distress too; but he said he would repeat what he had said before, that he kept me for a deeper reckoning, and that, as he had told me, he would put me into a posture to even all that favour, as I called it, at once, so we should talk it over another time, and balance all together.

Now I expected it would come out, but still he put it off, as before, from whence I concluded it could not be matter of love, for that those things are not usually delayed in such a manner, and therefore it must be matter of money; upon which thought I broke the silence, and told him that as he knew I had, by obligation, more kindness for him than to deny any favour to him that I could grant, and that he seemed backward to mention his case, I begged of him to give me leave to ask him whether anything lay upon his mind with respect to his business and effects in the world; that if it did, he knew what I had in the world as well as I did; and that if he wanted money, I would let him have any sum for his occasion, as far as five or six thousand pistoles, and he should pay me as his own affairs would permit; and that if he never paid me I would never give him any trouble for it.

He rose up with ceremony, and gave me thanks in terms that sufficiently told me he had been bred among people more polite and more courteous than is esteemed the ordinary usage of the Dutch; and after his compliment was over he came nearer to me, and told me that he was obliged to assure me, though with repeated acknowledgments of my kind offer, that he was not in any want of money; that he had met with no uneasiness in any of his affairs, no, not of any kind whatever, except that of the loss of his wife and one of his children, which indeed had troubled him much; but that this was no part of what he had to offer to me, and by granting which I should balance all obligations; but that, in short, it was that, seeing Providence had (as it were for that purpose) taken his wife from him, I would make up the loss to him; and with that he held me fast in his arms, and, kissing me, would not give me leave to say no, and hardly to breathe.

At length, having got room to speak, I told him that, as I said before, I could deny him but one thing in the world, I was very sorry he should propose that thing only that I could not grant.

I could not but smile, however, to myself that he should make so many circles and roundabout motions to come to a discourse which had no such rarity at the bottom of it, if he had known all. But there was another reason why I resolved not to have him, when, at the same time, if he had courted me in a manner less honest or virtuous, I believe I should not have denied him; but I shall come to that part presently.

He was, as I have said, long a-bringing it out, but when he had brought it out he pursued it with such importunities as would admit of no denial, at least he intended they should not; but I resisted them obstinately, and yet with expressions of the utmost kindness and respect for him that could be imagined, often telling him there was nothing else in the world that I could deny him, and showing him all the respect, and upon all occasions treating him with intimacy and freedom, as if he had been my brother.

He tried all the ways imaginable to bring his design to pass, but I was inflexible; at last, he thought of a way, which, he flattered himself, would not fail; nor would he have been mistaken perhaps in any other woman in the world but me; this was, to try if he could take me at an advantage and get to bed to me, and then, as was most rational to think, I should willingly enough marry him afterwards.

We were so intimate together, that nothing but man and wife could, or at least ought, to be more; but still our freedoms kept within the bounds of modesty and decency. But one evening, above all the rest, we were very merry, and I fancied he pushed the mirth to watch for his advantage; and I resolved that I would, at least, feign to be as merry as he; and that, in short, if he offered anything, he should have his will easily enough.

About one o'clock in the morning, for so long we sat up together, I said, "Come, 'tis one o'clock, I must go to bed."—"Well," says he, "I'll go with you."—"No, no," says I, "go to your own chamber;" he said he would go to bed with me. "Nay," says I, "if you will, I don't know what to say; if I can't help it, you must." However, I got from him, left him, and went into my chamber, but did not shut the door, and, as he could easily see that I was undressing myself he steps to his own room, which was but on the same floor, and in a few minutes undresses himself also, and returns to my door in his gown and slippers.

I thought he had been gone indeed, and so that he had been in jest; and, by the way, thought either he had no mind to the thing, or that he never intended it; so I shut my door, that is, latched it, for I seldom locked or bolted it, and went to bed. I had not been in bed a minute, but he comes in his gown to the door, and opens it a little way, but not enough to come in, or look in, and says softly, "What, are you really gone to bed?"—"Yes, yes," says I, "get you gone."—"No, indeed," says he, "I shall not be gone, you gave me leave before to come to bed, and you shan't say get you gone now." So he comes into my room, and then turns about, and fastens the door, and immediately comes to the bedside to me. I pretended to scold and struggle, and bid him begone, with more warmth than before; but it was all one; he had not a rag of clothes on but his gown and slippers and shirt, so he throws off his gown, and throws open the bed, and came in at once.

I made a seeming resistance, but it was no more indeed; for, as above, I resolved from the beginning he should lie with me if he would, and for the rest I left it to come after.

Well, he lay with me that night, and the two next, and very merry we were all the three days between; but the third night he began to be a little more grave. "Now, my dear," says he, "though I have pushed this matter farther than ever I intended, or than I believe you expected from me, who never made any pretences to you but what were very honest; yet to heal it all up and let you see how sincerely I meant at first, and how honest I will ever be to you, I am ready to marry you still, and desire you to let it be done to-morrow morning; and I will give you the same fair conditions of marriage as I would have done before."

This, it must be owned, was a testimony that he was very honest, and that he loved me sincerely; but I construed it quite another way, namely, that he aimed at the money. But how surprised did he look, and how was he confounded when he found me receive his proposal with coldness and indifference, and still tell him that it was the only thing I could not grant!

He was astonished. "What not take me now?" says he, "when I have been a-bed with you?" I answered coldly, though respectfully still, "It is true, to my shame be it spoken," says I, "that you have taken me by surprise, and have had your will of me; but I hope you will not take it ill that I cannot consent to marry, for all that. If I am with child," said I, "care must be taken to manage that as you direct; I hope you won't expose me, for my having exposed myself to you, but I cannot go any farther." and at that point I stood, and would hear of no matrimony by any means.

Now because this may seem a little odd, I shall state the matter clearly; as I understood it myself. I knew that while I was a mistress, it is customary for the person kept to receive from them that keep; but if I should be a wife, all I had then was given up to the husband, and I was thenceforth to be under his authority only; and as I had money enough, and needed not fear being what they call a cast-off mistress, so I had no need to give him twenty thousand pounds to marry me, which had been buying my lodging too dear a great deal.

Thus his project of coming to bed to me was a bite upon himself, while he intended it for a bite upon me; and he was no nearer his aim of marrying me than he was before. All his arguments he could urge upon the subject of matrimony were at an end, for I positively declined marrying him; and as he had refused the thousand pistoles which I had offered him in compensation for his expenses and loss at Paris, with the Jew, and had done it upon the hopes he had of marrying me; so when he found his way difficult still, he was amazed, and I had some reason to believe, repented that he had refused the money.

But thus it is when men run into wicked measures to bring their designs about. I that was infinitely obliged to him before, began to talk to him as if I had balanced accounts with him now, and that the favour of lying with a whore was equal, not to the thousand pistoles only, but to all the debt I owed him, for saving my life and all my effects.

But he drew himself into it, and though it was a dear bargain, yet it was a bargain of his own making; he could not say I had tricked him into it; but as he projected and drew me into lie with him, depending that it was a sure game in order to a marriage, so I granted him the favour, as he called it, to balance the account of favours received from him, and keep the thousand pistoles with a good grace.

He was extremely disappointed in this article, and knew not how to manage for a great while; and as I dare say, if he had not expected to have made it an earnest for marrying me, he would never have attempted me the other way; so, I believed, if it had not been for the money, which he knew I had, he would never have desired to marry me after he had lain with me. For, where is the man that cares to marry a whore, though of his own making? And as I knew him to be no fool, so I did him no wrong, when I supposed that, but for the money, he would not have had any thoughts of me that way, especially after my yielding as I had done; in which it is to be remembered that I made no capitulation for marrying him, when I yielded to him, but let him do just what he pleased, without any previous bargain.

Well, hitherto we went upon guesses at one another's designs; but as he continued to im-portune me to marry, though he had lain with me, and still did lay with me as often as he pleased, and I continued to refuse to marry him, though I let him lay with me whenever he desired it; I say, as these two circumstances made up our conversation, it could not continue long thus, but we must come to an explanation.

One morning, in the middle of our unlawful freedoms, that is to say, when we were in bed together he sighed, and told me, he desired my leave to ask me one question, and that I would give him an answer to it, with the same ingenuous freedom and honesty, that I had used to treat him with. I told him I would. Why then his question was, why I would not marry him, seeing I allowed him all the freedom of a husband? "Or," says he, "my dear, since you have been so kind as to take me to your bed, why will you not make me your own, and take me for good and all, that we may enjoy ourselves without any reproach to one another."

I told him, that as I confessed it was the only thing I could not comply with him in, so it was the only thing in all my actions, that I could not give him a reason for. That it was true I had let him come to bed to me, which was supposed to be the greatest favour a woman could grant; but it was evident, and he might see it, that as I was sensible of the obligation I was under to him for saving me from the worst circumstance it was possible for me to be brought to, I could deny him nothing; and if I had had any greater favour to yield him, I should have done it, that of matrimony only excepted, and he could not but see that I loved him to an extraordinary degree, in every part of my behaviour to him; but that as to marrying, which was giving up my liberty, it was what once he knew I had done, and he had seen how it had hurried me up and down in the world, and what it had exposed me to; that I had an aversion to it, and desired he would not insist upon it. He might easily see I had no aversion to him; and that if I was with child by him, he should see a testimony of my kindness to the father, for that I would settle all I had in the world upon the child.

He was mute a good while; at last, says he, "Come, my dear, you are the first woman in the world that ever lay with a man, and then refused to marry him, and therefore there must be some other reason for your refusal; and I have therefore one other request, and that is, if I guess at the true reason, and remove the objection, will you then yield to me?" I told him if he removed the objection I must needs comply, for I should certainly do everything that I had no objection against.

"Why then, my dear, it must be that either you are already engaged, and married to some other man, or you are not willing to dispose of your money to me, and expect to advance yourself higher with your fortune. Now, if it be the first of these, my mouth will be stopped, and I have no more to say; but if it be the last, I am prepared effectually to remove the objections, and answer all you can say on that subject."

I took him up short at the first of these, telling him he must have base thoughts of me indeed, to think that I could yield to him in such a manner as I had done, and continue it with so much freedom, as he found I did, if I had a husband, or were engaged to any other man; and that he might depend upon it that was not my case, nor any part of my case.

"Why then," said he, "as to the other, I have an offer to make to you that shall take off all the objection, viz., That I will not touch one pistole of your estate more than shall be with your own voluntary consent, neither now or at any other time, but you shall settle it as you please for your life, and upon whom you please after your death;" that I should see he was able to maintain me without it; and that it was not for that that he followed me from Paris.

I was indeed surprised at that part of his offer, and he might easily perceive it; it was not only what I did not expect, but it was that I knew not what answer to make to. He had, indeed, removed my principal objection, nay, all my objections, and it was not possible for me to give any answer; for if upon so generous an offer I should agree with him, I then did as good as confess that it was upon the account of my money that I refused him; and that though I could give up my virtue, and expose myself, yet I would not give up my money, which, though it was true, yet was really too gross for me to acknowledge, and I could not pretend to marry him upon that principle neither. Then as to having him, and make over all my estate out of his hands, so as not to give him the management of what I had, I thought it would be not only a little Gothic and inhuman, but it would be always a foundation of unkindness between us, and render us suspected one to another; so that upon the whole I was obliged to give a new turn to it, and talk upon a kind of an elevated strain, which really was not in my thoughts at first, at all; for I own, as above, the divesting myself of my estate and putting my money out of my hand, was the sum of the matter that made me refuse to marry; but, I say, I gave it a new turn upon this occasion, as follows:

I told him I had, perhaps, differing notions of matrimony from what the received custom had given us of it; that I thought a woman was a free agent, as well as a man, and was born free, and could she manage herself suitably, might enjoy that liberty to as much purpose as the men do; that the laws of matrimony were indeed otherwise, and mankind at this time acted quite upon other principles; and those such that a woman gave herself entirely away from herself, in marriage, and capitulated only to be, at best, but an upper servant, and from the time she took the man, she was no better or worse than the servant among the Israelites, who had his ears bored, that is, nailed to the door-post, who by that act gave himself up to be a servant during life.

That the very nature of the marriage contract was, in short, nothing but giving up liberty, estate, authority, and everything, to the man, and the woman was indeed a mere woman ever after, that is to say, a slave.

He replied, that though in some respects it was as I had said, yet I ought to consider that as an equivalent to this, the man had all the care of things devolved upon him; that the weight of business lay upon his shoulders, and as he had the trust, so he had the toil of life upon him; his was the labour, his the anxiety of living; that the woman had nothing to do but to eat the fat and drink the sweet; to sit still and look round her, to be waited on and made much of, be served, and loved, and made easy, especially if the husband acted as became him; and that, in general, the labour of the man was appointed to make the woman live quiet and unconcerned in the world; that they had the name of subjection without the thing; and if, in inferior families, they had the drudgery of the house, and care of the provisions upon them, yet they had, indeed, much the easier part; for in general, the women had only the care of managing, that is, spending what their husbands get; and that a woman had the name of subjection, indeed, but that they generally commanded, not the men only, but all they had; managed all for themselves; and where the man did his duty, the woman's life was all ease and tranquillity, and that she had nothing to do but to be easy, and to make all that were about her both easy and merry.

I returned, that while a woman was single, she was a masculine in her politic capacity; that she had then the full command of what she had, and the full direction of what she did; that she was a man in her separated capacity, to all intents and purposes that a man could be so to himself; that she was controled by none, because unaccountable to none: so I sung these two lines of Mr ———'s.

"O! 'tis pleasant to be free,
The sweetest Miss is Liberty."

I added, that whoever the woman was that had an estate, and would give it up to be the slave of a great man, that woman was a fool, and must be fit for nothing but a beggar; that it was my opinion a woman was as fit to govern and enjoy her own estate, without a man, as a man was without a woman; and that, if she had a mind to gratify herself as to sexes, she might entertain a man, as a man does a mistress; that while she was thus single she was her own, and if she gave away that power, she merited to be as miserable as it was possible that any creature could be.

All he could say could not answer the force of this as to argument, only this, that the other way was the ordinary method that the world was guided by; that he had reason to expect I should be content with that which all the world was contented with; that he was of the opinion, that a sincere affection between a man and his wife answered all the objections that I had made about the being a slave, a servant, and the like, and where there was a mutual love there could be no bondage; but that there was but one interest, one aim, one design, and all conspired to make both very happy.

"Ay," said I, "that is the thing I complain of. The pretence of affection takes from a woman everything that can be called herself; she is to have no interest, no aim, no view; but all is the interest, aim, and view, of the husband; she is to be the passive creature you spoke of," said I. "She is to lead a life of perfect indolence, and living by faith (not in God, but) in her husband, she sinks or swims, as he is either fool or wise man, unhappy or prosperous; and in the middle of what she thinks is her happiness and prosperity, she is engulfed in misery and beggary, which she had not the least notice, knowledge, or suspicion of. How often have I seen a woman living in all the splendor that a plentiful fortune ought to allow her! with her coaches and equipages, her family and rich furniture, her attendants and friends, her visitors and good company, all about her to-day; to-morrow surprised with a disaster, turned out of all by a commission of bankrupt, stripped—to the clothes on her back, her jointure, suppose she had it, is sacrificed to the creditors, so long as her husband lived, and she turned into the street, and left to live on the charity of her friends, if she has any, or follow the monarch, her husband, into the Mint, and live there on the wreck of his fortunes till he is forced to run away from her, even there; and then she sees her children starve, herself miserable, breaks her heart, and cries herself to death? This," says I, "is the state of many a lady that has had ten thousand pounds to her portion."

He did not know how feelingly I spoke this, and what extremities I had gone through of this kind; how near I was to the very last article above, viz. crying myself to death; and how I really starved for almost two years together.

But he shook his head, and said, "Where had I lived? and what dreadful families had I lived among, that had frightened me into such terrible apprehensions of things? that these things indeed might happen where men run into hazardous things in trade, and without prudence or due consideration, launch their fortunes in a degree beyond their strength, grasping at adventures beyond their stocks, and the like; but that, as he was stated in the world, if I would embark with him, he had a fortune equal with mine; that together we should have no occasion of engaging in business any more, but that in any part of the world where I had a mind to live, whether England, France, Holland, or where I would, we might settle, and live as happily as the world could make any one live; that if I desired the management of our estate, when put together, if I would not trust him with mine, he would trust me with his; that we would be upon one bottom, and I should steer.—"Ay," says I, "you'll allow me to steer, that is, hold the helm, but you'll con the ship, as they call it; that is, as at sea, a boy serves to stand at the helm, but but he that gives him the orders is pilot."

He laughed at my simile; "No," says he, "you shall be pilot then, you shall con the ship." "Ay," says I, "as long as you please, but you can take the helm out of my hand when you please, and bid me go spin. It is not you," says I, "that I suspect, but the laws of matrimony puts the power into your hands, and bids you do it; commands you to command; and binds me, forsooth, to obey; you, that are now upon even terms with me, and I with you," says I, "are the next hour set upon the throne, and the humble wife placed at your footstool: all the rest, all that you call oneness of interest, mutual affection, and the like, is courtesy and kindness then, and a woman is indeed infinitely obliged where she meets with it, but cannot help herself where it fails."

Well, he did not give it over yet, but came to the serious part, and there he thought he should be too many for me; he first hinted that marriage was decreed by heaven; that it was the fixed state of life, which God had appointed for man's felicity, and for establishing a legal posterity; and there could be no legal claim of estates by inheritance, but by children born in wedlock; that all the rest sunk under scandal and illegitimacy; and very well he talked upon that subject indeed.

But it would not do; I took him short there. "Look you, sir," said I, "you have the advantage of me there indeed, in my particular case; but it would not be generous to make use of it. I readily grant, that it were better for me to have married you, than to admit you to the liberty I have given you; but as I could not reconcile my judgment to marriage, for the reasons above, and had kindness enough for you, and obligation too much on me to resist you, I suffered your rudeness, and gave up my virtue; but I have two things before me to heal up that breach of honour without that desperate one of marriage, and those are, repentance for what is past, and putting an end to it for time to come."

He seemed to be concerned to think that I should take him in that manner; he assured me that I misunderstood him, that he had more manners as well as more kindness for me, and more justice than to reproach me with what he had been the aggressor in, and had surprised me into. That what he spoke referred to my words above, that the woman, if she thought fit, might entertain a man, as the man did a mistress; and that I seemed to mention that way of living as justifiable, and setting it as a lawful thing, and in the place of matrimony.

Well, we strained some compliments upon those points not worth repeating; and I added, I supposed when he got to bed to me he thought himself sure of me; and, indeed, in the ordinary course of things, after he had lain with me he ought to think so, but that, upon the same foot of argument which I had discoursed with him upon, it was just the contrary; and when a woman had been weak enough to yield up the last point before wedlock, it would be adding one weakness to another to take the man afterwards, to pin down the shame of it upon herself all the days of her life, and bind herself to live all her time with the only man that could upbraid her with it. That in yielding at first she must be a fool, but to take the man is to be sure to be called a fool; that to resist a man is to act with courage and vigour, and to cast off the reproach, which, in the course of things, drops out of knowledge and dies. The man goes one way and the woman another, as Fate and the circumstances of living direct; and if they keep one another's counsel, the folly is heard no more of; but to take the man," says I, "is the most preposterous thing in nature, and (saving your presence) is to befoul one's self, and live always in the smell of it. No, no," added I, "after a man has lain with me as a mistress, he ought never to lie with me as a wife. That's not only preserving the crime in memory, but it is recording it in the family; if the woman marries the man afterwards, she bears the reproach of it to the last hour; if her husband is not a man of a hundred thousand, he sometime or other upbraids her with it; if he has children, they fail not one way or other to hear of it: if the children are virtuous, they do their mother the justice to hate her for it; if they are wicked, they give her the mortification of doing the like, and giving her for the example. On the other hand, if the man and the woman part, there is an end of the crime, and an end of the clamour; time wears out the memory of it, or a woman may remove but a few streets, and she soon outlives it, and hears no more of it."

He was confounded at this discourse, and told me he could not say but that I was right in the main. That as to that part relating to managing estates, it was arguing à la cavalier, it was in some sense right, if the women were able to carry it on so, but that in general the sex were not capable of it; their heads were not turned for it, and they had better choose a person capable and honest, that knew how to do them justice, as women, as well as to love them; and that then the trouble was all taken off of their hands.

I told him it was a dear way of purchasing their ease, for very often when the trouble was taken off their hands, so was their money too; and that I thought it was far safer for the sex not to be afraid of the trouble but to be really afraid of their money, and that if no body was trusted, nobody would be deceived; and the staff in their own hands was the best security in the world.

He replied, that I had started a new thing in the world; that however I might support it by subtle reasoning, yet it was a way of arguing that was contrary to the general practice, and that he confessed he was much disappointed in it; that had he known I would have made such an use of it, he would never attempted what he did, which he had no wicked design in, resolving to make me reparation, and that he was very sorry he had been so unhappy; that he was very sure he should never upbraid me with it hereafter, and had so good an opinion of me as to believe I did not suspect him; but seeing I was positive in refusing him, notwithstanding what had passed, he had nothing to do but to secure me from reproach, by going back again to Paris, that so, according to my own way of arguing, it might die out of memory, and I might never meet with it again to my disadvantage.

I was not pleased with this part at all, for I had no mind to let him go neither; and yet I had no mind to give him such hold of me as he would have had; and thus I was in a kind of suspense, irresolute, and doubtful what course to take.

I was in the house with him, as I have observed, and I saw evidently that he was preparing to go back to Paris; and particularly, I found he was remitting money to Paris, which was, as I understood afterwards, to pay for some wines, which he had given order to have bought for him at Troyes in Champagne; and I knew not what course to take; and besides that I was very loth to part with him, I found also that I was with child by him, which was what I had not yet told him of; and sometimes I thought not to tell him of it at all; but I was in a strange place, and had no acquaintance, though I had a great deal of substance, which indeed, having no friends there, was the more dangerous to me.

This obliged me to take him one morning, when I saw him, as I thought, a little anxious about his going, and irresolute; says I to him, "I fancy you can hardly find in your heart to leave me now."—"The more unkind is it in you," said he, "severely unkind, to refuse a man that knows not how to part with you."

"I am so far from being unkind to you," said I, "that I will go over all the world with you, if you desire me, except to Paris, where you know I can't go."

"It is a pity so much love," said he, "on both sides should ever separate."

"Why, then," said I, "do you go away from me?"

"Because," said he, "you won't take me."

"But if I won't take you," said I, "you may take me anywhere but to Paris."

He was very loth to go anywhere, he said, without me; but he must go to Paris or to the East Indies.

I told him I did not use to court, but I durst venture myself to the East Indies with him, if there was a necessity of his going.

He told me, God be thanked, he was in no necessity of going any where, but that he had a tempting invitation to go to the Indies.

I answered, I would say nothing to that; but that I desired he would go anywhere but to Paris, because there he knew I must not go.

He said he had no remedy but to go where I could not go; for he could not bear to see me, if he must not have me.

I told him that was the unkindest thing he could say of me, and that I ought to take it very ill, seeing I knew how very well to oblige him to stay, without yielding to what he knew I could not yield to.

This amazed him, and he told me I was pleased to be mysterious; but that he was sure it was in nobody's power to hinder him going, if he resolved upon it, except me, who had influence enough upon him to make him do anything.

Yes, I told him, I could hinder him, because I knew he could no more do an unkind thing by me than he could do an unjust one; and to put him out of his pain, I told him I was with child.

He came to me, and taking me in his arms, and kissing me a thousand times almost, said, Why would I be so unkind not to tell him that before?

I told him 'twas hard, that to have him stay, I should be forced to do as criminals do to avoid the gallows, plead my belly; and that I thought I had given him testimonies enough of an affection equal to that of a wife, if I had not only lain with him; been with child by him, shown myself unwilling to part with him, but offered to go the East Indies with him; and except one thing that I could not grant, what could he ask more?

He stood mute a good while, but afterwards told me, he had a great deal more to say, if I could assure him that I would not take ill whatever freedom he might use me in his discourse.

I told him that he might use any freedom in words; for a woman who had given leave to such other freedoms, as I had done, but left herself no room to take anything ill, let it be what it would.

"Why then," he said, "I hope you believe, madam, I was born a Christian, and that I have some sense of sacred things upon my mind. When I first broke in upon my own virtue and assaulted yours; when I surprised, and, as it were, forced you to that which neither you intended or I designed but a few hours before; it was upon a presumption that you would certainly marry me, if once I could go that length with you; and it was with an honest resolution to make you my wife.

"But I have been surprised with such a denial that no woman in such circumstances ever gave to a man; for certainly it was never known that any woman refused to marry a man that had first lain with her, much less a man that had gotten her with child; but you go upon different notions from all the world, and though you reason upon it so strongly that a man knows hardly what to answer, yet I must own there is something in it shocking to nature, and something very unkind to yourself: but above all, it is unkind to the child that is yet unborn, who, if we marry, will come into the world with advantage enough, but if not, is ruined before it is born; must bear the eternal reproach of what it is not guilty of; must be branded from its cradle with a mark of infamy; be loaded with the crimes and follies of its parents, and suffer for sins that it never committed. This I take to be very hard, and, indeed, cruel to the poor infant not yet born, whom you cannot think of with any patience, if you have the common affection of a mother, and not do that for it which should at once place it on a level with the rest of the world, and not leave it to curse its parents for what also we ought to be ashamed of. I cannot, therefore," says he, "but beg and intreat you, as you are a Christian and a mother, not to let the innocent lamb you go with be ruined before it is born, and leave it to curse and reproach us hereafter, for what may be so easily avoided.

"Then, dear madam," said he, with a world of tenderness (and I thought I saw tears in his eyes), "allow me to repeat it, that I am a Christian, and consequently I do not allow what I have rashly, and without due consideration, done; I say, I do not approve of it as lawful, and therefore, though I did, with the view I have mentioned, one unjustifiable action, I cannot say that I could satisfy myself to live in a continual practice of what in judgment we must both condemn; and though I love you above all the women in the world, and have done enough to convince you of it, by resolving to marry you after what has passed between us, and by offering to quit all pretensions to any part of your estate, so that I should, as it were, take a wife after I had lain with her, and without a farthing portion, which, as my circumstances are, I need not do; I say, notwithstanding my affection to you, which is inexpressible, yet I cannot give up my soul as well as body, the interest of this world, and the hopes of another; and you cannot call this my disrespect to you."

If ever any man in the world was truly valuable for the strictest honesty of intention, this was the man; and if ever a woman in her senses rejected a man of merit on so trivial and frivolous a pretence, I was the woman: but surely it was the most preposterous thing that ever woman did.

He would have taken me as a wife, but would not entertain me as a whore. Was ever woman angry with any gentleman on that head? And was ever woman so stupid to choose to be a whore, where she might have been an honest wife? But infatuations are next to being possessed with the devil. I was inflexible, and pretended to argue upon the point of a woman's liberty as before, but he took me short, and with more warmth than he had yet used with me, though with the utmost respect, replied, "Dear madam, you argue for liberty, at the same time that you restrain yourself from that liberty which God and nature has directed you to take; and to supply the deficiency, propose a vicious liberty, which is neither honourable, no, nor religious. Will you propose liberty at the expense of modesty?"

I returned, that he mistook me: I did not propose it; I only said that those who could not be content without concerning the sexes in that affair, might do so indeed; might entertain a man as men do a mistress, if they thought fit, but he did not hear me say I would do so: and though, by what had passed, he might well censure me in that part, yet he should find, for the future, that I should freely converse with him without any inclination that way.

He told me he could not promise that for himself, and thought he ought not to trust himself with the opportunity, for that, as he had failed already, he was loth to lead himself into temptation of offending again, and that this was the true reason of his resolving to go back to Paris; not that he could willingly leave me, and would be very far from waiting my invitation; but if he could not stay upon terms that became him, either as a honest man or a christian, what could he do? And he hoped, he said, I could not blame him, that he was unwilling anything that was to call him father should upbraid him with leaving him in the world to be called bastard; adding, that he was astonished to think how I could satisfy myself to be so cruel to an innocent infant not yet born; professed he could never bear the thoughts of it, much less bear to see it, and hoped I would not take it ill that he could not stay to see me delivered, for that very reason.

I saw he spoke this with a disturbed mind, and that it was with some difficulty that he restrained his passion, so I declined any further discourse upon it; only said I hoped he would consider of it. "O madam," says he, "do not bid me consider, 'tis for you to consider:" and with that he went out of the room, in a strange kind of confusion, as was easy to be seen in his countenance.

If I had not been one of the foolishhest as well as wickedest creatures upon earth, I could never have acted thus. I had one of the honestest, completest gentleman upon earth, at my hand. He had in one sense saved my life, but had saved that life from ruin in a most remarkable manner. He loved me even to distraction, and had come from Paris to Rotterdam on purpose to seek me. He had offered me marriage, even after I was with child by him, and had offered to quit all his pretensions to my estate, and give it up to my own management, having a plentiful estate of his own. Here I might have settled myself out of the reach even of disaster itself; his estate and mine would have purchased even then above two thousand pounds a year, and I might have lived like a queen, nay, far more happy than a queen; and, which was above all, I had now an opportunity to have quitted a life of crime and debauchery, which I had been given up to for several years, and to have sat down quiet in plenty and honour, and to have set myself apart to the great work, which I have since seen so much necessity and occasion for, I mean that of repentance.

But my measure of wickedness was not yet full. I continued obstinate against matrimony, and yet I could not bear the thoughts of his going away neither. As to the child, I was not very anxious about it. I told him I would promise him that it should never come to him to upbraid him with its being illegitimate; that if it was a boy, I would breed it up like the son of a gentleman, and use it well for his sake: and after a little more such talk as this, and seeing him resolved to go, I retired, but could not help letting him see the tears run down my cheeks. he came to me and kissed me, intreated me, conjured me by the kindness he had shewn me in my distress, by the justice he had done me in my bills and money affairs, by the respect which made him refuse a thousand pistoles from me for his expenses with that traitor the Jew, by the pledge of our misfortunes, so he called it, which I carried with me, and by all the sincerest affection could propose to do, that I would not drive him away.

But it would not: I was stupid and senseless, deaf to all his importunities, and continued so to the last. So we parted, only desiring me to promise that I would write him word when I was delivered, and how he might give me an answer; and this I engaged I would do. And upon his desiring to be informed which way I intended to dispose of myself, I told him I resolved to go directly to England, and to London, where I proposed to lie in; but since he resolved to leave me, I told him I supposed it would be of no consequence to him what became of me.

He lay in his lodgings that night, but went away early in the morning, leaving me a letter, in which he repeated all he had said, recommended the care of the child, and desired of me that as he had remitted to me the offer of a thousand pistoles, which I would have given him for the recompense of his charges and trouble with the Jew, and had given it me back; so he desired I would allow him to oblige me to set apart that thousand pistoles with its improvement for the child, and for its education, earnestly pressing me to secure that little portion for the abandoned orphan, when I should think fit, as he was sure I would, to throw away the rest upon something as worthless as my sincere friend at Paris. He concluded with moving me to reflect, with the same regret as he did, on our follies we had committed together; asked me forgiveness for being the aggressor in the fact, and forgave me everything, he said, but the cruelty of refusing him, which he owned he could not forgive me so heartily as he should do, because he was satisfied it was an injury to myself, would be an introduction to my ruin, and that I would seriously repent of it. He foretold some fatal things, which, he said, he was well assured I should fall into, and that at last I should be ruined by a bad husband; bid me be the more wary, that I might render him a false prophet; but to remember, that if ever I came into distress, I had a fast friend at Paris, who would not upbraid me with the unkind things past, but would be always ready to return me good for evil.

This letter stunned me. I could not think it possible for any one that had not dealt with the devil to write such a letter, for he spoke of some particular things which afterwards were to befall me, with such an assurance that it frightened me beforehand; and when those things did come to pass, I was persuaded he had some more than human knowledge. In a word, his advices to me to repent were very affectionate, his warnings of evil to happen to me were very kind, and his promises of assistance, if I wanted him, were so generous, that I have seldom seen the like; and though I did not at first set much by that part, because I looked upon them as what might not happen, and as what was improbable to happen at that time, yet all the rest of his letter was so moving that it left me very melancholy, and I cried four-and-twenty hours after almost without ceasing about it; and yet even all this while, whatever it was that bewitched me, I had not one serious wish that I had taken him. I wished heartily, indeed, that I could have kept him with me, but I had a mortal aversion to marrying him, or, indeed, anybody else, but formed a thousand wild notions in my head that I was yet gay enough, and young and handsome enough to please a man of quality, and that I would try my fortune at London, come of it what would.

Thus blinded by my own vanity, I threw away the only opportunity I then had to have effectually settled my fortunes, and secured them for this world: and I am a memorial to all that shall read my story, a standing monument of the madness and distraction which pride and infatuations from hell run us into, how ill our passions guide us, and how dangerously we act when we follow the dictates of an ambitious mind.

I was rich, beautiful, and agreeable, and not yet old. I had known something of the influence I had had upon the fancies of men, even of the highest rank. I never forgot that the Prince de ——— had said with an ecstasy that I was the finest woman in France. I knew I could make a figure at London, and how well I could grace that figure. I was not at a loss how to behave, and having already been adored by princes, I thought of nothing less than of being mistress to the king himself. But I go back to my immediate circumstances at that time.

I got over the absence of my honest merchant but slowly at first: it was with infinite regret that I let him go at all; and when I read the letter he left I was quite confounded: as soon as he was out of call, and irrecoverable, I would have given half I had in the world for him back again, my notions of things changed in an instant, and I called myself a thousand fools for casting myself upon a life of scandal and hazard; when after the shipwreck of virtue, honour, and principle, and sailing at the utmost risk in the stormy seas of crime, and abominable levity, I had a safe harbour presented, and no heart to cast anchor in it.

His predictions terrified me, his promises of kindness if I came to distress melted me into tears, but frightened me with the apprehensions of ever coming into such distress, and filled my head with a thousand anxieties and thoughts how it should be possible for me, who had now such a fortune, to sink again into misery.

Then the dreadful scene of my life, when I was left with my five children, &c. as I have related, represented itself again to me, and I sat considering what measures I might take to bring myself to such a state of desolation again, and how I should act to avoid it.

But these things wore off gradually. As to my friend, the merchant, he was gone, and gone irrecoverably, for I durst not follow him to Paris for the reasons mentioned above. Again, I was afraid to write to him to return lest he should have refused, as I verily believed he would; so I sat and cried intolerably for some days, nay, I may say, for some weeks; but I say, it wore off gradually, and as I had a pretty deal of business for managing my effects, the hurry of that particular part served to divert my thoughts, and in part to wear out the impressions which had been made upon my mind.

I had sold my jewels, all but the fine diamond ring, which my gentleman, the jeweller, used to wear, and this, at proper times, I wore myself; as also the diamond necklace which the prince had given me, and a pair of extraordinary earrings worth 600 pistoles; the other, which was a fine casket, he left with me at his going to Versailles, and a small case with some rubies and emeralds, &c. I say I sold them at the Hague for 7,600 pistoles. I had received all the bills which the merchant had helped me to at Paris, and with the money I brought with me, they made up 13,900 pistoles more; so that I had in ready money, and in account in the bank of Amsterdam, above one and twenty thousand pistoles, besides jewels; and how to get this treasure to England was my next care.

The business I had had now with a great many people for receiving such large sums, and selling jewels of such considerable value, gave me opportunity to know and converse with several of the best merchants of the place; so that I wanted no direction now how to get my money remitted to England. Applying therefore to several merchants, that I might neither risk it all on the credit of one merchant, nor suffer any single man to know the quantity of money I had; I say, applying myself to several merchants I got bills of exchange payable at London for all my money. The first bills I took with me, the second bills I left in trust (in case of any disaster at sea) in the hands of the first merchant, him to whom I was recommended by my friend from Paris.

Having thus spent nine months in Holland, refused the best offer ever woman in my circumstances had, parted unkindly, and indeed barbarously with the best friend and honestest man in the world, got all my money in my pocket, and a bastard in my belly, I took shipping at the Briel in the packet-boat, and arrived safe at Harwich, where my woman, Amy, was come, by my direction, to meet me.

I would willingly have given ten thousand pounds of my money to have been rid of the burthen I had in my belly, as above; but it could not be, so I was obliged to bear with that part, and get rid of it by the ordinary method of patience, and a hard travail.

I was above the contemptible usage that women in my circumstances oftentimes meet with. I had considered all that fully; and having sent Amy beforehand, and remitted her money to do it, she had taken me a very handsome house in — street, near Charing cross; had hired me two maids and a footman, whom she had put in a good livery; and having hired a glass coach and four horses, she came with them and the man servant to Harwich to meet me, and had been there near a week before I came; so I had nothing to do but go away to London to my own house, where I arrived in very good health, and where I passed for a French lady, by the title of —.

My first business was to get all my bills accepted; which, to cut the story short, were all both accepted and currently paid; and I then resolved to take me a country lodging somewhere near the town, to be incognito, till I was brought to bed; which, appearing in such a figure, and having such an equipage, I easily managed without anybody's offering the usual insults of parish inquiries. I did not appear in my new house for some time, and afterwards I thought fit, for particular reasons to quit that house, and not come to it all, but take handsome large apartments in the Pall Mall, in a house, out of which was a private door into the king's garden, by permission of the chief gardener, who had lived in the house.

I had now all my effects secured; but my money being my great concern at that time, I found it a difficulty how to dispose of it so as to bring me in an annual interest. However, in some time I got a substantial safe mortgage for 14,000*l.* by the assistance of the famous Sir Robert Clayton, for which I had an estate of 1,800*l.* a-year bound to me; and had 700*l.* per annum interest for it.

This, with some other securities, made me a very handsome estate of above a thousand pounds a year; enough, one would think, to keep any woman in England from being a whore.

I lay in at —, about four miles from London, and brought a fine boy into the world, and according to my promise, sent an account of it to my friend at Paris, the father of it; and in the letter told him how sorry I was for his going away, and did as good as intimate that if he would come once more to see me I should use him better than I had done. He gave me a very kind and obliging answer, but took not the least notice of what I had said of his coming over, so I found my interest lost there for ever. He gave me joy of the child, and hinted that he hoped I would make good what he had begged for the poor infant as I had promised, and I sent him word that I would fulfil his order to a tittle; and such a fool, and so weak I was in this last letter, notwithstanding what I have said of his not taking notice of my invitation, as to ask his pardon almost for the usage I gave him at Rotterdam, and stooped so low as to expostulate with him for not taking notice of my inviting him to come to me again, as I had done; and which was still more, went so far as to make a second sort of an offer to him, telling him almost in plain words that if he would come over now I would have him, but he never gave me the least reply to it at all, which was as absolutely a denial to me as he was ever able to give; so I sat down, I cannot say contented, but vexed heartily that I had made the offer at all, for he had, as I may say, his full revenge of me in scorning to answer, and to let me twice ask that of him, which he with so much importunity begged of me before.

I was now up again, and soon came to my city lodging in the Pall Mall, and here I began to make a figure suitable to my estate, which was very great; and I shall give you an account of my equipage in a few words, and of myself too.

I paid 60*l.* a year rent for my new apartments, for I took them by the year, but then they were handsome lodgings indeed, and very richly furnished. I kept my own servants to clean and look after them, found my own kitchenware and firing. My equipage was handsome but not very large; I had a coach, a coachman, a footman, my woman Amy, whom I now dressed like a gentlewoman, and made her my companion, and three maids, and thus I lived for a time. I dressed to the height of every mode, went extremely rich in clothes, and as for jewels, I wanted none. I gave a very good livery, laced with silver, and as rich as anybody below the nobility could be seen with; and thus I appeared, leaving the world to guess who or what I was, without offering to put myself forward.

I walked sometimes in the Mall with my woman Amy, but I kept no company, and made no acquaintances, only made as gay a show as I was able to do, and that upon all occasions. I found, however, the world was not altogether so unconcerned about me as I seemed to be about them; and first I understood that the neighbours began to be mighty inquisitive about me, as who I was? and what my circumstances were?

Amy was the only the person that could answer their curiosity, or give any account of me, and she, a tattling woman and a true gossip, took care to do that with all the art that she was mistress of. She let them know that I was the widow of a person of quality in France, that I was very rich, that I came over hither to look after an estate that fell to me by some of my relations who died here, that I was worth 40,000*l.* all in my own hands, and the like.

This was all wrong in Amy, and in me too, though we did not see it at first, for this recommended me indeed to those sort of gentlemen they call fortune-hunters, and who always besieged ladies, as they call it, on purpose to take them prisoners, as I called it, that is to say, to marry the women, and have the spending of their money. But if I was wrong in refusing the honourable proposals of the Dutch merchant, who offered me the disposal of my whole estate, and had as much of his own to maintain me with; I was right now in refusing those offers which came generally from gentlemen of good families and good estates, but who living to the extent of them, were always needy and necessitous, and wanted a sum of money to make themselves easy, as they call it, that is to say, to pay off incumbrances, sisters' portions, and the like; and then the woman is prisoner for life, and may live as they please to give her leave. This life I had seen into clearly enough, and therefore I was not to be caught that way. However, as I said, the reputation of my money brought several of those sort of gentry about me, and they found means, by one stratagem or other, to get access to my ladyship; but in short, I answered them all well enough, that I lived single and was happy; that as I had no occasion to change my condition for an estate, so I did not see, that by the best offer that any of them could make me, I could mend my fortune; that I might be honoured with titles indeed, and in time rank on public occasion with the peeresses (I mention that, because one that offered at me was the eldest son of a peer), but that I was as well without the title as long as I had the estate, and while I had 2,000*l.* a year of my own, I was happier than I could be in being a prisoner of state to a nobleman, for I took the ladies of that rank to be little better.

As I have mentioned Sir Robert Clayton, with whom I had the good fortune to become acquainted, on account of the mortgage which he helped me to, it is necessary to take notice, that I had much advantage in my ordinary affairs by his advice, and therefore I called it my good fortune; for as he paid me so considerable an annual income as 700*l.* a year, so I am to acknowledge myself much a debtor, not only to the justice of his dealings with me, but to the prudence and conduct which he guided me to, by his advice, for the management of my estate; and as he found I was not inclined to marry, he frequently took occasion to hint how soon I might raise my fortune to a prodigious height, if I would but order my family economy so far within my revenue as to lay up every year something to add to the capital.

I was convinced of the truth of what he said, and agreed to the advantages of it. You are to take it as you go, that Sir Robert supposed by my own discourse, and especially by my woman Amy, that I had 2,000*l.* a year income. He judged, as he said, by my way of living, that I could not spend above one thousand; and so, he added, I might prudently lay by 1,000*l.* every year to add to the capital; and by adding every year the additional interest or income of the money to the capital, he proved to me, that in ten years I should double the 1,000*l.* per annum that I laid by; and he drew me out a table, as he called it, of the increase for me to judge by; and by which, he said, if the gentlemen of England would but act so, every family of them would increase their fortunes to a great degree, just as merchants do by trade; "whereas now," says Sir Robert, "by the humour of living up to the extent of their fortunes, and rather beyond, the gentlemen," says he, "ay, and the nobility too, are almost all of them borrowers, and all in necessitous circumstances."

As Sir Robert frequently visited me, and was (if may say so from his own mouth) very well leased with my way of conversing with him, for he knew nothing, nor so much as guessed at what I had been; I say, as he came often to see me, so he always entertained me with this scheme of frugality; and one time he brought another paper, wherein he showed me much to the same purpose as the former, to what degree I should increase my estate if I would come into this method of contracting my expenses; and by this scheme of his, it appeared, that laying up a thousand pounds a year, and every year adding the interest to it, I should in twelve years' time have in bank one and twenty thousand and fifty-eight pounds, after which I might lay up two thousand pounds a year.

I objected that I was a young woman, that I had been used to live plentifully, and with a good appearance, and that I knew not how to be a miser.

He told me that if I thought I had enough it was well, but if I desired to have more, this was the way; that in another twelve years I should be too rich, so that I should not know what to do with it.

"Ay, sir," says I, "you are contriving how to make me a rich old woman, but that won't answer my end, I had rather have 20,000*l.* now than 60,000*l.* when I am fifty years old."

"Then, madam," says he, "I suppose your honour has no children?"

"None, Sir Robert," said I, "but what are provided for;" so I left him in the dark as much as I found him. However, I considered his scheme very well, though I said no more to him at that time, and I resolved, though I would make a very good figure, I say, I resolved to abate a little of my expense, and draw in, live closer; and save something, if not so much as he proposed to me. It was near the end of the year that Sir Robert made this proposal to me, and when the year was up, I went to his house in the city, and there I told him I came to thank him for his scheme of frugality; that I had been studying much upon it, and though I had not been able to mortify myself so much as to lay up a thousand pounds a-year, yet, as I had not come to him for my interest half-yearly as was usual, I was now come to let him to know that I had resolved to lay up that seven hundred pounds a year, and never use a penny of it, desiring him to help me to put it out to advantage.

Sir Robert, a man thoroughly versed in arts of improving money, but thoroughly honest, said to me, "Madam, I am glad you approve of the method that I proposed to you; but you have begun wrong, you should have come for your interest at the half year, and then you had had the money to put out; now you have lost half a year's interest of 35*l.* which is 9*l.*" for I had but 5 per cent. on the mortgage.

"Well, well, sir," says I, "can you put this out for me now?"

"Let it lie, madam," says he, "till the next year, and then I'll put out your 1,400*l.* together, and in the meantime I'll pay you interest for the 700*l.*" So he gave me his bill for the money which he told me should be no less than 6*l.* per cent. Sir Robert Clayton's bill was what nobody would refuse, so I thanked him and let it lie; and next year I did the same, and the third year Sir Robert got me a good mortgage for 2,200*l.* at 6*l.* per cent. interest; so I had 132*l.* a year added to my income, which was a very satisfying article.

But I return to my history. As I have said, I found that my measures were all wrong; the posture I set up in exposed me to innumerable visitors of the kind I have mentioned above. I was cried up for a vast fortune, and one that Sir Robert Clayton managed for; and Sir Robert Clayton was courted for me, as much as I was for myself. But I had given Sir Robert his cue; I had told him my opinion of matrimony, in just the same terms as I had done my merchant, and he came into it presently; he owned that my observation was just, and that if I valued my liberty, as I knew my fortune, and that it was in my own hands, I was to blame if I gave it away to any one.

But Sir Robert knew nothing of my design; that I aimed at being a kept mistress, and to have a handsome maintenance; and that I was still for getting money, and laying it up too, as much as he could desire me, only by a worse way.

However, Sir Robert came to me seriously one day, and told me he had an offer of matrimony to make to me that was beyond all that he had heard had offered themselves, and this was a merchant. Sir Robert and I agreed exactly in our notions of a merchant. Sir Robert said, and I found it to be true, that a true-bred merchant is the best gentleman in the nation; that in knowledge, in manners, in judgment of things, the merchant out-did many of the nobility; that having once mastered the world, and being above the demand of business, though no real estate, they were then superior to most gentlemen, even in estate; that a merchant in flush business, and a capital stock, is able to spend more money than a gentleman of 5,000*l.* a-year estate; that while a merchant spent, he only spent what he got, and not that; and that he laid up great sums every year.

That an estate is a pond; but that a trade is a spring; that if the first is once mortgaged, it seldom gets clear, but embarrassed the person for ever; but the merchant had his estate continually flowing, and upon this he named me merchants who lived in more real splendour, and spent more money than most of the noblemen in England could singly expend, and that they still grew immensely rich.

He went on to tell me that even the tradesmen in London, speaking of the better sorts of trades, could spend more money in their families, and give better fortunes to their children, than, generally speaking, the gentry of England from 1,000*l.* a-year downward could do, and yet grow rich too.

The upshot of all this was to recommend to me rather the bestowing my fortune upon some eminent merchant, who lived already in the first figure of a merchant, and who, not being in want or scarcity of money, but having a flourishing business and a flowing cash, would at the first word settle all my fortune on myself and children, and maintain me like a queen.

This was certainly right; and had I taken his advice I had really been happy; but my heart was bent upon an independency of fortune, and I told him I knew no state of matrimony but what was, at best, a state of inferiority, if not of bondage; that I had no notion of it; that I lived a life of absolute liberty now, was free as I was born, and, having a plentiful fortune, I did not understand what coherence the words honour and obey had with the liberty of a free woman; that I knew no reason the men had to engross the whole liberty of the race, and make the women, notwithstanding any disparity of fortune, be subject to the laws of marriage, of their own making; that it was my misfortune to be a woman, but I was resolved it should not be made worse by the sex; and, seeing liberty seemed to be the men's property, I would be a man woman; for, as I was born free, I would die so.

Sir Robert smiled, and told me I talked a kind of Amazonian language; that he found few women of my mind, or that, if they were, they wanted resolution to go on with it; that notwithstanding all my notions, which he could not but say had once some weight in them, yet he understood I had broke in upon them, and had been married. I answered I had so; but he did not hear me say that I had any encouragement from what was past to make a second venture; that I was got well out of the toil, and if I came in again I should have nobody to blame but myself.

Sir Robert laughed heartily at me, but gave over offering any more arguments, only telling me he had pointed me out for some of the best merchants in London, but since I forbade him he would give me no disturbance of that kind; he applauded my way of managing my money, and told me I should soon be monstrous rich; but he neither knew nor mistrusted that, with all this wealth, I was yet a whore, and was not averse to adding to my estate at the further expense of my virtue.

But to go on with my story as to my way of living. I found, as above, that my living as I did would not answer; that it only brought the fortune-hunters and bites about me, as I have said before, to make a prey of me and my money; and in short, I was harassed with lovers, beaux, and fops of quality in abundance, but it would not do. I aimed at other things, and was possessed with so vain an opinion of my own beauty, that nothing less than the king himself was in my eye; and this vanity was raised by some words let fall by a person I conversed with, who was, perhaps, likely enough to have brought such a thing to pass, had it been sooner: but that game began to be pretty well over at court. However, the having mentioned such a thing, it seems a little too publicly, it brought abundance of people about me, upon a wicked account too.

And now I began to act in a new sphere. The court was exceeding gay and fine, though fuller of men than of women, the queen not affecting to be very much in public. On the other hand, it is no slander upon the courtiers to say, they were as wicked as anybody in reason could desire them. The king had several mistresses, who were prodigious fine, and there was a glorious show on that side indeed. If the sovereign gave himself aloose, it could not be expected the rest of the court should be all saints; so far was it from that, though I would not make it worse than it was, that a woman that had anything agreeable in her appearance could never want followers.

I soon found myself thronged with admirers, and I received visits from some persons of very great figure, who always introduced themselves by the help of an old lady or two, who were now become my intimates; and one of them, I understood afterwards, was set to work on purpose to get into my favour, in order to introduce what followed.

The conversation we had was generally courtly, but civil: at length some gentlemen proposed to play, and made what they called a party. This, it seems, was a contrivance of one of my female hangers-on, for, as I said, I had two of them, who thought this was the way to introduce people as often as she pleased; and so indeed it was. They played high and stayed late, but begged my pardon, only asked leave to make an appointment for the next night. I was as gay and as well pleased as any of them, and one night told one of the gentleman, my Lord —, that seeing they were doing me the honour of diverting themselves at my apartment, and desired to be there sometimes, I did not keep a gaming table, but I would give them a little ball the next day, if they pleased, which they accepted very willingly.

Accordingly, in the evening, the gentlemen began to come, where I let them see that I understood very well what such things meant. I had a large dining room in my apartments, with five other rooms on the same floor, all which I made drawing-rooms for the occasion, having all the beds taken down for the day. In three of these I had tables placed covered with wine and sweetmeats, the fourth had a green table for play, and the fifth was my own room, where I sat, and where I received all the company that came to pay their compliments to me. I was dressed, you may be sure, to all the advantage possible, and had all the jewels on that I was mistress of. My Lord —, to whom I made the invitation, sent me a set of fine music from the playhouse, and the ladies danced, and we began to be very merry, when, about eleven o'clock, I had notice given me that there were some gentlemen coming in masquerade. I seemed a little surprised, and began to apprehend some disturbance, when, my Lord — perceiving it, spoke to me to be easy, for that there was a party of the guards at the door, which should be ready to prevent any rudeness; and another gentleman gave me a hint, as if the king was among the masks. I coloured as red as blood itself could make a face look, and expressed a great surprise; however, there was no going back, so I kept my station in my drawing-room, but with the folding doors wide open.

A while after, the masks came in, and began with a dance a la comique, performing wonderfully indeed. While they were dancing I withdrew, and left a lady to answer for me that I would return immediately. In less than half an hour I returned, dressed in the habit of a Turkish princess; the habit I got at Leghorn, when my foreign prince brought me a Turkish slave, as I have said. The Maltese man of war had, it seems, taken a Turkish vessel going from Constantinople to Alexandria, in which were some ladies bound for Grand Cairo in Egypt; and as the ladies were made slaves, so their fine clothes were thus exposed; and with this Turkish slave I bought the rich clothes too. The dress was extraordinary fine indeed: I had bought it as a curiosity, having never seen the like. The robe was a fine Persian or Indian damask, the ground white, and the flowers blue and gold, and the train held five yards. The dress under it was a vest of the same, embroidered with gold, and set with some pearl in the work, and some Turquoise stones. To the vest was a girdle five or six inches wide, after the Turkish mode; and on both ends where it joined, or hooked, was set with diamonds, four eight inches either way, only they were not true diamonds, but nobody knew that but myself.

The turban or head-dress had a pinnacle on the top, but not above five inches, with a piece of loose sarsenet hanging from it; and on the front, just over the forehead, was a good jewel, which I had added to it.

This habit, as above, cost me about sixty pistoles in Italy, but cost much more in the country from whence it came: and little did I think, when I bought it, that I should put it to such a use as this, though I had dressed myself in it many times by the help of my little Turk, and afterwards between Amy and I, only to see how I looked in it. I had sent her up before to get it ready, and when I came up, I had nothing to do but to slip it on, and was down in my drawing-room in a little more than a quarter of an hour. When I came there, the room was full of company, but I ordered the folding doors to be shut for a minute or two, till I had received the compliments of the ladies that were in the room, and had given them a full view of my dress.

But my Lord ———, who happened to be in the room, slipped out at another door, and brought back with him one of the masks, a tall well-shaped person, but who had no name, being all masked, nor would it have been allowed to ask any person's name on such an occasion. The person spoke in French to me, that it was the finest dress he had ever seen; and asked me if he should have the honour to dance with me? I bowed, as giving my consent, but said, as I had been a Mahometan, I could not dance after the manner of this country; I supposed their music would not play à la Moresque. He answered merrily, I had a Christian's face, and he'd venture it that could dance like a Christian; adding, that so much beauty could not be Mahometan. Immediately the folding doors were flung open, and he led me into the room. The company were under the greatest surprise imaginable; the very music stopped awhile to gaze, for the dress was indeed exceedingly surprising, perfectly new, very agreeable, and wonderful rich.

The gentleman, whoever he was, for I never knew, led me only a courant, and then asked me, if I had a mind to dance an antic, that is to say, whether I would dance the antic as they had danced in masquerade, or anything by myself. I told him anything else rather, if he pleased; so we danced only two French dances, and he led me to the drawing-room door when he retired to the rest of the masks. When he left me at my drawing-room door I did not go in, as he thought I would have done, but turned about, and showed myself to the whole room, and calling my woman to me, gave her some directions to the music, by which the company presently understood that I would give them a dance by myself. Immediately all the house rose up, and paid me a kind of compliment, by removing back every way to make me room, for the place was exceeding full. The music did not at first hit the tune that I directed which was a French tune, so I was forced to send my woman to them again, standing all this while at my drawing-room door; but as soon as my woman spoke to them again they played it right, and I, to let them see it was so, stepped forward to the middle of the room. Then they began it again, and I danced by myself a figure which I learnt in France, when the Prince de ——— desired I would dance for his diversion. It was indeed, a very fine figure, invented by a famous master at Paris, for a lady or a gentleman to dance single; but being perfectly new it pleased the company exceedingly, and they all thought it had been Turkish; nay, one gentleman had the folly to expose himself so much as to say, and I think swore too, that he had seen it danced at Constantinople, which was ridiculous enough.

At the finishing the dance the company clapped, and almost shouted; and one of the gentlemen cried out, "Roxana! Roxana! by ———," with an oath; upon which foolish accident I had the name of Roxana presently fixed upon me all over the court end of the town, as effectually as if I had been christened Roxana. I had it seems the felicity of pleasing everybody that night to an extreme; and my ball, but especially my dress, was the chat of the town for that week, and so the name Roxana was the toast at and about the court, no other health was to be named with it.

Now things began to work as I would have them, and I began to be very popular, as much as I could desire. The ball held till (as well as I was pleased with the show) I was sick of the night; the gentlemen masked went off about three o'clock in the morning, the other gentlemen sat down to play; the music held it out; and some of the ladies were dancing at six in the morning.

But I was mighty eager to know who it was that danced with me; some of the lords went so far as to tell me, I was very much honoured in my company; one of them spoke so broad as almost to say it was the king, but I was convinced afterwards it was not; and another replied, if he had been his majesty, he should have thought it no dishonour to lead up a Roxana, but to this hour I never knew positively who it was; and by his behaviour I thought he was too young, his majesty being at that time in an age that might be discovered from a young person, even in his dancing.

Be that as it would, I had five hundred guineas sent me the next morning, and the messenger was ordered to tell me that the persons who sent it desired a ball again at my lodgings on the next Tuesday, but that they would have leave to give the entertainment themselves. I was mighty well pleased with this (to be sure) but very inquisitive to know who the money came from, but the messenger was silent as death, as to that point; and bowing always at my inquiries, begged me to ask no questions which he could not give an obliging answer to.

I forgot to mention that the gentleman that played gave an hundred guineas to the box as they called it, and at the end of their play, they asked for my gentlewoman of the bedchamber, as they called her (Mrs Amy, forsooth) and gave it her, and gave twenty guineas more among the servants.

This magnificent doings equally both pleased and surprised me, and I hardly knew where I was; but especially that notion of the king being the person that danced with me, puffed me up to that degree, that I not only did not know anybody else, but indeed was very far from knowing myself.

I had now the next Tuesday to provide for the like company; but alas! it was all taken out of my hand: three gentlemen, who yet were it seems but servants, came on the Saturday, and bringing sufficient testimonies that they were right, for one was the same who brought the five hundred guineas; I say, three of them came, and brought bottles of all sorts of wines, and hampers of sweetmeats to such a quantity, it appeared they designed to hold the trade on more than once, and that they would furnish everything to a profusion.

However, as I found a deficiency in two things, I made provision of about twelve dozen of fine damask napkins, with tablecloths of the same, sufficient to cover all the tables, with three tablecloths upon every table, and sideboards in proportion; I also bought a handsome quantity of plate, necessary to have served all the sideboards, but the gentlemen would not suffer any of it to be used, telling me they had bought fine China dishes and plates for the whole service, and that in such public places they could not be answerable for the plate; so it was all set up in a large glass cupboard in the room I sat in, where it made a very good show indeed.

On Tuesday there came such an appearance of gentlemen and ladies that my apartments were by no means able to receive them; and those who in particular appeared as principals, gave order below to let no more company come up. The street was full of coaches with coronets, and fine glass chairs; and, in short, it was impossible to receive the company. I kept my little room as before, and the dancers filled the great room; all the drawing-rooms also were filled, and three rooms below stairs, which were not mine.

It was very well that there was a strong party of the guards brought to keep the door, for without that there had been such a promiscuous crowd, and some of them scandalous too, that we should have been all disorder and confusion; but the three head servants managed all that, and had a word to admit all the company by.

It was uncertain to me, and is to this day, who it was that danced with me the Wednesday before, when the ball was my own; but that the K—— was at this assembly was out of the question with me, by circumstances that I suppose I could not be deceived in; and particularly, that there were five persons who were not masked, three of them had blue garters, and they appeared not to me till I came out to dance.

This meeting was managed just as the first, though with much more magnificence, because of the company. I placed myself (exceedingly rich in clothes and jewels) in the middle of my little room, as before, and made my compliment to all the company as they passed me, as I did before; but my Lord ——, who had spoken openly to me the first night, came to me, and unmasking told me the company had ordered him to tell me they hoped they should see me in the dress I had appeared in the first day, which had been so acceptable that it had been the occasion of this new meeting; "And, madam," says he, "there are some in this assembly, who it is worth your while to oblige."

I bowed to my Lord ——, and immediately withdrew. While I was above, a-dressing in my new habit, two ladies, perfectly unknown to me, were conveyed into my apartment below, by the order of a noble person who, with his whole family, had been in Persia; and here indeed I thought I should have been outdone, or perhaps balked.

One of these ladies was dressed most exquisitely fine indeed, in the habit of a virgin lady of quality of Georgia, and the other in the same habit of Armenia, with each of them a woman slave to attend them.

The ladies had their petticoats short to their ancles, but pleated all round, and before them short aprons, but of the finest point that could be seen, their gowns were made with long antic sleeves hanging down behind, and a train let down; they had no jewels, but their heads and breasts were dressed up with flowers, and they both came in veiled.

Their slaves were bare-headed, but their long black hair was braided in locks hanging down behind to their waists, and tied up with ribbons. They were dressed exceedingly rich, and were as beautiful as their mistresses; for none of them had any masks on. They waited in my room till I came down, and all paid their respects to me after the Persian manner, and sat down on a safra, that is to say, almost cross-legged on a couch made up of cushions laid on the ground.

This was admirably fine, and I was indeed startled at it. They made their compliment to me in French, and I replied in the same language. When the doors were opened they walked into the dancing-room, and danced such a dance as indeed nobody there had ever seen, and to an instrument like a guitar, with a small low-sounding trumpet, which indeed was very fine, and which my Lord —— had provided.

They danced three times all alone, for nobody indeed could dance with them. The novelty pleased, truly, but yet there was something wild and Bizarre in it, because they really acted to the life the barbarous country whence they came; but as mine had the French behaviour under the Mahometan dress, it was every way as new, and pleased much better indeed.

So soon as they had shown their Georgian and Armenian shapes, and danced, as I have said, three times, they withdrew, paid their compliment to me (for I was queen of the day), and went off to undress.

Some gentlemen then danced with ladies all in masks; and when they stopped, nobody rose up to dance, but all called out "Roxana, Roxana." In the interval, my Lord —— had brought another masked person into my room, whom I knew not, only that I could discern it was not the same person that led me out before. This noble person (for I afterwards understood it was the Duke of ——), after a short compliment, led me out into the middle of the room.

I was dressed in the same vest and girdle as before, but the robe had a mantle over it, which is usual in the Turkish habit, and it was of crimson and of green, the green brocaded with gold; and my tyhiaai, or head-dress, varied a little from that I had before, as it stood higher, and had some jewels about the rising part, which made it look like a turban crowned.

I had no mask, neither did I paint, and yet I had the day of all the ladies that appeared at the ball; I mean of those that appeared with faces on. As for those masked, nothing could be said of them, no doubt there might be many finer than I was; it must be confessed that the habit was infinitely advantageous to me, and everybody looked at me with a kind of pleasure, which gave me great advantage too.

After I had danced with that noble person I did not offer to dance by myself, as I had before; but they all called out "Roxana" again; and two of the gentlemen came into the drawing-room to entreat me to give them the Turkish dance, which I yielded to readily, so I came out and danced just as at first.

While I was dancing I perceived five persons standing altogether, and among them one only with his hat on. It was an immediate hint to me who it was, and had at first almost put me into some disorder; but I went on, received the applause of the house, as before, and retired into my own room. When I was there the five gentlemen came across the room to my side, and, coming in, followed by a throng of great persons, the person with his hat on said, "Madam Roxana, you perform to admiration." I was prepared, and offered to kneel to kiss his hand, but he declined it, and saluted me, and so, passing back again through the great room, went away.

I do not say here who this was, but I say I came afterwards to know something more plainly. I would have withdrawn and disrobed, being somewhat too thin in that dress, unlaced and open-breasted, as if I had been in my shift; but it could not be, and I was obliged to dance afterwards with six or eight gentlemen, most, if not all of them, of the first rank; and I was told afterwards that one of them was the D—— of M——th.

About two or three o'clock in the morning the company began to decrease, the number of women especially, and some dropped away one at a time; and the gentlemen retired down stairs, where they unmasked and went to play.

Amy waited at the room where they played, sat up all night to attend them, and in the morning when they broke up they swept the box into her lap, when she counted out to me sixty-two guineas and a half; and the other servants got in proportion. Amy came to me when they were all gone, "La, madam," says Amy, with a long gaping cry, "what shall I do with this money? And indeed the poor creature was half mad with joy.

I was now in my element. I was as much talked off as any body could desire, and I did not doubt but something or other would come of it, but the report of my being so rich rather was a balk to my view than anything else; for the gentlemen that would, perhaps, have been troublesome enough otherwise, seemed to be kept off; for Roxana was too high for them.

There is a scene which came in here, which I must cover from human eyes or ears; for three years and about a month Roxana lived retired, having been obliged to make an excursion in a manner and with a person which duty and private vows obliges her not to reveal as yet.

At the end of this time I appeared again; but I must add, that as I had in this time of retreat made hay, &c. so I did not come abroad again with the same lustre, or shine with the same advantage as before; for as some people had got, at least a suspicion of where I had been, and who had had me all the while, it began to be public that Roxana was, in short, a mere Roxana, neither better nor worse, and not that woman of honour and virtue that was at first supposed.

You are now to suppose me about seven years come to town, and that I had not only suffered the old revenue, which I hinted was managed by Sir Robert Clayton, to grow, as was mentioned before, but I had laid up an incredible wealth, the time considered, and had I had the least thought of reforming, I had all the opportunity to do it with advantage that ever woman had; for the common vice of all whores, I mean money, was out of the question, nay, avarice itself seemed to be gluttoned; for, including what I had saved in reserving the interest of 14,000*l.* which, as before, I had left to grow; and including some very good presents I had made to me in mere compliment, upon these shining masquerade meetings, which I held up for about two years, and what I made of three years of the most glorious retreat, as I call it, that ever woman had, I had fully doubled my first substance, and had near 5,000*l.* in money, which I kept at home, besides abundance of plate and jewels, which I had either given me, or had bought to set myself out for public days.

In a word, I had now 35,000*l.* estate; and as I found ways to live without wasting either principal or interest, I laid up 2,000*l.* every year at least out of the mere interest, adding it to the principal, and thus I went on.

After the end of what I call my retreat, and out of which I brought a great deal of money, I appeared again, but I seemed like an old piece of plate that had been hoarded up some years and comes out tarnished and discoloured; so I came out blown, and looked like a cast-off mistress, nor indeed was I any better; though I was not at all impaired in beauty, except that I was a little fatter than I was formerly, and always regarding that I was four years older.

However, I preserved the youth of my temper, was always bright, pleasant in company, and agreeable to everybody, or else everybody flattered me; and in this condition I came abroad to the world again; and though I was not so popular as before, and indeed did not seek it, because I knew it could not be; yet I was far from being without company, and that of the greatest quality of subjects; I mean, who frequently visited me, and sometimes we had meetings of mirth and play at my apartments, where I failed not to divert them in the most agreeable manner possible.

Nor could any of them make the least particular application to me, from the notion they had of my excessive wealth, which, as they thought, placed me above the meanness of a maintenance, and so left no room to come easily about me.

But at last I was very handsomely attacked by a person of honour, and which recommended him particularly to me, a person of very great estate. He made a long introduction to me upon the subject of my wealth. "Ignorant creature!" said I to myself, considering him as a lord, was there ever a woman in the world that could stoop to the baseness of being a whore, and was above taking the reward of her vice? No, no, depend upon it if your lordship obtains anything of me you must pay for it? and the notions of my being so rich, serves only to make it cost you the dearer, seeing you cannot offer a small matter to a woman of 2,000*l.* a year estate."

After he had harangued upon that subject a good while, and had assured me he had no design upon me, that he did not come to make a prize of me, or to pick my pocket, which by the way I was in no fear of, for I took too much care of my money to part with any of it that way; he then turned his discourse to the subject of love, a point so ridiculous to me without the main thing, I mean the money, that I had no patience to hear him make so long a story of it.

I received him civilly, and let him see I could bear to hear a wicked proposal without being affronted, and yet I was not to be brought into it too easily. He visited me a long while, and, in short, courted me as closely and assiduously as if he had been wooing me to matrimony. He made me several valuable presents, which I suffered myself to be prevailed with to accept, but not without great difficulty.

Gradually I suffered all his other importunities, and when he made a proposal of a compliment or appointment to me for a settlement, he said that though I was rich, yet there was not the less due from him to acknowledge the favours he received; and that if I was to be his, I should not live at my own expense, cost what it would. I told him I was far from being extravagant, yet I did not live at the expense of less than 500*l.* a year out of my own pocket; that, however, I was not covetous of settled allowances, for I looked upon that as a kind of golden chain, something like matrimony; that though I knew how to be true to a man of honour, as I knew his lordship to be, yet I had a kind of aversion to the bonds; and though I was not so rich as the world talked me up to be, yet I was not so poor as to bind myself to hardships for a pension.

He told me he expected to make my life perfectly easy, and intended it so; that he knew of no bondage there could be in a private engagement between us; that the bonds of honour he knew I would be tied by, and think them no burden, and for other obligations, he scorned to expect anything from me but what he knew, as a woman of honour I could grant. Then as to maintenance, he told me he would soon show me that he valued me infinitely above 500*l.* a year; and upon this foot we began.

I seemed kinder to him after this discourse; and as time and private conversation made us very intimate, we began to come nearer as to the main article, namely, of the 500*l.* a year. He offered that at the first word, and to acknowledge it as an infinite favour to have it be accepted of; and I, that thought it was too much by all the money, suffered myself to be mastered, or prevailed with to yield, even on but a bare engagement upon parole.

When he had obtained his end that way, I told him my mind: "Now you see, my lord, how weakly I have acted, to yield to you without any capitulation, or anything secured to me but what you may cease to allow when you please; if I am the less valued for such a confidence, I shall be injured in a manner that I will endeavour not to deserve."

He told me, that he would make it evident to me, that he did not seek me by way of bargain, as such things were often done; that as I had treated him with a generous confidence, so I should find I was in the hands of a man of honour, and one that knew how to value the obligation; and upon this he pulled out a goldsmith's bill for 300*l.* which (putting it into my hand) he said he gave me as a pledge that I should not be a loser by my not having made a bargain with him.

This was engaging indeed, and gave me a good idea of our future correspondence, and, in short, as I could not refrain treating him with more kindness than I had done before, so one thing begetting another, I gave him several testimonies that I was entirely his own by inclination as well as by the common obligation of a mistress, and this pleased him exceedingly.

Soon after this private engagement, I began to consider whether it were not more suitable to the manner of life I now led, to be a little less public; and, as I told my lord, it would rid me of the importunities of others, and of continual visits from a sort of people whom he knew of, and who, by the way, having now got the notion of me which I really deserved, began to talk of the old game, love and gallantry, and to offer at what was rude enough; things as nauseous to me now as if I had been married, and as virtuous as other people. The visits of these people began indeed to be uneasy to me, and particularly as they were always very tedious and impertinent; nor could my Lord — be pleased with them at all if they had gone on. It would be diverting to set down here in what manner I repulsed those sort of people; how in some I resented it as an affront, and told them that I was sorry they should oblige me to vindicate myself from the scandal of such suggestions, by telling them that I could see them no more, and by deterring them by telling them not to give themselves the trouble of visiting me, who (though I was not willing to be uncivil), yet thought myself obliged never to receive a visit from any gentleman after he had made such proposals as those to me. But these things would be too tedious to bring in here; it was on this account I proposed to his lordship my taking new lodgings for privacy; besides I considered, that I might live very handsomely, and yet not so publicly, so I needed not spend so much money by a great deal; and if I made 500*l.* a year of this generous person, it was more than I had any occasion to spend by a great deal.

My lord came readily into this proposal, and went farther than I expected, for he found out a lodging for me in a very handsome house, where yet he was not known; I suppose he had employed somebody to find it for him; and where he had a convenient way to come into the garden, by a door that opened into the Park, a thing very rarely allowed in those times.

By this key he could come in at what time of night or day he pleased; and as we had also a little door in the lower part of the house, which was always left upon the lock, and his was the master-key, so if it was twelve, one, or two o'clock at night, he could come directly into my bedchamber.—N.B. I was not afraid I should be found abed with anybody else, for in a word I conversed with nobody at all.

It happened pleasantly enough one night, his lordship had stayed late, and I not expecting him home that night, had taken Amy to bed with me, and when my lord came into the chamber we were both fast asleep. I think it was near three o'clock when he came in, and a little merry, but not at all fuddled, or what they call in drink; and he came at once into the room.

Amy was frightened out of her wits, and cried out; I said calmly, "Indeed, my lord, I did not expect you to-night, and we have been a little frightened to-night with fire." "O!" says he, "I see you have got a bedfellow with you." I began to make an apology: "No, no," says my lord, "you need no excuse, 'tis not a man bedfellow I see; but then," talking merrily enough, "hark ye," says he, "now I think on't, how shall I be satisfied it is not a man bedfellow?" "O," says I, "I dare say your lordship is satisfied 'tis poor Amy;" "yes," says he, "'tis Mrs Amy, but how do I know what Amy is? It may be Mr Amy, for ought I know; I hope you'll give me leave to be satisfied." I told him, "yes, by all means, I would have his lordship satisfied, but I supposed he knew who she was."

Well, he fell foul of poor Amy, and indeed I thought once he would have carried the jest on before my face, as was once done in a like case; but his lordship was not so hot neither, but he would know whether Amy was Mr Amy or Mrs Amy, and so I suppose he did, and then being satisfied in that doubtful case, he walked to the farther end of the room, and went into a little closet and sat down.

In the meantime Amy and I got up, and I bid her run and make the bed in another chamber for my lord, and I gave her sheets to put into it; which she did immediately, and I put my lord to bed there; and when I had done, at his desire, went to bed to him. I was backward at first to come to bed to him, and made my excuse because I had been in bed with Amy, and had not shifted me, but he was past those niceties at that time; and as long as he was sure it was Mrs Amy and not Mr Amy, he was very well satisfied, and so the jest passed over; but Amy appeared no more all that night, or the next day, and when she did my lord was so merry with her upon his éclaircissement, as he called it, that Amy did not know what to do with herself.

Not that Amy was such a nice lady in the main, if she had been fairly dealt with, as has appeared in the former part of this work; but now she was surprised, and a little hurried, that she scarce knew where she was; and besides, she was, as to his lordship, as nice a lady as any in the world, and for anything he knew of her, she appeared as such. The rest was to us only that knew of it.

I held this wicked scene of life out eight years, reckoning from my first coming to England; and though my lord found no fault, yet I found without much examining, that any one who looked in my face might see I was above twenty years old, and yet without flattering myself, I carried my age, which was above fifty, very well too.

I may venture to say that no woman ever lived a life like me, of six and twenty years of wickedness, without the least signals of remorse, without any signs of repentance, or without so much as a wish to put an end to it; I had so long habituated myself to a life of vice, that really it appeared no vice to me. I went on smooth and pleasant, I wallowed in wealth, and it flowed in upon me at such a rate, having taken the frugal measures that the good knight directed, that I had at the end of the eight years 2,800*l.* coming yearly in, of which I did not spend one penny, being maintained by my allowance from my lord —, and more than maintained by above 200*l.* per annum; for though he did not contract for 500*l.* a-year, as I made dumb signs to have it be, yet he gave me money so often, and that in such large parcels, that I had seldom so little as seven to eight hundred pounds a-year of him, one year with another.

I must go back here, after telling openly the wicked things I did, to mention something, which, however, had the face of doing good; I remembered that when I went from England, which was fifteen years before, I had left five little children, turned out as it were to the wide world, and the charity of their father's relations; the eldest was not six years old, for we had not been married full seven years when their father went away.

After my coming to England, I was greatly desirous to hear how things stood with them; and whether they were all alive or not, and in what manner they had been maintained; and yet I resolved not to discover myself to them in the least, or to let any of the people that had the breeding of them up know that there was such a body left in the world as their mother.

Amy was the only body I could trust with such a commission, and I sent her into Spitalfields, to the old aunt, and the poor woman that were so instrumental in disposing the relations to take some care of the children, but they were both gone, dead and buried some years. The next inquiry she made was at the house where she carried the poor children, and turned them in at the door; when she came there she found the house inhabited by other people, so that she could make little or nothing of her inquiries, and came back with an answer, that indeed was no answer to me, for it gave me no satisfaction at all. I sent her back to inquire in the neighbourhood, what was become of the family that lived in that house? and if they were removed, where they lived? and what circumstances they were in? and withal, if she could, what became of the poor children, and how they lived, and where? how they had been treated? and the like.

She brought me back word upon this second going that she heard, as to the family, that the husband, who, though but uncle-in-law to the children, had yet been kindest to them, was dead; and that the widow was left but in mean circumstances, that is to say, she did not want, but that she was not so well in the world as she was thought to be when her husband was alive.

That, as to the poor children, two of them, it seems, had been kept by her, that is to say, by her husband, while he lived, for that it was against her will, that we all knew; but the honest neighbours pitied the poor children, they said, heartily; for that their aunt used them barbarously, and made them little better than servants in the house to wait upon her and her children, and scarce allowed them clothes fit to wear.

These were, it seems, my eldest and third, which were daughters; the second was a son, the fourth a daughter, and the youngest a son.

To finish the melancholly part of this history of my two unhappy girls, she brought me word that so soon as they were able to go out and get any work they went from her, and some said she had turned them out of doors; but it seems she had not done so, but she used them so cruelly that they left her, and one of them went to service to a neighbour's a little way off, who knew her, an honest substantial weaver's wife, to whom she was chamber-maid, and in a little time she took her sister out of the Bridewell of her aunt's house, and got her a place too.

This was all melancholly and dull. I sent her then to the weaver's house, where the eldest had lived, but found that, her mistress being dead, she was gone, and nobody knew there whither she went, only that they heard she had lived with a great lady at the other end of the town; but they did not know who that lady was.

These inquiries took us up three or four weeks, and I was not one jot the better for it, for I could hear nothing to my satisfaction. I sent her next to find out the honest man, who, as in the beginning of my story I observed, made them be entertained, and caused the youngest to be fetched from the town where we lived, and where the parish officers had taken care of them. This gentleman was still alive; and there she heard that my youngest daughter and eldest son were dead also; but that my youngest son was alive, and was at that time about seventeen years old, and that he was put out apprentice by the kindness and charity of his uncle, but to a mean trade, at which he was obliged to work very hard.

Amy was so curious in this part that she went immediately to see him, and found him all dirty, and hard at work. She had no remembrance at all of the youth, for she had not seen him since he was about two years old; and it was evident he could have no knowledge of her.

However, she talked with him, and found him a good, sensible, mannerly youth; that he knew little of the story of his father or mother, and had no view of anything but to work hard for his living; and she did not think fit to put any great things into his head, lest it should take him off his business, and perhaps make him turn giddy-headed, and be good for nothing; but she went and found out that kind man, his benefactor, who had put him out; and finding him a plain, well-meaning, honest, and kind-hearted man, she opened her tale to him the easier. She made a long story, how she had a prodigious kindness for the child, because she had the same for his father and mother; told him that she was the servant-maid that brought all of them to their aunt's door, and run away and left them; that their poor mother wanted bread, and what came of her after she would have been glad to know. She added that her circumstances had happened to mend in the world, and that, as she was in condition, so she was disposed to show some kindness to the children if she could find them out.

He received her with all the civility that so kind a proposal demanded, gave her an account of what he had done for the child, how he had maintained him, fed and clothed him, put him to school, and at last put him out to a trade. She said he had indeed been a father to the child. "But, sir," says she, "'tis a very laborious hard-working trade, and he is but a thin weak boy." "That's true," says he; "but the boy chose the trade, and I assure you I gave 20*l.* with him, and am to find him clothes all his apprenticeship; and as to its being a hard trade," says he, "that's the fate of his circumstances, poor boy; I could not well do better for him."

"Well, sir, as you did all for him in charity," says she, "it was exceedingly well; but, as my resolution is to do something for him, I desire you will, if possible, take him away again from that place, where he works so hard, for I cannot bear to see the child work so very hard for his bread, and I will do something for him that shall make him live without such hard labour."

He smiled at that. "I can, indeed," says he, "take him away, but then I must lose my 20*l.* that I gave with him."

"Well, sir," said Amy, "I'll enable you to lose that 20*l.* immediately," and so she put her hand in her pocket and pulls out her purse.

He begun to be a little amazed at her, and looked her hard in the face, and that so very much that she took notice of it, and said, "Sir, I fancy by your looking at me you think you know me, but I am assured you do not, for I never saw your face before; I think you have done enough for the child, and that you ought to be acknowledged as a father to him; but you ought not to lose by your kindness to him, more than the kindness of bringing him up obliges you to; and therefore there's the 20*l.*," added she, "and pray let him be fetched away."

"Well, madam," says he, "I will thank you for the boy, as well as for myself; but will you please to tell me what I must do with him?"

"Sir," says Amy, "as you have been so kind as to keep him so many years, I beg you will take him home again one year more, and I'll bring you 100*l.* more, which I will desire you to lay out in schooling and clothes for him, and to pay you for his board ; perhaps I may put him in a condition to return your kindness."

He looked pleased, but surprised very much, and inquired of Amy, but with very great respect, what he should go to school to learn, and what trade she would please to put him out to.

Amy said she should put him to learn a little Latin, and then merchants' accounts, and to write a good hand, for she would have him be put to a Turkey merchant.

"Madam," says he, "I am glad for his sake to hear you talk so ; but do you know that a Turkey merchant will not take him under 400*l.* or 500*l.* ?"

"Yes, sir," says Amy, "I know it very well."

"And," says he, "that it will require as many thousands to set him up?"

"Yes, sir," says Amy, "I know that very well too ;" and, resolving to talk very big, she added, "I have no children of my own, and I resolve to make him my heir ; and if 10,000*l.* be required to set him up, he shall not want it. I was but his mother's servant when he was born, and I mourned heartily for the disaster of the family ; and I always said if ever I was worth anything in the world I would take the child for my own, and I'll be as good as my word now, though I did not then foresee that it would be with me as it has been since." And so Amy told him a long story how she was troubled for me, and what she would give to hear whether I was dead or alive, and what circumstances I was in ; that if she could but find me, if I was ever so poor, she would take care of me, and make a gentlewoman of me again.

He told her that, as to the child's mother, she had been reduced to the last extremity, and was obliged (as he supposed she knew) to send the children all among her husband's friends ; and if it had not been for him they had been all sent to the parish ; but that he obliged the other relations to share the charge among them ; that he had taken two, whereof he had lost the eldest, who died of the small-pox ; but that he had been as careful of this as of his own, and had made very little difference in their breeding up, only that when he came to put him out he thought it best for the boy to put him to a trade which he might set up in without a stock, for otherwise his time would be lost ; and that, as to his mother, he had never been able to hear one word of her, no, not though he had made the utmost inquiry after her ; that there went a report that she had drowned herself ; but that he could never meet with anybody that could give him a certain account of it.

Amy counterfeited a cry for her poor mistress ; told him, she would give anything in the world to see her, if she was alive ; and a great deal more such like talk they had about that ; then they returned to speak of the boy.

He inquired of her, why she did not seek after the child before, that he might have been brought up from a younger age, suitable to what she designed to do for him.

She told him, she had been out of England, and was but newly returned from the East Indies. That she had been out of England, and was but newly returned, was true, but the latter was false, and was put in to blind him, and to provide against farther inquiries ; for it was not a strange for young women to go away poor to the East Indies and come home vastly rich ; so she went on with directions about him, and both agreed in this, that the boy should by no means be told what was intended for him, but only that he should be taken home again to his uncle's, that his uncle thought the trade too hard for him, and the like.

About three days after this, Amy goes again, and carried him the 100*l.* she promised him, but then Amy made quite another figure than she did before ; for she went in my coach, with two footmen after her, and dressed very fine also, with jewels and a gold watch ; and there was indeed no great difficulty to make Amy look like a lady, for she was a very handsome well-shaped woman, and genteel enough ; the coachmen and servants were particularly ordered to show her the same respect as they would do me, and to call her Madame Collins, if they were asked any questions about her.

When the gentleman saw what a figure she made, it added to the former surprise, and he entertained her in the most respectful manner possible ; congratulated her advancement in fortune, and particularly rejoiced that it should fall to the poor child's lot to be so provided for, contrary to all expectation.

Well, Amy talked big, but very free and familiar ; told them she had no pride in her good fortune ; (that was true enough, for to give Amy her due, she was far from it, and was as good humoured a creature as ever lived) ; that she was the same as ever, and that she always loved this boy, and was resolved to do something extraordinary for him.

Then she pulled out her money, and paid down 120*l.*, which, she said, she paid him that he might be sure he should be no loser by taking him home again, and that she would come and see him again, and talk farther about things with him, that so all might be settled for him, in such a manner as the accidents, such as mortality or anything else, should make no alteration to the child's prejudice.

At this meeting, the uncle brought his wife out, a good motherly, comely, grave woman, who spoke very tenderly of the youth, and as it appeared, had been very good to him, though she had several children of her own. After a long discourse, she put in a word of her own. "Madam," says she, "I am heartily glad of the good intentions you have for this poor orphan, and I rejoice sincerely in it for his sake ; but madam, you know, (I suppose) that there are two sisters alive too ; may we not speak a word for them ? poor girls," says she, "they have not been so kindly used as he has, and are turned out to the wide world."

"Where are they, madam," says Amy.

"Poor creatures," says the gentlewoman, "they are out at service ; nobody knows where but themselves ; their case is very hard."

"Well, madam," said Amy, "though if I could but find them, I would assist them ; yet my concern is for my boy, as I call him, and I'll put him in a condition to take care of his sisters."

"But madam," says the good compassionate creature, "he may not be so charitable, perhaps by his own inclination, for brothers are not fathers; and they have been cruelly used already, poor girls; we have often relieved them, both with victuals and clothes too, even while they were pretended to be kept by their barbarous aunt."

"Well, madam," says Amy, "what can I do for them; they are gone, it seems, and cannot be heard of? When I see them, 'tis time enough."

She pressed Amy then to oblige their brother, out of the plentiful fortune he was like to have, to do something for his sisters when he should be able.

Amy spoke coldly of that still, but said she would consider of it; and so they parted for that time; they had several meetings after this, for Amy went to see her adopted son, and ordered his schooling, clothes, and other things, but enjoined them not to tell the young man anything, but that they thought the trade he was at too hard for him, and they would keep him at home a little longer, and give him some schooling, to fit him for better business; and Amy appeared to him as she did before, only as one that had known his mother, and had some kindness for him.

Thus this matter passed on for near a twelvemonth, when it happened that one of my maid-servants having asked Amy leave, for Amy was mistress of the servants, and took in and put out such as she pleased; I say, having asked leave to go into the city to see some friends, came home crying bitterly, and in a most grievous agony she was, and continued so several days, till Amy, perceiving the excess, and that the maid would certainly cry herself sick, she took an opportunity with her, and examined her about it.

The maid told her a long story that she had been to see her brother, the only brother she had in the world, and that she knew he was put out an apprentice to a —; but there had come a lady in a coach to his uncle —, who had brought him up, and made him take him home again; and so the wench run on with the whole story, just as 'tis told above, till she came to that part that belonged to herself, and there, says she, "I had not let them know where I lived, and the lady would have taken me, and they say, would have provided for me too, as she has done for my brother, but nobody could tell where to find me, and so I have lost it all, and all the hopes of being anything but a poor servant all my days:" and then the girl fell a crying.

Amy said, "what's all this story? who could this lady be? it must be some trick sure."—"No," she said, "'twas not a trick, for she had made them take her brother home from apprentice, and bought him new clothes, and put him to have more learning; and the gentlewoman said she would make him her heir."

"Her heir," says Amy, "what does that amount to? it may be she has nothing to leave him; she might make anybody her heir."

"No, no;" says the girl, "she came in a fine coach and horses, and I don't know how many footmen to attend her, and brought a great bag of gold, and gave it to my uncle —, he that brought up my brother, to buy him clothes, and to pay for his schooling and board."

"He that brought up your brother?" says Amy; "why didn't he bring you up too, as well as your brother? Pray who brought you up?"

Here the poor girl told a melancholy story, how an aunt had brought up her and her sister, and how barbarously she had used them, as we have heard.

By this time Amy had her head full enough, and her heart too; and did not know how to hold it, or what to do, for she was satisfied that this was no other than my own daughter; for she told her all the history of her father and mother, and how she was carried by their maid to her aunt's door, just as is related in the beginning of my story.

Amy did not tell me this story for a great while, nor did she well know what course to take in it; but as she had authority to manage everything in the family, she took occasion some time after, without letting me know anything of it, to find some fault with the maid, and turn her away.

Her reasons were good, though at first I was not pleased when I heard of it, but I was convinced afterwards, that she was in the right; for if she had told me of it, I should have been in great perplexity between the difficulty of concealing myself from my own child, and the inconvenience of having my way of living be known among my first husband's relations, and even to my husband himself; for as to his being dead at Paris, Amy seeing me resolved against marrying any more, had told me that she had formed that story only to make me easy, when I was in Holland, if any thing should offer to my liking.

However, I was too tender a mother still, notwithstanding what I had done, to let this poor girl go about the world drudging, as it were for bread, and slaving at the fire, and in the kitchen, as a cook maid; besides it came into my head, that she might marry some poor devil of a footman, or a coachman, or some such thing, and be undone that way, or, which was worse, be drawn in to lie with some of that coarse cursed kind, and be with child, and be utterly ruined that way; and in the midst of all my prosperity this gave me great uneasiness.

As to sending Amy to her, there was no doing that now; for as she had been servant in the house, she knew Amy as well as Amy knew me; and no doubt, though I was much out of her sight, yet she might have had the curiosity to have peeped at me, and seen me enough to know me again, if I had discovered myself to her; so that, in short, there was nothing to be done that way.

However, Amy, a diligent indefatigable creature, found out another woman and gave her her errand, and sent her to the honest man's house in Spitalfields, whither she supposed the girl would go, after she was out of her place; and bade her talk with her, and tell her at a distance that as something had been done for her brother, so something would be done for her too; and that she should not be discouraged, she carried her 20*l.* to buy her clothes, and bid her not go to service any more, but think of other things; that she should take a lodging in some good family, and she should soon hear further.

The girl was overjoyed with this news, you may be sure, and at first a little too much elevated with it, and dressed herself very handsomely indeed, and as soon as she had done so, came and paid a visit to Madam Amy, to let her see how fine she was. Amy congratulated her, and wished it might be all as she expected; but admonished her not to be elevated with it too much; told her, humility was the best ornament of a gentlewoman; and a great deal of good advice she gave her, but discovered nothing.

All this was acted in the first years of my setting up my new figure in the town, and while the masks and balls were in agitation; and Amy carried the affair of setting out my son into the world, which we were assisted in by the sage advice of my faithful counsellor Sir Robert Clayton, who procured us a master for him, by whom he was afterwards sent abroad to Italy, as you shall hear in its place; and Amy managed my daughter too very well, though by a third hand.

My amour with my Lord — began now to draw to an end, and indeed, notwithstanding his money, it had lasted so long, that I was much more sick of his lordship than he could be of me; he grew old, and fretful, and captious, and I must add, which made the vice itself begin to grow surfeiting and nauseous to me, he grew worse and wicked, the older he grew, and that to such degree, as it is not fit to write of, and made me so weary of him, that upon one of his capricious humours, which he often took occasion to trouble me with, I took occasion to be much less complaisant to him than I used to be; and, as I knew him to be hasty, I first took care to put him into a little passion, and then to resent it, and this brought us to words, in which I told him I thought he grew sick of me; and he answered in a heat, that truly so he was. I answered, that I found his lordship was endeavouring to make me sick too; that I had met with several such rubs from him of late, and that he did not use me as he was wont to do, and I begged his lordship he would make himself easy. This I spoke with an air of coldness and indifference, such as I knew he could not bear; but I did not downright quarrel with him, and tell him I was sick of him too, and desire him to quit me, for I knew that would come of itself; besides, I had received a great deal of handsome usage from him, and I was loth to have the breach be on my side, that he might not be able to say I was ungrateful.

But he put the occasion into my hands, for he came no more to me for two months; indeed, I expected a fit of absence, for such I had had several times before, but not for above a fortnight or three weeks at most; but after I had staid a month, which was longer than ever he kept away yet, I took a new method with him, for I was resolved now it should be in my power to continue or not, as I thought fit. At the end of a month therefore I removed, and took lodgings at Kensington Gravel Pits, and that part next to the road to Acton, and left nobody in my lodgings but Amy and the footman, with proper instructions how to behave, when his lordship, being come to himself, should think fit to come again, which I knew he would.

About the end of two months he came in the dusk of the evening as usual; the footman answered him, and told him his lady was not at home, but there was Mrs Amy above; so he did not order her to be called down, but went upstairs into the dining-room, and Mrs Amy came to him; he asked where I was? "My lord," said she, "my mistress has been removed a good while hence, and lives at Kensington."—"Ay, Mrs Amy! how come you to be here then?"—"My lord," said she, "we are here till the quarter-day, because the goods are not removed, and to give answers, if any one comes to ask for my lady."—"Well, and what answer are you to give to me?"—"Indeed, my lord," says Amy, "I have no particular answer to your lordship, but to tell you, and everybody else, where my lady lives, that they may not think she's run away."—"No, Mrs Amy," says he, "I don't think she's run away, but indeed, I can't go after her so far as that." Amy said nothing to that, but made a curtesy, and said, "she believed I would be there again for a week or two in a little time."—"How little time, Mrs Amy?" says my lord. "She comes next Tuesday," says Amy. "Very well," says my lord, "I will call and see her then;" and so he went away.

Accordingly I came on the Tuesday, and stayed a fortnight, but he came not; so I went back to Kensington, and after that I had very few of his lordship's visits, which I was very glad of, and in little time after was more glad of it than I was at first, and upon a better account too.

For now I began not to be sick of his lordship only, but really I began to be sick of the vice; and as I had good leisure now to divert and enjoy myself in the world, as much as it was possible for any woman to do that ever lived in it; so I found that my judgment began to prevail upon me to fix my delight upon nobler objects than I had formerly done, and the very beginning of this brought some just reflection upon me relating to things past, and to the former manner of my living; and though there was not the least hint in all this from what may be called religion or conscience, and far from anything of repentance, or anything that was akin to it, especially at first; yet the sense of things, and the knowledge I had of the world, and the vast variety of scenes that I had acted my part in, began to work upon my senses, and it came so very strong upon my mind one morning when I had been lying awake some time in my bed, as if somebody had asked me the question, What was I a whore for now? It occurred naturally upon this inquiry, that at first I yielded to the importunity of my circumstances, the misery of which the devil dismally aggravated, to draw me to comply; for I confess I had strong natural aversions to the crime at first, partly owing to a virtuous education, and partly to a sense of religion; but the devil, and that greater devil of poverty prevailed; and the person who laid siege to me, did it in such an obliging, and I may almost say, irresistible manner, all still managed by the evil spirit, for I must be allowed to believe that he has a share in all such things, if not the whole management of them. But, I say, it was carried on by that person in such an irresistible manner, that (as I said) when I related the fact, there was no withstanding it: these circumstances, I say, the devil managed not only to bring me to comply, but he continued them as arguments to fortify my mind against all reflections, and to keep me in that horrid course I had engaged in, as if it were honest and lawful.

But not to dwell upon that now; this was a pretence, and here was something to be said, though I acknowledge it ought not to have been sufficient to me at all; but I say to leave that, all this was out of doors; the devil himself could not form one argument, or put one reason into my head now, that could serve for an answer, no, not so much as a pretended answer to this question, Why I should be a whore now?

It had for a while been a little kind of excuse to me that I was engaged with this wicked old lord, and that I could not in honour forsake him; but how foolish and absurd did it look to repeat the word honour on so vile an occasion? as if a woman should prostitute her honour in point of honour; horrid inconsistency! Honour called upon me to detest the crime and the man too, and to have resisted all the attacks which, from the beginning, had been made upon my virtue; and honour, had it been consulted, would have preserved me honest from the beginning.

"For HONESTY and HONOUR are the same."

This, however, shows us with what faint excuses, and with what trifles we pretend to satisfy ourselves, and suppress the attempts of conscience in the pursuit of an agreeable crime, and in the possessing those pleasures which we are loth to part with.

But this objection would now serve no longer, for my lord had, in some sort, broke his engagements (I won't call it honour again) with me, and had so far slighted me as fairly to justify my entire quitting of him now; and so as the objection was fully answered, the question remained still unanswered, Why am I a whore now? Nor indeed had I anything to say for myself, even to myself; I could not, without blushing, as wicked as I was, answer, that I loved it for the sake of the vice, and that I delighted in being a whore, as such; I say, I could not say this, even to myself, and all alone, nor indeed would it have been true. I was never able in justice, and with truth, to say I was so wicked as that; but as necessity first debauched me, and poverty made me a whore at the beginning, so excess of avarice for getting money, and excess of vanity, continued me in the crime, not being able to resist the flatteries of great persons; being called the finest woman in France; being caressed by a prince; and afterwards I had pride enough to expect, and folly enough to believe, though indeed without ground, by a great monarch. These were my baits, these the chains by which the devil held me bound, and by which I was indeed so fast held for any reasoning that I was then mistress of to deliver me from.

But this was all over now, avarice could have no pretence; I was out of the reach of all that fate could do to reduce me; now I was so far from poor, or the danger of it, that I had 50,000*l.* in my pocket at least; nay, I had the income of 50,000*l.*, for I had 2,500*l.* a-year coming in upon very good land security, besides three or four thousand pounds in money, which I kept by me for ordinary occasions, and besides jewels and plate, and goods, which were worth near 5,600*l.*

more; these put together, when I ruminated on it all in my thoughts, as you may be sure I did often, added weight still to the question, as above, and it sounded continually in my head, what's next? What am I a whore for now?

It is true, this was, as I say, seldom out of my thoughts, but yet it made no impressions upon me of that kind which might be expected from a reflection of so important a nature, and which had so much of substance and seriousness in it.

But, however, it was not without some little consequences even at that time, and which gave a little turn to my way of living at first, as you shall hear in its place.

But one particular thing intervened besides this, which gave me some uneasiness at this time, and made way for other things that followed. I have mentioned in several little digressions, the concern I had upon me for my children, and in what manner I had directed that affair; I must go on a little with that part, in order to bring the subsequent parts of my story together.

My boy, the only son I had left I had a legal right to call son, was, as I have said, rescued from the unhappy circumstances of being apprentice to a mechanic, and was brought up upon a new foot; but though this was infinitely to his advantage, yet it put him back near three years in his coming into the world, for he had been near a year at the drudgery he was first put to, and it took up two years more to form him for what he had hopes given him he should hereafter be, so that he was fully nineteen years old, or rather twenty years, before he came to be put out as I intended; at the end of which time I put him to a very flourishing Italian merchant, and he again sent him to Messina, in the island of Sicily; and a little before the juncture I am now speaking of, I had letters from him, that is to say, Mrs Amy had letters from him, intimating that he was out of his time, and that he had an opportunity to be taken into an English house there, on very good terms, if his support from hence might answer what he was bid to hope for; and so begged that what would be done for him might be so ordered that he might have it for his present advancement, referring for the particulars to his master, the merchant in London, whom he had been apprentice to here; who, to cut the story short, gave such a satisfactory account of it, and of my young man, to my steady and faithful counsellor, Sir Robert Clayton, that I made no scruple to pay 4,000*l.* which was 1,000*l.* more than he demanded, or rather proposed, that he might have encouragement to enter into the world better than he expected.

His master remitted the money very faithfully to him, and finding, by Sir Robert Clayton, that the young gentleman, for so he called him, was well supported, wrote such letters on his account, as gave him a credit at Messina equal in value to the money itself.

I could not digest it very well, that I should all this while conceal myself thus from my own child, and make all this favour due, in his opinion, to a stranger; and yet I could not find in my heart to let my son know what a mother he had, and what a life she lived; when, at the same time, that he must think himself infinitely obliged to me, he must be obliged, if he was a man of virtue, to hate his mother, and abhor the way of living, by which all the bounty he enjoyed was raised.

This is the reason of mentioning this part of my son's story, which is otherwise no ways concerned in my history, but as it put me upon thinking how to put an end to that wicked course I was in, that my own child, when he should afterwards come to England in a good figure, and with the appearance of a merchant, should not be ashamed to own me.

But there was another difficulty, which lay heavier upon me a great deal, and that was, my daughter; who, as before, I had relieved by the hands of another instrument, which Amy had procured. The girl, as I have mentioned, was directed to put herself into a good garb, take lodgings, and entertain a maid to wait upon her, to give herself some breeding, that is to say, to learn to dance, and fit herself to appear as a gentlewoman; being made to hope, that she should, sometime or other, find that she should be put into a condition to support her character, and to make herself amends for all her former troubles; she was only charged not to be drawn into matrimony, till she was secured of a fortune that might assist to dispose of herself suitable not to what then she was, but what she was to be.

The girl was too sensible of her circumstances not to give all possible satisfaction of that kind, and indeed she was mistress of too much understanding not to see how much she should be obliged to that part for her own interest.

It was not long after this, but being well equipped, and in every thing well set out, as she was directed, she came as I have related above, and paid a visit to Mrs Amy, and to tell her of her good fortune. Amy pretended to be much surprised at the alteration, and overjoyed for her sake, and began to treat her very well, entertained her handsomely, and when she would have gone away pretended to ask my leave, and sent my coach home with her; and, in short, learning from her where she lodged, which was in the city, Amy promised to return her visit, and did so; and, in a word, Amy and Susan (for she was my own name) began an intimate acquaintance together.

There was an inexpressible difficulty in the poor girl's way, or else I should not have been able to have forborne discovering myself to her, and this was, her having been a servant in my particular family; and I could by no means think of ever letting the children know what a kind of creature they owed their being to, or giving them an occasion to upbraid their mother with her scandalous life, much less to justify the like practice from my example.

Thus it was with me; and thus, no doubt, considering parents always find it, that their own children are a restraint to them in their worst courses, when the sense of a Superior Power has not the same influence. But of that hereafter.

There happened, however, one good circumstance in the case of this poor girl, which brought about a discovery sooner than otherwise it would have been, and it was thus: after she and Amy had been intimate for some time, and had exchanged several visits, the girl now grown a woman, talking to Amy of the gay things that used to fall out when she was servant in my family, spoke of it with a kind of concern, that she could not see (me) her lady; and at last she adds, "'twas very strange, madam," says she to Amy, "but though I lived near two years in the house, I never saw my mistress in my life, except it was that public night when she danced in the fine Turkish habit, and then she was so disguised that I knew nothing of her afterwards."

Amy was glad to hear this; but as she was a cunning girl from the beginning, she was not to be bit, and so she laid no stress upon that at first, but gave me an account of it; and I must confess it gave me a secret joy to think that I was not known to her; and that, by virtue of that only accident, I might, when other circumstances made room for it, discover myself to her, and let her know that she had a mother in a condition fit to be owned.

It was a dreadful restraint to me before, and this gave me some very sad reflections, and made way for the great question I have mentioned above; and by how much the circumstance was bitter to, by so much the more agreeable it was to understand that the girl had never seen me, and consequently, did not know me again if she was to be told who I was.

However, the next time she came to visit Amy I was resolved to put it to a trial, and to come into the room and let her see me, and to see by that, whether she knew me or no; but Amy put me by, lest indeed, as there was reason enough to question, I should not be able to contain, or forbear discovering myself to her; so it went off for that time.

But both these circumstances, and that is the reason of my mentioning them, brought me to consider of the life I lived, and to resolve to put myself into some figure of life, in which I might not be scandalous to my own family, and be afraid to make myself known to my own children, who were my own flesh and blood.

There was another daughter I had, which, with all our inquiries we could not hear of, high nor low, for several years after the first. But I return to my own story.

Being now in part removed from my old station, I seemed to be in a fair way of retiring from my old acquaintances, and consequently from the vile abominable trade I had driven so long; so that the door seemed to be, as it were, particularly opened to my reformation, if I had any mind to it in earnest; but, for all that, some of my old friends, as I used to call them, inquired me out, and came to visit me at Kensington, and that more frequently than I wished they would do; but it being once known where I was, there was no avoiding it, unless I would have downright refused and affronted them; and I was not yet in earnest enough with my resolutions to go that length.

The best of it was, my old lewd favourite, whom I now heartily hated, entirely dropped me; he came once to visit me, but I caused Amy to deny me, and say I was gone out; she did it so oddly too, that when his lordship went away, he said coldly to her, "Well, well, Mrs Amy, I find your mistress does not desire to be seen; tell her I won't trouble her any more," repeating the words any more two or three times over, just at his going away.

I reflected a little on it at first, as unkind to him, having had so many considerable presents from him, but, as I have said, I was sick of him, and that on some accounts, which if I could suffer myself to publish them, would fully justify my conduct; but that part of the story will not bear telling, so I must leave it and proceed.

I had begun a little, as I have said above, to reflect upon my manner of living, and to think of putting a new face upon it; and nothing moved me to it more than the consideration of my having three children, who were now grown up; and yet, that while I was in that station of life I could not converse with them, or make myself known to them; and this gave me a great deal of uneasiness; at last I entered into a talk on this part of it with my woman Amy.

We lived at Kensington, as I have said, and though I had done with my old wicked L——, as above, yet I was frequently visited, as I said, by some others, so that, in a word, I began to be known in the town, not by name only, but my character too, which was worse.

It was one morning when Amy was in bed with me, and I had some of my dullest thoughts about me, that Amy hearing me sigh pretty often, asked me if I was not well? "Yes, Amy, I am well enough," says I, "but my mind is oppressed with heavy thoughts, and has been so a good while; and then I told her how it grieved me that I could not make myself known to my own children, or form any acquaintances in the world.—"Why so?" says Amy. "Why, prithee," says I, "what will my children say to themselves, and to one another, when they find their mother, however rich she may be, is at best but a whore, a common whore? And as for acquaintance, prithee Amy, what sober lady, or what family of any character will visit or be acquainted with a whore?"

"Why, all that's true, madam," says Amy; "but how can it be remedied now?"—"Tis true, Amy," said I, "the thing cannot be remedied now, but the scandal of it, I fancy, may be thrown off."

"Truly," says Amy, "I don't see how, unless you will go abroad again, and live in some other nation, where nobody has known us, or seen us, so that they cannot say they ever saw us before."

That very thought of Amy put what follows into my head; and I returned, "Why, Amy," says I, "is it not possible for me to shift my being, from this part of the town, and go and live in another part of the city, or another part of the country, and be as entirely concealed as if I had never been known?"

"Yes," says Amy, "I believe it might; but then you must put off all your equipages, and servants, coaches and horses; change your liveries, nay, your own clothes, and if it was possible your very face."

"Well," says I, "and that's the way, Amy, and that I'll do, and that forthwith; for I am not able to live in this manner any longer." Amy came into this with a kind of pleasure particular to herself, that is to say, with an eagerness not to be resisted; for Amy was apt to be precipitant in her motions, and was for doing it immediately. "Well," says I, "Amy, as soon as you will, but what course must we take to do it? we cannot put off servants and coach and horses, and every thing, leave off housekeeping, and transform ourselves into a new shape all in a moment; servants must have warning, and the goods must be sold off, and a thousand things," and this began to perplex us, and in particular took us up two or three days' consideration.

At last, Amy, who was a clever manager in such cases, came to me with a scheme, as she called it. "I have found it out, madam," says she, "I have found a scheme how you shall, if you have a mind to it, begin and finish a perfect, entire change of your figure and circumstances in one day, and shall be as much unknown, madam, in twenty-four hours, as you would be in so many years."

"Come, Amy," says I, "let us hear it, for you please me mightily with the thoughts of it." "Why, then," says Amy, "let me go into the city this afternoon, and I'll inquire out some honest, plain, sober family, where I will take lodgings for you, as for a country-gentlewoman that desires to be in London for about half a year, and to board yourself and a kinswoman, that is half a servant, half a companion, meaning myself; and so agree with them by the month."

"To this lodging (if I hit upon one to your mind) you may go to-morrow morning in a hackney-coach, with nobody but me, and leave such clothes and linen as you think fit; but to be sure, the plainest you have; and then you are removed at once, you need never so much as set your foot in this house again (meaning where we then were) or see anybody belonging to it; in the meantime I'll let the servants know that you are going over to Holland upon extraordinary business, and will leave off your equipages, and so I'll give them warning, or, if they will accept of it, give them a month's wages; and then I will sell off your furniture as well as I can; as to your coach, it is but having it new painted, and the lining changed, and getting new harness and hammercloths, and you may keep it still, or dispose of it as you think fit; and only take care to let this lodging be in some remote part of the town, and you may be as perfectly unknown, as if you had never been in England in your life."

This was Amy's scheme, and it pleased me so well, that I resolved not only to let her go, but was resolved to go with her myself; but Amy put me off of that, because, she said, she should have occasion to hurry up and down so long, that if I was with her it would rather hinder than further her; so I waved it.

In a word, Amy went, and was gone five long hours; but when she came back, I could see by her countenance that her success had been suitable to her pains, for she came laughing and gaping. "O madam!" says she, "I have pleased you to the life;" and with that, she tells me how she had fixed upon a house in a court in the Minories; that she was directed to it merely by accident; that it was a female family, the master of the house being gone to New England, and that the woman had four children, kept two maids, and lived very handsomely, but wanted company to divert her; and that on that very account she had agreed to take boarders.

Amy agreed for a good handsome price, because she was resolved I should be used well; so she bargained to give her 35*l.* for the half year, and 50*l.* if we took a maid, leaving that to my choice; and that we might be satisfied we should meet with nothing very gay, the people were Quakers, and I liked them the better.

I was so pleased that I resolved to go with Amy the next day to see the lodgings, and to see the woman of the house, and see how I liked them; but if I was pleased with the general, I was much more pleased with the particulars; for the gentlewoman, I must call her so, though she was a Quaker, was a most courteous, obliging, mannerly person; perfectly well-bred, and perfectly well-humoured, and in short, the most agreeable conversation that ever I met with; and, which was worth all, so grave, and yet so pleasant and so merry, that 'tis scarce possible for me to express how I was pleased and delighted with her company; and particularly, I was so pleased that I would go away no more; so I e'en took up my lodging there the very first night.

In the meantime, though it took up Amy almost a month so entirely, to put off all the appearances of housekeeping, as above, it need take me up no time to relate it; 'tis enough to say, that Amy quitted all that part of the world, and came pack and package to me, and here we took up our abode.

I was now in a perfect retreat indeed; remote from the eyes of all that ever had seen me, and as much out of the way of ever being seen or heard of by any of the gang that used to follow me, as if I had been among the mountains in Lancashire; for when did a blue garter, or a coach-and-six, come into a little narrow passage in the Minories, or Goodman's fields? And as there was no fear of them, so I really had no desire to see them, or so much as to hear from them any more as long as I lived.

I seemed in a little hurry while Amy came and went so every day at first; but when that was over I lived here perfectly retired, and with a most pleasant and agreeable lady; I must call her so, for though a Quaker, she had a full share of good breeding sufficient to her if she had been a duchess; in a word, she was the most agreeable creature in her conversation, as I said before, that ever I met with.

I pretended, after I had been there some time, to be extremely in love with the dress of the Quakers, and this pleased her so much, that she would needs dress me up one day in a suit of her own clothes; but my real design was, to see whether it would pass upon me for a disguise.

Amy was struck with the novelty, though I had not mentioned my design to her, and when the Quaker was gone out of the room, says Amy, "I guess your meaning; it is a perfect disguise to you; why you look quite another body, I should not have known you myself; nay," says Amy, "more than that, it makes you look ten years younger than you did."

Nothing could please me better than that, and when Amy repeated it, I was so fond of it, that I asked my Quaker (I won't call her landlady, 'tis indeed too coarse a word for her, and she deserved a much better) I say, I asked her if she would sell it; I told her I was so fond of it, that I would give her enough to buy her a better suit; she declined it at first, but I soon perceived that it was chiefly in good manners, because I should not dishonour myself, as she called it, to put on her old clothes; but if I pleased to accept of them, she would give me them for my dressing-clothes, and go with me, and buy a suit for me, that might be better worth my wearing.

But as I conversed in a very frank open manner with her, I bid her do the like with me; that I made no scruple of such things, but that if she would let me have them I would satisfy her; so she let me know what they cost, and to make her amends, I gave her three guineas more than they cost her.

This good (though unhappy) Quaker had the misfortune to have had a bad husband, and he was gone beyond sea; she had a good house and well-furnished, and had some jointure of her own estate, which supported her and her children, so that she did not want; but she was not above such a help, as my being there was to her; so she was as glad of me as I was of her.

However, as I knew there was no way to fix this new acquaintance like making myself a friend to her, I began with making her some handsome presents, and the like to her children. And first, opening my bundles one day in my chamber, I heard her in another room, and called her in with a kind of familiar way; there I showed her some of my fine clothes, and having among the rest of my things a piece of very fine new holland, which I had bought a little before, worth about 9*s.* an ell, I pulled it out, "Here, my friend," says I, "I will make you a present, if you will accept of it;" and with that I laid the piece of holland in her lap.

I could see she was surprised, and that she could hardly speak. "What dost thou mean?" says she; "indeed, I cannot have the face to accept so fine a present as this;" adding, "'tis fit for thy own use, but 'tis above my wear, indeed." I thought she had meant she must not wear it so fine, because she was a Quaker; so I returned, "Why, do not you Quakers wear fine linen neither?" — "Yes," says she, "we wear fine linen when we can afford it, but this is too good for me." However, I made her take it, and she was very thankful too; but my end was answered another way, for by this I engaged her so, that as I found her a woman of understanding, and of honesty too, I might, upon any occasion, have a confidence in her, which was, indeed, what I very much wanted.

By accustoming myself to converse with her, I had not only learned to dress like a Quaker, but so used myself to thee and thou, that I talked like a Quaker too, as ready and naturally as if I had been born among them; and, in a word, I passed for a Quaker among all people that did not know me. I went but little abroad, but I was so used to a coach, that I knew not how well to go without one; besides, I thought it would be a farther disguise to me, so I told my Quaker friend one day, that I thought I lived too close, that I wanted air; she proposed taking a hackney-coach sometimes, or a boat; but I told her I had always had a coach of my own till now, and I could find in my heart to have one again.

She seemed to think it strange at first, considering how close I lived, but had nothing to say when she found I did not value the expense; so, in short, I resolved I would have a coach. When we came to talk of equipages, she extolled the having all things plain. I said so too; so I left it to her direction, and a coachmaker was sent for, and he provided me a plain coach, no gilding or painting, lined with a light grey cloth, and my coachman had a coat of the same, and no lace on his hat.

When all was ready I dressed myself in the dress I bought of her, and said, "Come, I'll be a Quaker to day, and you and I'll go abroad," which we did; and there was not a Quaker in the town that looked less like a counterfeit than I did. But all this was my particular plot, to be the more completely concealed, and that I might depend upon being not known, and yet need not be confined like a prisoner and be always in fear; so that all the rest was grimace.

We lived there very easy and quiet, and yet I cannot say I was so in my mind; I was like a fish out of water; I was as gay, and as young in my disposition, as I was at five-and-twenty; and as I had always been courted, flattered, and used to love it, so I missed it in my conversation; and this put me many times upon looking back upon things past.

I had very few moments in my life which, in their reflection, afforded me anything but regret; but of all the foolish actions I had to look back upon in my life, none looked so preposterous, and so like distraction, nor left so much melancholy on my mind, as my parting with my friend, the merchant of Paris, and the refusing him upon such honourable and just conditions as he had offered; and though on his just (which I called unkind) rejecting my invitation to come to him again, I had looked on him with some disgust, yet now my mind run upon him continually, and the ridiculous conduct of my refusing him, and I could never be satisfied about him; I flattered myself that if I could see him, I could yet master him, and that he would presently forget all that had passed that might be thought unkind; but as there was no room to imagine anything like that to be possible, I threw those thoughts off again as much as I could.

However, they continually returned, and I had no rest night or day for thinking of him, whom I had forgot above eleven years. I told Amy of it, and we talked it over sometimes in bed, almost whole nights together. At last Amy started a thing of her own head, which put it in a way of management, though a wild one too. "You are uneasy, madam," says she, "about this Mr ———, the merchant at Paris; come," says she, "if you'll give me leave, I'll go over and see what's become of him."

"Not for ten thousand pounds," said I; "no, nor if you met him in the street, not to offer to speak to him on my account."—"No," says Amy, "I would not speak to him at all, or if I did, I warrant you it shall not look to be on your account; I will only inquire after him, and if he is in being, you shall hear of him; if not, you shall hear of him still, and that may be enough."

"Why," says I, "if you will promise me not to enter into anything relating to me with him, not to begin any discourse at all, unless he begins it with you, I could almost be persuaded to let you go and try."

Amy promised me all that I desired; and, in a word, to cut the story short, I let her go; but tied her up to so many particulars, that it was almost impossible her going could signify anything; and had she intended to observe them, she might as well have staid at home as have gone; for I charged her, if she came to see him, she should not so much as take notice that she knew him again; and if he spoke to her, she should tell him she was come away from me a great many years ago, and knew nothing what was become of me; that she had been come over to France six years ago, and was married there, and lived at Calais, or to that purpose.

Amy promised me nothing, indeed, for, as she said, it was impossible for her to resolve what would be fit to do, or not to do, till she was there upon the spot, and had found out the gentleman or heard of him; but that then, if I would trust her, as I had always done, she would answer for it that she would do nothing but what should be for my interest, and what she would hope I should be very well pleased with.

With this general commission, Amy, notwithstanding she had been so frightened at the sea, ventured her carcass once more by water, and away she goes to France; she had four articles of confidence in charge to inquire after for me, and, as I found by her, she had one for herself; I say, four for me, because, though her first and principal errand was to inform herself of the Dutch merchant, yet I gave her in charge to inquire, second, after my husband, whom I left a trooper in the gens d'armes; third, after that rogue of a Jew, whose very name I hated, and of whose face I had such a frightful idea, that Satan himself could not counterfeit a worse; and, lastly, after my foreign prince. And she discharged herself very well of them all, though not so successfully as I wished.

Amy had a very good passage over the sea, and I had a letter from her, from Calais, in three days after she went from London. When she came to Paris, she wrote me an account, that as to her first and most important inquiry, which was after the Dutch merchant; her account was, that he had returned to Paris, lived three years there, and, quitting that city, went to live at Rouen: so away goes Amy for Rouen.

But as she was going to bespeak a place in the coach to Rouen, she meets very accidentally in the street with her gentleman, as she called him; that is to say, the Prince de ———'s gentleman, who had been her favourite, as above.

You may be sure there were several other kind things happened between Amy and him, as you shall hear afterwards: but the two main things were, first, that Amy inquired about his lord, and had a full account of him, of which presently; and, in the next place, telling him whither she was going, and for what. He bade her not go yet, for that he would have a particular account of it the next day from a merchant that knew him; and accordingly he brought her word the next day, that he had been for six years before that gone for Holland, and that he lived there still.

This, I say, was the first news from Amy for some time, I mean about my merchant. In the mean time Amy, as I have said, inquired about the other persons she had in her instructions. As for the prince, the gentleman told her he was gone into Germany, where his estate lay, and that he lived there; that he had made great inquiry after me; that he (his gentleman) had made all the search he had been able for me, but that he could not hear of me; that he believed, if his lord had known I had been in England, he would have gone over to me; but that, after long inquiry, he was obliged to give it over; but that he verily believed, if he could have found me, he would have married me; and that he was extremely concerned that he could hear nothing of me.

I was not at all satisfied with Amy's account, but ordered her to go to Rouen herself; which she did, and there with much difficulty (the person she was directed to being dead), I say, with much difficulty, she came to be informed that my merchant had lived there two years, or something more; but that having met with a very great misfortune, he had gone back to Holland, as the French merchant said, where he staid two years; but with this addition, viz. that he came back again to Rouen, and lived in good reputation there another year; and afterwards, he was gone to England, and that he lived in London. But Amy could by no means learn how to write to him there, till, by great accident, an old Dutch skipper, who had formerly served him, coming to Rouen, Amy was told of it; and he told her that he lodged in St Laurence Pountney lane, in London, but was to be seen every day upon the Exchange, in the French walk.

This Amy thought it was time enough to tell me of when she came over; and besides, she did not find this Dutch skipper till she had spent four or five months, and been again at Paris, and then come back to Rouen for farther information. But in the mean time she wrote me from Paris, that he was not to be found by any means; that he had been gone from Paris seven or eight years; that she was told that he had lived at Rouen, and she was a going thither to inquire, but that she had heard afterwards that he was gone also from thence to Holland, so she did not go.

This, I say, was Amy's first account; and I, not satisfied with it, had sent her an order to go to Rouen, to inquire there also, as above.

While this was negotiating, and I received these accounts from Amy at several times, a strange adventure happened to me, which I must mention just here; I had been abroad to take the air, as usual, with my Quaker as far as Epping Forest, and we were driving back towards London, when on the road between Bow and Mile End, two gentlemen on horseback came riding by, having overtaken the coach and passed it, and went forward towards London.

They did not ride apace, though they passed the coach, for we went very softly, nor did they look into the coach at all, but rode side by side, earnestly talking to one another, and inclining their faces side-ways a little towards one another, he that went nearest the coach, with his face from it, and he that was farthest from the coach, with his face towards it, and passing in the very next tract to the coach, I could hear them talk Dutch very distinctly; but it is impossible to describe the confusion I was in, when I plainly saw that the farthest of the two, him whose face looked towards the coach, was my friend, the Dutch merchant of Paris.

If it had been possible to conceal my disorder from my friend the Quaker I would have done it, but I found that she was too well acquainted with such things not to take the hint. "Dost thou understand Dutch?" said she. "Why?" said I. "Why," says she, "it is easy to suppose that thou art a little concerned at somewhat those men say; I suppose they are talking of thee." "Indeed, my good friend," said I, "thou art mistaken this time, for I know very well what they are talking of, but it is all about ships and trading affairs." "Well," says she, "then one of them is a man friend of thine, or somewhat is the case; for though thy tongue will not confess it, thy face does."

I was going to have told a bold lie, and said I knew nothing of them, but I found it was impossible to conceal it, so I said, "Indeed, I think I know the farthest of them; but I have neither spoken to him, or so much as seen him for above eleven years." "Well, then," says she, "thou hast seen him with more than common eyes when thou didst see him; or else seeing him now would not be such a surprise to thee." "Indeed," said I, "it is true I am a little surprised at seeing him just now, for I thought he had been in quite another part of the world; and I can assure you I never saw him in England in my life." "Well, then, it is the more likely he is come over now on purpose to seek thee." "No, no," said I, "knight errantry is over, women are not so hard to come at, that men should not be able to please themselves without running from one kingdom to another." "Well, well," says she, "I would have him see thee for all that, as plainly as thou hast seen him." "No, but he sha'n't," says I, "for I am sure he don't know me in this dress, and I'll take care he sha'n't see my face, if I can help it;" so I held up my fan before my face, and she saw me resolute in that, so she pressed me no farther.

We had several discourses upon the subject, but still I let her know I was resolved he should not know me; but, at last, I confessed so much, that though I would not let him know who I was, or where I lived, I did not care if I knew where he lived, and how I might inquire about him. She took the hint immediately, and her servant being behind the coach, she called him to the coach-side, and bade him keep his eye upon that gentleman, and as soon as the coach came to the end of Whitechapel, he should get down, and follow him closely, so as to see where he put up his horse, and then to go into the inn and inquire, if he could, who he was and where he lived.

The fellow followed diligently to the gate of an inn in Bishopsgate street, and seeing him go in, made no doubt but he had him fast, but was confounded when, upon inquiry, he found the inn was a thoroughfare into another street, and that the two gentlemen had only rode through the inn, as the way to the street where they were going, and so, in short, came back no wiser than he went.

My kind Quaker was more vexed at the disappointment, at least apparently so, than I was; and asking the fellow if he was sure he knew the gentleman again if he saw him, the fellow said, "He had followed him so close, and took so much notice of him, in order to do his errand as it ought to be done, that he was very sure he should know him again; and that besides, he was sure he should know his horse."

This part was, indeed, likely enough; and the kind Quaker, without telling me anything of the matter, caused her man to place himself just at the corner of Whitechapel church wall every Saturday in the afternoon, that being the day when the citizens chiefly ride abroad to take the air; and there to watch all the afternoon and look for him.

It was not till the fifth Saturday that her man came, with a great deal of joy, and gave her an account that he had found out the gentleman; that he was a Dutchman, but a French merchant; that he came from Rouen, and his name was ———, and that he lodged at Mr ———'s, on Laurence Pountney hill. I was surprised, you may be sure, when she came and told me one evening all the particulars, except that of having set her man to watch. "I have found out thy Dutch friend," says she, "and can tell thee how to find him too." I coloured again as red as fire. "Then thou hast dealt with the evil one, friend," said I, very gravely.—"No, no," says she, "I have no familiar; but, I tell thee, I have found him for thee, and his name is so and so, and he lives as above recited."

I was surprised again at this, not being able to imagine how she should come to know all this. However, to put me out of pain, she told me what she had done. "Well," said I, "thou art very kind, but this is not worth thy pains; for I know it, 'tis only to satisfy my curiosity, for I shall not send to him upon any account."—"Be that as thou wilt," says she; "besides," added she, "thou art in the right to say so to me, for why should I be trusted with it? though if I were, I assure thee I should not betray thee."—"That is very kind," said I, "and I believe thee; and assure thyself, if I do send to him, thou shalt know it, and be trusted with it too."

During this interval of five weeks I suffered a hundred thousand perplexities of mind. I was thoroughly convinced I was right as to the person, that it was the man: I knew him so well, and saw him so plain, I could not be deceived. I drove out again in the coach (on pretence of air) almost every day, in hopes of seeing him again, but was never so lucky as to see him; and now I had made the discovery, I was as far to seek what measures to take as I was before.

To send to him, or speak to him first, if I should see him, so as to be known to him, that I resolved not to do, if I died for it; to watch him about his lodging, that was as much below my spirit as the other; so that, in a word, I was at a perfect loss how to act, or what to do.

At length came Amy's letter, with the last account which she had at Rouen, from the Dutch skipper, which, confirming the other, left me out of doubt that this was my man; but still, no human invention could bring me to the speech of him, in such a manner as would suit with my resolutions; for, after all, how did I know what his circumstances were? whether married or single? and if he had a wife, I knew he was so honest a man, he would not so much as converse with me, or so much as know me, if he met me in the street.

In the next place, as he had entirely neglected me, which, in short, is the worst way of slighting a woman, and had given no answer to my letters, I did not know but he might be the same man still; so I resolved, that I could do nothing in it, unless some fairer opportunity presented, which might make my way clearer to me; for I was determined he should have no room to put any more slights upon me.

In these thoughts I passed away near three months; till at last, being impatient, I resolved to send for Amy to come over, and tell her how things stood, and that I would do nothing till she came. Amy, in answer, sent me word she would come away with all speed, but begged of me that I would enter into no engagement with him, or anybody, till she arrived; but still keeping me in the dark, as to the thing itself which she had to say, at which I was heartily vexed, for many reasons.

But while all these things were transacting, and letters and answers passed between Amy and I a little slower than usual, at which I was not so well pleased as I used to be with Amy's dispatch; I say, in this time the following scene opened.

It was one afternoon, about four o'clock, my friendly Quaker and I sitting in her chamber up stairs, and very cheerful, chatting together (for she was the best company in the world), when somebody ringing hastily at the door, and no servant just then in the way, she ran down herself to the door, when a gentleman appears, with a footman attending, and making some apologies, which she did not thoroughly understand, he speaking but broken English; he asked to speak with me, by the very same name that I went by in her house, which, by the way, was not the name that he had known me by.

She, with very civil language, in her way, brought him into a very handsome parlour below stairs, and said she would go and see whether the person who lodged in her house owned that name, and he should hear farther.

I was a little surprised, even before I knew anything of who it was, my mind foreboding the thing as it happened (whence that arises, let the naturalists explain to us); but I was frightened, and ready to die, when my Quaker came up all gay and crowing. "There," says she, "is the Dutch French merchant come to see thee." I could not speak one word to her, nor stir off my chair, but sat as motionless as a statue. She talked a thousand pleasant things to me, but they made no impression on me; at last she pulled me and teased me, "Come, come," says she, "be thyself, and rouse up, I must go down again to him; what shall I say to him?"—"Say," said I, "that you have no such body in the house."—"That I cannot do," says she, "because it is not the truth; besides, I have owned thou art above; come, come, go down with me."—"Not for a thousand guineas," said I.—"Well," says she, "I'll go and tell him thou wilt come quickly." So, without giving me time to answer her, away she goes.

A million of thoughts circulated in my head while she was gone, and what to do I could not tell; I saw no remedy but I must speak with him, but would have given 500*l.* to have shunned it; yet had I shunned it, perhaps then I would have given 500*l.* again that I had seen him. Thus fluctuating and unconcluding were my thoughts, what I so earnestly desired I declined when it offered itself; and what now I pretended to decline, was nothing but what I had been at the expense of 40*l.* or 50*l.* to send Amy to France for; and even without any view, or indeed any rational expectation of bringing it to pass; and what for half a year before I was so uneasy about that I could not be quiet night or day, till Amy proposed to go over to inquire after him. In short, my thoughts were all confused, and in the utmost disorder. I had once refused and rejected him, and I repented it heartily; then I had taken ill his silence, and in my mind rejected him again, but had repented that too. Now I had stooped so low as to send after him into France, which if he had known, perhaps, he had never come after me; and should I reject him a third time! On the other hand, he had repented too in his turn, perhaps, and not knowing how I had acted either in stooping to send in search after him, or in the wickeder part of my life, was come over hither to seek me again; and I might take him, perhaps, with the same advantages as I might have done before, and would I now be backward to see him! Well, while I was in this hurry, my friend the Quaker comes up again, and perceiving the confusion I was in, she runs to her closet, and fetched me a little pleasant cordial, but I would not taste it. "O," says she, "I understand thee, be not uneasy, I'll give thee something shall take off all the smell of it; if he kisses thee a thousand times, he shall be no wiser." I thought with myself, thou art perfectly acquainted with affairs of this nature, I think you must govern me now, so I began to incline to go down with her; upon that I took the cordial, and she gave me a kind of spicy preserve after it, whose flavour was so strong, and yet so deliciously pleasant, that it would cheat the nicest smelling, and it left not the least taint of the cordial on the breath.

Well, after this (though with some hesitation still) I went down a pair of back stairs with her, and into a dining room, next to the parlour in which he was; but there I halted, and desired she would let me consider of it a little. "Well, do so," says she, and left me with more readiness than she did before; "do consider, and I'll come to thee again."

Though I hung back with an awkwardness that was really unfeigned, yet when she so readily left me, I thought it was not so kind, and I began to think she should have pressed me still on to it;

so foolishly backward are we to the thing which of all the world we most desire; mocking ourselves with a feigned reluctance, when the negative would be death to us; but she was too cunning for me, for while I, as it were, blamed her in my mind, for not carrying me to him, though at the same time I appeared backward to see him; on a sudden she unlocks the folding doors, which looked into the next parlour, and throwing them open, "There," says she (ushering him in) "is the same person who, I suppose, thou inquirest for;" and the same moment, with a kind of decency, she retired, and that so swift, that she would not give us leave hardly to know which way she went.

I stood up, but was confounded with a sudden inquiry in my thoughts, how I should receive him? and with a resolution as swift as lightning, in answer to it, said to myself, it shall be coldly; so, on a sudden, I put on an air of stiffness and ceremony, and held it for about two minutes; but it was with great difficulty.

He restrained himself too, on the other hand, came towards me gravely, and saluted me in form; but it was, it seems, upon his supposing the Quaker was behind him, whereas she, as I said, understood things too well, and had retired, as if she had vanished, that we might have full freedom; for, as she said afterwards, she supposed we had seen one another before, though it might have been a great while ago.

Whatever stiffness I had put on my behaviour to him, I was surprised in my mind, and angry at his, and began to wonder what kind of a ceremonious meeting it was to be. However, after he perceived the woman was gone, he made a kind of a hesitation, looking a little round him, "Indeed," said he, "I thought the gentlewoman was not withdrawn," and with that he took me in his arms, and kissed me three or four times; but I, that was prejudiced to the last degree with the coldness of his first salutes, when I did not know the cause of it, could not be thoroughly cleared of the prejudice, though I did know the cause; and thought that even his return, and taking me in his arms, did not seem to have the same ardour with which he used to receive me, and this made me behave to him awkwardly; and I know not how, for a good while; but this by the way.

He began with a kind of an ecstasy upon the subject of his finding me out; how it was possible that he should have been four years in England, and had used all the ways imaginable, and could never so much as have the least intimation of me, or of any one like me; and that it was now above two years that he had despaired of it, and had given over all inquiry; and that now he should chop upon me, as it were, unlooked and unsought for.

I could easily have accounted for his not finding me, if I but set down the detail of my real retirement; but I gave it a new, and indeed a truly hypocritical turn. I told him that any one that knew the manner of life I led might account for his not finding me; and that the retreat I had taken up would have rendered it a hundred thousand to one odds that he ever found me at all; that as I had abandoned all conversation, taken up another name, lived remote from London, and had not preserved one acquaintance in it, it was no wonder he had not met with me; that even my dress would let him see that I did not desire to be known by anybody.

Then he asked if I had not received some letters from him? I told him, No, he had not thought fit to give me the civility of an answer to the last I wrote to him; and he could not suppose I should expect a return, after a silence in a case where I had laid myself so low, and exposed myself in a manner I had never been used to; that indeed I had never sent for any letters after that to the place where I had ordered his to be directed; and that being so justly, as I thought, punished for my weakness, I had nothing to do but to repent of being a fool, after I had strictly adhered to a just principle before. That however, as what I did was rather from motives of gratitude than from real weakness, however it might be construed by him, I had the satisfaction in myself of having fully discharged the debt. I added, that I had not wanted occasions of all the seeming advancements which the pretended felicity of a marriage life was usually set off with, and might have been what I desired not to name; but that however low I had stooped to him, I had maintained the dignity of female liberty against all the attacks, either of pride or avarice; and that I had been infinitely obliged to him for giving me an opportunity to discharge the only obligation that endangered me without subjecting me to the consequence; and that I hoped he was satisfied I had paid the debt, by offering myself to be chained, but was infinitely debtor to him another way for letting me remain free.

He was so confounded at this discourse that he knew not what to say, and for a good while he stood mute indeed; but recovering himself a little, he said, "I run out into a discourse he hoped was over and forgotten, and he did not intend to revive it; that he knew I had not had his letters, for that when he first came to England he had been at the place to which they were directed, and found them all lying there but one; and that the people had not known how to deliver them; that he thought to have had a direction there how to find me, but had the mortification to be told that they did not so much as know who I was; that he was under a great disappointment, and that I ought to know, in answer to all my resentments, that he had done a long and (he hoped) a sufficient penance for the slight that I had supposed he had put upon me; that it was true (and I could not suppose any other) that upon the repulse I had given him in a case so circumstanced as his was, and after such earnest entreaties, and such offers as he had made me, he went away with a mind heartily grieved and full of resentment; that he had looked back on the crime he had committed with some regret, but on the cruelty of my treatment of the poor infant I went with at that time with the utmost detestation; and that this made him unable to send an agreeable answer to me; for which reason he had sent none at all for some time; but that in about six or seven months those resentments wearing off by the return of his affection to me, and his concern for the poor child—" there he stopped, and indeed tears stood in his eyes, while in a parenthesis he only added, and to this minute he did not know whether it was dead or alive; he then went on—" Those resentments wearing off, he sent me several letters, I think he said seven or eight, but received no answer; that then his business obliging him to go to Holland, he came to England as in his way, but found, as above, that his letters had not been called for, but that he left them at the house after paying the postage of them; and going then back to France, he was yet uneasy, and could not refrain the knight-errantry of coming to England again to seek me, though he knew neither where, or of who, to inquire for me, being disappointed in all his inquiries before; that he had yet taken up his residence here, firmly believing that one time or other he should meet me, or hear of me, and that some kind chance would at last throw him in my way; that he had lived thus above four years, and though his hopes were vanished, yet he had not any thoughts of removing any more in the world, unless it should be at last, as it is with other old men, he might have some inclination to go home to die in his own country, but that he had not thought of it yet; that if I would consider all these steps, I would find some reasons to forget his first resentments, and to think that penance, as he called it, which he had undergone in search of me an amende honorable, in reparation of the affront given to the kindness of my letter of invitation; and that we might at last make ourselves some satisfaction on both sides for the mortification past."

I confess I could not hear all this without being moved very much, and yet I continued a little stiff and formal, too, a good while. I told him that before I could give him any reply to the rest of his discourse, I ought to give him the satisfaction of telling him that his son was alive, and that indeed, since I saw him so concerned about it, and mention it with such affection, I was sorry that I had not found out some way or other to let him know it sooner; but that I thought, after his slighting the mother, as above, he had summed up his affection to the child, in the letter he had wrote to me about providing for it; and that he had, as other fathers often do, looked upon it as a birth which, being out of the way, was to be forgotten, as its beginning was to be repented of; that in providing sufficiently for it, he had done more than all such fathers used to do, and might be well satisfied with it.

He answered me, that he should have been very glad if I had been so good but to have given him the satisfaction of knowing the poor unfortunate creature was yet alive, and he would have taken some care of it upon himself, and particularly, by owning it for a legitimate child, which, where nobody had known to the contrary, would have taken off the infamy which would otherwise cleave to it; and so the child should not, itself, have known anything of its own disaster, but that he feared it was now too late.

He added, that I might see by all his conduct since that what unhappy mistake drew him into the thing at first; and that he would have been very far from doing the injury to me, or being instrumental to add une miserable (that was his word) to the world, if he had not been drawn into it by the hopes he had of making me his own; but that, if it was possible to rescue the child from the consequences of its unhappy birth, he hoped I would give him leave to do it, and he would let me see that he had both means and affection still to do it; and that, notwithstanding all the misfortunes that had befallen him, nothing that belonged to him, especially by a mother he had such a concern for as he had for me, should ever want what he was in a condition to do for it.

I could not hear this without being sensibly touched with it; I was ashamed that he should show that he had more real affection for the child, though he had never seen it in his life, than I that bore it, for indeed I did not love the child, nor love to see it; and though I had provided for it, yet I did it by Amy's hand, and had not seen it above twice in four years, being privately resolved that when it grew up it should not be able to call me mother.

However I told him the child was taken care of, and that he need not be anxious about it, unless he suspected that I had less affection for it than he that had never seen it in his life; that he knew what I had promised him to do for it, namely, to give it the 1,000 pistoles which I had offered him, and which he had declined; that I assured him I had made my will, and that I had left it 5,000*l.* and the interest of it till he should come of age, if I died before that time; that I would still be as good as that to it; but if he had a mind to take it from me into his government I would not be against it; and to satisfy him that I would perform what I said, I would cause the child to be delivered to him, and the 5,000*l.* also for its support, depending upon it that he should show himself a father to it by what I saw of his affection to it now.

I had observed that he had hinted two or three times in his discourse his having had misfortunes in the world, and I was a little surprised at the expression, especially at the repeating it so often, but I took no notice of that part yet.

He thanked me for my kindness to the child with a tenderness which showed the sincerity of all he had said before, and which increased the regret with which, as I said, I looked back on the little affection I had shown to the poor child. He told me he did not desire to take him from me, but so as to introduce him into the world as his own, which he could still do, having lived absent from his other children (for he had two sons and a daughter which were brought up at Nimeguen in Holland with a sister of his) so long that he might very well send another son of ten years old to be bred up with them, and suppose his mother to be dead or alive as he found occasion; and that as I had resolved to do so handsomely for the child, he would add to it something considerable, though, having had some great disappointments (repeating the words), he could not do for it as he would otherwise have done.

I then thought myself obliged to take notice of his having so often mentioned his having met with disappointments. I told him I was very sorry to hear he had met with anything afflicting to him in the world; that I would not have anything belonging to me add to his loss, or weaken him in what he might do for his other children; and that I would not agree to his having the child away, though the proposal was infinitely to the child's advantage, unless he would promise me that the whole expense should be mine, and that if he did not think 5,000*l.* enough for the child I would give it more.

We had so much discourse upon this and the old affairs, that it took up all our time at his first visit. I was a little importunate with him to tell me how he came to find me out, but he put it off for that time, and only obtaining my leave to visit me again, he went away; and indeed my heart was so full of what he had said already that I was glad when he went away. Sometimes I was full of tenderness and affection for him, and especially when he expressed himself so earnestly and passionately about the child; other times I was crowded with doubts about his circumstances; sometimes I was terrified with apprehensions lest if I should come into a close correspondence with him he should in any way come to hear what kind of life I had led at Pallmall and in other places, and it might make me miserable afterwards; from which last thought I concluded that I had better repulse him again than receive him. All these thoughts and many more crowded in so fast, I say, upon me, that I wanted to give vent to them and get rid of him, and was very glad when he was gone away.

We had several meetings after this, in which still we had so many preliminaries to go through that we scarce ever bordered upon the main subject; once, indeed, he said something of it, and I put it off with a kind of jest. "Alas!" says I, "those things are out of the question now; 'tis almost two ages since those things were talked between us," says I. "You see I am grown an old woman since that." Another time he gave a little push at it again, and I laughed again. "Why, what dost thou talk of?" said I, in a formal way, "Dost thou not see I am turned Quaker? I cannot speak of those things now." "Why," says he, "the Quakers marry as well as other people, and love one another as well; besides," says he, "the Quaker's dress does not ill become you," and so jested with me again, and so it went on for a third time; however, I began to be kind to him in process of time, as they call it, and we grew very intimate; and had not the following accident unluckily intervened I had certainly married him, or consented to marry him, the very next time he had asked me.

I had long waited for a letter from Amy, who, it seems, was just at that time gone to Rouen the second time to make her inquiries about him; and I received a letter from her at this unhappy juncture, which gave me the following account of my business.

I. That for my gentleman whom I had now, as I may say, in my arms, she said he had been gone from Paris, as I have hinted, having met with some great losses and misfortunes; that he had been in Holland on that very account, whither he had also carried his children; that he was after that settled for some time at Rouen; that she had been at Rouen, and found there (by a mere accident), from a Dutch skipper, that he was at London, and had been there above three years; that he was to be found upon the Exchange, on the French Walk, and that he lodged at St Lawrence Pountney's lane, and the like; so Amy said she supposed I might soon find him out, but that she doubted he was poor, and not worth looking after. This she did because of the next clause, which the jade had most mind to on many accounts.

II. That as to the Prince ———; that, as above, he was gone into Germany, where his estate lay; that he had quitted the French service, and lived retired; that she had seen his gentleman, who remained at Paris to solicit his arrears, &c.; that he had given her an account how his lord had employed him to inquire for me, and find me out, as above, and told her what pains he had taken to find me; that he had understood that I was gone to England; that he once had orders to go to England to find me; that his lord had resolved, if he could have found me, to have called me a countess, and so have married me and carried me into Germany with him; and that his commission was still to assure me that the prince would marry me if I would come to him, and that he would send him an account that he had found me, and did not doubt but he would have orders to come over to England to attend me in a figure suitable to my quality.

Amy, an ambitious jade, who knew my weakest part, namely, that I loved great things, and that I loved to be flattered and courted, said abundance of kind things upon this occasion, which she knew were suitable to me, and would prompt my vanity; and talked big of the prince's gentleman having orders to come over to me, with a procuration to marry me by proxy (as princes usually do in like cases), and to furnish me with an equipage, and I know not how many fine things; but told me withal that she had not yet let him know that she belonged to me still, or that she knew where to find me, or to write me; because she was willing to see the bottom of it, and whether it was a reality or a gasconade. She had indeed told him that if he had any such commission she would endeavour to find me out, but no more.

III. For the Jew, she assured me, that she had not been able to come at a certainty what was become of him, or in what part of the world he was; but that thus much she had learned from good hands, that he had committed a crime, in being concerned in a design to rob a rich banker at Paris; and that he was fled, and had not being heard of there for above six years.

IV. For that of my husband the brewer, she learned that being commanded into the field upon an occasion of some action in Flanders, he was wounded at the battle of Mons, and died of his wounds in the hospital of the Invalids; so there was an end of my four inquiries, which I sent her over to make.

This account of the Prince, and the return of his affection to me, with all the flattering great things which seemed to come along with it; and especially as they came gilded, and set out by my maid Amy; I say this account of the Prince came to me in a very unlucky hour, and in the very crisis of my affairs.

The merchant and I had entered into close conferences upon the grand affair. I had left off talking my platonic, and of my independency, and being a free woman as before; and he having cleared up my doubts too, as to his circumstances, and the misfortunes he had spoken of, I had gone so far, that we had begun to consider where we should live, and in what figure, what equipage, what house, and the like.

I had made some harangues upon the delightful retirement of a country life, and how we might enjoy ourselves effectually without the incumbrances of business and the world; but all this was grimace, and purely because I was afraid to make any public appearance in the world, for fear some impertinent person of quality should chop upon me again, and cry out, "Roxana, Roxana, by —," with an oath, as had been done before.

My merchant, bred to business, and used to converse among men of business, could hardly tell how to live without it; at least it appeared he would be like a fish out of water, uneasy and dying; but however he joined with me, only argued that we might live as near London as we could, that he might sometimes come to 'Change, and hear how the world should go abroad, and how it fared with his friends and his children.

I answered, that if he chose still to embarrass himself with business, I supposed it would be more to his satisfaction to be in his own country, where his family was so well known, and where his children also were.

He smiled at the thoughts of that, and let me know, that he should be very willing to embrace such an offer, but that he could not expect it of me, to whom England was, to be sure, so naturalized now, as that it would be carrying me out of my native country, which he would not desire by any means, however agreeable it might be to him.

I told him he was mistaken in me; that as I had told him so much of a married state being a captivity, and the family being a house of bondage, that when I married I expected to be but an upper-servant; so if I did, notwithstanding, submit to it, I hoped he should see I knew how to act the servant's part, and do everything to oblige my master; that if I did not resolve to go with him wherever he desired to go, he might depend I would never leave him; "and did I not," said I, "offer myself to go with you to the East Indies?"

All this while this was indeed but a copy of my countenance; for as my circumstances would not admit my stay at London, at least not so as to appear publicly, I resolved, if I took him, to live remote in the country, or go out of England with him.

But in an evil hour, just now came Amy's letter, in the very middle of all these discourses; and the fine things she had said about the prince, began to make strange work with me; the notion of being a princess, and going over to live where all that happened here would have been quite sunk out of knowledge as well as out of memory (conscience excepted) was mighty taking; the thoughts of being surrounded with domestics, honoured with titles, be called her Highness, and live in all the splendour of a court, and what was still more, in the arms of a man of such rank, and who I knew loved and valued me; all this, in a word, dazzled my eyes, turned my head, and I was as truly crazed and distracted for about a fortnight as most of the people in Bedlam, though perhaps not quite so far gone.

When my gentleman came to me the next time, I had no notion of him, I wished I had never received him at all; in short, I resolved to have no more to say to him, so I feigned myself indisposed; and though I did come down to him, and speak to him a little, yet I let him see that I was so ill that I was (as we say) no company, and that it would be kind in him to give me leave to quit him for that time.

The next morning he sent a footman to inquire how I did; and I let him know I had a violent cold, and was very ill with it; two days after he came again, and I let him see me again, but feigned myself so hoarse that I could not speak to be heard, and that it was painful to me but to whisper; and, in a word, I held him in this suspense near three weeks.

During this time I had a strange elevation upon my mind; and the prince, or the spirit of him, had such a possession of me, that I spent most of this time in the realizing all the great things of a life with the prince to my mind, pleasing my fancy with the grandeur I was supposing myself to enjoy, and withall, wickedly studying in what manner to put off this gentleman, and be rid of him for ever.

I cannot but say that sometimes the baseness of the action struck hard with me; the honour and sincerity with which he had always treated me, and, above all, the fidelity he had shewed me at Paris, and that I owed my life to him; I say, all these stared in my face, and I frequently argued with myself upon the obligation I was under to him, and how base would it be, now too, after many obligations and engagements, to cast him off.

But the title of highness, and of a princess, and all those fine things, as they came in, weighed down all this; and the sense of gratitude vanished as if it had been a shadow.

At other times I considered the wealth I was mistress of; that I was able to live like a princess, though not a princess; and that my merchant (for he had told me all the affair of his misfortunes) was far from being poor, or even mean; that together, we were able to make up an estate of between three and four thousand pounds a year, which was in itself equal to some princes abroad. But though this was true, yet the name of princess, and the flutter of it, in a word, the pride weighed them down; and all these arguings generally ended to the disadvantage of my merchant; so that, in short, I resolved to drop him, and give him final answer at his next coming; namely, that something had happened in my affairs, which had caused me to alter my measures unexpected; and, in a word, to desire him to trouble himself no further.

I think verily this rude treatment of him, was for some time the effect of a violent fermentation in my blood; for the very motion which the steady contemplation of my fancied greatness had put my spirits into, had thrown me into a kind of fever, and I scarce knew what I did.

I have wondered since that it did not make me mad; nor do I now think it strange to hear of those who have been quite lunatic with their pride, that fancied themselves queens and empresses, and have made their attendants serve them upon the knee, given visitors their hand to kiss, and the like; for certainly if pride will not turn the brain nothing can.

However, the next time my gentleman came I had not courage enough, or not ill-nature enough, to treat him in the rude manner I had resolved to do, and it was very well I did not; for soon after I had another letter from Amy, in which was the mortifying news, and indeed surprising to me, that my prince (as I with a secret pleasure had called him) was very much hurt by a bruise he had received in hunting and engaging with a wild boar; a cruel and desperate sport, which the noblemen in Germany, it seems, much delight in.

This alarmed me indeed, and the more, because Amy wrote me word that his gentleman was gone away express to him, not without apprehensions that he should find his master was dead before his coming home; but that he (the gentleman) had promised her that so soon as he arrived he would send back the same courier to her with an account of his master's health, and of the main affair; and that he had obliged Amy to stay at Paris fourteen days for his return; she having promised him before to make it her business to go to England and to find me out for his lord if he sent her such orders; and he was to send her a bill for fifty pistoles for her journey. So Amy told me she waited for the answer.

This was a blow to me several ways; for, first, I was in a state of uncertainty as to his person, whether he was alive or dead; and I was not unconcerned in that part, I assure you; for I had an inexpressible affection remaining for his person, besides the degree to which it was revived by the view of a firmer interest in him; but this was not all, for in losing him I for ever lost the prospect of all the gaiety and glory that had made such an impression upon my imagination.

In this state of uncertainty, I say, by Amy's letter, I was like still to remain another fortnight; and had I now continued the resolution of using my merchant in the rude manner I once intended, I had made perhaps a sorry piece of work of it indeed, and it was very well my heart failed me, as it did.

However, I treated him with a great many shuffles, and feigned stories to keep him off from any closer conferences than we had already had, that I might act afterwards as occasion might offer, one way or other; but that which mortified me most was, that Amy did not write, though the fourteen days were expired. At last, to my great surprise, when I was with the utmost impatience looking out at the window, expecting the postman that usually brought the foreign letters, I say, I was agreeably surprised to see a coach come to the yard-gate where we lived, and my woman, Amy, alight out of it and come towards the door, having the coachman bringing several bundles after her.

I flew like lightning down stairs to speak to her, but was soon damped with her news. "Is the prince alive or dead, Amy?" says I. She spoke coldly and slightly: "He is alive, Madam," said she, but it is not much matter; I had as liev he had been dead." So we went up stairs again to my chamber, and there we began a serious discourse of the whole matter.

First, she told me a long story of his being hurt by a wild boar, and of the condition he was reduced to, so that every one expected he should die, the anguish of the wound having thrown him into a fever, with abundance of circumstances too long to relate here; how he recovered of that extreme danger, but continued very weak; how the gentleman had been homme de parole, and had sent back the courier as punctually as if it had been to the king; that he had given a long account of his lord, and of his illness and recovery; but the sum of the matter, as to me, was, that as to the lady, his lord was turned penitent, was under some vows for his recovery, and could not think any more on that affair; and especially, the lady being gone, and that it had not been offered to her, so there was no breach of honour, but that his lord was sensible of the good offices of Mrs Amy, and had sent her the fifty pistoles for her trouble, as if she had really gone the journey.

I was, I confess, hardly able to bear the first surprise of this disappointment. Amy saw it, and gapes out (as was her way), "Law, madam! never be concerned at it; you see he is gotten among the priests, and I suppose they have saucily imposed some penance upon him, and it may be, sent him of an errand barefoot to some Madonna or Notredame, or other; and he is off of his amours for the present. I'll warrant you he'll be as wicked again as ever he was when he is got thorough well, and gets but out of their hands again. I hate this out-o'-season repentance; what occasion had he, in his repentance, to be off of taking a good wife? I should have been glad to see you have been a princess, and all that; but if it can't be, never afflict yourself; you are rich enough to be a princess to yourself; you don't want him, that's the best of it."

Well, I cried for all that, and was heartily vexed, and that a great while; but as Amy was always at my elbow, and always jogging it out of my head with her mirth and her wit, it wore off again.

Then I told Amy all the story of my merchant, and how he had found me out when I was in such a concern to find him; how it was true that he lodged in St Lawrence Pountney's lane; and how I had had all the story of his misfortunes, which she had heard of, in which he had lost above 8,000*l.* sterling; and that he had told me frankly of it before she had sent me any account of it, or at least before I had taken any notice that I had heard of it.

Amy was very joyful at that part. "Well, madam, then," says Amy, "what need you value the story of the prince; and going I know not whither into Germany to lay your bones in another world, and learn the devil's language called High Dutch? You are better here by half," says Amy. "Law, madam," says she, "why, are you not as rich as Crassus?"

Well, it was a great while still before I could bring myself off of this fancied sovereignty; and I that was so willing once to be mistress to a king, was now ten thousand times more fond of being wife to a prince.

So fast a hold has pride and ambition upon our minds that when once it gets admission, nothing is so chimerical, but, under this possession, we can form ideas in our fancy, and realize them to our imagination. Nothing can be so ridiculous as the simple steps we take in such cases; a man or a woman becomes a mere malade imaginaire, and I believe may as easily die with grief, or run mad with joy (as the affair in his fancy appears right or wrong), as if all was real, and actually under the management of the person.

I had indeed two assistants to deliver me from this snare, and these were, first, Amy, who knew my disease, but was able to do nothing as to the remedy; the second, the merchant, who really brought the remedy, but knew nothing of the distemper.

I remember when all these disorders were upon my thoughts, in one of the visits my friend the merchant made me, he took notice that he perceived I was under some unusual disorder; he believed, he said, that my distemper, whatever it was, lay much in my head, and it being summer weather, and very hot, proposed to me to go a little way into the air.

I started at his expression: "What," says I, "do you think then that I am crazed? You should then propose a madhouse for my cure." "No, no," says he, "I do not mean anything like that; I hope the head may be distempered and not the brain." Well, I was too sensible that he was right, for I knew I had acted a strange wild kind of part with him; but he insisted upon it, and pressed me to go into the country. I took him short again, "What need you," says I, "send me out of your way? It is in your power to be less troubled with me, and with less inconvenience to us both."

He took that ill, and told me I used to have a better opinion of his sincerity; and desired to know what he had done to forfeit my charity. I mention this only to let you see how far I had gone in my measures of quitting him, that is to say, how near I was of showing him how base, ungrateful, and how vilely I could act; but I found I had carried the jest far enough, and that a little matter might have made him sick of me again, as he was before; so I began, by little and little, to change my way of talking to him, and to come to discourse to the purpose again, as we had done before.

A while after this, when we were very merry, and talking familiarly together, he called me with an air of particular satisfaction, his princess. I coloured at the word, for it indeed touched me to the quick; but he knew nothing of the reason of my being touched with it: "What d'ye mean by that?" said I. "Nay," says he, "I mean nothing but that you are a princess to me." "Well," says I, "as to that I am content, and yet I could tell you I might have been a princess if I would have quitted you, and believe I could be so still."—"It is not in my power to make you a princess," says he, "but I can easily make you a lady here in England, and a countess too if you will go out of it."

I heard both with a great deal of satisfaction, for my pride remained though it had been baulked, and I thought with myself that this proposal would make some amends for the loss of the title that had so tickled my imagination another way, and I was impatient to understand what he meant; but I would not ask him by any means; so it passed off for that time.

When he was gone I told Amy what he had said, and Amy was as impatient to know the manner how it could be as I was; but the next time (perfectly unexpected by me) he told me that he had accidentally mentioned a thing to me last time he was with me, having not the least thought of the thing itself; but not knowing but such a thing might be of some weight to me, and that it might bring me respect among people where I might appear, he had thought since of it, and was resolved to ask me about it.

I made light of it, and told him that as he knew I had chosen a retired life, it was of no value to me to be called a lady or countess either; but that if he intended to drag me, as I might call it, into the world again, perhaps it might be agreeable to him; but besides that, I could not judge of the thing, because I did not understand how either of them was to be done.

He told me that money purchased titles of honour in almost all parts of the world; though money could not give principles of honour, they must come by birth and blood; that however titles sometimes assist to elevate the soul, and to infuse generous principles into the mind, and especially where there was a good foundation laid in the persons; that he hoped we should neither of us misbehave if we came to it; and that as we know how to wear a title without undue elevations, so it might fit as well upon us as on another; that as to England, he had nothing to do but to get an act of naturalization in his favour, and he knew where to purchase a patent for baronet, that is to say, to have the honour and title transferred to him; but if I intended to go abroad with him, he had a nephew, the son of his elder brother, who had the title of count, with the estate annexed, which was but small, and that he had frequently offered to make it over to him for a thousand pistoles, which was not a great deal of money, and considering it was in the family already, he would, upon my being willing, purchase it immediately.

I told him I liked the last; but then I would not let him buy it unless he would let me pay the thousand pistoles. "No, no," says he, "I refused a thousand pistoles that I had more right to have accepted than that, and you shall not be at so much expense now."—"Yes," says I, "you did refuse it, and perhaps repented it afterwards." "I never complained," says he. "But I did," says I, "and often repented it for you."—"I do not understand you," says he. "Why," says I, "I repented that I suffered you to refuse it." "Well, well," said he, "we may talk of that hereafter when you shall resolve which part of the world you will make your settled residence in." Here he talked very handsomely to me, and for a good while together; how it had been his lot to live all his days out of his native country, and to be often shifting and changing the situation of his affairs; and that I myself had not always had a fixed abode, but that now, as neither of us was very young, he fancied I would be for taking up our abode where, if possible, we might remove no more; that as to his part, he was of that opinion entirely, only with this exception, that the choice of the place should be mine, for that all places in the world were alike to him, only with the single addition, namely, that I was with him.

I heard him with a great deal of pleasure, as well for his being willing to give me the choice, as for that I resolved to live abroad, for the reason I have mentioned already, namely, lest I should at any time be known in England, and all that story of Roxana, and the balls, should come out; as also I was not a little tickled with the satisfaction of being still a countess, though I could not be a princess.

I told Amy all this story, for she was still my privy-councillor; but when I asked her opinion, she made me laugh heartily. "Now, which of the two shall I take, Amy?" said I; "shall I be a lady, that is, a baronet's lady in England, or a countess in Holland?" The ready-witted jade, that knew the pride of my temper too, almost as well as I did myself, answered (without hesitation), "both, madam: which of them?" says she (repeating the words), "why not both of them? and then you will be really a princess; for sure, to be a lady in English, and a countess in Dutch, may make princess in High Dutch." Upon the whole, though Amy was in jest, she put the thought into my head, and I resolved, that, in short, I would be both of them, which I managed as you shall hear.

First, I seemed to resolve that I would live and settle in England, only with this condition, namely, that I would not live in London. I pretended that it would choke me up; that I wanted breath when I was in London, but anywhere else I would be satisfied; and then I asked him whether any seaport town in England would not suit him? because I knew, though he seemed to leave off, he would always love to be among business, and conversing with men of business; and I named several places, either nearest for business with France or with Holland; as Dovor, or Southampton, for the first; and Ipswich, or Yarmouth, or Hull, for the last; but I took care that we would resolve upon nothing; only by this it seemed to be certain that we should live in England.

It was time now to bring things to a conclusion, and so in about six weeks' time more we settled all preliminaries; and, among the rest, he let me know that he should have the bill for his naturalization passed time enough, so that he would be (as he called it) an Englishman before we married. That was soon perfected, the parliament being then sitting, and several other foreigners joining in the said bill to save the expense.

It was not above three or four days after, but that, without giving me the least notice that he had so much as been about the patent for baronet, he brought it to me in a fine embroidered bag, and saluting by the name of my Lady — (joining his own surname to it), presented it to me with his picture set with diamonds, and at the same time gave me a breast jewel worth a thousand pistoles, and the next morning we were married. Thus I put an end to all the intriguing part of my life—a life full of prosperous wickedness; the reflections upon which were so much the more afflicting, as the time had been spent in the grossest crimes, which, the more I looked back upon, the more black and horrid they appeared, effectually drinking up all the comfort and satisfaction which I might otherwise have taken in that part of life which was still before me.

The first satisfaction, however, that I took in the new condition I was in, was in reflecting that at length the life of crime was over, and that I was like a passenger coming back from the Indies, who having, after many years' fatigue and hurry in business, gotten a good estate, with innumerable difficulties and hazards, is arrived safe at London with all his effects, and has the pleasure of saying he shall never venture upon the seas any more.

When we were married, we came back immediately to my lodgings (for the church was but just by), and we were so privately married, that none but Amy, and my friend the Quaker, was acquainted with it. As soon as we came into the house, he took me in his arms, and kissing me, "Now you are my own," says he, "O! that you had been so good to have done this eleven years ago."—"Then," said I, "you, perhaps, would have been tired of me long ago; it is much better now, for now all our happy days are to come; besides," said I, "I should not have been half so rich," but that I said to myself, for there was no letting him into that reason of it. "O!" says he "I should not have been tired of you; but having the satisfaction of your company, it had saved me that unlucky blow at Paris, which was a dead loss to me of above eight thousand pistoles, and all the fatigues of so many years' hurry and business;" and then he added, "but I'll make you pay for it all now I have you." I started a little at the words. "Ay," said I, "do you threaten already? Pray, what d'ye mean by that?" and began to look a little grave.

"I'll tell you," says he, "very plainly what I mean;" and still he held me fast in his arms. "I intend from this time never to trouble myself with any more business, so I shall never get one shilling for you more than I have already, all that you will lose one way; next, I intend not to trouble myself with any of the care or trouble of managing what either you have for me, or what I have to add to it; but you shall e'en take it all upon yourself, as the wives do in Holland, so you will pay for it that way too, for all the drudgery shall be yours; thirdly, I intend to condemn you to the constant bondage of my impertinent company, for I shall tie you like a pedlar's pack at my back, I shall scarce ever be from you; for, I am sure I can take delight in nothing else in this world."—"Very well," says I, "but I am pretty heavy, I hope you'll set me down sometimes when you are a weary."—"As for that," says he, "tire me if you can."

This was all jest and allegory; but it was all true, in the moral of the fable, as you shall hear in its place. We were very merry the rest of the day, but without any noise or clutter; for he brought not one of his acquaintance or friends, either English or foreigner. The honest Quaker provided us a very noble dinner indeed, considering how few we were to eat it; and every day that week she did the like, and would, at last, have it be all at her own charge, which I was utterly averse to; first, because I knew her circumstances not to be very great, though not very low; and next, because she had been so true a friend, and so cheerful a comforter to me, ay, and counsellor too in all this affair, that I had resolved to make her a present that should be some help to her when all was over.

But to return to the circumstances of our wedding; after being very merry, as I have told you, Amy and the Quaker put us to bed, and the honest Quaker little thinking we had been a bed together eleven years before; nay, that was a secret which, as it happened, Amy herself did not know. Amy grinned and made faces, as if she had been pleased; but it came out in so many words when he was not by; the sum of her mumbling and muttering was, that this should have been done ten or a dozen years before; that it would signify little now; that was to say, in short, that her mistress was pretty near fifty, and too old to have any children. I chid her, the Quaker laughed, complimented me upon my not being so old as Amy pretended, that I could not be above forty, and might have a house full of children yet; but Amy and I too knew better than she how it was, for in short, I was old enough to have done breeding, however I looked; but I made her hold her tongue.

In the morning my Quaker landlady came and visited us before we were up, and made us eat cakes, and drink chocolate in bed; and then left us again and bid us take a nap upon it, which I believe we did; in short, she treated us so handsomely, and with such an agreeable cheerfulness, as well as plenty, as made it appear to me that Quakers may, and that this Quaker did understand good manners, as well as any other people.

I resisted her offer, however, of treating us for the whole week; and I opposed it so long that I saw evidently that she took it ill, and would have thought herself slighted if we had not accepted it; so I said no more, but let her go on, only told her I would be even with her, and so I was. However, for that week she treated us as she said she would, and did it so very fine, and with such a profusion of all sorts of good things, that the greatest burden to her was, how to dispose of things that were left; for she never let anything, how dainty, or however large, be so much as seen twice among us.

I had some servants indeed which helped her off a little; that is to say, two maids, for Amy was now a woman of business, not a servant, and eat always with us; I had also a coachman and a boy; my Quaker had a man-servant too, but had but one maid; but she borrowed two more of some of her friends for the occasion, and had a man-cook for dressing the victuals.

She was only at a loss for plate, which she gave me a whisper of; and I made Amy fetch a large strong box, which I had lodged in a safe hand, in which was all the fine plate which I had provided on a worse occasion, as is mentioned before, and I put it into the Quaker's hand, obliging her not to use it as mine but as her own, for a reason I shall mention presently.

I was now my Lady ———, and I must own, I was exceedingly pleased with it; 'twas so big, and so great to hear myself called her ladyship, and your ladyhip, and the like, that I was like the Indian king at Virginia, who having a house built for him by the English, and a lock put upon the door, would sit whole days together with the key in his hand, locking and unlocking, and double locking the door, with an unaccountable pleasure at the novelty; so I could have sat a whole day together to hear Amy talk to me, and call me your ladyship at every word; but after awhile the novelty wore off, and the pride of it abated, till at last truly I wanted the other title as much as I did that of ladyship before.

We lived this week in all the innocent mirth imaginable, and our good-humoured Quaker was so pleasant in her way, that it was particularly entertaining to us. We had no music at all, or dancing; only I now and then sung a French song to divert my spouse, who desired it, and the privacy of our mirth greatly added to the pleasure of it. I did not make many clothes for my wedding, having always a great many rich clothes by me, which, with a little altering for the fashion, were perfectly new. The next day he pressed me to dress, though we had no company; at last, jesting with him, I told him I believed I was able to dress me so, in one kind of dress that I had by me, that he would not know his wife when he saw her, especially if anybody else was by. "No!" he said, "that was impossible, and he longed to see that dress." I told him I would dress me in it, if he would promise me never to desire me to appear in it before company; he promised he would not, but wanted to know why too, as husbands, you know, are inquisitive creatures, and love to inquire after anything they think is kept from them; but I had an answer ready for him; "because," said I, "it is not a decent dress in this country, and would not look modest; neither, indeed, would it, for it was but one degree off from appearing in one's shift, but was the usual wear in the country where they were used." He was satisfied with my answer, and gave me his promise never to ask me to be seen in it before company. I then withdrew, taking only Amy and the Quaker with me; and Amy dressed me in my old Turkish habit which I danced in formerly, and &c. as before. The Quaker was charmed with the dress, and merrily said, "That if such a dress should come to be worn here, she should not know what to do, she should be tempted not to dress in the Quaker's way any more."

When all the dress was put on I loaded it with jewels, and in particular, I placed the large breast-jewel which he had given me of a thousand pistoles, upon the front of the Tyhaia, or head-dress, where it made a most glorious show indeed. I had my own diamond necklace on, and my hair was tout brilliant, all glittering with jewels.

His picture set with diamonds I had placed stitched to my vest, just, as might be supposed, upon my heart (which is the compliment in such cases amongst the Eastern people), and all being open at the breast, there was no room for anything of a jewel there. In this figure, Amy, holding the train of my robe, I came down to him. He was surprised, and perfectly astonished. He knew me, to be sure, because I had prepared, and because I told him of it before, because there was nobody there but the Quaker and Amy; but he by no means knew Amy, for she had dressed herself in the habit of a Turkish slave, being the garb of my little Turk, which I had at Naples as I have said; she had her neck and arms bare, was bareheaded, and her hair braided in a long tassel hanging down her back; but the jade could neither hold her countenance or her chattering tongue, so as to be concealed long.

Well, he was so charmed with this dress that he would have me sit and dine in it; but it was so thin, and so open before, and the weather being also sharp, that I was afraid of taking cold; however, the fire being enlarged, and the doors kept shut, I sat to oblige him, and he professed he never saw so fine a dress in his life. I afterwards told him that my husband (so he called the jeweller that was killed) bought it for me at Leghorn, with a young Turkish slave which I parted with at Paris; and that it was by the help of that slave that I learned how to dress in it, and how everything was to be worn, and many of the Turkish customs also, with some of their language. This story agreeing with the fact, only changing the person, was very natural, and so it went off with him; but there was good reason why I should not receive any company in this dress, that is to say, not in England; I need not repeat it, you will hear more of it.

But when I came abroad I frequently put it on, and upon two or three occasions danced in it, but always at his request.

We continued at the Quaker's lodgings for above a year; for now making as though it was difficult to determine where to settle in England to his satisfaction, unless in London, which was not to mine, I pretended to make him an offer, that to oblige him, I began to incline to go and live abroad with him; that I knew nothing could be more agreeable to him, and that as to me every place was alike; that as I had lived abroad without a husband so many years, it could be no burden to me to live abroad again, especially with him. Then we fell to straining our courtesies upon one another; he told me he was perfectly easy at living in England, and had squared all his affairs accordingly; for that as he told me he intended to give over all business in the world, as well the care of managing it as the concern about it, seeing we were both in condition neither to want it or to have it be worth our while; so I might see it was his intention, by his getting himself naturalized, and getting the patent of baronet, &c. Well, for all that, I told him I accepted his compliment, but I could not but know that his native country, where his children were breeding up, must be most agreeable to him, and that if I was of such value to him, I would be there then to enhance the rate of his satisfaction; that wherever he was would be a home to me, and any place in the world would be England to me if he was with me; and thus, in short, I brought him to give me leave to oblige him with going to live abroad, when in truth I could not have been perfectly easy at living in England unless I had kept constantly within doors; lest sometime or other the dissolute life I had lived here should have come to be known, and all those wicked things have been known too, which I now began to be very much ashamed of.

When we closed up our wedding week, in which our Quaker had been so very handsome to us, I told him how much I thought we were obliged to her for her generous carriage to us; how she had acted the kindest part through the whole, and how faithful a friend she had been to me upon all occasions; and then letting him know a little of her family unhappinesses, I proposed that I thought I not only ought to be grateful to her, but really to do something extraordinary for her, towards making her easy in her affairs. And I added, that I had no hangers-on that should trouble him, that there was nobody belonged to me but what was thoroughly provided for; and that if I did something for this honest woman that was considerable, it should be the last gift I would give to anybody in the world but Amy; and as for her, we were not a going to turn her adrift, but whenever anything offered for her, we would do as we saw cause; that, in the meantime, Amy was not poor, that she had saved together between seven and eight hundred pounds; by the way, I did not tell him how, and by what wicked ways she had got it, but that she had it; and that it was enough to let him know she would never be in want of us.

My spouse was exceedingly pleased with my discourse about the Quaker, made a kind of speech to me upon the subject of gratitude, told me it was one of the brightest parts of a gentlewoman, that it was so twisted with honesty, nay, and even with religion too, that he questioned whether either of them could be found where gratitude was not to be found; that in this act there was not only gratitude but charity; and that to make the charity still more Christian-like, the object too had real merit to attract it; he therefore agreed to the thing with all his heart, only would have had me let him pay it out of his effects.

I told him, as for that, I did not design, whatever I had said formerly, that we should have two pockets; and that though I had talked to him of being a free woman, and an independent, and the like, and he had offered and promised that I should keep all my own estate in my own hands; yet, that since I had taken him, I would even do as other honest wives did, where I thought fit to give myself, I should give what I had too; that if I reserved anything it should be only in case of mortality, and that I might give it to his children afterwards, as my own gift; and that, in short, if he thought fit to join stocks, we should see to-morrow morning what strength we could both make up in the world, and bringing it all together, consider before we resolved upon the place of removing, how we should dispose of what we had, as well as of ourselves. This discourse was too obliging, and he too much a man of sense not to receive it, as it was meant; he only answered, we would do in that as we should both agree; but the thing under our present care was to show not gratitude only, but charity and affection too, to our kind friend the Quaker; and the first word he spoke of was to settle a 1,000*l.* upon her for her life, that is to say, 60*l.* a year; but in such a manner as not to be in the power of any person to reach but herself. This was a great thing, and indeed showed the generous principles of my husband, and for that reason I mention it; but I thought that a little too much too, and particularly, because I had another thing in view for her about the plate, so I told him I thought if he gave her a purse with a hundred guineas as a present first, and then made her a compliment of 40*l.* per annum for her life, secured any such way as she should desire, it would be very handsome.

He agreed to that; and the same day in the evening, when we were just going to bed, he took my Quaker by the hand, and with a kiss, told her, that we had been very kindly treated by her from the beginning of this affair, and his wife before, as she (meaning me) had informed him; and that he thought himself bound to let her see that she had obliged friends who knew how to be grateful; that for his part of the obligation, he desired she would accept of that, for an acknowledgment in part only (putting the gold into her hand) and that his wife would talk with her about what further he had to say to her; and upon that, not giving her time hardly to say thank ye, away he went up stairs into our bedchamber, leaving her confused and not knowing what to say.

When he was gone, she began to make very handsome and obliging representations of her good will to us both, but that it was without expectation of reward; that I had given her several valuable presents before, and so indeed I had; for, besides the piece of linen which I gave her at first, I had given her a suit of damask table-linen, of the linen I bought for my balls, viz. three table-cloths and three dozen of napkins, and at another time I gave her a little necklace of gold beads, and the like; but this is by the way; but she mentioned them, I say, and how she was obliged by me on other occasions; that she was not in condition to show her gratitude in any other way, not being able to make a suitable return; and that now we took from her all opportunity to balance my former friendship, and I left her more in debt than she was before. She spoke this in a very good kind of manner, in her own way, but which was very agreeable indeed, and had as much apparent sincerity, and I verily believe as real as was possible to be expressed; but I put a stop to it, and bid her say no more, but accept of what my spouse had given her, which was but in part, as she had heard him say. "And put it up," says I, "and come and sit down here, and give me leave to say something else to you on the same head, which my spouse and I have settled between ourselves in your behalf."—"What dost thee mean?" says she, and blushed, and looked surprised, but did not stir. She was going to speak again, but I interrupted her, and told her she should make no more apologies of any kind whatever, for I had better things than all this to talk to her of; so I went on, and told her, that as she had been so friendly and kind to us on every occasion, and that her house was the lucky place where we came together; and that she knew I was from her own mouth acquainted in part with her circumstances, we were resolved she should be the better for us so long as she lived. Then I told her what we had resolved to do for her, and that she had nothing more to do but to consult with me how it should be effectually secured for her, distinct from any of the effects which were her husband's; and that if her husband did so supply her, that she could live comfortably, and not want it for bread or other necessities, she should not make use of it, but lay up the income of it, and add it every year to the principal, so to increase the annual payments, which in time, and perhaps before she might come to want it might double itself; that we were very willing whatever she should so lay up should be to herself, and whoever she thought fit after her; but that the 40*l.* a-year must return to our family after her life, which we both wished might be long and happy.

Let no reader wonder at my extraordinary concern for this poor woman, or at my giving my bounty to her a place in this account. It is not, I assure you, to make a pageantry of my charity, or to value myself upon the greatness of my soul, that should give in so profuse a manner as this, which was above my figure, if my wealth had been twice as much as it was; but there was another spring from whence all flowed, and it is on that account I speak of it. Was it possible I could think of a poor desolate woman with four children and her husband gone from her, and perhaps good for little if he had stayed; I say, was I, that had tasted so deep of the sorrows of such a kind of widowhood, able to look on her, and think of her circumstances, and not to be touched in an uncommon manner? No, no, I never looked on her and her family, though she was not left so helpless and friendless as I had been, without remembering my condition, when Amy was sent out to pawn or sell my pair of stays to buy a breast of mutton, and a bunch of turnips; nor could I look on her poor children, though not poor and perishing, like mine, without tears; reflecting on the dreadful condition that mine were reduced to, when poor Amy sent them all unto their aunt's in Spitalfields, and run away from them. These were the original springs or fountain-head, from whence my affectionate thoughts were moved to assist this poor woman.

When a poor debtor, having lain long in the Compter, or Ludgate, or the King's Bench, for debt, and afterwards gets out, rises again in the world, and grows rich, such an one is a certain benefactor to the prisoners there, and perhaps to every prison he passes by as long as he lives, for he remembers the dark days of his own sorrow; and even those who never had the experience of such sorrows to stir up their minds to acts of charity, would have the same charitable good disposition, did they as sensibly remember what it is that distinguishes them from others by a more favourable and merciful providence.

This, I say, was however the spring of my concern for this honest, friendly, and grateful Quaker; and as I had so plentiful a fortune in the world, I resolved she should taste of the fruit of her kind usage to me, in a manner that she could not expect.

All the while I talked to her I saw the disorder of her mind; the sudden joy was too much for her, and she coloured, trembled, changed, and at last grew pale, and was indeed near fainting; when she hastily rung a little bell for her maid, who coming in immediately, she beckoned to her, for speak she could not, to fill her a glass of wine, but she had no breath to take in, and was almost choked with that which she took in her mouth. I saw she was ill, and assisted her what I could and with spirits and things to smell to, just kept her from fainting, when she beckoned to her maid to withdraw, and immediately burst out in crying, and that relieved her. When she recovered herself a little, she flew to me, and throwing her arms about my neck, "O!" says she, "thou hast almost killed me;" and there she hung, laying her head in my neck for half a quarter of an hour, not able to speak, but sobbing like a child that had been whipped.

I was very sorry that I did not stop a little in the middle of my discourse, and make her drink a glass of wine, before it had put her spirits into such a violent motion; but it was too late, and it was ten to one odds but that it had killed her.

But she came to herself at last, and began to say some very good things in return for my kindness; I would not let her go on, but told her, I had more to say to her still than all this, but that I would let it alone till another time; my meaning was about the box of plate, good part of which I gave her, and some I gave to Amy, for I had so much plate, and some so large, that I thought if I let my husband see it, he might be apt to wonder what occasion I could ever had for so much, and for plate of such a kind too; as particularly, a great cistern for bottles, which cost a hundred and twenty pounds, and some large candlesticks, too big for any ordinary use. These I caused Amy to sell; in short, Amy sold above three hundred pounds worth of plate; what I gave the Quaker was worth above sixty pounds, and I gave Amy above thirty-three pounds worth, and yet I had a great deal left for my husband.

Nor did our kindness to the Quaker end with the forty pounds a-year, for we were always, while we stayed with her, which was above ten months, giving her one good thing or another; and, in a word, instead of lodging with her, she boarded with us, for I kept the house, and she and all her family eat and drank with us, and yet we paid her the rent of the house too; in short, I remembered my widowhood, and I made this widow's heart glad many a day the more upon that account.

And now my spouse and I began to think of going over to Holland, where I had proposed to him to live, and in order to settle all the preliminaries of our future manner of living, I began to draw in my effects, so as to have them all at command, upon whatever occasion we thought fit; after which, one morning I called my spouse up to me, "Hark ye, sir," said I to him, "I have two very weighty questions to ask of you; I do not know what answer you will give to the first, but I doubt you will be able to give a sorry answer to the other, and yet, I assure you, it is of the last importance to yourself, and towards the future part of your life, wherever it is to be."

He did not seem to be much alarmed, because he could see I was speaking in a kind of merry way. "Let's hear your questions, my dear," says he, "and I'll give the best answer I can to them."—"Why first," says I,

"I. You have married a wife here, made her a lady, and put her in expectation of being something else still, when she comes abroad; pray have you examined whether you are able to supply all her extravagant demands when she comes abroad; and maintain an expensive English-woman in all her pride and vanity? In short, have you inquired whether you are able to keep her?

"II. You have married a wife here, and given her a great many fine things, and you maintain her like a princess, and sometimes call her so; pray what portion have you had with her? what fortune has she been to you? and where does her estate lay, that you keep her so fine? I am afraid you keep her in a figure a great deal above her estate, at least above all that you have seen of it yet? Are you sure you have not got a bite? and that you have not made a beggar a lady?"

"Well," says he, "have you any more questions to ask? let's have them altogether, perhaps they may be all answered in a few words, as well as these two."—"No," says I, "these are the two grand questions, at least for the present."—"Why, then," says he, "I answer you in a few words; that I am fully master of my own circumstances, and without farther inquiry, can let my wife you speak of know, that as I have made her a lady I can maintain her as a lady, wherever she goes with me; and this, whether I have one pistole of her portion, or whether she has any portion or no: and as I have not inquired whether she has any portion or not, so she shall not have the less respect showed her from me, or be obliged to live meaner, or be anyways strained on that account; on the contrary, if she goes abroad to live with me in my own country, I will make her more than a lady, and support the expense of it too, without meddling with anything she has; and this, I suppose," says he, "contains an answer to both your questions together."

He spoke this with a great deal more earnestness in his countenance, than I had when I proposed my questions; and said a great many kind things upon it, as the consequence of former discourses, so that I was obliged to be in earnest too. "My dear," says I, "I was but in jest in my questions; but they were proposed to introduce what I am going to say to you in earnest; namely, that if I am to go abroad, it is time I should let you know how things stand, and what I have to bring you with your wife; how it is to be disposed and secured, and the like; and therefore come," says I, "sit down and let me show you your bargain here; I hope you will find that you have not got a wife without a fortune."

He told me then, that since he found I was in earnest, he desired that I would adjourn till tomorrow, and then we would do as the poor people do after they marry, feel in their pockets, and see how much money they can bring together in the world.—"Well," says I, "with all my heart;" and so we ended our talk for that time.

As this was in the morning, my spouse went out after dinner to his goldsmith's, as he said, and about three hours after returns with a porter and two large boxes with him; and his servant brought another box, which I observed was almost as heavy as the two that the porter brought, and made the poor fellow sweat heartily; he dismissed the porter, and in a little while after went out again with his man, and returning at night brought another porter with more boxes and bundles, and all was carried up, and put into a chamber next to our bedchamber; and in the morning he called for a pretty large round table, and began to unpack.

When the boxes were opened, I found they were chiefly full of books, and papers, and parchments, I, mean books of accounts, and writings, and such things, as were in themselves of no moment to me, because I understood them not; but I perceived he took them all out, and spread them about him upon the table and chairs, and began to be very busy with them; so I withdrew and left him; and he was indeed so busy among them that he never missed me till I had been gone a good while; but when he had gone through all his papers, and come to open a little box, he called for me again. "Now," says he, and called me his countess, "I am ready to answer your first question; if you will sit down till I have opened this box, we will see how it stands."

So we opened the box; there was in it indeed what I did not expect, for I thought he had sunk his estate rather than raised it; but he produced me in goldsmiths' bills, and stock in the English East India Company, about sixteen thousand pounds sterling; then he gave into my hands nine assignments upon the bank of Lyons in France, and two upon the rents of the town-house in Paris, amounting in the whole to five thousand crowns per annum, or annual rent, as it is called there; and, lastly, the sum of thirty thousand rixdollars in the bank of Amsterdam; besides some jewels and gold in the box to the value of about fifteen or sixteen hundred pounds, among which was a very good necklace of pearl of about two hundred pounds value; and that he pulled out and tied about my neck, telling me that should not be reckoned into the account.

I was equally pleased and surprised, and it was with an inexpressible joy that I saw him so rich. "You might well tell me," said I, "that you are able to make me a countess, and maintain me as such." In short, he was immensely rich; for besides all this, he showed me, which was the reason of his being so busy among the books, I say, he showed me several adventures he had abroad in the business of his merchandize; as particularly an eighth share in an East India ship then abroad; an account-courant with a merchant at Cadiz in Spain; about three thousand lent upon bottomry, upon ships gone to the Indies; and a large cargo of goods in a merchant's hands for sale at Lisbon in Portugal; so that in his books there was about twelve thousand pounds more; all which put together, made about twenty-seven thousand pounds sterling, and one thousand three hundred and twenty pounds a year.

I stood amazed at this account, as well I might, and said nothing to him for a good while; and the rather, because I saw him still busy looking over his books. After a while, as I was going to express my wonder; "hold, my dear," says he, "this is not all neither;" then he pulled me out some old seals, and small parchment rolls, which I did not understand; but he told me they were a right of reversion which he had to a paternal estate in his family, and a mortgage of one thousand four hundred rixdollars, which he had upon it, in the hands of the present possessor; so that was about three thousand pounds more.

"But now hold again," says he, "for I must pay my debts out of all this, and they are very great, I assure; and the first," he said, "was a black article of eight thousand pistoles, which he had a law suit about at Paris, but he had it awarded against him, which was the loss he had told me of, and which made him leave Paris in disgust; that in other accounts he owed about five thousand three hundred pounds sterling; but after all this, upon the whole, he had still one thousand seven hundred pounds clear stock in money, and one thousand three hundred and twenty pounds a year in rent.

After some pause, it came to my turn to speak. "Well," says I, "it is very hard a gentleman with such a fortune as this should come over to England, and marry a wife with nothing; it shall never," says I, "be said; but what I have I'll bring into the public stock;" so I began to produce.

First, I pulled out the mortgage which good Sir Robert had procured for me, the annual rent of seven hundred pounds per annum; the principal money one thousand four hundred pounds.

Secondly, I pulled out another mortgage upon land, procured by the same faithful friend, which at three times had advanced twelve thousand pounds.

Thirdly, I pulled him out a parcel of little securities, procured by several hands, by fee-farm rents, and such petty mortgages as those times afforded, amounting to ten thousand eight hundred pounds principal money, and paying six hundred and thirty-six pounds a year, so that in the whole there was two thousand and fifty-six pounds a year ready money constantly coming in.

When I had shown him all these, I laid them upon the table, and bade him take them, that he might be able to give me an answer to the second question, viz. What fortune he had with his wife? and laughed a little at it.

He looked at them a while, and then handed them all back again to me; "I will not touch them," says he, "nor one of them, till they are all settled in trustees' hands for your own use, and the management wholly your own."

I cannot omit what happened to me while all this was acting, though it was cheerful work in the main, yet I trembled every joint of me, worse for aught I know than ever Belshazzar did at the handwriting on the wall, and the occasion was every way as the just. "Unhappy wretch," said I to myself, "shall my ill-got wealth, the product of prosperous lust, and of a vile and vicious life of whoredom and adultery, be intermingled with the honest well-gotten estate of this innocent gentleman, to be a moth and a caterpillar among it, and bring the judgment of Heaven upon him, and upon what he has, for my sake? Shall my wickedness blast his comforts? Shall I be fire in his flax? and be a means to provoke Heaven to curse his blessings? God forbid! I'll keep them asunder, if it be possible."

This is the true reason why I have been so particular in the account of my vast acquired stock; and how his estate, which was perhaps the product of many years' fortunate industry; and which was equal, if not superior, to mine, at best was at my request, kept apart from mine, as is mentioned above.

I have told you how he gave back all my writings into my own hands again. "Well," says I, "seeing you will have it be kept apart, it shall be so, upon one condition, which I have to propose, and no other."—"And what is the condition?" says he.—"Why," says I, "all the pretence I can have for the making over my own estate to me is, that in case of your mortality, I may have it reserved for me, if I outlive you."—"Well," says he, "that is true."—"But then," said I, "the annual income is always received by the husband, during his life, as 'tis supposed, for the mutual subsistence of the family; now," says I, "here is 2,000*l.* a year, which I believe is as much as we shall spend, and I desire none of it may be saved; and all the income of your own estate, the interest of the 17,000*l.* and the 1,320*l.* a year may be constantly laid by for the increase of your estate; and so," added I, "by joining the interest every year to the capital, you will perhaps grow as rich as you would do if you were to trade with it all, if you were obliged to keep house out of it too."

He liked the proposal very well, and said it should be so; and this way I, in some measure satisfied myself that I should not bring my husband under the blast of a just Providence, for mingling my cursed ill-gotten wealth with his honest estate. This was occasioned by the reflections which, at some certain intervals of time, came into my thoughts of the justice of heaven, which I had reason to expect would sometime or other still fall upon me or my effects, for the dreadful life I had lived.

And let nobody conclude from the strange success I met with in all my wicked doings, and the vast estate which I had raised by it, that therefore I either was happy or easy. No, no, there was a dart struck into the liver; there was secret hell within, even all the while, when our joy was at the highest; but more especially now, after it was all over, and when, according to all appearance, I was one of the happiest women upon earth; all this while, I say, I had such a constant terror upon my mind, as gave me every now and then very terrible shocks, and which made me expect something very frightful upon every accident of life.

In a word, it never lightened or thundered, but I expected the next flash would penetrate my vitals, and melt the sword [soul] in this scabbard of flesh; it never blew a storm of wind, but I expected the fall of some stack of chimneys, or some part of the house would bury me in its ruins; and so of other things.

But I shall perhaps have occasion to speak of all these things again by and by; the case before us was in a manner settled; we had full four thousand pounds per annum for our future subsistence, besides a vast sum in jewels and plate; and besides this, I had about eight thousand pounds reserved in money, which I kept back from him, to provide for my two daughters, of whom I have yet much to say.

With this estate, settled as you have heard, and with the best husband in the world, I left England again; I had not only in human prudence, and by the nature of the thing, being now married and settled in so glorious a manner, I say, I had not only abandoned all the gay and wicked course which I gone through before, but

I began to look back upon it with that horror, and with that detestation, which is the certain companion, if not the forerunner of repentance.

Sometimes the wonders of my present circumstances would work upon me, and I should have some raptures upon my soul, upon the subject of my coming so smoothly out of the arms of hell, that I was not engulfed in ruin, as most who lead such lives are, first or last; but this was a flight too high for me; I was not come to that repentance that is raised from a sense of heaven's goodness; I repented of the crime, but it was of another and lower kind of repentance, and rather moved by my fears of vengeance, than from a sense of being spared from being punished and landed safe after a storm.

The first thing which happened after our coming to the Hague (where we lodged for a while) was, that my spouse saluted me one morning with the title of countess, as he said he intended to do, by having the inheritance to which the honour was annexed, made over to him. It is true, it was a reversion, but it soon fell, and in the mean time, as all the brothers of a count are called counts, so I had the title by courtesy, about three years before I had it in reality.

I was agreeably surprised at this coming so soon, and would have had my spouse have taken the money which it cost him, out of my stock, but he laughed at me, and went on.

I was now in the height of my glory and prosperity, and I was called the Countess de ———; for I had obtained that unlooked for, which I secretly aimed at, and was really the main reason of my coming abroad. I took now more servants, lived in a kind of magnificence that I had not been acquainted with, was called your honour at every word, and had a coronet behind my coach; though at the same time I knew little or nothing of my pedigree.

The first thing that my spouse took upon him to manage, was to declare ourselves married eleven years before our arriving in Holland; and consequently to acknowledge our little son, who was yet in England, to be legitimate; order him to be brought over, and added to his family, and acknowledge him to be our own.

This was done by giving notice to his people at Nimeguen, where his children (which were two sons and a daughter) were brought up; that he was come over from England, and that he was arrived at the Hague with his wife, and should reside there some time; and that he would have his two sons brought down to see him, which accordingly was done, and where I entertained them with all the kindness and tenderness that they could expect from their mother-in-law; and who pretended to be so ever since they were two or three years old.

This, supposing us to have been so long married, was not difficult at all, in a country where we had been seen together about that time, viz., eleven years and a half before; and where we had never been seen afterwards till we now returned together; this being seen together was also openly owned and acknowledged, of course, by our friend the merchant at Rotterdam, and also by the people in the house where we both lodged in the same city, and where our first intimacies began, and who, as it happened, were all alive; and therefore, to make it the more public, we made a tour to Rotterdam again, lodged in the same house, and were visited there by our friend the merchant, and afterwards invited frequently to his house, where he treated us very handsomely.

This conduct of my spouse, and which he managed very cleverly, was indeed a testimony of a wonderful degree of honesty and affection to our little son; for it was done purely for the sake of the child.

I call it an honest affection, because it was from a principle of honesty that he so earnestly conhimself to prevent the scandal which would otherwise have fallen upon the child, who was itself innocent; and as it was from this principle of justice that he so earnestly solicited me, and conjured me by the natural affections of a mother, to marry him when it was yet young within me and unborn, that the child might not suffer for the sin of its father and mother; so, though at the same time he really loved me very well, yet I had reason to believe that it was from this principle of justice to the child that he came to England again to seek me with design to marry me, and, as he called it, save the innocent lamb from an infamy worse than death.

It is with a just reproach to myself that I must repeat it again, that I had not the same concern for it, though it was the child of my own body; nor had I ever the hearty affectionate love to the child that he had. What the reason of it was I cannot tell; and, indeed, I had shown a general neglect of the child through all the gay years of my London revels, except that I sent Amy to look upon it now and then, and to pay for its nursing; as for me, I scarce saw it four times in the first four years of its life, and often wished it would go out of the world; whereas a son which I had by the jeweller, I took a different care of, and showed a different concern for, though I did not let him know me; for I provided very well for him, had him put out very well to school; and when he came to years fit for it, let him go over with a person of honesty and good business, to the Indies; and after he had lived there for some time, and began to act for himself, sent him over the value of 2,000*l.* at several times, with which he traded, and grew rich; and, as it is to be hoped, may at last come over again with forty or fifty thousand pounds in his pocket, as many do who have not such encouragement at their beginning.

I also sent him over a wife, a beautiful young lady, well bred, an exceedingly good-natured pleasant creature; but the nice young fellow did not like her, and had the impudence to write to me, that is, to the person I employed to correspond with him, to send him another, and promised that he would marry her I had sent him to a friend of his, who liked her better than he did; but I took it so ill that I would not send him another, and withal, stopped another article of 1,000*l.* which I had appointed to send him. He considered of it afterwards, and offered to take her; but then truly she took so ill the first affront he put upon her that she would not have him, and I sent him word I thought she was very much in the right. However, after courting her two years, and some friends interposing, she took him, and made him an excellent wife, as I knew she would; but I never sent him the 1,000*l.* cargo, so that he lost that money for misusing me, and took the lady at last without it.

My new spouse and I lived a very regular contemplative life, and in itself certainly a life filled with all human felicity. But if I looked upon my present situation with satisfaction, as I certainly did, so in proportion I on all occasions looked back on former things with detestation and with the utmost affliction; and now, indeed, and not till now, those reflections began to prey upon my comforts, and lessen the sweets of my other enjoyments. They might be said to have gnawed a hole in my heart before, but now they made a hole quite through it; now they eat into all my pleasant things, made bitter every sweet, and mixed my sighs with every smile.

Not all the affluence of a plentiful fortune; not a hundred thousand pounds estate (for between us we had little less); no honour and titles, attendants and equipages; in a word, not all the things we call pleasure could give me any relish, or sweeten the taste of things to me; at least, not so much but I grew sad, heavy, pensive, and melancholy; slept little, and eat little; dreamed continually of the most frightful and terrible things imaginable. Nothing but apparitions of devils and monsters, falling into gulfs and off from steep and high precipices, and the like; so that in the morning when I should rise, and be refreshed with the blessing of rest, I was harrassed with frights and terrible things formed merely in the imagination, and was either tired and wanted sleep, or overrun with vapours, and not fit for conversing with my family, or any one else.

My husband, the tenderest creature in the world, and particularly so to me, was in great concern for me, and did everything that lay in his power to comfort and restore me; strove to reason me out of it; then tried all the ways possible to divert me; but it was all to no purpose, or to but very little.

My only relief was sometimes to unbosom myself to poor Amy when she and I were alone; and she did all she could to comfort me, but all was to little effect there, for, though Amy was the better penitent before, when we had been in the storm, Amy was just what she used to be now,—a wild, gay, loose wretch, and not much the graver for her age, for Amy was between forty and fifty by this time too.

But to go on with my own story. As I had no comforter, so I had no counsellor; it was well, as I often thought, that I was not a Roman Catholic, for what a piece of work should I have made to have gone to a priest with such a history as I had to tell him, and what penance would any father confessor have obliged me to perform, especially if he had been honest and true to his office!

However, as I had none of the recourse, so I had none of the absolution, by which the criminal confessing goes away comforted; but I went about with a heart loaded with crime, and altogether in the dark as to what I was to do; and in this condition I languished near two years. I may well call it languishing, for if Providence had not relieved me I should have died in little time. But of that hereafter.

I must now go back to another scene, and join it to this end of my story, which will complete all my concern with England, at least, all that I shall bring into this account. I have hinted at large what I had done for my two sons, one at Messina and the other in the Indies.

But I have not gone through the story of my two daughters; I was so in danger of being known by one of them, that I durst not see her, so as to let her know who I was; and for the other, I could not well know how to see her, and own her, and let her see me, because she must then know that I would not let her sister know me, which would look strange; so that upon the whole, I resolved to see neither of them at all, but Amy managed all that for me; and when she had made gentlewomen of them both, by giving them a good, though late education, she had like to have blown up the whole case, and herself and me too, by an unhappy discovery of herself to the last of them, that is, to her who was our cookmaid, and who, as I said before, Amy had been obliged to turn away, for fear of the very discovery which now happened. I have observed already in what manner Amy managed her by a third person; and how the girl, when she was set up for a lady, as above, came and visited Amy at my lodgings; after which, Amy going, as was her custom, to see the girl's brother (my son) at the honest man's house in Spitalfields; both the girls were there merely by accident, at the same time, and the other girl unawares discovered the secret, that this was the lady that had done all this for them.

Amy was greatly surprised at it, but as she saw there was no remedy, she made a jest of it; and so after that, conversed openly, being still satisfied that neither of them could make much of it, as long as they knew nothing of me. So she took them together one time, and told them the history, as she called it, of their mother; beginning at the miserable carrying them to their aunt's; she owned she was not their mother herself, but described her to them. However, when she said she was not their mother, one of them expressed herself very much surprised, for the girl had taken up a strong fancy that Amy was really her mother; and that she had for some particular reasons, concealed it from her, and therefore when she told her frankly that she was not her mother, the girl fell a crying, and Amy had much ado to keep life in her. This was the girl who was at first my cookmaid in Pall Mall. When Amy had brought her to again a little, and she had recovered her first disorder, Amy asked what ailed her? the poor girl hung about her, and kissed her, and was in such a passion still, though she was a great wench of nineteen or twenty years old, that she could not be brought to speak a great while; at last, having recovered her speech, she said still, "But O do not say you a'n't my mother! I'm sure you are my mother;" and then the girl cried again like to kill herself. Amy could not tell what to do with her a good while; she was loth to say again she was not her mother, because she would not throw her into a fit of crying again; but she went round about a little with her. "Why, child," says she, "why would you have me be your mother? If it be because I am so kind to you, be easy, my dear," says Amy, "I'll be as kind to you still, as if I was your mother."

"Ay but," says the girl, "I am sure you are my mother too; and what have I done that you won't own me, and you will not be called my mother? though I am poor, you have made me a gentlewoman," says she, "and I won't do anything to disgrace you; besides," adds she, "I can keep a secret too, especially for my own mother, sure;" then she call Amy her dear mother, and hung about her neck again, crying still vehemently.

This last part of the girl's words alarmed Amy, and, as she told me, frightened her terribly; nay, she was so confounded with it, that she was not able to govern herself, or conceal her disorder from the girl herself, as you shall hear. Amy was at a full stop, and confused to the last degree; and the girl, a sharp jade, turned it upon her. "My dear mother," says she, "do not be uneasy about it; I know it all; but do not be uneasy, I won't let my sister know a word of it, or my brother either, without you give me leave, but don't disown me now you have found me; don't hide yourself from me any longer; I can't bear that," says she, "it will break my heart."

"I think the girl's mad," says Amy; "why, child, I tell thee, if I was thy mother, I would not disown thee; don't you see I am as kind to you as if I was your mother?" Amy might as well have sung a song of a kettle-drum, as talk to her. "Yes," says the girl, "you are very good to me, indeed; and that was enough to make anybody believe she was her mother too; but, however, that was not the case, she had other reasons to believe, and to know that she was her mother, and it was a sad thing she would not let her call her mother, who was her own child."

Amy was so heart-full with the disturbance of it, that she did not enter further with her into the inquiry, as she would otherwise have done, I mean, as to what made the girl so positive, but comes away, and tells me the whole story.

I was thunderstruck with the story at first, and much more afterwards, as you shall hear; but, I say, I was thunderstruck at first, and amazed, and said to Amy, "There must something or other in it more than we know of; but, having examined further into it, I found the girl had no notion of anybody but of Amy, and glad I was that I was not concerned in the pretence, and that the girl had no notion of me in it. But even this easiness did not continue long, for the next time Amy went to see her, she was the same thing, and rather more violent with Amy than she was before. Amy endeavoured to pacify her by all the ways imaginable. first, she told her, she took it ill that she would not believe her; and told her, if she would not give over such a foolish whimsy, she would leave her to the wide world, as she found her.

This put the girl into fits, and she cried ready to kill herself, and hung about Amy again, like a child. "Why," says Amy, "why can you not be easy with me then, and compose yourself, and let me go on to do you good, and show you kindness as I would do, and as I intend to do? Can you think that if I was your mother, I would not tell you so? What whimsy is this that possesses your mind?" says Amy. Well, the girl told her, in a few words, but those few such as frightened Amy out of her wits, and me too, that she knew well enough how it was. "I know," says she, "when you left ———, naming the village, where I lived when my father went away from us all, that you went over to France. I know that too, and who you went with," says the girl; "did no my Lady Roxana come back again with you? I know it all well enough, though I was but a child, I have heard it all."— And thus she run on with such discourse, as put Amy out of all temper again; and she raved at her like a bedlam, and told her, she would never come near her any more; she might go a begging again if she would; she'd have nothing to do with her. The girl, a passionate wench, told her, she knew the worst of it, she could go to service again, and if she would not own her own child, she must do as she pleased; then she fell into a passion of crying again, as if she would kill herself.

In short, this girl's conduct terrified Amy to the last degree, and me too, and was it not that we knew the girl was quite wrong in some things, she was yet so right in some other, that it gave me a great deal of perplexity; but that which put Amy the most to it, was, that the girl (my daughter) told her, that she (meaning her mother) had gone away with the jeweller, and into France too; she did not call him the jeweller, but with the landlord of the house; who, after her mother fell into distress, and that Amy had taken all the children from her, made much of her, and afterwards married her.

In short, it was plain the girl had but a broken account of things, but yet, that she had received some accounts that had a reality in the bottom of them; so that it seems out first measures, and the amour with the jeweller, were not so concealed as I thought they had been; and it seems came in a broken manner to my sister-in-law, whom Amy carried the children to, and she made some bustle, it seems, about it; but as good luck was, it was too late, and I was removed, and gone, none knew whither; or else she would have sent all the children home to me again, to be sure.

This we picked out of the girl's discourse, that is to say, Amy did at several times; but it all consisted of broken fragments of stories, such as the girl herself had heard so long ago, that she herself could make very little of it; only that in the main, that her mother had played the whore; had gone away with the gentleman that was landlord of the house; that he married her; that she went into France. And as she had learned in my family, where she was a servant, that Mrs Amy and her Lady Roxana had been in France together; so she put all these things together, and joining them with the great kindness that Amy now showed her, possessed the creature that Amy was really her mother; nor was it possible for Amy to conquer it for a long time.

But this, after I had searched into it, as far as by Amy's relation I could get an account of it, did not disquiet me half so much, as that the young slut had got the name of Roxana by the end; and that she knew who the Lady Roxana was, and the like; though this, neither, did not hang together, for then she would not have fixed upon Amy for her mother. But some time after, when Amy had almost persuaded her out of it, and that the girl began to be so confounded in her discourses of it, that they made neither head nor tail; at last the passionate creature flew out in a kind of rage, and said to Amy, That if she was not her mother, Madam Roxana was her mother then, for one of them, she was sure, was her mother; and then all this that Amy had done for her, was by Madam Roxana's order; and "I am sure," says she, "it was my Lady Roxana's coach that brought the gentlewoman (whoever it was) to my uncle's in Spitalfields; for the coachman told me so." Amy fell a laughing at her aloud, as was her usual way, but as Amy told me, it was but on one side of her mouth: for she was so confounded at her discourse, that she was ready to sink into the ground; and so was I too, when she told it me.

However, Amy brazened her out of it all; told her, "Well, since you think you are so high-born as to be my Lady Roxana's daughter, you may go to her and claim your kindred, can't you? I suppose," says Amy, "you know where to find her?" She said, she did not question to find her, for she knew where she was gone to live privately; but though she might be removed again, "for I know how it is," says she, with a kind of a smile or a grin; "I know how it all is, well enough."

Amy was so provoked, that she told me, in short, she began to think it would be absolutely necessary to murder her. That expression filled me with horror, all my blood ran chill in my veins, and a fit of trembling seized me, that I could not speak a good while; at last, "What, is the devil in you, Amy?" said I. "Nay, nay," says she, "let it be the devil or not the devil, if I thought she knew one tittle of your history, I would dispatch her if she were my own daughter a thousand times."—"And I," says I in a rage, "as well as I love you, would be the first that should put the halter about your neck, and see you hanged with more satisfaction than ever I saw you in my life; nay," says I, "you would not live to be hanged, I believe I should cut your throat with my own hand; I am ready to do it," said I, "as 'tis, for your but naming the thing;" with that, I called her cursed devil, and bid her get out of the room.

I think it was the first time that ever I was angry with Amy in all my life; and when all was done, though she was a devilish jade in having such a thought, yet it was all of it the effect of her excess of affection and fidelity to me.

But this thing gave me a terrible shock, for it happened just after I was married, and served to hasten my going over to Holland; for I would not have been seen, so as to be known by the name of Roxana, no, not for ten thousand pounds; it would have been enough to have ruined me to all intents and purposes with my husband, and everybody else too; I might as well have been the German princess.

Well, I set Amy to work; and give Amy her due, she set all her wits to work, to find out which way this girl had her knowledge, but, more particularly, how much knowledge she had, that is to say, what she really knew, and what she did not know, for this was the main thing with me; how she should say she knew who Madam Roxana was, and what notions she had of that affair was very mysterious to me, for it was certain she could not have a right notion of me, because she would have it be that Amy was her mother.

I scolded heartily at Amy for letting the girl ever know her, that is to say, know her in this affair; for that she knew her could not be hid, because she, as I might say, served Amy, or rather under Amy, in my family, as is said before; but she (Amy) talked with her at first by another person, and not by herself; and that secret came out by an accident, as I have said above.

Amy was concerned at it as well as I, but could not help it; and though it gave us great uneasiness, yet, as there was no remedy, we were bound to make as little noise of it as we could, that it might go no further. I bid Amy punish the girl for it, and she did so, for she parted with her in a huff, and told her she should see she was not her mother, for that she could leave her just where she found her; and seeing she could not be content to be served with the kindness of a friend, but that she would needs make a mother of her, she would, for the future, be neither mother nor friend; and so bid her go to service again, and be a drudge, as she was before.

The poor girl cried most lamentably, but would not be beaten out of it still; but that which dumb-founded Amy more than all the rest, was, that when she had rattled the poor girl a long time, and could not beat her out of it, and had, as I have observed, threatened to leave her, the girl kept to what she had said before, and put this turn to it again, that she was sure, if Amy was not, my Lady Roxana was her mother, and that she would go find her out; adding, that she made no doubt but that she could do it, for she knew where to inquire the name of her new husband.

Amy came home with this piece of news in her mouth to me. I could easily perceive when she came in that she was mad in her mind, and in a rage at something or other, and was in great pain to get it out; for when she came first in my husband was in the room. However, Amy going up to undress her, I soon made an excuse to follow her, and coming into the room, "What the d—l is the matter, Amy?" says I; "I am sure you have some bad news."—"News," says Amy, aloud, "ay, so I have; I think the d—l is in that young wench, she will ruin us all and herself too, there is no quieting her." So she went on and told me all the particulars; but sure nothing was so astonished as I was when she told me that the girl knew I was married, that she knew my husband's name, and would endeavour to find me out. I thought I should have sunk down at the very words. In the middle of all my amazement Amy starts up and runs about the room like a distracted body, "I'll put an end to it, that I will, I cannot bear it, I must murder her, I'll kill the b——," and swears by her Maker, in the most serious tone in the world, and then repeated it over three or four times, walking to and again in the room; "I will, in short, I will kill her if there was not another wench in the world."

"Prithee hold thy tongue, Amy," says I, "why, thou art mad."—"Ay, so I am," says she, "stark mad; but I'll be the death of her for all that, and then I shall be sober again."—"But you shan't," says I; "you shan't hurt a hair of her head; why, you ought to be hanged for what you have done already, for having resolved on it is doing it; as to the guilt of the fact, you are a murderer already, as much as if you had done it already."

"I know that," says Amy, "and it can be no worse; I'll put you out of your pain, and her too, she shall never challenge you for her mother in this world, whatever she may in the next." "Well, well," says I, "be quiet, and do not talk thus, I can't bear it." So she grew a little soberer after a while.

I must acknowledge the notion of being discovered carried with it so many frightful ideas, and hurried my thoughts so much, that I was scarce myself more than Amy, so dreadful a thing is a load of guilt upon the mind.

And yet when Amy began the second time to talk thus abominably of killing the poor child, of murdering her, and swore by her Maker that she would, so that I began to see that she was in earnest, I was further terrified a great deal, and it helped to bring me to myself again in other cases.

We laid our heads together then to see if it was possible to discover by what means she had learned to talk so, and how she (I mean my girl) came to know that her mother had married a husband; but it would not do, the girl would acknowledge nothing, and gave but a very imperfect account of things still, being disgusted to the last degree with Amy's leaving her so abruptly as she did.

Well, Amy went to the house where the boy was, but it was all alone; there they had only heard a confused story of the Lady somebody, they knew not who, which this same wench had told them, but they gave no heed to it at all. Amy told them how foolishly the girl had acted, and how she had carried on the whimsy so far, in spite of all they could say to her; that she had taken it so ill, she would see her no more, and so she might even go to service again if she would, for she (Amy) would have nothing to do with her unless she humbled herself and changed her note, and that quickly too.

The good old gentleman, who had been the benefactor to them all, was greatly concerned at it, and the good woman his wife was grieved beyond all expression, and begged her ladyship (meaning Amy) not to resent it; they promised too they would talk with her about it, and the old gentlewoman added, with some astonishment, "Sure she cannot be such a fool but she will be prevailed with to hold her tongue, when she has it from your own mouth that you are not her mother, and sees that it disoblige your ladyship to have her insist upon it." And so Amy came away with some expectation that it would be stopped here.

But the girl was such a fool for all that, and persisted in it obstinately, notwithstanding all they could say to her; nay, her sister begged and intreated her not to play the fool, for that it would ruin her too, and that the lady (meaning Amy) would abandon them both.

Well, notwithstanding this, she insisted, I say, upon it, and which was worse, the longer it lasted the more she began to drop Amy's ladyship, and would have it that the Lady Roxana was her mother, and that she had made some inquiries about it, and did not doubt but she should find her out.

When it was come to this, and we found there was nothing to be done with the girl, but that she was so obstinately bent upon the search after me, that she ventured to forfeit all she had in view; I say, when I found it was come to this, I began to be more serious in my preparations of going beyond sea, and, particularly, it gave me some reason to fear that there was something in it; but the following accident put me beside all my measures, and struck me into the greatest confusion that ever I was in in my life.

I was so near going abroad that my spouse and I had taken measures for our going off; and because I would be sure not to go too public, but so as to take away all possibility of being seen, I had made some exception to my spouse against going in the ordinary passage-boats. My pretence to him was the promiscuous crowds in those vessels, want of convenience, and the like; so he took the hint and found me out an English merchant ship, which was bound for Rotterdam, and getting soon acquainted with the master, he hired his whole ship, that is to say, his great cabin, for I do not mean his ship for freight; so that we had all the conveniences possible for our passage, and all things being nearly ready, he brought home the captain one day to dinner with him, that I might see him, and be acquainted a little with him; so we came, after dinner, to talk of the ship and the conveniences on board, and the captain pressed me earnestly to come on board and see the ship, intimating that he would treat us as well as he could; and in discourse I happened to say, I hoped he had no other passengers; he said, no he had not; but, he said, his wife had courted him a good while to let her go over to Holland with him, for he always used that trade, but he never could think of venturing all he had in one bottom; but if I went with him he thought to take her and her kinswoman along with him this voyage, that they might both wait upon me; and so added, that if he would do him the honour to dine on board the next day, he would bring his wife on board, the better to make us welcome.

Who could have believed the devil had any snare at the bottom of all this? or that I was in any danger on such an occasion, so remote and out of the way as this was? But the event was the oddest that could be thought of. As it happened, Amy was not at home when we accepted this invitation, and so she was left out of the company; but instead of Amy, we took our honest, good-humoured, never-to-be-omitted friend the Quaker, one of the best creatures that ever lived, sure; and who, besides a thousand good qualities unmixed with one bad one, was particularly excellent for being the best company in the world; though I think I had carried Amy too, if she had not been engaged in this unhappy girl's affair; for on a sudden the girl was lost, and no news was to be heard of her, and Amy had hunted her to every place she could think of, that it was likely to find her in, but all the news she could hear of her was, that she was gone to an old comrade's house of hers, whom she called sister, and who was married to a master of a ship at Redriff, and even this the jade never told me. It seems when this girl was directed by Amy to get her some breeding, go to the boarding school, and the like, she was recommended to a boarding-school at Camberwell, and there she contracted an acquaintance with a young lady (so they are all called) her bedfellow, that they called sisters, and promised never to break off their acquaintance.

But judge you what an unaccountable surprise I must be in when I came on board the ship and was brought into the captain's cabin, or what they call it, the great cabin of the ship, to see his lady or wife, and another young person with her, who, when I came to see her near hand, was my old cook maid in the Pall-mall, and, as appeared by the sequel of the story, was neither more nor less than my own daughter; that I knew her was out of doubt; for though she had not had opportunity to see me very often, yet I had often seen her, as I must needs, being in my own family so long.

If ever I had need of courage, and a full presence of mind, it was now; it was the only valuable secret in the world to me, all depended upon this occasion; if the girl knew me, I was undone; and to discover any surprise or disorder had been to make her know me, or guess it, and discover herself.

I was once going to feign a swooning and fainting away, and so falling on the ground, or floor, put them all into a hurry and fright, and by that means get an opportunity to be continually holding something to my nose to smell to, and so hold my hand or my handkerchief, or both, before my mouth; then pretended I could not bear the smell of the ship, or the closeness of the cabin; but that would have been only to remove into a clearer air upon the quarter-deck, where we should with it have had a clearer light too; and if I had pretended the smell of the ship, it would have served only to have carried us all on shore to the captain's house, which was hard by; for the ship lay so close to the shore, that we only walked over a plank to go on board, and over another ship which lay within her; so this not appearing very feasible, and the thought not being two minutes old, there was no time, for the two ladies rose up, and we saluted, so that I was bound to come so near my girl as to kiss her, which I would not have done had it been possible to have avoided it, but there was no room to escape.

I cannot but take notice here, that notwithstanding there was a secret horror upon my mind, and I was ready to sink when I came close to her to salute her, yet it was a secret, inconceivable pleasure to me when I kissed her to know that I kissed my own child, my own flesh and blood, born of my body, and who I had never kissed since I took the fatal farewell of them all, with a million of tears, and a heart almost dead with grief, when Amy and the good woman took them all away, and went with them to Spitalfields. No pen can describe, no words can express, I say, the strange impression which this thing made upon my spirits, I felt something shoot through my blood; my heart fluttered, my head flashed, and was dizzy, and all within me, as I thought, turned about, and much ado I had not to abandon myself to an excess of passion at the first sight of her, much more when my lips touched her face; I thought I must have taken her in my arms, and kissed her again a thousand times, whether I would or no.

But I roused up my judgment, and shook it off, and with infinite uneasiness in my mind I sat down. You will not wonder, if upon this surprise I was not conversible for some minutes, and that the disorder had almost discovered itself. I had a complication of severe things upon me, I could not conceal my disorder without the utmost difficulty, and yet upon my concealing it depended the whole of my prosperity, so I used all manner of violence with myself to prevent the mischief which was at the door.

Well, I saluted her, but as I went first forward to the captain's lady, who was at the farther end of the cabin, towards the light, I had the occasion offered to stand with my back to the light, when I turned about to her, who stood more on my left hand, so that she had not a fair sight of me, though I was so near her. I trembled, and knew neither what I did or said, I was in the utmost extremity, between so many particular circumstances as lay upon me, for I was to conceal my disorder from everybody at the utmost peril, and at the same time expected everybody would discern it; I was to expect she would discover that she knew me, and yet was, by all means possible, to prevent it. I was to conceal myself, if possible, and yet had not the least room to do anything towards it; in short, there was no retreat, no shifting anything off, no avoiding or preventing her having a full sight of me, nor was there any counterfeiting my voice, for then my husband would have perceived it; in short, there was not the least circumstance that offered me any assistance, or any favourable thing to help me in this exigence.

After I had been upon the rack for near half an hour, during which I appeared stiff and reserved, and a little too formal, my spouse and the captain fell into discourse about the ship and the sea, and business remote from us women; and by-and-by the captain carried him out upon the quarter-deck, and left us all by ourselves in the great cabin. Then we began to be a little freer one with another, and I began to be a little revived by a sudden fancy of my own, namely, I thought I perceived that the girl did not know me; and the chief reason of my having such a notion was, because I did not perceive the least disorder in her countenance, or the least change in her carriage, no confusion, no hesitation in her discourse; nor, which I had my eye particularly upon, did I observe that she fixed her eyes much upon me, that is to say, not singling me out to look steadily at me, as I thought would have been the case, but that she rather singled out my friend the Quaker, and chatted with her on several things ; but I observed too, that it was all about indifferent matters.

This greatly encouraged me, and I began to be a little cheerful ; but I was knocked down again as with a thunderclap, when turning to the captain's wife, and discoursing of me, she said to her, " Sister, I cannot but think (my lady) to be very much like such a person," then she named the person ; and the captain's wife said she thought so too ; the girl replied again, she was sure she had seen me before, but she could not recollect where ; I answered (though her speech was not directed to me) that I fancied she had not seen me before in England," but asked if she had lived in Holland ; she said, " No, no, she had never been out of England ; and I added, that she could not then have known me in England, unless it was very lately, for I had lived at Rotterdam a great while. This carried me out of that part of the broil pretty well ; and to make it go off the better, when a little Dutch boy came into the cabin, who belonged to the captain, and who I easily perceived to be Dutch, I jested, and talked Dutch to him, and was merry about the boy, that is to say, as merry as the consternation I was still in would let me be.

However I began to be thoroughly convinced by this time that the girl did not know me, which was an infinite satisfaction to me ; or at least, that though she had some notion of me, yet that she did not think anything about my being who I was, and which, perhaps, she would have been as glad to have known as I would have been surprised if she had ; indeed, it was evident that, had she suspected anything of the truth, she would not have been able to have concealed it.

Thus this meeting went off, and, you may be sure, I was resolved, if once I got off of it, she should never see me again, to revive her fancy ; but I was mistaken there too, as you shall hear. After we had been on board, the captain's lady carried us home to her house, which was but just on shore, and treated us there again very handsomely, and made us promise that we would come again and see her before we went, to concert our affairs for the voyage, and the like ; for she assured us that both she and her sister went the voyage at that time for our company ; and I thought to myself, then you'll never go the voyage at all, for I saw from that moment, that it would be no way convenient for my ladyship to go with them ; for that frequent conversation might bring me to her mind, and she would certainly claim her kindred to me in a few days, as indeed would have been the case.

It is hardly possible for me to conceive what would have been our part in this affair had my woman Amy gone with me on board this ship, it had certainly blown up the whole affair, and I must for ever after have been this girl's vassal, that is to say, have let her into the secret, and trusted to her keeping it too, or have been exposed and undone. The very thought filled me with horror.

But I was not so unhappy neither, as it fell out, for Amy was not with us, and that was my deliverance indeed ; yet we had another chance to get over still. As I resolved to put off the voyage, so I resolved to put off the visit, you may be sure ; going upon this principle, namely, that I was fixed in it, that the girl had seen her last of me, and should never see me more.

However, to bring myself well off, and withal to see (if I could) a little farther into the matter, I sent my friend the Quaker to the captain's lady, to make the visit promised, and to make my excuse that I could not possibly wait on her, for that I was very much out of order ; and in the end of the discourse I bade her insinuate to them that she was afraid I should not be able to get ready to go the voyage so soon as the captain would be obliged to go, and that perhaps we might put it off to his next voyage. I did not let the Quaker into any other reason of it than that I was indisposed ; and not knowing what other face to put upon that part, I made her believe that I thought I was a breeding.

It was easy to put that into her head, and she of course hinted to the captain's lady, that she found me so very ill that she was afraid I would miscarry, and then, to be sure, I could not think of going.

She went, and she managed that part very dexterously, as I knew she would, though she knew not a word of the grand reason of my indisposition ; but I was all sunk, and dead-hearted again, when she told me she could not understand the meaning of one thing in her visit, namely, that the young woman, as she called her, that was with the captain's lady, and who she called sister, was most impertinently inquisitive into things ; as who I was ? how long I had been in England ? where I had lived ? and the like ; and that, above all the rest, she inquired if I did not live once at the other end of the town.

" I thought her inquiries so out of the way," says the honest Quaker, " that I gave her not the least satisfaction ; but as I saw by thy answers on board the ship, when she talked of thee, that thou did'st not incline to let her be acquainted with thee, so I was resolved that she should not be much the wiser for me ; and when she asked me if thou ever lived'st here or there, I always said, No ; but that thou wast a Dutch lady, and was going home again to thy family, and lived abroad.

I thanked her very heartily for that part, and indeed she served me in it more than I let her know she did ; in a word, she thwarted the girl so cleverly, that if she had known the whole affair she could not have done it better.

But I must acknowledge all this put me upon the rack again, and I was quite discouraged, not at all doubting but that the jade had a right scent of things, and that she knew and remembered my face, but had artfully concealed her knowledge of me till she might perhaps do it more to my disadvantage. I told all this to Amy, for she was all the relief I had. The poor soul (Amy) was ready to hang herself, that, as she said, she had been the occasion of it all ; and that if I was ruined (which was the word I always used to her), she had ruined me ; and she tormented herself about it so much, that I was sometimes fain to comfort her and myself too.

What Amy vexed herself at was chiefly, that she should be surprised so by the girl, as she called her, I mean surprised into a discovery of herself to the girl ; which indeed was a false step of Amy's, and so I had often told her, but it was to no purpose to talk of that now, the business was, how to get clear of the girl's suspicions, and of the girl too, for it looked more threatening every day than the other; and if I was uneasy at what Amy had told me of her rambling and rattling to her (Amy), I had a thousand times as much reason to be uneasy now when she had chopped upon me so unhappily as this; and not only had seen my face, but knew too where I lived, what name I went by, and the like.

And I am not come to the worst of it yet neither, for a few days after my friend the Quaker had made her a visit, and excused me on the account of my indisposition, as if they had done it in over and above kindness, because they had been told I was not well, they come both directly to my lodgings to visit me; the captain's wife and my daughter (who she called sister), and the captain, to show them the place; the captain only brought them to the door, put them in, and went away upon some business.

Had not the kind Quaker, in a lucky moment, come running in before them, they had not only clapped in upon me, in the parlour, as it had been a surprise, but which would have been a thousand times worse, had seen Amy with me; I think if that had happened, I had had no remedy but to take the girl by herself, and have made myself known to her, which would have been all distraction.

But the Quaker, a lucky creature to me, happened to see them come to the door, before they rung the bell, and instead of going to let them in, came running in, with some confusion in her countenance, and told me who was a coming; at which, Amy run first and I after her, and bid the Quaker come up as soon as she had let them in.

I was going to bid her deny me, but it came into my thoughts, that having been represented so much out of order it would have looked very odd; besides I knew the honest Quaker, though she would do anything else for me, would not lie for me, and it would have been hard to have desired it of her.

After she had let them in, and brought them into the parlour, she came up to Amy and I, who were hardly out of the fright, and yet were congratulating one another, that Amy was not surprised again.

They paid their visit in form, and I received them as formally, but took occasion two or three times to hint that I was so ill that I was afraid I should not be able to go to Holland, at least not so soon as the captain must go off; and made my compliment how sorry I was to be disappointed of the advantage of their company and assistance in the voyage; and sometimes I talked as if I thought I might stay till the captain returned, and would be ready to go again; then the Quaker put in, that then I might be too far gone, meaning with child, that I should not venture at all; and then (as if she should be pleased with it) added, she hoped I would stay and lie in at her house; so as this carried its own face with it, it was well enough.

But it was now high time to talk of this to my husband, which, however, was not the greatest difficulty before me; for after this and other chat had taken up some time, the young fool began her tattle again; and two or three times she brought it in, that I was so like a lady that she had the honour to know at the other end of the town, that she could not put the lady out of her mind when I was by, and once or twice I fancied the girl was ready to cry; by and by she was at it again, and at last I plainly saw tears in her eyes; upon which I asked her if the lady was dead, because she seemed to be in some concern for her? She made me much easier by her answer than ever she did before: she said, she did not really know, but she believed she was dead.

This, I say, a little relieved my thoughts, but I was soon down again; for, after some time, the jade began to grow talkative; and as it was plain that she had told all that her head could retain of Roxana, and the days of joy which I had spent at that part of the town, another accident had like to have blown us all up again.

I was in a kind of dishabille when they came, having on a loose robe, like a morning gown, but much after the Italian way; and I had not altered it when I went up, only dressed my head a little; and as I had been represented as having been lately very ill, so the dress was becoming enough for a chamber.

This morning vest or robe, call it as you please, was more shaped to the body than we wear them since, showing the body in its true shape, and perhaps a little too plainly if it had been to be worn where any men were to come; but among ourselves it was well enough, especially for hot weather; the colour was green, figured, and the stuff a French damask, very rich.

This gown or vest put the girl's tongue a running again, and her sister, as she called her, prompted it; for as they both admired my vest, and were taken up much about the beauty of the dress, the charming damask, the noble trimming, and the like, my girl puts in a word to the sister (captain's wife), "This is just such a thing as I told you," says she, "the lady danced in."—"What," says the captain's wife, "the Lady Roxana that you told me of? O! that's a charming story," says she, "tell it my lady." I could not avoid saying so too, though from my soul I wished her in heaven for but naming it, nay, I will not say but if she had been carried the other way it had been much as one to me, if I could but have been rid of her, and her story too, for when she came to describe the Turkish dress, it was impossible but the Quaker, who was a sharp, penetrating creature, should receive the impression in a more dangerous manner than the girl, only that indeed she was not so dangerous a person; for if she had known it all, I could more freely have trusted her than I could the girl, by a great deal, nay, I should have been perfectly easy in her.

However, as I have said, her talk made me dreadfully uneasy, and the more when the captain's wife mentioned but the name of Roxana. What my face might do towards betraying me I know not, because I could not see myself, but my heart beat as if it would have jumped out of my mouth, and my passion was so great that, for want of vent, I thought I should have burst. In a word I was in a kind of silent rage, for the force I was under of restraining my passion was such as I never felt the like of. I had no vent, nobody to open myself to, or to make a compliment to, for my relief; I durst not leave the room by any means, then she would have told all the story in my absence, and I should have been perpetually uneasy to know what she said; so that, in a word, I was obliged to sit and hear her tell all the story of Roxana, that is to say, of myself, and not know at the same time whether she was in earnest or in jest, whether she knew me or no; or, in short, whether I was to be exposed, or not exposed.

She began only in general with telling where she lived, what a place she had of it, how gallant a company her lady had always had in the house; how they used to sit up all night in the house, gaming and dancing; what a fine lady her mistress was, and what a vast deal of money the upper servants got; as for her, she said, her whole business was in the next house, so that she got but little, except one night, that there were twenty guineas given to be divided among the servants, when, she said, she got two guineas and a half for her share.

She went on, and told them how many servants there was, and how they were ordered; but, she said there was one Mrs Amy, who was over them all; and that she being the lady's favourite, got a great deal. She did not know, she said, whether Amy was her christian name or her surname; but she supposed it was her surname; that they were told she got threescore pieces of gold at one time, being the same night that the rest of the servants had twenty guineas divided among them.

I put in at that word, and said it was a vast deal to give away; "Why," says I, "it was a portion for a servant."—"O, madam!" says she, "it was nothing to what she got afterwards; we that were servants hated her heartily for it; that is to say, we wished it had been our lot in her stead." Then I said again, "Why, it was enough to get her a good husband, and settle her in the world, if she had sense to manage it."—"So it might, to be sure, madam," says she; "for we were told she laid up above 500*l.*; but, I suppose, Mrs Amy was too sensible that her character would require a good portion to put her off."

"O," said I, "if that was the case, it was another thing."

"Nay," says she, "I don't know but they talked very much of a young lord that was very great with her."

"And pray what came of her at last?" said I; for I was willing to hear a little (seeing she would talk of it) what she had to say, as well of Amy as of myself.

"I don't know, madam," said she, "I never heard of her for several years, till the other day I happened to see her."

"Did you indeed?" says I, (and made mighty strange of it); "what! and in rags, it may be," said I, "that's often the end of such creatures."

"Just the contrary, madam," says she. "She came to visit an acquaintance of mine, little thinking, I suppose, to see me, and, I assure you, she came in her coach."

"In her coach!" said I, "upon my word she had made her market then, I suppose; she made hay while the sun shone; was she married, pray?"

"I believe she had been married, madam," says she, "but it seems she had been at the East Indies; and if she was married, it was there, to be sure. I think she said she had good luck in the Indies."

"That is, I suppose," said I, "she had buried her husband there."

"I understand it so, madam," says she, "and that she had got his estate."

"Was that her good luck?" said I, "it might be good to her, as to the money indeed, but it was but the part of a jade to call it good luck."

Thus far our discourse of Mrs Amy went, and no farther, for she knew no more of her; but then the Quaker unhappily, though undesignedly, put in a question, which the honest, good-humoured creature would have been far from doing if she had known that I carried on the discourse of Amy on purpose to drop Roxana out of the conversation.

But I was not to be made easy too soon. The Quaker put in, "But I think thou said'st something was behind of thy mistress; what didst thou call her, Roxana, was it not? Pray, what became of her?"

"Ay, ay, Roxana," says the captain's wife; "pray, sister, let's hear the story of Roxana; it will divert my lady, I'm sure."

That's a damn'd lie, said I to myself; if you knew how little 'twould divert me, you would have too much advantage over me; well, I saw no remedy, but the story must come on, so I prepared to hear the worst of it.

"Roxana!" says she, "I know not what to think of her; she was so much above us, and so seldom seen, that we could know little of her but by report, but we did sometimes see her too; she was a charming woman indeed, and the footmen used to say that she was to be sent for to court."

"To court," said I, "why she was at court, wa'n't she? the Pall Mall is not far from Whitehall."

"Yes, madam," says I, "but I mean another way."

"I understand thee," says the Quaker; "thou meanest, I suppose, to be mistress to the king."

"Yes, madam," says she.

I cannot help confessing what a reserve of pride still was left in me; and though I dreaded the sequel of the story, yet when she talked how handsome and fine a lady this Roxana was, I could not help being pleased and tickled with it, and put in questions two or three times, of how handsome she was? and was she really so fine a woman as they talked of, and the like, on purpose to hear her repeat what the people's opinion of me was, and how I had behaved.

"Indeed," says she at last, "she was a most beautiful creature as ever I saw in my life."

"But then," said I, "you never had the opportunity to see her but when she was set out to the best advantage."

"Yes, yes, madam," says she, "I have seen her several times in her dishabille. And I can assure you, she was a very fine woman; and that which was more still, everybody said she did not paint."

This was still agreeable to me one way; but there was a devilish sting in the tail of it all, and this last article was one; wherein she said she had seen me several times in my dishabille. This put me in mind that then she must certainly know me, and it would come out at last ; which was death to me but to think of.

"Well, but sister," says the captain's wife, "tell my lady about the ball, that's the best of all the story, and of Roxana's dancing in a fine outlandish dress."

"That's one of the brightest parts of her story indeed," says the girl ; "the case was this : we had balls and meetings in her ladyship's apartments every week almost ; but one time my lady invited all the nobles to come such a time, and she would give them a ball ; and there was a vast crowd indeed," says she.

"I think you said the King was there, sister, didn't you ?"

"No, madam," says she, "that was the second time, when they said the king had heard how finely the Turkish lady danced, and that he was there to see her ; but the king, if his majesty was there, came disguised."

"That is what they call incog.," says my friend the Quaker ; "thou canst not think the king would disguise himself.—"Yes," says the girl, "it was so, he did not come in public with his guards, but we all knew which was the king well enough, that is to say, which they said was the king."

"Well," says the captain's wife, "about the Turkish dress ; pray let us hear that."—"Why," says she, "my lady sat in a fine little drawing-room, which opened into the great room, and where she received the compliments of the company ; and when the dancing began, a great lord," says she, "I forget who they called him, (but he was a very great lord or duke, I don't know which), took her out, and danced with her ; but after a while, my lady on a sudden shut the drawing-room, and run upstairs with her woman, Mrs Amy ; and though she did not stay long (for I suppose she had contrived it all before hand), she came down dressed in the strangest figure that ever I saw in my life ; but it was exceeding fine."

Here she went on to declare the dress, as I have done already ; but did it so exactly, that I was surprised at the manner of her telling it ; there was not a circumstance of it left out.

I was now under a new perplexity ; for this young slut gave so complete an account of every thing in the dress, that my friend the Quaker coloured at it, and looked two or three times at me, to see if I did not do so too ; for (as she told me afterwards) she immediately perceived it was the same dress that she had seen me have on, as I have seen before. However, as she saw I took no notice of it, she kept her thoughts private to herself ; and I did so too, as well as I could.

I put in two or three times that she had a good memory, that could be so particular in every part of such a thing.

"O madam !" says she, "we that were servants, stood by ourselves in a corner, but so as we could see more than some strangers ; besides," said she, "it was all our conversation for several days in the family, and what one did not observe another did."—"Why," says I to her, "this was no Persian dress ; only, I suppose, your lady was some French comedian, that is to say, a stage Amazon, that put on a counterfeit dress to please the company, such as they used in the play of Tamerlane, at Paris, or some such."

"No, indeed, madam," says she, "I assure you, my lady was no actress ; she was a fine modest lady, fit to be a princess ; everybody said, if she was a mistress, she was fit to be a mistress to none but the king ; and they talked her up for the king, as if it had really been so. Besides, madam," says she, "my lady danced a Turkish dance ; all the lords and gentry said it was so ; and one of them swore he had seen it danced in Turkey himself, so that it could not come from the theatre at Paris ; and then the name Roxana," says she, "was a Turkish name."

"Well," said I, "but that was not your lady's name, I suppose."

"No, no, madam," said she, "I know that ; I know my lady's name and family very well ; Roxana was not her name, that's true indeed."

Here she run me aground again, for I durst not ask her what was Roxana's real name, lest she had really dealt with the devil, and had boldly given my own name in for answer : so that I was still more and more afraid that the girl had really gotten the secret somewhere or other ; though I could not imagine neither how that could be.

In a word, I was sick of the discourse, and endeavoured many ways to put an end to it, but it was impossible ; for the captain's wife, who called her sister, prompted her, and pressed her to tell it, most ignorantly thinking that it would be a pleasant tale to all of us.

Two or three times the Quaker put in, that this Lady Roxana had a good stock of assurance ; and that it was likely if she had been in Turkey, she had lived with, or been kept by, some great Bashaw there. But still she would break in upon all such discourse, and fly out into the most extravagant praises of her mistress, the famed Roxana. I run her down as some scandalous woman ; that it was not possible to be otherwise ; but she would not hear of it ; her lady was a person of such and such qualification, that nothing but an angel was like her, to be sure ; and yet, after all she could say, her own account brought her down to this ; that, in short, her lady kept little less than a gaming ordinary ; or, as it would be called in the times since that, an assembly for gallantry and play.

All this while I was very uneasy, as I said before, and yet the old story went off again without any discovery, only that I seemed a little concerned that she should liken me to this gay lady, whose character I pretended to run down very much, even upon the foot of her own relation.

But I was not at the end of my mortification yet, neither ; for now my innocent Quaker threw out an unhappy expression, which put me upon the tenters again. Says she to me, "This lady's habit, I fancy, is just such a one as thine by the description of it ;" and then turning to the captain's wife, says she, "I fancy my friend has a finer Turkish or Persian dress, a great deal."—"O ! says the girl, "'tis impossible to be finer ; my lady's," says she, "was all covered with gold and diamonds ; her hair and head-dress, I forgot the name they gave it," said she, "shone like stars, there was so many jewels in it."

I never wished my good friend the Quaker out of my company before now ; but, indeed, I would have given some guineas to have been rid of her just now ; for beginning to be curious in the comparing the two dresses, she innocently began a description of mine ; and nothing terrified me so much as the apprehension lest she should importune me to show it, which I was resolved I would never agree to. But before it came to this, she pressed my girl to describe the tyhaia, or head-dress ; which she did so cleverly, that the Quaker could not help saying mine was just such a one ; and after several other similitudes, all very vexatious to me, out comes the kind motion to me to let the ladies see my dress ; and they joined their eager desires of it even to importunity.

I desired to be excused, though I had little to say at first why I declined it ; but at last it came into my head to say it was packed up with my other clothes that I had least occasion for, in order to be sent on board the captain's ship ; but that if we lived to come to Holland together, (which, by the way, I resolved should never happen), then, I told them, at unpacking my clothes, they should see me dressed in it ; but they must not expect I should dance in it like the Lady Roxana, in all her fine things.

This carried it off pretty well ; and getting over this, got over most of the rest, and I began to be easy again ; and, in a word, that I may dismiss the story too as soon as may be, I got rid at last of my visitors, who I had wished gone two hours sooner than they intended it.

As soon as they were gone I run up to Amy and gave vent to my passions, by telling her the whole story, and letting her see what mischiefs one false step of hers had like, unluckily, to have involved us all in ; more, perhaps, than we could ever have lived to get through. Amy was sensible of it enough, and was just giving her wrath a vent another way, viz., by calling the poor girl all the damned jades and fools (and sometimes worse names) that she could think of ; in the middle of which up comes my honest good Quaker, and put an end to our discourse. The Quaker came in smiling, (for she was always soberly cheerful), "Well," says she, "thou art delivered at last ; I come to joy thee of it ; I perceived thou wert tired grievously of thy visitors."

"Indeed," says I, "so I was ; that foolish young girl held us all in a Canterbury story, I thought she would never have done with it. Why, truly, I thought she was very careful to let thee know she was but a cook-maid. Ay," says I, "and at a gaming-house, or gaming-ordinary, and at the other end of the town too ; all which (by the way) she might know, would add very little to her good name among us citizens."

"I can't think," says the Quaker "but she had some other drift in that long discourse ; there's something else in her head," says she, "I am satisfied of that." Thought I, are you satisfied of it ? I am sure I am the less satisfied for that ; at least 'tis but small satisfaction to me to hear you say so. What can this be ? says I, and when will my uneasiness have an end ? But this was silent, and to myself, you may be sure. But in answer to my friend, the Quaker, I returned, by asking her a question or two about it ; as what she thought was in it ? and why she thought there was anything in it ? For, says I, she can have nothing in it relating to me.

"Nay," says the kind Quaker, "if she had any view towards thee, that is no business of mine ; and I should be far from desiring thee to inform me."

This alarmed me again ; not that I feared trusting the good-humoured creature with it, if there had been anything of just suspicion in her ; but this affair was a secret I cared not to communicate to anybody. However, I say, this alarmed me a little ; for as I had concealed everything from her, I was willing to do so still ; but as she could not but gather up abundance of things from the girl's discourse, which looked towards me, so she was too penetrating to be put off with such answers as might stop another's mouth. Only there was this double felicity in it, first, that she was not inquisitive to know or find anything out, and not dangerous if she had known the whole story. But, as I say, she could not but gather up several circumstances from the girl's discourse, as particularly the name of Amy, and the several descriptions of the Turkish dress which my friend the Quaker had seen, and taken so much notice of, as I have said before.

As for that, I might have turned it off by jesting with Amy, and asking her who she lived with before she came to live with me ? But that would not do, for we had unhappily anticipated that way of talking, by having often talked how long Amy had lived with me ; and which was still worse, by having owned formerly that I had had lodgings in the Pall-mall ; so that all these things corresponded too well. There was only one thing that helped me out with the Quaker, and that was the girl's having reported how rich Mrs Amy was grown, and that she kept her coach. Now, as there might be many more Mrs Amys besides mine, so it was not likely to be my Amy, because she was far from such a figure as keeping her coach ; and this carried it off from the suspicions which the good friendly Quaker might have in her head.

But as to what she imagined the girl had in her head, there lay more difficulty in that part a great deal, and I was alarmed at it very much, for my friend the Quaker told me she observed that the girl was in a great passion when she talked of the habit, and more when I had been importuned to show her mine, but declined it. She said she several times perceived her to be in disorder, and to restrain herself with great difficulty ; and once or twice she muttered to herself that she had found it out, or that she would find it out, she could not tell whether ; and that she often saw tears in her eyes ; that when I said my suit of Turkish clothes was put up, but that she should see it when we arrived in Holland, she heard her say softly, she would go over on purpose then.

After she had ended her observations, I added, "I observed, too, that the girl looked and talked oddly, and that she was very inquisitive ; but I could not imagine what she aimed at."—"Aimed at," says the Quaker, "'tis plain to me what she aims at. She believes that thou art the same Roxana that danced in the Turkish vest, but she is not certain."—"Does she believe so ?" says I, "If I had thought that, I would have put her out of her pain."—"Believe so !" says the Quaker, "Yes ; and I began to believe so too, and should have believed so still, if thou had'st not satisfied me to the contrary by thy taking no notice of it, and by what thou hast said since."—"Should you have believed so," said I, warmly, "I am very sorry for that. Why, would you have taken me for an actress, or a French stage player?"—"No," says the good, kind creature, "thou carriest it too far; as soon as thou mad'st thy reflections upon her, I knew it could not be; but who could think any other when she described the Turkish dress which thou hast here, with the head tire and jewels, and when she named thy maid Amy too, and several other circumstances concurring? I should certainly have believed it," said she, "if thou hadst not contradicted it; but as soon as I heard thee speak, I concluded it was otherwise."—"That was very kind," said I, "and I am obliged to you for doing me so much justice; it is more, it seems, than that young talking creature does."—"Nay," says the Quaker, "indeed she does not do thee justice; for she as certainly believes it still, as ever she did."—"Does she?" said I;—"Aye," says the Quaker; "and I warrant thee she will make thee another visit about it."—"Will she?" says I; "then I believe I shall downright affront her."—"No, thou shalt not affront her," says she, (full of her good humour and temper,) "I will take that part on my hands, for I will affront her for thee, and not let her see thee." I thought that was a very kind offer, but was at a loss how she would be able to do it; and the thought of seeing her again half distracted me, not knowing that temper she would come in, much less what manner to receive her in; but my fast friend and constant comforter the Quaker said she perceived the girl was impertinent, and that I had no inclination to converse with her, and she was resolved I should not be troubled with her. But I shall have occasion to say more of this presently; for this girl went further yet than I thought she had.

It was now time, as I said before, to take measures with my husband, in order to put off my voyage; so I fell into talk with him one morning, as he was dressing, and while I was in bed; I pretended I was very ill; and as I had but too easy a way to impose upon him, because he so absolutely believed every thing I said, so I managed my discourse so as that he should understand by it I was a breeding, though I did not tell him so.

However, I brought it about so handsomely, that before he went out of the room he came and sat down by the bed-side, and began to talk very seriously to me upon the subject, about my being so every day ill, and that, as he hoped I was with child, he would have me consider well of it, whether I had not best alter my thoughts of the voyage to Holland; for that being sea-sick, and which was worse, if a storm should happen, might be very dangerously in me. And after saying abundance of the kindest things that the kindest of husbands in the world could say, he concluded, that it was his request to me, that I would not think any more of going till after all should be over; but that I would, on the contrary, prepare to lie-in where I was, and where I knew as well as he, I could be very well provided, and very well assisted.

This was just what I wanted; for I had, as you have heard, a thousand good reasons why I should put off the voyage, especially with that creature in company; but I had a mind the putting it off should be at his motion, not my own; and he came into it of himself, just as I would have had it. This gave me an opportunity to hang back a little, and to seem as if I was unwilling: I told him, I could not abide to put him to difficulties and perplexities in his business; that now he had hired the great cabin in the ship, and, perhaps, paid some of the money, and, it may be, taken freight for goods; and to make him break it all off again would be a needless charge to him, or, perhaps, a damage to the captain.

As to that, he said, it was not to be named, and he would not allow it to be any consideration at all; that he could easily pacify the captain of the ship by telling him the reason of it, and that if he did make him some satisfaction for the disappointment, it should not be much.

"But, my dear," says I, "you have not heard me say I am with child, neither can I say so; and if it should not be so at last, then I shall have made a fine piece of work of it indeed; besides," says I, "the two ladies, the captain's wife and her sister, they depend upon our going over, and have made great preparations, and all in compliment to me; what must I say to them?"

"Well, my dear," says he, "if you should not be with child, though I hope you are, yet there is no harm done; the staying three or four months longer in England will be no damage to me, and we can go when we please, when we are sure you are not with child, or when it appearing that you are with child, you shall be down and up again; and as for the captain's wife and sister, leave that part to me; I'll answer for it there shall be no quarrel raised upon the subject; I'll make your excuse to them by the captain himself, so all will be well enough there, I warrant you."

This was as much as I could desire; and thus it rested for a while. I had indeed some anxious thoughts about this impatient girl, but believed that putting off the voyage would have put an end to it all, so I began to be pretty easy; but I found myself mistaken, for I was brought to the point of destruction by her again, and that in the most unaccountable manner imaginable.

My husband, as he and I had agreed, meeting the captain of the ship, took the freedom to tell him, that he was afraid he must disappoint him, for that something had fallen out which had obliged him to alter his measures, and that his family could not be ready to go time enough for him.

"I know the occasion, sir," says the captain; "I hear your lady has got a daughter more than she expected; I give you joy of it."—"What do you mean by that?" says my spouse.—"Nay, nothing," says the captain, "but what I hear the women tattle over the tea-table. I know nothing, but that you do not go the voyage upon it, which I am sorry for; but you know your own affairs," added the captain, "that is no business of mine."

"Well but," says my husband, "I must make you some satisfaction for the disappointment," and so he pulls out his money. "No, no," says the captain; and so they fell to straining their compliments one upon another; but, in short, my spouse gave him three or four guineas, and made him take it; and so the first discourse went off again, and they had no more of it.

But it did not go off so easily with me; for now, in a word, the clouds began to thicken about me, and I had alarms on every side. My husband told me what the captain had said; but very happily took it, that the captain had brought a tale by halves, and having heard it one way, had told it another; and that neither could he understand the captain, neither did the captain understand himself, so he contented himself to tell me, he said, word for word, as the captain delivered it.

How I kept my husband from discovering my disorder you shall hear presently; but let it suffice to say just now, that if my husband did not understand the captain, nor the captain understand himself, yet I understood them both very well; and, to tell the truth, it was a worse shock than ever I had had yet. Invention supplied me, indeed, with a sudden motion to avoid shewing my surprize; for as my spouse and I were sitting by a little table near the fire, I reached out my hand, as if I had intended to take a spoon which lay on the other side, and threw one of the candles off the table; and then snatching it up, started up upon my feet, and stooped to the lap of my gown, and took it in my hand; "O!" says I, "my gown is spoiled; the candle has greased it prodigiously." This furnished me with an excuse to my spouse to break off the discourse for the present, and call Amy down; and Amy not coming presently, I said to him, "My dear, I must run up stairs and put it off, and let Amy clean it a little." So my husband rose up too, and went into a closet where he kept his papers and books, and fetched out a book, and sat down by himself to read.

Glad I was that I had got away, and up I ran to Amy, who, as it happened, was alone. "O, Amy!" says I, "we are all utterly undone." And with that, I burst out a crying, and could not speak a word for a great while.

I cannot help saying, that some very good reflections offered themselves upon this head; it presently occurred—What a glorious testimony it is to the justice of Providence, and to the concern Providence has in guiding all the affairs of men, (even the least as well as the greatest,) that the most secret crimes are, by the most unforeseen accidents, brought to light and discovered.

Another reflection was—How just it is that sin and shame follow one another so constantly at the heels; that they are not like attendants only, but like cause and consequence, necessarily connected one with another; that the crime going before, the scandal is certain to follow; and that it is not in the power of human nature to conceal the first or avoid the last.

"What shall I do, Amy?" said I, as soon as I could speak, "and what will become of me?" And then I cried again so vehemently that I could say no more a great while. Amy was frightened almost out of her wits, but knew nothing what the matter was; but she begged to know, and persuaded me to compose myself, and not to cry so. "Why madam, if my master should come up now," says she, "he will see what a disorder you are in; he will know you have been crying, and then he will want to know the cause of it." With that I broke out again. "O, he knows it already, Amy," says I, "he knows all! It is all discovered, and we are undone!" Amy was thunderstruck now indeed. "Nay," says Amy, "if that be true, we are undone indeed; but that can never be; that is impossible, I am sure."

"No, no," says I, "it is far from impossible, for I tell you it is so;" and by this time, being a little recovered, I told her what discourse my husband and the captain had had together, and what the captain had said. This put Amy into such a hurry, that she cried, she raved, she swore and cursed like a mad thing; then she upbraided me, that I would not let her kill the girl when she would have done it, and that it was all my own doing, and the like. Well, however, I was not for killing the girl yet; I could not bear the thoughts of that neither.

We spent half an hour in these extravagancies, and brought nothing out of them neither; for indeed we could do nothing or say nothing that was to the purpose; for if anything was to come out-of-the-way, there was no hindering it, nor help for; so after thus giving vent to myself by crying, I began to reflect how I had left my spouse below, and what I had pretended to come up for; so I changed my gown that I pretended the candle fell upon, and put on another, and went down.

When I had been down a good while, and found my spouse did not fall into the story again, as I expected, I took heart and called for it. "My dear," said I, "the fall of the candle put you out of your history; won't you go on with it?"—"What history?" says he.—"Why," says I, "about the captain."—"Oh," says he, "I had done with it; I know no more than the captain told a broken piece of news that he had heard by halves, and told more by halves than he heard; namely, of your being with child, and that you could not go the voyage."

I perceived my husband entered not into the thing at all, but took it for a story, which being told two or three times over, was puzzled, and come to nothing; and that all that was meant by it was, what he knew, or thought he knew already, viz., that I was with child, which he wished might be true.

His ignorance was a cordial to my soul, and I cursed them in my thoughts that should ever undeceive him; and as I saw him willing to have the story end there, as not worth being further mentioned, I closed it too; and said, I supposed the captain had it from his wife; she might have found somebody else to make her remarks upon, and so it passed off with my husband well enough, and I was still safe there, where I thought myself in most danger. But I had two uneasinesses still; the first was, lest the captain and my spouse should meet again, and enter into farther discourse about it; the second was, lest the busy impertinent girl should come again, and when she came, how to prevent her seeing Amy, which was an article as material as any of the rest ; for seeing Amy would have been as fatal to me as her knowing all the rest.

As to the first of these, I knew the captain could not stay in town above a week ; but that his ship being already full of goods, and fallen down the river, he must soon follow ; so I contrived to carry my husband somewhere out of town for a few days, that they might be sure not to meet.

My greatest concern was where we should go. At last I fixed upon North-Hall ; not, I said, that I would drink the waters, but that I thought the air was good, and might be for my advantage. He, who did everything upon the foundation of obliging me, readily came into it, and the coach was appointed to be ready the next morning ; but as we were settling matters, he put in an ugly word that thwarted all my designs ; and that was, that he had rather I would stay till afternoon, for that he should speak to the captain next morning, if he could, to give him some letters, which he could do, and be back again about twelve o'clock.

I said—"Ay, by all means." But it was a cheat on him ; and my voice and my heart differed ; for I resolved, if possible, he should not come near the captain, nor see him, whatever came of it.

In the evening therefore, a little before we went to bed, I pretended to have altered my mind, and that I would not go to North Hall, but I had a mind to go another way ; but I told him I was afraid his business would not permit him ; he wanted to know where it was. I told him, smiling, I would not tell him, lest it should oblige him to hinder his business. He answered with the same temper, but with infinitely more sincerity, that he had no business of such consequence as to hinder him going with me anywhere I had a mind to go. "Yes," says I, "you want to speak with the captain before he goes away." "Why, that's true," says he, "so I do," and paused a while ; and then added—"But I'll write a note to a man that does business for me, to go to him ; it is only to get some bills of lading signed, and he can do it." When I saw I had gained my point, I seemed to hang back a little. "My dear," says I, "don't hinder an hour's business for me ; I can put it off for a week or two, rather than you shall do yourself any prejudice." "No, no," says he, "you shall not put off an hour for me ; for I can do my business by proxy with anybody but my wife." And then he took me in his arms and kissed me. How did my blood flush up into my face, when I reflected how sincerely, how affectionately this good-humoured gentleman embraced this most cursed piece of hypocrisy that ever came into the arms of an honest man ! His was all tenderness, and the utmost sincerity ; mine all grimace and deceit—a piece of mere menage, and framed conduct to conceal a passed life of wickedness, and prevent his discovering that he had in his arms a she-devil, whose whole conversation for twenty-five years had been black as hell, a complication of crimes ; and for which, had he been let into it, he must have abhorred me, and the very mention of my name. But there was no help for me in it ; all I had to satisfy myself was, that it was my business to be what I was, and conceal what

I had been ; that all the satisfaction I could make him was to live virtuously for the time to come, not being able to retrieve what had been in time past ; and this I resolved upon, though had the, great temptation offered, as it did afterwards, I had reason to question my stability. But of that hereafter.

After my husband had thus kindly given up his measures to mine, we resolved to set out in the morning early. I told him that my project, if he liked it, was to go to Tunbridge, and he, being entirely passive in the thing, agreed to it with the greatest willingness ; but said, if I had not named Tunbridge, he would have named Newmarket, there being a great court there, and abundance of fine things to be seen. I offered him another piece of hypocrisy here, for I pretended to be willing to go thither, as the place of his choice, but indeed I would not have gone for a thousand pounds ; for the court being there at that time, I durst not run the hazard of being known at a place where there were so many eyes that had seen me before. So that, after some time, I told my husband that I thought Newmarket was so full of people at that time, that we should get no accommodation ; that seeing the court and the crowd was no entertainment to me, unless as it might be so to him, that if he thought fit, we would rather put it off for another time ; and that if, when we went to Holland, we should go by Harwich, we might take round by Newmarket and Bury, and so come to Ipswich, and go from thence to the sea-side. He was easily put off from this, as he was from anything else that I did not approve ; and so with all imaginable facility he appointed to be ready early in the morning to go with me for Tunbridge.

I had a double design in this, viz.—first, to get away my spouse from seeing the captain any more ; and secondly, to be out of the way myself, in case this impertinent girl, who was now my plague, should offer to come again, as my friend the Quaker believed she would, and as indeed happened within two or three days afterwards.

Having thus secured my going away the next day, I had nothing to do but to furnish my faithful agent the Quaker with some instruction what to say to this tormentor, (for such she proved afterwards,) and how to manage her, if she made any more visits than ordinary.

I had a great mind to leave Amy behind too, as an assistant, because she understood so perfectly well what to advise upon any emergency ; and Amy importuned me to do so ; but I know not what secret impulse prevailed over my thoughts against it ; I could not do it, for fear the wicked jade should make her away, which my very soul abhorred the thoughts of ; which, however, Amy found means to bring to pass afterwards, as I may in time relate more particularly.

It is true I wanted as much to be delivered from her as ever a sick man did from a third-day ague ; and had she dropped into the grave by any fair way, as I may call it,—I mean, had she died of any ordinary distemper, I should have shed but very few tears for her. But I was not arrived to such a pitch of obstinate wickedness as to commit murder, especially such as to murder my own child, or so much as to harbour a thought so barbarous in my mind. But, as I said, Amy effected all afterwards, without my knowledge, for which I gave her my hearty curse, though I could do little more; for to have fallen upon Amy had been to have murdered myself. But this tragedy requires a longer story than I have room for here. I return to my journey.

My dear friend the Quaker was kind, and yet honest, and would do anything that was just and upright to serve me, but nothing wicked or dishonourable. That she might be able to say boldly to the creature, if she came, she did not know where I was gone, she desired I would not let her know; and to make her ignorance the more absolutely safe to herself, and likewise to me, I allowed her to say that she heard us talk of going to Newmarket, &c. She liked that part, and I left all the rest to her, to act as she thought fit, only charged her, that if the girl entered into the story of the Pallmall, she should not entertain much talk about it, but let her understand, that we all thought she spoke of it a little too particularly: and that the lady (meaning me) took it a little ill, to be so likened to a public mistress, or a stage-player, and the like; and so to bring her, if possible, to say no more of it. However, though I did not tell my friend the Quaker how to write to me, or where I was, yet I left a sealed paper with her maid to give her, in which I gave her a direction how to write to Amy, and so in effect to myself.

It was but a few days after I was gone, but the impatient girl came to my lodgings on pretence to see how I did, and to hear if I intended to go the voyage, and the like. My trusty agent was at home, and received her coldly at the door; but told her that the lady, which she supposed she meant, was gone from her house.

This was a full stop to all she could say for a good while; but as she stood musing some time at the door, considering what to begin a talk upon, she perceived my friend the Quaker looked a little uneasy, as if she wanted to go in and shut the door, which stung her to the quick; and the wary Quaker had not so much as asked her to come in; for seeing her alone, she expected she would be very impertinent, and concluded that I did not care how coldly she received her.

But she was not to be put off so. She said if the Lady — was not to be spoken with, she desired to speak two or three words with her, meaning my friend the Quaker. Upon that the Quaker civilly, but coldly, asked her to walk in, which was what she wanted. Note.—She did not carry her into her best parlour, as formerly, but into a little outer room, where the servants usually waited.

By the first of her discourse she did not stick to insinuate as if she believed I was in the house, but was unwilling to be seen; and pressed earnestly that she might speak but two words with me; to which she added earnest entreaties, and at last tears.

"I am sorry," says my good old creature, the Quaker, "thou hast so ill an opinion of me as to think I would tell thee an untruth, and say that the Lady — was gone from my house, if she was not! I assure thee I did not use any such method; nor does the Lady — desire any such kind of service from me, as I know of. If she had been in the house I should have told thee so."

She said little to that; but said, "It was business of the utmost importance that she desired to speak with me about; and then cried again very much.

"Thou seemest to be sorely afflicted," says the Quaker; "I wish I could give thee any relief; but if nothing will comfort thee but seeing the Lady —, it is not in my power."

"I hope it is," says she again; "to be sure, it is of great consequence to me; so much, that I am undone without it."

"Thou troublest me very much to hear thee say so," says the Quaker; "but why, then, didst thou not speak to her apart when thou wast here before?"

"I had no opportunity," says she, "to speak to her alone, and I could not do it in company; if I could have spoken but two words to her alone I would have thrown myself at her feet, and asked her blessing."

"I am surprised at thee; I do not understand thee," says the Quaker.

"O!" says she, "stand my friend, if you have any charity, or if you have any compassion for the miserable; for I am utterly undone!"

"Thou terrifiest me," says the Quaker, "with such passionate expressions! for verily I cannot comprehend thee!"

"O!" says she, "she is my mother! she is my mother! and she does not own me!"

"Thy mother!" says the Quaker; and began to be greatly moved indeed; "I am astonished at thee; what dost thou mean?"

"I mean nothing but what I say," says she; "I say again, she is my mother! and will not own me;" and with that she stopped with a flood of tears.

"Not own thee!" says the Quaker; and the tender creature wept too; "why, she says she does not know thee, and never saw thee before."

"No," says the girl, "I believe she does not know me, but I know her; and I know that she is my mother."

"It's impossible! thou talkest mystery!" says the Quaker; "wilt thou explain thyself a little to me?"

"Yes, yes," says she, "I can explain it well enough; I am sure she is my mother, and I have broke my heart to search for her; and to lose her again, when I was so sure I had found her, will break my heart more effectually."

"Well, but if she by thy mother," says the Quaker, "how can it be that she should not know thee?"

"Alas!" says she, "I have been lost to her ever since I was a child; she has never seen me."

"And hast thou never seen her?" says the Quaker.

"Yes," says she, "I have seen her, often enough, I saw her; for when she was the Lady Roxana I was her housemaid, being a servant, but I did not know her then, nor she me; but it has all come out since. Has she not a maid named Amy?" Note.—The honest Quaker was nonplussed, and greatly surprised at that question.

"True," she says; "the Lady — has several women servants, but I do not know all their names."

"But her woman, her favourite," adds the girl; "is not her name Amy?"

"Why, truly," says the Quaker, with a very happy turn of wit, "I do not like to be examined; but lest thou shouldst take up any mistakes, by reason of my backwardness to speak, I will answer thee for once, that what her woman's name is I know not; but they call her Cherry."

N.B.—My husband gave her that name in jest, on our wedding day, and we had called her by it ever after; so that she spoke literally true at that time.

The girl replied very modestly, that she was sorry if she gave her any offence in asking; that she did not design to be rude to her, or pretend to examine her; but that she was in such an agony at this disaster that she knew not what she did or said; and that she should be very sorry to disoblige her, but begged of her again, as she was a Christian and a woman, and had been a mother of children, that she would take pity on her, and, if possible, assist her, so that she might but come to me, and speak a few words to me.

The tender-hearted Quaker told me the girl spoke this with such moving eloquence, that it forced tears from her; but she was obliged to say, that she neither knew where I was gone, or how to write to me; but that if she did ever see me again she would not fail to give me an account of all we had said to her, or that she should yet think fit to say; and to take my answer to it, if I thought fit to give any.

Then the Quaker took the freedom to ask a few particulars about this wonderful story, as she called it; at which the girl, beginning at the first distresses of my life, and indeed of her own, went through all the history of her miserable education, her service under the Lady Roxana, as she called me, and her relief by Mrs Amy, with the reasons she had to believe that as Amy owned herself to be the same that lived with her mother, and especially that Amy was the Lady Roxana's maid, too, and came out of France with her, she was by those circumstances, and several others in her conversation, as fully convinced that the lady Roxana was her mother as she was that the Lady — at her house (the Quaker's), was the very same Roxana that she had been servant to.

My good friend, the Quaker, though terribly shocked at the story, and not well knowing what to say, yet was too much my friend to seem convinced in a thing, which, if it was true, she could see plainly I had a mind should not be known; so she turned her discourse to argue the girl out of it. She insisted upon the slender evidence she had of the fact itself, and the rudeness of claiming so near a relation of one so much above her, and of whose concern in it she had no knowledge, at least, no sufficient proof; that as the lady at her house was a person above any disguises, so she could not believe that she would deny her being her daughter, if she was really her mother; that she was able sufficiently to have provided for her if she had not a mind to have her known; and, therefore, seeing she had heard all she had said of the Lady Roxana, and was so far from owning herself to be the person, that she had censured that sham lady as a cheat and common woman; and that it was certain she could never be brought to own a name and character she had so justly exposed.

Besides, she told her that her lodger, meaning me, was not a sham lady, but the real wife of a knight baronet; and that she knew her to be honestly such, and far above such a person as she had described. She then added that she had another reason why it was not very possible to be true, and that is, says she, "Thy age is in the way; for thou acknowledgest that thou art four-and-twenty years old; and that thou wast the youngest of three of thy mother's children; so that by thy account thy mother must be extremely young, or this lady cannot be thy mother; for thou seest," says she, "and any one may see, she is but a young woman now, and cannot be supposed to be above forty years old, if she is so much; and is now big with child at her going into the country; so that I cannot give any credit to thy notion of her being thy mother; and if I might counsel thee it should be to give over that thought as an improbable story that does but serve to disorder thee, and disturb thy head; for," added she, "I perceive thou art much disturbed indeed."

But this was all nothing: she could be satisfied with nothing but seeing me; but the Quaker defended herself very well, and insisted on it, that she could not give her any account of me; and finding her still importunate, she affected at last, being a little disgusted that she should not believe her, and added, that indeed, if she had known where I was gone, she would not have given any one an account of it, unless I had given her orders to do so; "but seeing she has not acquainted me," says she, "where she is gone, 'tis an intimation to me, she was not desirous it should be publicly known;" and with this she rose up, which was as plain a desiring her to rise up too and begone, as could be expressed, except the downright showing her the door.

Well, the girl rejected all this, and told her, she could not indeed expect that she (the Quaker) should be affected with the story she had told her, however moving, or that she should take any pity on her. That it was her misfortune, that when she was at the house before, and in the room with me, she did not beg to speak a word with me in private, or throw herself upon the floor at my feet, and claim what the affection of a mother would have done for her; but since she had slipped her opportunity, she would wait for another; that she found by her (the Quaker's) talk, that she had not quite left her lodgings, but was gone into the country, she supposed, for the air; and she was resolved she would take so much knight-errantry upon her, that she would visit all the airing places in the nation, and even all the kingdom over, ay, and Holland too, but she would find me; for she was satisfied she could so convince me that she was my own child, that I would not deny it; and she was sure I was so tender and compassionate I would not let her perish after I was convinced that she was my own flesh and blood ; and in saying she would visit all the airing-places in England, she reckoned them all up by name, and began with Tunbridge, the very place I was gone to ; then reckoning up Epsom, North Hall, Barnet, Newmarket, Bury, and at last, the Bath ; and with this she took her leave.

My faithful agent the Quaker, failed not to write to me immediately ; but as she was a cunning, as well as an honest woman, it presently occurred to her that this was a story which, whether true or false, was not very fit to come to my husband's knowledge ; that as she did not know what I might have been, or might have been called in former times, and how far there might have been something or nothing in it, so she thought if it was a secret, I ought to have the telling it myself ; and if it was not, it might as well be public afterwards as now ; and that, at least, she ought not to leave it where she found it, and hand it forwards to anybody without my consent. These prudent measures were inexpressibly kind, as well as seasonable ; it had been likely enough that her letter might have come publicly to me, and though my husband would not have opened it, yet it would have looked a little odd that I should conceal its contents from him, when I had pretended so much to communicate all my affairs.

In consequence of this wise caution, my good friend only wrote me a few words, that the impertinent young woman had been with her, as she expected she would ; and that she thought it would be convenient that, if I could spare Cherry, I would send her up, (meaning Amy), because she found there might be some occasion for her.

As it happened this letter was inclosed to Amy herself, and not sent by the way I had at first ordered ; but it came safe to my hands ; and though I was alarmed a little at it, yet I was not acquainted with the danger I was in of an immediate visit from this teasing creature till afterwards ; and I run a greater risk, indeed, than ordinary in that I did not send Amy up under fourteen days, believing myself as much concealed at Tunbridge as if I had been at Vienna.

But the concern of my faithful spy, (for such my Quaker was now, upon the mere foot of her own sagacity), I say, her concern for me, was my safety in this exigence, when I was, as it were, keeping no guard for myself ; for, finding Amy not come up, and that she did not know how soon this wild thing might put her designed ramble in practice, she sent a messenger to the captain's wife's house, where she lodged, to tell her that she wanted to speak with her. She was at the heels of the messenger, and came eager for some news ; and hoped, she said, the lady, (meaning me), had been come to town.

The Quaker, with as much caution as she was mistress of, not to tell a downright lie, made her believe she expected to hear of me very quickly ; and frequently, by the bye, speaking of being abroad to take the air, talked of the country, about Bury, how pleasant it was, how wholesome, and how fine an air ; how the downs about Newmarket were exceeding fine ; and what a vast deal of company there was, now the court was there ; till at last, the girl began to conclude, that my ladyship was gone thither ; for, she said, she knew I loved to see a great deal of company.

"Nay," says my friend, "thou takest me wrong, I did not suggest," says she, "that the person thou enquirest after is gone thither, neither do I believe she is, I assure thee." Well, the girl smiled, and let her know that she believed it for all that ; so, to clench it fast, "Verily," says she, with great seriousness, "thou dost not do well, for thou suspectest everything and believest nothing. I speak solemnly to thee that I do not believe they are gone that way ; so if thou givest thyself the trouble to go that way, and art disappointed, do not say that I have deceived thee." She knew well enough that if this did abate her suspicion it would not remove it ; and that it would do little more than amuse her ; but by this she kept her in suspense till Amy came up, and that was enough.

When Amy came up she was quite confounded to hear the relation which the Quaker gave her, and found means to acquaint me of it ; only letting me know, to my great satisfaction, that she would not come to Tunbridge first ; but that she would certainly go to Newmarket or Bury first.

However, it gave me very great uneasiness ; for as she resolved to ramble in search after me over the whole country, I was safe no where, no, not in Holland itself ; so, indeed, I did not know what to do with her ; and thus I had a bitter in all my sweet, for I was continually perplexed with this hussy, and thought she haunted me like an evil spirit.

In the mean time Amy was next door to stark-mad about her ; she durst not see her at my lodgings for her life ; and she went days without number to Spitalfields, where she used to come, and to her former lodging, and could never meet with her ; at length she took up a mad resolution that she would go directly to the captain's house in Rotherhithe, and speak with her ; it was a mad step, that's true ; but as Amy said she was mad, so nothing she could do could be otherwise. For if Amy had found her at Rotherhithe, she (the girl) would have concluded presently that the Quaker had given her notice, and so that we were all of a knot ; and that, in short, all she had said was right. But as it happened, things came to hit better than we expected ; for that Amy going out of a coach to take water at Tower Wharf, meets the girl just come on shore, having crossed the water from Rotherhithe. Amy made as if she would have passed by her, though they met so full that she did not pretend she did not see her, for she looked fairly upon her first ; but then turning her head away with a slight, offered to go from her ; but the girl stopped, and spoke first, and made some manners to her

Amy spoke coldly to her, and a little angry ; and after some words, standing in the street, or passage, the girl saying she seemed to be angry, and would not have spoken to her, "Why," says Amy, "how can you expect I should have any more to say to you after I had done so much for you, and you have behaved so to me ?" The girl seemed to take no notice of that now, but answered—"I was going to wait on you now."—

"Wait on me!" says Amy; "What do you mean by that?"—"Why," says she again, with a kind of familiarity, "I was going to your lodgings."

Amy was provoked to the last degree at her, and yet she thought it was not her time to resent, because she had a more fatal and wicked design in her head against her; which, indeed, I never knew till after it was executed, nor durst Amy ever communicate it to me; for as I had always expressed myself vehemently against hurting a hair of her head, so she was resolved to take her own measures without consulting me any more.

In order to this, Amy gave her good words, and concealed her resentment as much as she could; and when she talked of going to her lodging Amy smiled, and said nothing, but called for a pair of oars to go to Greenwich; and asked her, seeing she said she was going to her lodging, to go along with her, for she was going home, and was all alone.

Amy did this with such a stock of assurance that the girl was confounded, and knew not what to say; but the more she hesitated the more Amy pressed her to go; and talking very kindly to her, told her if she did not go to see her lodgings she might go to keep her company, and she would pay a boat to bring her back again; so, in a word, Amy prevailed on her to go into the boat with her, and carried her down to Greenwich.

'Tis certain Amy had no more business at Greenwich than I had; nor was she going thither; but we were all hampered to the last degree with the impertinence of this creature; and in particular I was horribly perplexed with it.

As they were in the boat Amy began to reproach her with ingratitude in treating her so rudely who had done so much for her, and been so kind to her; and to ask her what she had got by it, or what she expected to get. Then came in my share, the Lady Roxana. Amy jested with that, and bantered her a little; and asked her if she had found her yet.

But Amy was both surprised and enraged when the girl told her roundly that she thanked her for what she had done for her, but that she would not have her think she was so ignorant as not to know that what she (Amy) had done was by her mother's order, and who she was beholding to for it. That she could never make instruments pass for principals, and pay the debt to the agent, when the obligation was all to the original. That she knew well enough who she was, and who she was employed by. That she knew the Lady — very well, (naming the name that I now went by), which was my husband's true name, and by which she might know whether she had found out her mother or no.

Amy wished her at the bottom of the Thames; and had there been no waterman in the boat, and nobody in sight, she swore to me she would have thrown her into the river. I was horribly disturbed when she told me this story, and began to think this would, at last, all end in my ruin; but when Amy spoke of throwing her into the river and drowning her, I was so provoked at her that all my rage turned against Amy, and I fell thoroughly out with her. I had now kept Amy almost thirty years and found her on all occasions the faithfulest creature to me that ever woman had; I say, faithful to me; for, however wicked she was, still she was true to me; and even this rage of hers was all upon my account, and for fear any mischief should befall me.

But be that how it would, I could not bear the mention of her murdering the poor girl, and it put me so beside myself, that I rose up in a rage, and bade her get out of my sight, and out of my house; told her I had kept her too long, and that I would never see her face more. I had before told her that she was a murderer, and a bloody-minded creature; that she could not but know that I could not bear the thoughts of it, much less the mention of it; and that it was the impudentest thing that ever was known to make such a proposal to me, when she knew that I was really the mother of this girl, and that she was my own child; that it was wicked enough in her, but that she must conclude I was ten times wickeder than herself if I could come into it. That the girl was in the right, and I had nothing to blame her for; but that it was owing to the wickedness of my life that made it necessary for me to keep her from a discovery; but that I would not murder my child, though I was otherwise to be ruined by it; Amy replied somewhat rough and short, would I not, but she would, she said, if she had an opportunity; and upon these words it was that I bade her get out of my sight and out of my house; and it went so far that Amy packed up up her alls, and marched off, and was gone for almost good and all. But of that, in its order, I must go back to the relation of the voyage which they made to Greenwich together.

They held on the wrangle all the way by water; the girl insisted upon knowing of her, that I was her mother, and told all the history of my life in the Pallmall, as well after her being turned away as before; and of my marriage since, and which was worse, not only who my present husband was, but where he had lived, viz. at Roan in France. She knew nothing of Paris, or of where we were going to live, namely, at Nimeguen; but told her in so many words, that if she could not find me here, she would go to Holland after me.

They landed at Greenwich, and Amy carried her into the Park with her, and they walked about two hours there in the farthest and remotest walks; which Amy did, because as they talked with great heat, it was apparent they were quarrelling, and the people took notice of it.

They walked till they came almost to the wilderness, at the south side of the park; but the girl perceiving Amy offered to go there among the woods and trees, stopped short there, and would go no farther; but said she would not go in there.

Amy smiled, and asked her what was the matter? She replied short, she did not know where she was, nor where she was going to carry her, and she would go no farther; and without any more ceremony, turns back, and walks apace away from her. Amy owned she was surprised, and came back too, and called to her, and asked her what she meant?

The girl boldly replied she did not know but she might murder her; and that, in short, she would not trust herself with her, and never would come into her company again alone.

It was very provoking, but, however, Amy kept her temper, with much difficulty, and bore it, knowing that much might depend upon it; so she mocked her foolish jealousy, and told her she need not be uneasy for her, she would do her no harm, and would have done her good, if she would have let her; but since she was of such a refractory humour, she should not trouble herself, for she should never come into her company again; and that neither she, or her brother, or sister, should ever hear from her, or see her any more; and so she should have the satisfaction of being the ruin of her brother and sister, as well as of herself.

The girl seemed a little mollified at that, and said, that for herself, she knew the worst of it, she could seek her fortune; but it was hard her brother and sister should suffer on her score; and something that was tender and well enough, on that account. But Amy told her it was for her to take that into consideration; for she would let her see that it was all her own; that she would have done them all good, but that having been used thus, she would do no more for any of them; and that she should not need to be afraid to come into her company again, for she would never give her occasion for it any more. This, by the way, was false in the girl, too; for she did venture into Amy's company again after that once too much, as I shall relate by itself.

They grew cooler, however, afterwards, and Amy carried her into a house at Greenwich, where she was acquainted, and took an occasion to leave the girl in a room a while, to speak to the people in the house, and so prepare them to own her as a lodger in the house; and then going in to her again, told her, there she lodged, if she had a mind to find her out, or if anybody else had anything to say to her. And so Amy dismissed her, and got rid of her again; and finding an empty hackney-coach in the town, came away by land to London, and the girl, going down to the water side, came by boat.

This conversation did not answer Amy's end at all, because it did not secure the girl from pursuing her design of hunting me out; and though my indefatigable friend the Quaker amused her three or four days, yet I had such notice of it at last, that I thought fit to come away from Tunbridge upon it; and where to go I knew not: but, in short, I went to a little village upon Epping Forest, called Woodford, and took lodgings in a private house, where I lived retired about six weeks, till I thought she might be tired of her search, and have given me over.

Here I received an account from my trusty Quaker, that the wench had really been at Tunbridge, had found out my lodgings, and had told her tale in a most dismal tone; that she had followed us, as she thought, to London; but the Quaker had answered her, that she knew nothing of it, which was indeed true; and had admonished her to be easy, and not to hunt after people of such fashion as we were, as if we were thieves; that she might be assured, that since I was not willing to see her, I would not be forced to do it; and treating me thus would effectually disoblige me. And with such discourses as these she quieted her; and she (the Quaker) added, that she hoped I should not be troubled much more with her.

It was in this time that Amy gave me the history of her Greenwich voyage, when she spoke of drowning and killing the girl in so serious a manner, and with such an apparent resolution of doing it, that, as I said, put me in a rage with her, so that I effectually turned her away from me, as I have said above, and she was gone; nor did she so much as tell me whither, or which way she was gone; on the other hand, when I came to reflect on it, that I now had neither assistant nor confidant to speak to, or receive the least information from, my friend the Quaker excepted, it made me very uneasy.

I waited, and expected, and wondered, from day to day, still thinking Amy would one time or other think a little, and come again, or at least, let me hear of her; but for ten days together I heard nothing of her. I was so impatient, that I got neither rest by day or sleep by night, and what to do I knew not. I durst not go to town to the Quaker's, for fear of meeting that vexatious creature, my girl, and I could get no intelligence where I was; so I got my spouse, on pretence of wanting her company, to take the coach one day and fetch my good Quaker to me.

When I had her, I durst ask her no questions, nor hardly knew which end of the business to begin to talk of; but of her own accord, she told me, that the girl had been three or four times haunting her for news from me; and that she had been so troublesome, that she had been obliged to shew herself a little angry with her; and at last, told her plainly that she need give herself no trouble in searching after me by her means; for she (the Quaker) would not tell her, if she knew; upon which she refrained a while. But on the other hand, she told me it was not safe for me to send my coach for her to come in, for she had some reason to believe that she (my daughter) watched her door night and day; nay, and watched her, too, every time she went in and out; for she was so bent upon a discovery that she spared no pains, and she believed she had taken a lodging very near their house for that purpose.

I could hardly give her a hearing of all this, for my eagerness to ask for Amy; but I was confounded when she told me she had heard nothing of her. It is impossible to express the anxious thoughts that rolled about in my mind, and continually perplexed me about her; particularly, I reproached myself with my rashness in turning away so faithful a creature, that in so many years had not only been a servant but an agent; and not only an agent, but a friend, and a faithful friend too.

Then I considered, too, that Amy knew all the secret history of my life,—had been in all the intrigues of it, and been a party in both evil and good,—and at best, there was no policy in it; that as it was very ungenerous and unkind to run things to such an extremity with her, and for an occasion, too, in which all the fault she was guilty of was owing to her excessive care for my safety; so it must be only her steady kindness to me, and an excess of generous friendship for me, that should keep her from ill-using me in return for it ; which ill-using me was enough in her power, and might be my utter undoing.

These thoughts perplexed me exceedingly, and what course to take I really did not know. I began indeed to give Amy quite over, for she had been gone above a fortnight ; and as she had taken away all her clothes, and her money too, which was not a little, and so had no occasion of that kind to come any more, so she had not left any word where she was gone, or to which part of the world I might send to hear of her.

And I was troubled on another account too, viz., that my spouse and I too had resolved to do very handsomely for Amy, without considering what she might have got another way at all ; but we had said nothing of it to her ; and so I thought, as she had not known what was likely to fall in her way, she had not the influence of that expectation to make her come back.

Upon the whole, the perplexity of this girl, who hunted me as if, like a hound, she had had a hot scent, but was now at a fault,—I say, that perplexity, and this other part, of Amy being gone, issued in this, I resolved to be gone, and go over to Holland ; there, I believed, I should be at rest. So I took occasion one day to tell my spouse, that I was afraid he might take it ill that I had amused him thus long, and that, at last, I doubted I was not with child ; and that, since it was so, our things being packed up, and all in order for going to Holland, I would go away now, when he pleased.

My spouse, who was perfectly easy, whether in going or staying, left it all entirely to me ; so I considered of it, and began to prepare again for the voyage. But alas ! I was irresolute to the last degree. I was, for want of Amy, destitute ; I had lost my right hand ; she was my steward, gathered in my rents,—I mean my interest money,—and kept my accounts ; and, in a word, did all my business ; and without her, indeed, I knew not how to go away, or how to stay. But an accident thrust itself in here, and that even in Amy's conduct, too, which frightened me away, and without her, too, in the utmost horror and confusion.

I have related how my faithful friend the Quaker was come to me, and what account she gave me of her being continually haunted by my daughter ; and that, as she said, she watched her very door night and day. The truth was, she set a spy to watch so effectually, that she (the Quaker) neither went in nor out but she had notice of it.

This was too evident, when the next morning after she came to me, (for I kept her all night,) to my unspeakable surprise, I saw a hackney-coach stop at the door where I lodged, and saw her (my daughter) in the coach all alone. It was a very good chance, in the middle of a bad one, that my husband had taken out the coach that very morning, and was gone to London. As for me, I had neither life nor soul left in me ; I was so confounded, I knew not what to do or to say.

My happy visitor had more presence of mind than I, and asked me if I had no acquaintance among the neighbours. I told her—Yes, there was a lady lodged two doors off that I was very intimate with. “But hast thou no way out backward to go to her ?” says she. Now it happened there was a back-door in the garden, by which we usually went and come to and from the house ; so I told her of it. “Well, well,” says she, “go out and make a visit, then, and leave the rest to me.” Away I run, told the lady (for I was very free there,) that I was a widow to-day, my spouse being gone to London, so I came, not to visit her, but to dwell with her that day ; because, also, our landlady had got strangers from London. So having framed this orderly lie, I pulled some work out of my pocket, and added, “I did not come to be idle.”

As I went out one way, my friend the Quaker went the other, to receive this unwelcome guest. The girl made but little ceremony ; but having bid the coachman ring at the gate, gets down out of the coach, and comes to the door ; a country girl going to the door, (belonging to the house,) for the Quaker forbid any of my maids going. Madam asked for my Quaker by name, and the girl asked her to walk in.

Upon this, my Quaker, seeing there was no hanging back, goes to her immediately, but put on all the gravity upon her countenance that she was mistress of,—and that was not a little, indeed.

When she (the Quaker) came into the room, (for they had shewed my daughter into a little parlour,) she kept her grave countenance, but said not a word ; nor did my daughter speak a good while ; but after some time, my girl began, and said—“I suppose you know me, madam ?”

“Yes,” says the Quaker, “I know thee.”—And so the dialogue went on.

Girl. Then you know my business, too.

Quaker. No, verily, I do not know any business thou canst have here with me.

G. Indeed, my business is not chiefly with you.

Q. Why, then, dost thou come after me thus far ?

G. You know whom I seek. [And with that she cried.]

Q. But why shouldst thou follow me for her, since thou knowest that I assured thee more than once that I knew not where she was ?

G. But I hoped you could.

Q. Then thou must hope that I did not speak the truth, which would be very wicked.

G. I doubt not but she is in this house.

Q. If those be thy thoughts, thou mayest enquire in the house ; so thou hast no more business with me. Farewell ! [Offers to go.]

G. I would not be uncivil ; I beg you to let me see her.

Q. I am here to visit some of my friends, and I think thou art not very civil in following me hither.

G. I came in hopes of a discovery in my great affair which you know of.

Q. Thou camest widely, indeed ; I counsel thee to go back again, and be easy ; I shall keep my word with thee, that I would not meddle in it, nor give thee any account, if I knew it, unless I had her orders.

G. If you knew my distress, you could not be so cruel.

Q. Thou hast told me all thy story, and I think it might be more cruelty to tell thee than not to tell thee; for I understand she is determined not to see thee, and declares she is not thy mother. Wilt thou be owned where thou hast no relation?

G. O, if I could speak to her, I would prove my relation to her so that she could not deny it any longer.

Q. Well, but thou canst not come to speak with her, it seems.

G. I hope you will tell me if she is here; I had a good account that you were come out to see her, and that she sent for you.

Q. I much wonder how thou couldst have such an account. If I had come out to see her, thou hast happened to miss the house, for I assure thee she is not to be found in this house.

Here the girl importuned her again with the utmost earnestness, and cried bitterly, insomuch, that my poor Quaker was softened with it, and began to persuade me to consider of it, and, if it might consist with my affairs, to see her, and hear what she had to say; but this was afterwards. I return to the discourse.

The Quaker was perplexed with her a long time; she talked of sending back the coach, and lying in the town all night. This, my friend knew would be very uneasy to me, but she durst not speak a word against it; but on a sudden thought, she offered a bold stroke, which, though dangerous if it happened wrong, had its desired effect.

She told her, that as for dismissing her coach, that was as she pleased; she believed she would not easily get a lodging in the town; but that as she was in a strange place, she would so much befriend her, that she would speak to the people of the house, that if they had room, she might have a lodging there for one night, rather than be forced back to London, before she was free to go.

This was a cunning, though a dangerous step, and it succeeded accordingly, for it amused the creature entirely, and she presently concluded, that really I could not be there then; otherwise she would never have asked her to lie in the house; so she grew cold again presently as to her lodging there, and said,—No, since it was so, she would go back that afternoon, but she would come back again in two or three days, and search that and all the surrounding towns in an effectual manner, if she staid a week or two to do it; for in short, if I was in England or Holland, she would find me.

“In truth,” says the Quaker, “thou wilt make me very hurtful to thee, then.”—“Why so?” says she. “Because wherever I go, thou wilt put thyself to great expense, and the country to a great deal of unnecessary trouble.”—“Not unnecessary,” says she. “Yes, truly,” says the Quaker; “it must be unnecessary, because it will be to no purpose. I think I must abide in my house, to save thee that charge and trouble.”

She said little to that, except that, she said, she would give her as little trouble as possible; but she was afraid she should sometimes be uneasy to her, which she hoped she would excuse. My Quaker told her, she would much rather excuse her, if she would forbear; for that, if she would believe her, she would assure her, she should never get any intelligence of me by her.

That set her into tears again; but after a while, recovering herself, she told her,—Perhaps she might be mistaken; and she (the Quaker) should watch herself very narrowly, or she might one time or another get some intelligence from her, whether she would or no; and she was satisfied she had gained some of her by this journey; for that if I was not in the house, I was not far off; and if I did not remove very quickly she would find me out. “Very well,” says the Quaker; “then if the lady is not willing to see thee, thou givest me notice to tell her, that she may get out of thy way.”

She flew out in a rage at that, and told my friend that if she did a curse would follow her and her children after her, and denounced such horrid things upon her, as frightened the poor tender-hearted Quaker strangely, and put her more out of temper than ever I saw her before; so that she resolved to go home the next morning, and I, that was ten times more uneasy than she, resolved to follow her, and go to London too; which, however, upon second thoughts, I did not, but took effectual measures not to be seen or owned, if she came any more; but I heard no more of her for some time.

I stayed there about a fortnight, and in all that time I heard no more of her, or of my Quaker about her; but after two days more, I had a letter from my Quaker, intimating that she had something of moment to say, that she could not communicate by a letter, but wished I would give myself the trouble to come up, directing me to come with the coach into Goodman's-fields, and then walk to her back-door on foot, which being left open on purpose, the watchful lady, if she had any spies, could not well see me.

My thoughts had for so long time been kept, as it were, waking, that almost everything gave me the alarm, and this especially, so that I was very uneasy; but I could not bring matters to bear to make my coming to London so clear to my husband as I would have done; for he liked the place, and had a mind, he said, to stay a little longer, if it was not against my inclination; so I wrote my friend the Quaker word, that I could not come to town yet; and that, besides, I could not think of being there under spies, and afraid to look out of doors; and so, in short, I put off going for near a fortnight more.

At the end of that time she wrote again, in which she told me, that she had not lately seen the impertinent visitor, which had been so troublesome; but that she had seen my trusty agent Amy, who told her that she had cried for six weeks without intermission; that Amy had given her an account how troublesome the creature had been, and to what straits and perplexities I was driven by her hunting after and following me from place to place; upon which Amy had said, that notwithstanding I was angry with her, and had used her so hardly for saying something about her of the same kind, yet there was an absolute necessity of securing her, and removing her out of the way; and that, in short, without asking my leave, or any body's leave, she would take care she should trouble her mistress (meaning me) no more ; and that after Amy had said so, she had indeed heard no more of the girl ; so that she supposed Amy had managed it so well as to put an end to it.

The innocent well-meaning creature, my Quaker, who was all kindness and goodness in herself, and particularly to me, saw nothing in this ; but she thought Amy had found some way to persuade her to be quiet and easy, and to give over teasing and following me, and rejoiced in it for my sake ; as she thought nothing of any evil herself, so she suspected none in anybody else ; and was exceeding glad of having such good news to write to me ; but my thoughts of it ran otherwise.

I was struck, as with a blast from heaven, at the reading her letter ; I fell into a fit of trembling from head to foot, and I ran raving about the room like a mad-woman ; I had nobody to speak a word to, to give vent to my passion ; nor did I speak a word for a good while, till after it had almost overcome me. I threw myself upon the bed, and cried out—"Lord, be merciful to me, she has murdered my child !"—and with that a flood of tears burst out, and I cried vehemently for above an hour.

My husband was very happily gone out a-hunting, so that I had an opportunity of being alone, and to give my passions some vent, by which I had a little recovered myself. But after my crying was over, then I fell into a new rage at Amy ; I called her a thousand devils, and monsters, and hard-hearted tigers ; I reproached her with knowing that I abhorred it, and had let her know it sufficiently, in that I had, as it were, kicked her out of doors, after so many years' friendship and service, only for naming it to me.

Well, after some time, my spouse came in from his sport, and I put on the best looks I could to deceive him ; but he did not take so little notice of me as not to see I had been crying, and that something troubled me ; and he pressed me to tell him. I seemed to bring it out with reluctance, but told him, my backwardness was more because I was ashamed that such a trifle should have any effect upon me than for any weight that was in it ; so I told him I had been vexing myself about my woman Amy's not coming again ; that she might have known me better than not to believe I should have been friends with her again, and the like ; and that, in short, I had lost the best servant by rashness that ever woman had.

"Well, well," says he, "if that be all your grief, I hope you will soon shake it off ; I'll warrant you that in a little while we shall hear of Mrs Amy again." And so it went off for that time. But it did not go off with me ; for I was uneasy and terrified to the last degree, and wanted to get some further account of the thing. So I went to my sure and certain comforter the Quaker, and there I had the whole story about it ; and the good innocent Quaker gave me joy of my being rid of such an unsufferable tormentor.

"Rid of her ! Ay," says I, "if I was rid of her fairly and honourably ; but I don't know what Amy may have done. Sure she has not made her away ?"—"Oh fie !" says my Quaker ;

"how canst thou entertain such a notion ? No, no. Made her away ! Amy did not talk like that. I dare say thou mayest be easy in that ; Amy has nothing of that in her head, I dare say," says she, and so threw it, as it were, out of my thoughts.

But it would not do ; it run in my head continually ; night and day I could think of nothing else ; and it fixed such a horror of the fact upon my spirits, and such a detestation of Amy, whom I looked upon as the murderer, that, as for her, I believe if I could have seen her I should certainly have sent her to Newgate, or some worse place, upon suspicion ; indeed, I think I could have killed her with my own hands.

As for the poor girl herself, she was ever before my eyes ; I saw her by night and by day ; she haunted my imagination, if she did not haunt the house ; my fancy showed her me in a hundred shapes and postures ; sleeping or waking, she was with me. Sometimes I thought I saw her with her throat cut ; sometimes with her head cut, and her brains knocked out ; other times hanged up upon a beam ; another time drowned in the great pond at Camberwell. And all these appearances were terrifying to the last degree ; and that which was still worse, I could really hear nothing of her ; I sent to the captain's wife in Redriff, and she answered me,—She was gone to her relations in Spitalfields. I sent thither, and they said she was there about three weeks ago, but that she went out in a coach with the gentleman that used to be so kind to her, but whither she was gone they knew not, for she had not been there since. I sent back the messenger for a description of the woman she went out with, and they described her so perfectly that I knew it to be Amy, and none but Amy.

I sent her word again that Mrs Amy, whom she went out with, left her in two or three hours, and that they should search for her, for I had reason to fear she was murdered. This frightened them all intolerably. They believed Amy had carried her to pay a sum of money, and that somebody had watched her after having received it, and had robbed and murdered her.

I believed nothing of that part, but I believed, as it was, that whatever was done, Amy had done it ; and that, in short, Amy had made her away ; and I believed it the more, because Amy came no more near me, but confirmed her guilt by her absence.

Upon the whole, I mourned thus for her for above a month ; but finding Amy still not come near me, and that I must put my affairs in a posture that I might go to Holland, I opened all my affairs to my dear trusty friend the Quaker, and placed her, in matters of trust, in the room of Amy ; and with a heavy bleeding heart for my poor girl, I embarked with my spouse, and all our equipage and goods on board another Holland trader, not a packet-boat, and went over to Holland, where I arrived, as I have said.

I must put in a caution, however, here, that you must not understand me as if I let my friend the Quaker into any part of the secret history of my former life ; nor did I commit the grand reserved article of all to her, viz., that I was really the girl's mother, and the lady Roxana ; there was no need of that part being exposed ; and it was always a maxim with me, that secrets should never be opened without evident utility. It could be no manner of use to me or her to communicate that part to her; besides, she was too honest herself to make it safe to me; for though she loved me sincerely, and it was plain by many circumstances that she did so, yet she would not lie for me upon occasion, as Amy would, and therefore it was not advisable on any terms to communicate that part; for if the girl, or any one else, should have come to her afterwards, and put it home to her, whether she knew that I was the girl's mother or not, or was the same as the lady Roxana or not, she either would not have denied it, or would have done it with so ill a grace, such blushing, such hesitations and falterings in her answers, as would have put the matter out of doubt, and betray herself and the secret too.

For this reason, I say, I did not discover anything of that kind to her; but I placed her, as I have said, in Amy's stead, in the other affairs of receiving money, interests, rents, and the like, and she was as faithful as Amy could be, and as diligent.

But there fell out a great difficulty here, which I knew not how to get over; and this was how to convey the usual supply or provision and money to the uncle and the other sister, who depended, especially the sister, upon the said supply for her support; and, indeed, though Amy had said rashly that she would not take any more notice of the sister, and would leave her to perish, as above, yet it was neither in my nature or Amy's either, much less was it my design; and therefore I resolved to leave the management of what I had reserved for that work with my faithful Quaker, but how to direct her to manage them was the great difficulty.

Amy had told them in so many words that she was not their mother, but that she was the maid Amy that carried them to their aunts; that she and their mother went over to the East Indies to seek their fortune, and that there good things had befallen them; and that their mother was very rich and happy; that she (Amy) had married in the Indies, but being now a widow, and resolving to come over to England, their mother had obliged her to inquire them out, and do for them as she had done; and that now she was resolved to go back to the Indies again; but that she had orders to do very handsomely by them; and, in a word, told them she had 2,000*l.* a piece for them, upon condition that they proved sober, and married suitably to themselves, and did not throw themselves away upon scoundrels.

The good family in whose care they had been I had resolved to take more than ordinary notice of; and Amy, by my order, had acquainted them with it, and obliged my daughters to promise to submit to their government, as formerly, and to be ruled by the honest man as by a father and counsellor; and engaged him to treat them as his children; and to oblige him effectually to take care of them, and to make his old age comfortable both to him and his wife, who had been so good to the orphans, I had ordered her to settle the other 2,000*l.*, that is to say, the interest of it, which was 120*l.* a-year, upon them, to be theirs for both their lives; but to come to my two daughters after them. This was so just, and was so prudently managed by Amy, that nothing she ever did for me, pleased me better. And in this posture, leaving my two daughters with their ancient friend, and so coming away to me, (as they thought to the East Indies,) she had prepared everything in order to her going over with me to Holland; and in this posture that matter stood when the unhappy girl, whom I have said so much of, broke in upon all our measures, as you have heard, and by an obstinacy never to be conquered or pacified, either with threats or persuasions, pursued her search after me (her mother) as I have said, till she brought me even to the brink of destruction, and would, in all probability, have traced me out at last, if Amy had not, by the violence of her passion, and by a way which I had no knowledge of, and indeed abhorred, put a stop to her, of which I cannot enter into the particulars here.

However, notwithstanding this, I could not think of going away and leaving this work so unfinished as Amy had threatened to do, and for the folly of one child to leave the other to starve; or to stop my determined bounty to the good family I have mentioned. So, in a word, I committed the finishing it all to my good friend the Quaker, to whom I communicated as much of the old story as needful to empower her to perform what Amy had promised, and to make her talk so much to the purpose, as one employed more remotely than Amy had been, needed to do.

To this purpose, she had first of all a full possession of the money; and went first to the honest man and his wife, and settled all the matter with them; when she talked of Mrs Amy, she talked of her as one that had been empowered by the mother of the girls, in the Indies, but was obliged to go back to the Indies, and had settled all sooner, if she had not been hindered by the obstinate humour of the other daughter; that she had left instructions with her for the rest; but that the other had affronted her so much, that she was gone away without doing anything for her; and that now, if anything was done, it must be by fresh orders from the East Indies.

I need not say how punctually my new agent acted; but what was more, she brought the old man and his wife, and my other daughter, several times to her house, by which I had an opportunity, being there only as a lodger, and a stranger, to see my other girl, which I had never done before since she was a little child.

The day I contrived to see them, I was dressed up in a Quaker's habit, and looked so like a Quaker, that it was impossible for them, who had never seen me before, to suppose that I had ever been anything else; also my way of talking was suitable enough to it, for I had learned that long before.

I have not time here to take notice what a surprise it was to me to see my child, how it worked upon my affections; with what infinite struggle I mastered a strong inclination that I had to discover myself to her; how the girl was the very counterpart of myself, only much handsomer; and how sweetly and modestly she behaved; how on that occasion I resolved to do more for her, than I had appointed by Amy, and the like.

It is enough to mention here, that as the setting this affair made way for my going on board, notwithstanding the absence of my old agent Amy; so however, I left some hints for Amy too, for I did not yet despair of my hearing from her; and that if my good Quaker should ever see her again, she should let her see them; wherein particularly ordering her to leave the affair of Spitalfields just as I had done, in the hands of my friend, she should come away to me, upon this condition nevertheless, that she gave full satisfaction to my friend the Quaker, that she had not murdered my child; for if she had, I told her, I never would see her face more. How, notwithstanding this, she came over afterwards, without giving my friend any of that satisfaction, or any account that she intended to come over.

I can say no more now, but that being arrived in Holland, with my spouse and his son, formerly mentioned, I appeared there with all the splendour and equipage suitable to our new prospect, as I have already observed.

Here, after some few years of flourishing and outwardly happy circumstances, I fell into a dreadful course of calamities, and Amy also; the very reverse of our former good days; the blast of heaven seemed to follow the injury done the poor girl by us both, and I was brought so low again, that my repentance seemed to be the only consequence of my misery, as my misery was of my crime.*

In resolving to go to Holland with my husband, and take possession of the title of countess as soon as possible, I had a view of deceiving my daughter, were she yet alive, and seeking me out; for it seldom happens that a nobleman, or his lady, are called by their surnames, and as she was a stranger to our noble title, might have inquired at our next door neighbour's for Mr , the Dutch merchant, and not have been one jot the wiser for her inquiry; so one evening, soon after this resolution, as I and my husband were sitting together when supper was over, and talking of several various scenes in life, I told him that, as there was no likelihood of my being with child, as I had some reason to suspect I was some time before, I was ready to go with him to any part of the world, whenever he pleased; I said, that great part of my things were packed up, and what was not would not be long about, and that I had little occasion to buy any more clothes, linen, or jewels, whilst I was in England, having a large quantity of the richest and best of everything by me already. On saying these words, he took me in his arms, and told me that he looked on what I had now spoken with so great an emphasis to be my settled resolution, and the fault should not lie on his side if it miscarried being put in practice.

The next morning he went out to see some merchants, who had received advice of the arrival of some shipping which had been in great danger at sea, and whose insurance had ran very high; and it was this interval that gave me an opportunity of my coming to a final resolution; I now told the Quaker, as she was sitting at work in her parlour, that we should very speedily leave her, and although she daily expected it, yet she was really sorry to hear that we had come to a full determination; she said abundance of fine things to me on the happiness of the life I did then, and was going to live; believing, I suppose, that a countess could not have a foul conscience; but at that very instant I would have, had it been in my power, resigned husband, estate, title, and all the blessings she fancied I had in the world, only for her real virtue, and the sweet peace of mind, joined to a loving company of children, which she really possessed.

When my husband returned, he asked me at dinner if I persevered in my resolution of leaving England; to which I answered in the affirmative: "Well," says he, "as all my affairs will not take up a week's time to settle, I will be ready to go from London with you in ten days' time. We fixed upon no particular place or abode, but in general concluded to go to Dover, cross the Channel to Calais, and proceed from thence by easy journeys to Paris, where, after staying about a week, we intended to go through part of France, the Austrian Netherlands, and so on to Amsterdam, Rotterdam, or the Hague, as we were to settle before we went from Paris. As my husband did not care to venture all our fortune in one bottom, so our goods, money, and plate were consigned to several merchants, who had been his intimates many years, and he took notes of a prodigious value in his pocket, besides what he gave me to take care of during our journey. The last thing to be considered was, how we should go ourselves, and what equipage we should take with us; my thoughts were wholly taken up about it some time; I knew I was going to be a countess, and did not care to appear anything mean before I came to that honour; but on the other hand, if I left London in any public way, I might possibly hear of inquiries after me on the road, that I had been acquainted with before. At last I said, we would discharge all our servants, except two footmen who should travel with us to Dover, and one maid to wait on me, that had lived with me only since the retreat of Amy, and she was to go through, if she was willing; and as to the carriage of us, a coach should be hired for my husband, myself, and maid, and two horses were to be hired for the footmen, who were to return with them to London.

When the Quaker had heard when and how we intended to go, she begged, as there would be a spare seat in the coach, to accompany us as far as Dover, which we both readily consented to; no woman could be a better companion, neither was there any acquaintance that we loved better, or could show more respect to us.

The morning before we set out my husband sent for a master coachman to know the price of a handsome coach, with six able horses, to go to Dover; he inquired how many days we intended to be on the journey; my husband said he would go but very easy, and chose to be three days on the road; that they should stay there two days, and be three more returning to London, with a gentlewoman (meaning the Quaker) in it; the coachman said it would be an eight day's journey, and he would have ten guineas for it. My husband consented to pay him his demand, and he received orders to be ready at the door by seven of the clock the next morning: I was quite prepared to go, having no person to take leave of but the Quaker, and she had desired to see us take the packet-boat at Dover, before we parted with her; and the last night of my stay in London was spent very agreeably with the Quaker and her family. My husband, who staid out later than usual, in taking his farewell of several merchants of his acquaintance, came home about eleven o'clock, and drank a glass or two of wine with us before we went to bed.

* The work, as originally published by De Foe in 1724, ends in this manner. The continuation of Roxana's life, which follows, was first printed in 1745, with a long explanation as to the author. It is impossible at this distance of time to say by whom it was written, but the style certainly bears a strong resemblance to that of De Foe.

The next morning the whole family got up about five o'clock, and I, with my husband's consent, made each of the Quaker's daughters a present of a diamond ring, valued at 20*l.*, and a guinea a-piece to all the servants, without exception. We all breakfasted together, and at the hour appointed the coach and attendants came to the door; this drew several people about it, who were all very inquisitive to know who was going into the country, and what is never forgot on such occasions, all the beggars in the neighbourhood were prepared to give us their benedictions in hopes of an alms. When the coachman had packed up what boxes were designed for our use, we, namely, my husband, the Quaker, myself, and the waiting-maid, all got into the coach, the footmen were mounted on horses behind, and in this manner the coach, after I had given a guinea to one of the Quaker's daughters equally to divide among the beggars at the door, drove away from the house, and I took leave of my lodging in the Minories, as well as of London.

At St George's church, Southwark, we were met by three gentlemen on horseback, who were merchants of my husband's acquaintance, and had come out on purpose to go half a day's journey with us, and as they kept talking to us at the coach side, we went a good pace, and were very merry together; we stopped at the best house of entertainment on Shooter's hill.

Here we stopped for about an hour and drank some wine. And my husband, whose chief study was how to please and divert me, caused me to alight out of the coach. Which the gentlemen who accompanied us observing, alighted also; the waiter showed us up stairs into a large room, whose window opened to our view a fine prospect of the River Thames, which here, they say, forms one of the most beautiful meanders. It was within an hour of high water, and such a number of ships coming in under sail quite astonished as well as delighted me, insomuch that I could not help breaking out into such like expressions, "My dear, what a fine sight this is; I never saw the like before! Pray, will they get to London this tide?" At which the good-natured gentleman smiled, and said, "Yes, my dear, why there is London, and as the wind is quite fair for them, some of them will come to an anchor in about half an hour, and all within an hour."

I was so taken up with looking down the river, that, till my husband spoke, I had not once looked up the river; but when I did, and saw London, the Monument, the Cathedral Church of St Paul, and the steeples belonging to the several parish churches, I was transported into an ecstasy, and could not refrain from saying, "Sure that cannot be the place we are now just come from! it must be further off, for that looks to be scarce three miles off, and we have been three hours by my watch coming from our lodgings in the Minories! No, no, it is not London, it is some other place!"

Upon which one of the gentlemen present offered to convince me that the place I saw was London, if I would go up to the top of the house, and view it from the turret. I accepted the offer, and I, my husband, and the three gentlemen, were conducted, by the master of the house, up stairs into the turret. If I was delighted before with my prospect, I was now ravished, for I was elevated above the room I was in before, upwards of thirty feet. I seemed a little dizzy, for the turret being a lanthorn and giving light all ways, for some time I thought myself suspended in the air; but sitting down, and having eat a mouthful of biscuit and drank a glass of sack, I soon recovered, and then the gentleman who had undertaken to convince me that the place I was shown was really London, thus began, after having drawn aside one of the windows.

"You see, my lady," says the gentleman, "the greatest, the finest, the richest, and the most populous city in the world, at least in Europe, as I can assure your ladyship, upon my own knowledge, it deserves the character I have given it." "But this, sir, will never convince me that the place you now show me is London, though I have before heard that London deserves the character you have with so much cordiality bestowed upon it. And this I can testify, that London, in every particular you have mentioned, greatly surpasses Paris, which is allowed by all historians and travellers to be the second city in Europe."

Here the gentleman, pulling out his pocket-glass, desired me to look through it, which I did; and then he directed me to look full at St Paul's, and to make that the centre of my future observation, and thereupon he promised me conviction.

Whilst I took my observation, I sat in a high chair, made for that purpose, with a convenience before you to hold the glass. I soon found the cathedral; and then I could not help saying, I have been several times up to the stone gallery, but not quite so often up to the iron gallery. Then I brought my eye to the monument, and was obliged to confess I knew it to be such. The gentleman then moved the glass, and desired me to look, which doing, I said, "I think I see Whitehall and St James's Park, and I see also two great buildings, like barns, but I do not know what they are." "Oh," says the gentleman, "they are the Parliament house and Westminster Abbey."—"They may be so," said I; and continuing looking, I perceived the very house at Kensington which I had lived in some time; but of that I took no notice; yet I found my colour come, to think what a life of gaiety and wickedness I had lived. The gentleman, perceiving my disorder, said, "I am afraid I have tired your ladyship; I will make but one remove more easterly, and then I believe you will allow the place we see to be London."

He might have saved himself the trouble, for I was thoroughly convinced of my error; but to give myself time to recover, and to hide my confusion, I seemed not yet to be quite convinced. I looked, and the first object that presented itself was Aldgate church, which, though I confess, to my shame, I seldom saw the inside of it, yet I was well acquainted with the outside, for many times my friend the Quaker and I had passed and repassed by it when we used to go in the coach to take an airing. I saw the church, or the steeple of the church, so plain, and knew it so well, that I could not help saying, with some earnestness, "My dear, I see our church—the church, I mean, belonging to our neighbourhood; I am sure it is Aldgate church." Then I saw the Tower and all the shipping; and, taking my eye from the glass, I thanked the gentleman for the trouble I had given him, and said to him, that I was fully convinced that the place I saw was London, and that it was the very place we came from that morning.

When we came to Sittingbourne our servants soon brought us word that although we were at the best inn in the town, yet there was nothing in the larder fit for our dinner. The landlord came in after him and began to make excuses for his empty cupboard. He told us, withal, that if we would please to stay, he would kill a calf, a sheep, a hog, or anything we had a fancy to. We ordered him to kill a pig and some pigeons, which, with a dish of fish, a cherry pie, and some pastry, made up a tolerable dinner. We made up two pounds ten shillings, for we caused the landlord, his wife, and two daughters to dine with us, and help us off with our wine. Our landlady and her two daughters, with a glass or two given to the cook, managed two bottles of white wine. This operated so strong upon one of the young wenches, that my spouse being gone out into the yard, her tongue began to run; and, looking at me, she says to her mother—"La! mother, how much like the lady her ladyship is, (speaking of me), the young woman who lodged here the other night, and stayed here part of the next day, and then set forward for Canterbury, described. The lady is the same person, I am sure."

This greatly alarmed me, and made me very uneasy, for I concluded this young woman could be no other than my daughter, who was resolved to find me out, whether I would or no. I desired the girl to describe the young woman she mentioned, which she did, and I was convinced it was my own daughter. I asked in what manner she travelled, and whether she had any company. I was answered that she was on foot, and that she had no company; but that she always travelled from place to place in company; that her method was, when she came into any town to go to the best inns and enquire for the lady she sought; and then when she had satisfied herself that the lady, whom she called her mother, was not to be found in that town or neighbourhood, she then begged the favour of the landlady of the inn where she was to put her into such a company that she knew, that she might go safe to the next town; that this was the manner of her proceeding at her house, and she believed she had practised it ever since she set out from London; and she hoped to meet with her mother, as she called her, upon the road.

I asked my landlady whether she described our coach and equipage, but she said the young woman did not enquire concerning equipage, but only described a lady, so like your ladyship, that I have often since I saw your ladyship took you to be the very person she was looking for.

Amidst the distractions of my mind, this afforded me some comfort, that my daughter was not in the least acquainted with the manner in which we travelled. My husband and the landlord returned, and that put an end to the discourse.

I left this town with a heavy heart, fearing my daughter would infallibly find me out at Canterbury; but, as good luck would have it, she had left that city before we came thither some time. I was very short in one thing, that I had not asked my landlady at Sittingbourne, how long it was since my daughter was there. But when I came to Canterbury I was very anxious and indefatigable in inquiring after my daughter, and I found that she had been at the inn where we then were, and had inquired for me, as I found by the description the people gave of myself.

Here I learnt my daughter had left Canterbury a week. This pleased me; and I was determined to stay in Canterbury one day, to view the cathedral, and see the antiquities of this metropolis.

As we had sixteen miles to our journey's end that night, for it was near four o'clock before we got into our coach again, the coachman drove with great speed, and at dusk in the evening we entered the west gate of the city, and put up at an inn in High-street, near St Mary Bredman's church, which generally was filled with the best of company. The anxiety of my mind, on finding myself pursued by this girl, and the fatigue of my journey, had made me much out of order, my head ached, and I had no stomach.

This made my husband (but he knew not the real occasion of my illness,) and the Quaker very uneasy, and they did all in their power to persuade me to eat any thing I could fancy. At length, the landlady of the inn, who perceived I was more disturbed in my mind than sick, advised me to eat one poached egg, drink a glass of sack, eat a toast, and go to bed, and she warranted, she said, I should be well by the morning. This was immediately done; and I must acknowledge, that the sack and toast cheered me wonderfully, and I began to take heart again; and my husband would have the coachman in after supper, on purpose to divert me and the honest Quaker, who, poor creature, seemed much more concerned at my misfortune than I was myself.

I went soon to bed, but for fear I should be worse in the night, two maids of the inn were ordered to sit up in an adjoining chamber; the Quaker and my waiting-maid lay in a bed in the same room, and my husband by himself in another apartment.

While my maid was gone down on some necessary business, and likewise to get me some burnt wine, which I was to drink going to bed, or rather when I was just got into bed, the Quaker and I had the following dialogue:—

Quaker. The news thou heardest at Sittingbourne hath disordered thee. I am glad the young woman has been out of this place a week; she went indeed for Dover; and when she comes there and canst not find thee, she may go to Deal, and so miss of thee.

Roxana. What I most depend upon is, that as we do not travel by any particular name, but the general one of the baronet and his lady, and the girl hath no notion what sort of equipage we travelled with, it was not easy to make a discovery of me, unless she accidentally, in her travels, light upon you (meaning the Quaker) or upon me; either of which must unavoidably blow the secret I had so long laboured to conceal.

Quaker. As thou intendest to stay here to-morrow, to see the things which thou callest antiquities, and which are more properly named the relics of the Whore of Babylon; suppose thou wert to send Thomas, who at thy command followeth after us, to the place called Dover, to inquire whether such a young woman has been inquiring for thee. He may go out betimes in the morning, and may return by night, for it is but twelve or fourteen miles at furthest thither.

Roxana.—I like thy scheme very well; and I beg the favour of you in the morning as soon as you are up, to send Tom to Dover, with such instructions as you shall think proper.

After a good night's repose I was well recovered, to the great satisfaction of all that were with me.

The good-natured Quaker, always studious to serve and oblige me, got up about five o'clock in the morning, and going down into the inn yard met with Tom, gave him his instructions, and he set out for Dover before six o'clock.

As we were at the best inn in the city, so we could readily have whatever we pleased, and whatever the season afforded; but my husband, the most indulgent man that ever breathed, having observed how heartily I ate my dinner at Rochester, two days before, ordered the very same bill of fare, and of which I made a heartier meal than I did before. We were very merry, and after we had dined we went to see the town-house, but as it was near five o'clock I left the Quaker behind me, to receive what intelligence she could get concerning my daughter, from the footman, who was expected to return from Dover at six.

We came to the inn just as it was dark, and then excusing myself to my husband, I immediately run up into my chamber, where I had appointed the Quaker to be against my return. I ran to her with eagerness, and enquired what news from Dover, by Tom, the footman.

She said, Tom had been returned two hours; that he got to Dover that morning between seven and eight, and found, at the inn he put up at, there had been an inquisitive young woman to find out a gentleman that was a Dutch merchant, and a lady who was her mother; that the young woman perfectly well described his lady, that he found that she had visited every public inn in the town; that she said she would go to Deal, and that if she did not find the lady, her mother, there, she would go by the first ship to Hague, and go from thence to Amsterdam and Rotterdam, searching all the towns through which she passes in the United Provinces.

This account pleased me very well, especially when I understood that she had been gone from Dover five days. The Quaker comforted me, and said it was lucky this busy creature had passed the road before us, otherwise she might easily have found means to have overtaken us, for, as she observed, the wench had such an artful way of telling her story, that she moved everybody to compassion; and she did not doubt but that if we had been before, as we were behind, she would have got those who would have assisted her with a coach, &c., to have pursued us, and they might have come up with us.

I was of the honest Quaker's sentiments. I grew pretty easy, called Tom and gave him half a guinea for his diligence; then I and the Quaker went into the parlour to my husband, and soon after supper came in, and I ate moderately, and we spent the remainder of the evening, for the clock had then told nine, very cheerfully. For my Quaker was so rejoiced at my good fortune, as she called it, that she was very alert and exceeding good company, and her wit, and she had no small share of it, I thought was better played off than ever I had heard it before.

My husband asked me how I should choose to go on board; I desired him to settle it as he pleased, telling him it was a matter of very great indifference to me, as he was to go with me. "That may be true, my dear," says he, "but I ask you for a reason or two, which I will lay before you, viz., if we hire a vessel for ourselves, we may set sail when we please, have the liberty of every part of the ship to ourselves, and land at what port, either in Holland or France, we might make choice of. Besides," added he, "another reason I mention it to you is, that I know you do not love much company, which, in going in the packet boat, it is almost impossible to avoid."—"I own, my dear," said I, "your reasons are very good; I have but one thing to say against them, which is, that the packet boat, by its frequent voyages, must of course be furnished with experienced seamen, who know the seas too well even to run any hazard." (At this juncture the terrible voyage I and Amy made from France to Harwich came so strong in my mind, that I trembled so as to be taken notice of by my husband.) "Besides," added I, "the landlord may send the master of one of them to you, and I think it may be best to hire the state-cabin, as they call it, to ourselves, by which method we shall avoid company, without we have an inclination to associate ourselves with such passengers we may happen to like; and the expense will be much cheaper than hiring a vessel to go the voyage with us alone, and every whit as safe."

The Quaker, who had seriously listened to our discourse, gave it in as her opinion that the method I had proposed was by far the safest, quickest, and cheapest. "Not," said she, "as I think thou wouldest be against any necessary expense, though I am certain thou wouldest not fling thy money away."

Soon after, my husband ordered the landlord to send for one of the masters of the packet boats, of whom he hired the great cabin, and agreed to sail from thence the next day if the wind and the tide answered.

The settling our method of going over sea having taken up the time till the dinner was ready, which we being informed of, came out of a chamber we had been in all the morning, to a handsome parlour, where everything was placed suitable to our rank; there was a large old fashioned service of plate, and a side-board genteelly set off. The dinner was excellent, and well dressed.

After dinner, we entered into another discourse, which was, the hiring of servants to go with us from Dover to Paris; a thing frequently done by travellers; and such are to be met with at every stage inn. Our footmen set out this morning on their return to London, and the Quaker and coach was to go the next day. My new chambermaid, whose name was Isabel, was to go through the journey, on condition of doing no other business than waiting on me. In a while we partly concluded to let the hiring of men servants alone till we came to Calais, for they could be of no use to us on board a ship, the sailor's or cabin boy's place being to attend the cabin passengers as well as his master.

To divert ourselves, we took a walk after we had dined, round about the town, and coming to the garrison, and being somewhat thirsty, all went into the suttler's for a glass of wine. A pint was called for, and brought; but the man of the house came in with it raving like a madman, saying "Do not you think you are a villain, to ask for a pot of ale, when I know you have spent all your money, and are ignorant of the means of getting more, without you hear of a place, which I look upon to be very unlikely."—"Do not be in such a passion, landlord," said my husband. "Pray what is the matter?"—"O, nothing, sir," says he; "but a young fellow in the suttling room, whom I find to have been a gentleman's servant, wants a place; and having spent all his money would willingly run up a score with me, knowing I must get him a master, if ever I intend to have my money."—"Pray, sir," said my husband, "send the young fellow to me, if I like him and can agree with him, it is possible I may take him into my service." The landlord took care we should not speak to him twice, he went and fetched him in himself; and my husband examined him before he spoke, as to his size, mien, and garb. The young man was clean dressed, of a middling stature, a dark complexion, and about twenty-seven years old.

"I hear, young man," says he to him, "that you want a place; it may, perhaps, be in my power to serve you; let me know at once what education you have had, if you have any family belonging to you, or if you are fit for a gentleman's service, can bring any person of reputation to your character, and are willing to go and live in Holland with me, we will not differ about your wages."

The young fellow made a respectful bow to each of us, and addressed himself to my husband as follows:—"Sir," said he, "in me you behold the eldest child of misfortune. I am but young, as you may see, I have no comers after me, and having lived with several gentleman, some of whom are on their travels, others settled in divers parts of the world, besides what are dead, makes me unable to produce a character without a week's notice to write to London, and I should not doubt but by the return of the post, to let you see some letters as would satisfy you in any doubts about me. My education," continued he "is but very middling, being taken from school before I had well learnt to read, write, and cast accounts; and as to my parentage, I cannot well give you any account of them; all that I know is that my father was a brewer, and by his extravagance ran out a handsome fortune, and afterwards left my poor mother almost penniless, with five small children, of which I was the second, though not above five years old. My mother knew not what to do with us, so she sent a poor girl, our maid, whose name I have forgot this many years, with us all to a relation's, and there left us; and I never saw or heard of or from them any more: indeed I enquired among the neighbours, and all that I could learn was, that my mother's goods were seized, that she was obliged to apply to the parish for relief, and died of grief soon after. For my part," says he, "I was put into the hands of my father's sister, where, by her cruel usage, I was forced to run away at nine years of age; and the numerous scenes of life I have since gone through are more than would fill a small volume. Pray, sir," added he, "let it satisfy you that I am thoroughly honest, and should be glad to serve you at any rate; and although I cannot possibly get a good character from anybody at present, yet I defy the whole world to give me an ill one, either in public or private life."

If I had had the eyes of Argus I should have seen with them all on this occasion; I knew that this was my son, and one that, among all my enquiry, I could never get any account of. The Quaker seeing my colour come and go, and also tremble, said, "I verily believe thou art not well, I hope this Kentish air, which was always reckoned aguish, does not hurt thee."—"I am taken very sick of a sudden," said I; "so pray let me go to our inn, that I may go to my chamber." Isabel being called in, she and the Quaker attended me there, leaving the young fellow with my spouse. When I was got into my chamber, I was seized with such a grief as I had never known before, and flinging myself down upon the bed, burst into a flood of tears, and soon after fainted away. Soon after I came a little to myself, and the Quaker begged of me to tell her what was the cause of my sudden indisposition. "Nothing at all," says I, "as I know of; but a sudden chillness seized my blood, and that, joined to a fainting of the spirits, made me ready to sink."

Presently after, my husband came to see how I did, and finding me somewhat better, he told me that he had a mind to hire the young man I had left him with, for he believed he was honest, and fit for our service. "My dear," says I, "I did not mind him. I would desire you to be cautious who we pick up on the road; but as I have the satisfaction of hiring my maids, I shall never trouble myself with the men servants, that is wholly your province. However," added I, "(for I was very certain he was my son, and was resolved to have him in my service, though it was my interest to keep my husband off, in order to bring him on,) "if you like the fellow, I am not averse to your hiring one servant in England: we are not obliged to trust him with much, before we see his conduct; and if he does not prove as you may expect, you may turn him off whenever you please."—"I believe," said my husband, "he has been ingenuous in his relation to me; and as a man who has seen great variety of life, and may have been the shuttlecock of fortune, the butt of envy, and the mark of malice, I will hire him when he comes to me here anon, as I have ordered him."

As I knew he was to be hired, I resolved to be out of the way when he came to my husband; so about five o'clock I proposed to the Quaker to take a walk on the pier and see the shipping, while the tea-kettle was boiling: We went, and took Isabel with us, and as we were going along I saw my son Thomas, (as I shall for the future call him,) going to our inn, so we stayed out about an hour, and when we returned my husband told me he had hired the man, and that he was to come to him as a servant on the morrow morning. "Pray, my dear," said I, "did you ask where he ever lived, or what his name is?"—"Yes," replied my husband, "he says his name is Thomas ———; and as to places, he has mentioned several families of note, and among others, he lived at my Lord ———'s, next door to the great French lady's in Pall-mall, whose name he tells me was Roxana." I was now in a sad dilemma, and was fearful I should be known by my own son; and the Quaker took notice of it, and afterwards told me she believed fortune had conspired that all the people I became acquainted with, should have known the Lady Roxana. "I warrant," said she, "this young fellow is somewhat acquainted with the impertinent wench that calls herself thy daughter."

I was very uneasy in mind, but had one thing in my favour, which was always to keep myself at a very great distance from my servants; and as the Quaker was to part with us the next day or night, he would have nobody to mention the name Roxana to, and so of course it would drop.

We supped pretty late at night, and were very merry, for my husband said all the pleasant things he could think of, to divert me from the supposed illness he thought I had been troubled with in the day. The Quaker kept up the discourse with great spirit, and I was glad to receive the impression, for I wanted the real illness to be drove out of my head.

The next morning, after breakfast, Thomas came to his new place; he appeared very clean, and brought with him a small bundle, which I supposed to be linen tied up in a handkerchief. My husband sent him to order some porters belonging to the quay to fetch our boxes to the custom house, where they were searched, for which we paid one shilling; and he had orders to give a crown for head money, as they called it; their demand by custom is but sixpence a head, but we appeared to our circumstance in everything. As soon as our baggage was searched it was carried from the custom house on board the packet boat, and there lodged in the great cabin, as we had ordered it.

This took up the time till dinner, and when we were sitting together after we had both dined, the captain came to tell us that the wind was very fair, and that he was to sail at high water, which would be about ten o'clock at night. My husband asked him to stay and drink part of a bottle of wine with him, which he did; and their discourse being all in the maritime strain, the Quaker and I retired and left them together, for I had something to remind her of in our discourse before we left London. When we got into the garden, which was rather neat than fine, I repeated all my former requests to her about my children, Spitalfields, Amy, &c., and we sat talking together till Thomas was sent to tell us the captain was going, on which we returned; but, by the way, I kissed her and put a large gold medal into her hand, as a token of my sincere love, and desired that she would never neglect the things she had promised to perform, and her repeated promise gave me great satisfaction.

The captain, who was going out of the parlour as we returned in, was telling my husband he would send six of his hands to conduct us to the boat, about a quarter of an hour before he sailed, and as the moon was at the full he did not doubt of a pleasant passage.

Our next business was to pay off the coachman, to whom my husband gave half a guinea extraordinary, to set the Quaker down at the house he took us all up at, which he promised to perform.

As it was low water, we went on board to see the cabin that we were to go our voyage in, and the captain would detain us to drink a glass of the best punch, I think, I ever tasted.

When we returned to the inn we ordered supper to be ready by eight o'clock, that we might drink a parting glass to settle it, before we went on board, for my husband who knew the sea very well, said a full stomach was the forerunner of sea sickness, which I was willing to avoid.

We invited the landlord, his wife, and daughter to supper with us, and having sat about an hour afterwards, the captain himself, with several sailors, came to fetch us to the vessel. As all was paid, and we had nothing to hinder us, but taking a final leave of the Quaker, who would go to see us safe in the vessel, where tears flowed from both our eyes, and I turned short in the boat, while my husband took his farewell, and he then followed me, and I never saw the Quaker or England any more.

We were no sooner on board than we hoisted sail, the anchors being up and the wind fair, we cut the waves at a great rate, till about four o'clock in the morning, when a French boat came to fetch the mail to carry it to the post house, and the boat cast her anchors, for we were a good distance from the shore, neither could we sail to the town till next tide, the present one being too far advanced in the ebb.

We might have gone on shore in the boat that carried the mail, but my husband was sleeping in the cabin when it came to the packet boat, and I did not care to disturb him; however, we had an opportunity soon after, for my husband waking, and two other boats came up with ours to see for passengers, so Thomas came to let us know we might go on shore, if we pleased. My husband paid the master of the packet-boat for our passage, and Thomas with the sailors' assistance, got our boxes into the wherry, so we sailed for Calais, but before our boat came to touch ground, several men, whose bread I suppose it is, rushed into the water, without shoes or stockings, to carry us on shore; so having paid ten shillings for the wherry, we each of us was carried from the boat to the land by two men, and our goods brought after us; here was a crown to be paid, to save ourselves from being wet, by all which a man that is going a travelling may see that it is not the bare expense of the packet-boat that will carry him to Calais.

It would be needless to inform the reader of all the ceremonies that we passed through at this place before we were suffered to proceed on our journey; however, our boxes having been searched at the custom house, my husband had them plumbed, as they called it, to hinder any further inquiry about them; and we got them all to the Silver Lion, a noted inn, and the post house of this place, where we took a stage coach for ourselves, and the next morning, having well refreshed ourselves, we all, viz. my husband, self, and chambermaid within the coach, and Thomas behind; besides which, my husband hired two horsemen well armed, who were pretty expensive, to travel with us, set forward on our journey.

We were five days on our journey from Calais to Paris, which we went through with much satisfaction, for having fine weather and good attendance we had nothing to hope for.

When we arrived at Paris, (I began to be sorry I had ever proposed going to it for fear of being known, but as we were to stay there but a few days, I was resolved to keep very retired) we went to a merchant's house of my husband's acquaintance in the Rue de la Bourle, near the Carmelites, in the Faubourg de St. Jacques. This being a remote part of the city, on the south side, and near several pleasant gardens, I thought it would be proper to be a little indisposed, that my husband might not press me to go with him to see the curiosities; for he could do the most needful business, such as going to the bankers to exchange bills, despatching of letters, settling affairs with merchants, &c., without my assistance; and I had a tolerable plea for my conduct, such as the great fatigue of our journey, being among strangers, &c.; so we stayed at Paris eight days without my going to any particular places, except going one day to the gardens of Luxembourg, another to the church of Notre Dame on the Isle of Paris, a third to the Hotel Royale des Invalides, a fourth to the gardens of the Thuilleries, a fifth to the suburbs of St. Lawrence, to see the fair which was then holding there; a sixth to the gardens of the Louvre, a seventh to the play-house, and the eighth stayed all day at home to write a letter to the Quaker, letting her know where I then was, and how soon we should go forwards in our journey, but did not mention where we intended to settle, as indeed we had not yet settled that ourselves.

One of the days, viz. that in which I went to the gardens of the Thuilleries, I asked Thomas several questions about his father, mother, and other relations, being resolved, notwithstanding he was my own son, as he did not know it, to turn him off by some stratagem or another, if he had any manner of memory of me, either as his mother, or the Lady Roxana; I asked him if he had any particular memory of his mother or father; he answered, "No, I scarce remember any thing of either of them," said he, "but I have heard from several people that I had one brother and three sisters, though I never saw them all, to know them, notwithstanding I lived with an aunt four years; I often asked after my mother, and some people said she went away with a man, but it was allowed by most people, that best knew her, that she, being brought to the greatest distress, was carried to the workhouse belonging to the parish, where she died soon after with grief."

Nothing could give me more satisfaction than what Thomas had related; so now, I thought I would ask about the lady Roxana, (for he had been my next door neighbour when I had that title conferred on me). "Pray Thomas," said I, "did not you speak of a great person of quality, whose name I have forgot, that lived next door to my Lord —'s, when you was his valet, pray who was she, I suppose a foreigner, by the name you called her?"—"Really, my lady," replied he, "I do not know who she was, all I can say of her is, that she kept the greatest company, and was a beautiful woman, by report, but I never saw her; she was called the lady Roxana, was a very good mistress, but her character was not so good as to private life, as it ought to be. Though I once had an opportunity," continued he, "of seeing a fine outlandish dress she danced in before the King, which I took as a great favour, for her cook took me up when the lady was out, and she desired my lady's woman to shew it to me."

All this answered right, and I had nothing to do but to keep my Turkish dress out of the way, to be myself unknown to my child, for as he had never seen Roxana, so he knew nothing of me.

In the interval, my husband had hired a stage coach to carry us to the city of Menin, where he intended to go by water down the river Lys to Ghent, and there take coach to Isabella-fort, opposite the city of Anvers, and cross the river to that place, and go from thence by land to Breda; and as he had agreed and settled this patrole, I was satisfied, and we set out next day. We went through several handsome towns and villages, before we took water, but by water we went round part of the city of Courtray, and several fortified towns. At Anvers we hired a coach to Breda, where we stayed two days to refresh ourselves, for we had been very much fatigued; as Williamstadt was situated so as to be convenient for our taking water for Rotterdam, we went there, and being shipped, had a safe and speedy voyage to that city.

As we had resolved in our journey to settle at the Hague, we did not intend to stay any longer at Rotterdam, than while my husband had all our wealth delivered to him from the several merchants he had consigned it to. This business took up a month, during which time we lived in ready furnished lodgings on the Great Quay, where all the respect was shewn us, as was due to our quality.

Here my husband hired two more men servants, and I took two maids, and turned Isabel, who was a well-bred agreeable girl, into my companion; but that I might not be too much fatigued, my husband went to the Hague first, and left me, with three maids and Thomas, at Rotterdam, while he took a house, furnished it, and had every thing ready for my reception, which was done with great expedition. One of his footmen came with a letter to me one morning, to let me know his master would come by the Scout next day to take me home, in which he desired that I would prepare for my departure. I soon got every thing ready, and the next morning, on the arrival of the Scout, I saw my husband; and we both, with all the servants, left the city of Rotterdam, and safely got to the Hague the afternoon following.

It was now the servants had notice given them to call me by the name of my lady, as the honour of baronetage had entitled me, and with which title I was pretty well satisfied, but should have been more so, had not I yet the higher title of countess in view.

I now lived in a place where I knew nobody, neither was I known, on which I was pretty careful whom I became acquainted with; our circumstances were very good, my husband loving, to the greatest degree, my servants respectful; and, in short, I lived the happiest life woman could enjoy, had my former crimes never crept into my guilty conscience.

I was in this happy state of life, when I wrote a letter to the Quaker, in which I gave her a direction where she might send to me. And about a fortnight after, as I was one afternoon stepping into my coach, in order to take an airing, the post-man came to our door with letters, one of which was directed to me, and as soon as I saw it was the Quaker's hand, I bid the coachman put up again, and went into my closet to read the contents, which were as follow:

"DEAR FRIEND,—I have had occasion to write to thee several times since we saw each other, but as this is my first letter, so it shall contain all the business thou wouldst know. I got safe to London, by thy careful ordering of the coach, and the attendants were not at all wanting in their duty. When I had been at home a few days, thy woman, Mrs Amy, came to see me, so I took her to task as thou ordered me, about murdering thy pretended daughter; she declared her innocence, but said, she had procured a false evidence to swear a large debt against her, and by that means, had put her into a prison, and feed the keepers to hinder her from sending any letter, or message, out of the prison, to any person whatever. This, I suppose, was the reason thou thought she was murdered, because thou wert relieved from her by this base usage. However, when I heard of it, I checked Amy very much, but was well satisfied to hear she was alive. After this I did not hear from Amy for above a month, and in the interim, (as I knew thou wast safe) I sent a friend of mine to pay the debt, and release the prisoner, which he did, but was so indiscreet as to let her know who was the benefactress. My next care was to manage thy Spitalfields business, which I did with much exactness. And the day that I received thy last letter, Amy came to me again, and I read as much of it to her, as she was concerned in; nay, I entreated her to drink tea with me, and after it one glass of citron, in which she drank towards thy good health, and she told me, she would come to me as soon as possible. Just as she was gone, I was reading thy letter again in the little parlour, and that turbulent creature (thy pretended daughter) came to me, as she said, to return thanks for the favour I had done her, so accidentally laid thy letter down in the window, while I went to fetch her a glass of cordial, for she looked sadly; and before I returned, I heard the street-door shut, on which I went back without the liquor, not knowing who might have come in, but missing her, I thought she might be gone to stand at the door, and the wind had blown it to; but, I was never the nearer, she was sought for in vain, so when I believed her to be quite gone, I looked to see if I missed any thing, which I did not; but at last, to my great surprise, I missed your letter, which she certainly took, and made off with. I was so terrified at this unhappy chance, that I fainted away, and had not one of my maidens come in at that juncture, it might have been attended with fatal consequences. I would advise thee, to prepare thyself to see her, for I verily believe she will come to thee. I dread your knowing of this, but hope the best. Before I went to fetch the unhappy cordial, she told me, as she had often done before, that she was the eldest daughter, that the captain's wife was your second daughter, and her s'ister, and that the youngest sister was dead. She also said, there were two brothers, the eldest of whom had never been seen by any of them, since she run away from an uncle's at nine years of age, and that the youngest had been taken care of by an old lady that kept her coach, whom he took to be his godmother. She gave me a long history, in what manner she was arrested, and flung into Whitechapel gaol, how hardly she fared there, and at length, the keeper's wife, to whom she told her pitiful story, took compassion of her, and recommended her to the bounty of a certain lady who lived in that neighbourhood, that redeemed prisoners for small sums, and who lay for their fees, every return of the day of her nativity; that she was one of the six the lady had discharged; that the lady prompted her to seek after her mother; that she thereupon did seek thee in all the towns and villages between London and Dover; that not finding thee at Dover she went to Deal; and that, at length, she being tired of seeking thee, she returned by shipping to London, where she was no sooner arrived, but she was immediately arrested, and flung into the Marshalsea prison, where she lived in a miserable condition, without the use of pen, ink, and paper, and without the liberty of having any one of her friends come near her. "In this condition I was," continued she, "when you sent and paid my debt for me, and discharged me." When she had related all this, she fell into such a fit of crying, sighing, and sobbing, from which when she was a little recovered she broke out into loud exclamations against the wickedness of the people in England, that they could be so unchristian as to arrest her twice, when she said it was as true as the gospel that she never did owe to any one person the sum of one shilling in all her life; that she could not think who it was, that should owe her so much ill-will, for that she was not conscious to herself that she had any ways offended any person in the whole universal world, except Mrs Amy in the case of her mother, which, she affirmed, she was acquitted of by all men, and hoped she should be so by her Maker; and that if she (Mrs Amy) had any hand in her sufferings, God would forgive her, as she heartily did. But then, she added, I will not stay in England, I will go all over the world, I will go to France, to Paris; I know my mother did once live there; and if I do not find her there, I will go through Holland, to Amsterdam, to Rotterdam; in short, I will go till I find my mother out, if I should die in the pursuit. I should be glad to hear of thine and thy spouse's welfare, and remain with much sincerity,

Your sincere friend,

The ninth of the month M. P. called October.

P. S. If thou hast any business to transact in this city, pray let me know ; I shall use my best endeavours to oblige thee ; my daughters all join with me in willing thee a hearty farewell."

I concealed my surprise for a few minutes, only till I could get into the summer-house, at the bottom of our large garden ; but when I was shut in, no living soul can describe the agony I was in ; I raved, tore, fainted away, swore, prayed, wished, cried, and promised, but all availed nothing, I was now stuck in to see the worst of it. let what would happen.

At last I came to the following resolution, which was to write a letter to the Quaker, and in it inclose a fifty pound bank-bill, and tell the Quaker to give that to the young woman, if she called again, and also to let her know a fifty pound bill should be sent her every year, so long as she made no enquiry after me, and kept herself retired in England. Although this opened myself too full to the Quaker, yet I thought I had better venture my character abroad, than destroy my peace at home.

Soon after my husband came home, and he perceived I had been crying, and asked what was the reason, I told him, that I had shed tears both for joy and sorrow: for, said I, "I have received one of the tenderest letters from Amy, as it was possible for any person, and she tells me in it," added I, "that she will soon come to see me: which so overjoyed me, that I cried, and after it, I went to read the letter a second time, as I was looking out of the summer-house window over the canal, and in unfolding it, I accidentally let it fall in, by which mischance it is lost, for which I am very sorry, as I intended you should see it.—"Pray my dear," said he, "do not let that give you any uneasiness; if Amy comes, and you approve of it, you have my consent to take her into the house, in what capacity you please."—"I am very glad," continued he, "that you have nothing of more consequence to be uneasy at, I fancy you would make but an indifferent help-mate if you had." Oh! thought I to myself, if you but knew half the things that lie on my conscience, I believe you would think that I bear them out past all example.

About ten days afterwards, as we were sitting at dinner, with two gentlemen, one of the footmen came to the door, and said, "My lady, here is a gentlewoman at the door, who desires to speak with you: she says her name is Mrs Amy."

I no sooner heard her name, but I was ready to swoon away, but I ordered the footman to call Isabel, and ask the gentlewoman to walk up with her into my dressing-room ; which he immediately did, and there I went to have my first interview with her. She kissed me for joy, when she saw me, and I sent Isabel down stairs, for I was in pain till I had some private conversation with my old confidant.

There was not much ceremony between us, before I told her all the material circumstances that had happened in her absence, especially about the girl's imprisonments which she had contrived, and how she had got my letter at the Quaker's, the very day she had been there. "Well," says Amy, when I had told her all, "I find nothing is to ensue, if she lives, but your ruin; you would not agree to her death, so I will not make myself uneasy about her life; it might have been rectified, but you were angry with me for giving you the best of counsel, viz. when I proposed to murder her."

“Hussey,” said I in the greatest passion imaginable, “how dare you mention the word murder? you wretch you, I could find in my heart, if my husband and the company were gone, to kick you out of my house. Have you not done enough to kill her, in throwing her into one of the worst jails in England, where you see, that Providence in a peculiar manner appeared to her assistance. Away! thou art a wicked wretch, thou art a murderer in the sight of God.”

"I will say no more," says Amy, "but if I could have found her, after thy friend the Quaker had discharged her out of the Marshalsea-prison, I had laid a scheme to have her taken up for a theft, and by that means got her transported for fourteen years. She will be with you soon, I am sure; I believe she is now in Holland."

While we were in this discourse, I found the gentlemen who dined with us, were going, so we came down stairs, and I went into the parlour to take leave of them, before their departure. When they were gone, my husband told me, he had been talking with them about taking upon him the title of Count or Earl of ———, as he had told me of, and as an opportunity now offered, he was going to put it in execution.

I told him I was so well settled, as not to want anything this world could afford me, except the continuance of his life and love; (though the very thing he had mentioned, joined with the death of my daughter, in the natural way, would have been much more to my satisfaction.) "Well, my dear," says he, "the expense will be but small, and as I promised you the title, it shall not be long before the honour shall be brought home to your toilette." He was as good as his word, for that day week he brought the patent home to me, in a small box covered with crimson velvet, and two gold hinges. "There, my lady countess," says he, "long may you live to bear the title, for I am certain you are a credit to it." In a few days after, I had the pleasure to see our equipage, as coach, chariot, &c. all new painted, and a coronet fixed at the proper place, and, in short, everything was proportioned to our quality, so that our house vied with most of the other nobility.

It was at this juncture, that I was at the pinnacle of all my worldly felicity, notwithstanding my soul was black with the foulest crimes. And at the same time I may begin to reckon the beginning of my misfortunes, which were in embryo, but were very soon brought forth, and hurried me on to the greatest distress.

As I was sitting one day talking to Amy, in our parlour, and the street-door being left open by one of the servants, I saw my daughter pass by the window, and without any ceremony, she came to the parlour-door, and opening of it, came boldly in; I was terribly amazed, and asked her who she wanted, as if I had not known her, but Amy's courage was quite lost, and she swooned away. "Your servant, my lady," says she, "I thought I should never have had the happiness to see you tête-à-tête, till your agent, the Quaker, in Haydon-yard, in the Minories, carelessly left a direction for me in her own window; however she is a good woman, for she released me out of a jail, in which, I believe, that base wretch, (pointing to Amy who was coming to herself,) caused me to be confined." As soon as Amy recovered, she flew at her like a devil, and between them there was so much noise, as alarmed the servants, who all came to see what was the matter. Amy had pulled down one of my husband's swords, drawn it, and was just going to run her through the body, as the servants came in, who not knowing anything of the matter, some of them secured Amy, others held the girl, and the rest were busy about me, to prevent my fainting away, which was more than they could do, for I fell into strong fits, and in the interim they turned the girl out of the house, who was fully bent on revenge.

My lord, as I now call him, was gone out a hunting I was satisfied he knew nothing of it, as yet, and when Amy and I were thoroughly come to ourselves, we thought it most advisable to find the girl out, and give her a handsome sum of money to keep her quiet. So Amy went out, but in all her searching could hear nothing of her, this made me very uneasy; I guessed she would contrive to see my lord before he came home, and so it proved, as you will presently hear.

When night came on, that I expected his return, I wondered I did not see him; Amy sat up in my chamber with me, and was as much concerned as was possible. Well, he did not come in all that night, but the next morning, about ten o'clock, he rapped at the door, with the girl along with him. When it was opened, he went into the great parlour, and bid Thomas go call down his lady; this was the crisis; I now summoned up all my resolution, and took Amy down with me, to see if we could not baffle the girl, who to an inch, was her mother's own child.

It will be necessary here to give a short account of our debate, because on it all my future misery depended, and it made me lose my husband's love, and own my daughter, who would not rest there, but told my lord how many brothers and sisters she had.

When we entered the room, my lord was walking very gravely about it, but with his brows knit, and a wild confusion in his face, as if all the malice and revenge of a Dutchman had joined to put me out of countenance before I spoke a word.

"Pray madam," says he, "do you know this young woman; I expect a speedy and positive answer, without the least equivocation?"

"Really, my Lord," replied I, "to give you an answer as quick as you desire, I declare I do not."

"Do not," said he, "what do you mean by that? She tells me, that you are her mother, and that her father run away from you, and left two sons, and two daughters, besides herself, who were all sent to their relations for provision, after which you run away with a jeweller to Paris. Do you know anything of this? answer me quickly."

My lord, said the girl, there is Mrs Amy, who was my mother's servant at that time (as she told me herself about three months ago), knows very well I am the person I pretend to be, and caused me to be thrown into jail for debts I knew nothing of, because I should not find out my mother to make myself known to her before she left England.

After this, she told my lord every thing she knew of me, even in the character of Roxana, and described my dress so well, that he knew it to be mine.

When she had gone quite through her long relation; "Well madam," says he, "now let me see if I cannot tell how far she has told the truth in relation to you. When I first became acquainted with you, it was on the sale of those jewels, in which I stood so much your friend, at a time that you were in the greatest distress, your substance being in the hands of the Jew; you then passed for a jeweller's widow; this agrees with her saying you run away with a jeweller. In the next place, you would not consent to marry me about twelve years ago, I suppose then your real husband was living, for nothing else could tally with your condescension to me in everything except marriage. Since that time, your refusing to come to Holland in the vessel I had provided for you, under a distant prospect of your being with child, though in reality it was your having a child too much, as the captain told me of, when I, being ignorant of the case, did not understand him. Now," continued she, "she says that you were the identical Lady Roxana, which made so much noise in the world, and has even described the robe and head-dress you wore on that occasion, and in that I know that she is right; for, to my own knowledge, you have that very dress by you now, I having seen you dressed in it, at our lodging at the Quaker's. From all these circumstances," says he, "I may be assured that you have imposed grossly upon me, and instead of being a woman of honour, as I took you for, I find that you have been an abandoned wretch, and had nothing to recommend you but a sum of money and a fair countenance, joined to a false unrelenting heart."

These words of my lord's struck such a damp upon my spirits, as made me unable to speak in my turn. But at last, I spoke as follows:—"My lord, I have most patiently stood to hear all it was possible for you to allege against me, which has no other proof than imagination. That I was the wife of a brewer, I have no reason now to deny, neither had I any occasion before to acknowledge it. I brought him a handsome fortune, which joined to his, made us appear in a light far superior to our neighbours; I had also five children by him, two sons and three daughters, and had my husband been as wise as rich, we might have lived happily together now. But it was not so, for he minded nothing but sporting in almost every branch; and closely following of it soon run out all his substance, and then left me in an unhappy helpless condition. I did not send my children to my relations till the greatest necessity drove me, and after that hearing my husband was dead, I married the jeweller who was afterwards murdered. If I had owned how many children I had, the jeweller would not have married me, and the way of life I was in would not keep my family, so I was forced to deny them, in order to get them bread. Neither can I say that I have either heard or known anything of my children since, excepting that I heard they were all taken care of; and this was the very reason I would not marry you, when you offered it some years since, for these children lay seriously at my heart, and as I did not want money, my inclination was to come to England, and not entail five children upon you the day of marriage."

"Pray, madam," said my lord, interrupting me, "I do not find that you kept up to your resolutions when you got there; you were so far from doing your duty as a parent that you even neglected the civility of acquaintances, for they would have asked after them, but your whole scheme has been to conceal yourself as much as possible, and even when you were found out denied yourself, as witness the case of your daughter here. As to the character of Lady Roxana, which you so nicely managed," said he, "did that become a woman that had five children, whose necessity had obliged you to leave them, to live in a continual scene of pageantry and riot, I could almost say debauchery? Look into your conduct, and see if you deserve to have the title or the estate you now so happily enjoy."

After this speech, he walked about the room in a confused manner for some minutes, and then addressed himself to Amy. "Pray, Mrs Amy," says he, "give me your judgment in this case, for although I know you are as much as possible in your lady's interest, yet I cannot think you have so little charity as to think she acted like a woman of worth or discretion,—do you really think, as you knew all of them from infants, that this young woman is your lady's daughter?"

Amy, who always had spirits enough about her, said at once, she believed the girl was my daughter; "and truly," says she, "I think your man Thomas is her eldest son, for the tale he tells of his birth and education suits exactly with our then circumstances."

"Why indeed," said my lord, "I believe so too, for I now recollect that when we first took him into our service at Dover, he told me he was the son of a brewer in London, that his father had run away from his mother, and left her in a distressed condition with five children, of which he was second child, or eldest son."

Thomas was then called into the parlour, and asked what he knew of his family; he repeated all as above, concerning his father's running away and leaving me; but said that he had often asked and enquired after them, but without any success, and concluded, that he believed his brothers and sisters were distributed in several places, and that his mother died in the greatest distress and was buried by the parish.

"Indeed," said my lord, "it is my opinion that Thomas is one of your sons; do not you think the same?" addressing himself to me.

"From the circumstances that have been related, my lord," said I, "I now believe that these are both my children; but you would have thought me a mad woman to have countenanced and taken this young woman in as my child, without a thorough assurance of it; for that would have been running myself to a certain expense and trouble, without the least glimpse of real satisfaction."

"Pray," said my lord to my daughter, "let me know what is become of your brothers and sisters; give me the best account of them that you can."

"My lord," replied she, "agreeable to your commands, I will inform you to the best of my knowledge; and to begin with myself, who am the eldest of the five, I was put to a sister of my father's with my youngest brother, who, by mere dint of industry, gave us maintenance and education suitable to her circumstances; and she, with my uncle's consent, let me go to service when I was advanced in years; and among the variety of places I lived at, Lady Roxana's was one."

"Yes," said Thomas, "I knew her there, when I was a valet at my Lord D——'s, the next door; it was there I became acquainted with her; and she, by the consent of the gentle woman, pointing to Amy, let me see the Lady Roxana's fine vestment, which she danced in at the grand ball."

"Well," continued my daughter, "after I left this place I was at several others before I became acquainted with Mrs Amy a second time (I knew her before as Roxana's woman), who told me one day some things relating to my mother, and from thence I concluded if she was not my mother herself (as I at first thought she was), she must be employed by her; for no stranger could profess so much friendship, where there was no likelihood of any return, after being so many years asunder."

"After this, I made it my business to find your lady out, if possible, and was twice in her company, once on board the ship you were to have come to Holland in, and once at the Quaker's house in the Minories, London; but as I gave her broad hints of whom I took her for, and my lady did not think proper to own me, I began to think I was mistaken, till your voyage to Holland was put off. Soon after I was flung into White-chapel jail for a false debt, but, through the recommendation of the jailor's wife to the annual charity of the good Lady Roberts, of Mile-End, I was discharged. Whereupon I posted away, seeking my mother all down the Kent road as far as Dover and Deal, at which last place not finding her, I came in a coaster to London, and landing in Southwark was immediately arrested and confined in the Marshalsea prison, where I remained some time deprived of every means to let any person without the prison know my deplorable state and condition, till my chum, a young woman, my bedfellow, who was also confined for debt, was by a gentleman discharged. This young woman of her own free will, went, my lord, to your lodgings in the Minories, and acquainted your landlady, the Quaker, where I was, and for what sum I was confined, who immediately sent and paid the pretended debt, and so I was a second time discharged. Upon which, going to the Quaker's to return her my thanks soon after, a letter from your lady to her, with a direction in it where to find you, falling into my hands, I set out the next morning for the Hague: and I humbly hope your pardon, my lord, for the liberty I have taken; and you may be assured, that whatever circumstances of life I happen to be in, I will be no disgrace to your lordship or family."

"Well," said my husband, "what can you say of your mother's second child, who I hear was a son?"

"My lord," said I, "it is in my power to tell you, that Thomas there is the son you mention; their circumstances are the same, with this difference, that she was brought up under the care of a good aunt, and the boy forced to run away from a bad one, and shift for his bread ever since; so if she is my daughter, he is my son, and to oblige you, my lord, I own her, and to please myself I will own him, and they two are brother and sister; I had no sooner done speaking, than Thomas fell down before me and asked my blessing. After which, he addressed himself to my lord as follows:—

"My lord," said he, "out of your abundant goodness you took me into your service at Dover, I told you then the circumstances I was in, which will save your lordship much time by preventing a repetition; but, if your lordship pleases, it shall be carefully penned down, for such a variety of incidents has happened to me in England, Wales, Scotland, Ireland, Holland, France, and the Isle of Man, in which I have travelled for about eighteen years past, as may prove an agreeable amusement to you, when you are cloyed with better company; for as I have never been anything above a common servant, so my stories shall only consist of facts, and such as are seldom to be met with, as they are all in low life."

"Well, Thomas," said my Lord, "take your own time to do it, and I will reward you for your trouble."

"Now, madam," said my lord to my daughter, if you please to proceed: "My lord," continued she, "my mother's third child, which was a daughter, lived with the relation I did, and got a place to wait upon a young lady, whose father and mother were going to settle at Boulogne, in France; she went with them, and having stayed at this gentleman's (who was a French merchant) two years, was married to a man with the consent of the family she lived in, and her master, by way of fortune, got him to be master of a French and Holland coaster, and this was the very person whose ship you hired to come to Holland in, the captain's wife, was my own sister, consequently my lady's second daughter; as to my youngest sister, she lived with the uncle and aunt Thomas run away from, and died of the small-pox soon after. My youngest brother was put out apprentice to a carpenter, where he improved in his business, till a gentlewoman came to his master and mistress, (which I take by the description they gave me, to be Mrs Amy), who had him put out to an education fit for a merchant, and then sent him to the Indies, where he is now settled, and in a fair way to get a large estate.

"This, my lord, is the whole account I can at present give of them, and although it may seem very strange, I assure you, it is all the just truth."

When she had finished her discourse, my lord turned to me, and said, that since I that was her mother, had neglected doing my duty, though sought so much after, he would take it upon himself to see both the girl and Thomas provided for, without any advising or letting me know anything about them. And added with a malicious sneer, "I must take care of the child I have had by you too, or it will have but an indifferent parent to trust to in case of my decease."

This finished the discourse, and my lord withdrew into his study, in a humour that I am unable to describe, and left me, Amy, Thomas, and my daughter Susanna, as I must now call her, in the parlour together. We sat staring at each other some time, till at last Amy said, "I suppose, my lady, you have no further business with your new daughter; she has told her story, and may now dispose of herself to the best advantage she can."—"No," said I, "I have nothing to say to her, only that she shall never be admitted into my presence again." The poor girl burst out into tears, and said, "Pray, my lady, excuse me, for I am certain that were you in my circumstances, you would have done the very action I have, and would expect a pardon for committing the offence."

After this, I said to Thomas, "Keep what has been said to yourself, and I shall speak to you by and by;" and then I withdrew, and went upstairs to my closet, leaving Amy with Susanna, who soon dismissed her, and followed me.

When Amy came to me, "Now, my lady, says she, what do you think of this morning's work? I believe my lord is not so angry as we were fearful of."—"You are mistaken in your lord, Amy," said I, "and are not so well acquainted with the deep and premeditated revenge of Dutchmen as I am, and although it may not be my husband's temper, yet I dread it as much, but shall see more at dinner-time."

Soon after this, my husband called Thomas, and bid him order the cloth for his dinner to be laid in his study, and bid him tell his mother that he would dine by himself; when I heard this, I was more shocked than I had been yet. "Now his anger begins to work, Amy," said I, "how must I act?"—"I do not know," answered she, "but I will go into the study, and try what can be done, and, as a faithful mediator, will try to bring you together." She was not long before she returned, and bursting into tears, "I know not what to do," says she, "for your husband is in a deep study, and when I told him you desired him to dine with you in the parlour as usual, he only said, Mrs Amy, go to your lady, tell her to dine when and where she pleases, and pray obey her as your lady; but let her know from me, that she has lost the tenderness I had for her as a wife, by the little thought she had of her children."

Nothing could have shocked me more than the delivery of this message by Amy; I, almost bathed in tears, went to him myself; found him in a melancholy posture, reading in Milton's 'Paradise Regained'; he looked at me very sternly when I entered his study, told me he had nothing to say to me at that time, and if I had a mind not to disturb him I must leave him for the present. "My lord," said I, "supposing all that has been said by this girl was truth, what reason have you to be in this unforgiving humour? What have I done to you to deserve this usage? Have you found any fault with me since I had the happiness of being married to you? Did you ever find me in any company that you did not approve of? Have you any reason to think that I have wasted any of your substance? If you have none of these things to allege against me, for heaven's sake do not let us now make our lives unhappy, for my having had legitimate children by a lawful husband, at a time that you think it no crime to have had a natural son by me, which I have the most reason to repent of."

I spoke the latter part of these words with a small air of authority, that he might think me the less guilty; but, I believe, he only looked on what I had said as a piece of heroism; for he soon after delivered himself in the following speech: "Madam, do you not think that you have used me in a very deceitful manner? If you think that I have not had that usage I will, in a few words, prove the contrary. When first I knew you, soon after the jeweller's death at Paris, you never mentioned, in all that intricate affair I was engaged in for you, so much as your having any children; that, as your circumstances then were, could have done you no harm, but, on the contrary, it would have moved the compassion of your bitter enemy, the Jew, if he had any. Afterwards, when I first saw you in London, and began to treat with you about marriage, your children, which, to all prudent women, are the first things provided for, were so far neglected as not to be spoken of, though mine were mentioned to you; and as our fortunes were very considerable, yours might very well have been put into the opposite scale with them. Another great piece of your injustice was, when I offered to settle your own fortune upon yourself, you would not consent to it; I do not look on that piece of condescension out of love to me, but a thorough hatred you had to your own flesh and blood; and lastly, your not owning your daughter, though she strongly hinted who she was to you, when she was twice in your company, and even followed you from place to place while you were in England. Now, if you can reconcile this piece of inhumanity with yourself, pray try what you can say to me about your never telling me the life you led in Pall mall, in the character of Roxana? You scrupled to be happily married to me, and soon after came to England, and was a reputed whore to any nobleman that would come up to your price, and lived with one a considerable time, and was taken by several people to be his lawful wife. If any gentleman should ask me what I have taken to my bed, what must I answer? I must say an inhuman false-hearted whore, one that had not tenderness enough to own her own children, and has too little virtue, in my mind, to make a good wife.

"I own I would," says he, "have settled your own estate upon you with great satisfaction, but I will not do it now; you may retire to your chamber, and when I have any occasion to speak with you, I will send a messenger to you; so, my undeserving lady countess, you may walk out of the room."

I was going to reply to all this, but instead of hearing me he began to speak against the Quaker, who, he supposed, knew all the intrigues of my life; but I cleared her innocence, by solemnly declaring it was a thorough reformation of my past life that carried me to live at the Quaker's house, who knew nothing of me before I went to live with her, and that she was I believed, a virtuous woman.

I went away prodigiously chagrined. I knew not what course to take, I found expostulation signified nothing, and all my hopes depended on what I might say to him after we were gone to bed at night. I sent in for Amy, and having told her our discourse, she said she knew not what to think of him, but hoped it would, by great submission, wear off by degrees. I could eat but little dinner, and Amy was more sorrowful than hungry, and, after we had dined, we walked by ourselves in the garden, to know what we had best pursue. As we were walking about, Thomas came to us, and told us that the young woman who had caused all the words had been at the door, and delivered a letter to my lord's footman, who had carried it up stairs, and that she was ordered to go to his lordship in his study, which struck me with a fresh and sensible grief. I told Thomas, as he was to be her brother, to learn what my lord had said to her, if he could, as she came down; on which he went into the house to obey his order.

He was not gone in above a quarter of an hour before he came to me again, and told me she was gone, and that my lord had given her a purse of twenty guineas, with orders to live retired, let nobody know what or who she was, and come to him again in about a month's time. I was very much satisfied to hear this, and was in hopes of its proving a happy omen; and I was better pleased about two hours after, when Thomas came to me, to let me know that my lord had given him thirty guineas, and bid him take off his livery and new clothe himself, for he intended to make him his first clerk, and put him in the way of making his fortune. I now thought it was impossible for me to be poor, and was inwardly rejoiced that my children (meaning Thomas and Susanna) were in the high road to grow rich.

As Amy and I had dined by ourselves, my lord kept his study all the day, and at night, after supper, Isabel came and told me that my lord's man had received orders to make his bed in the crimson room, which name it received from the colour of the bed and furniture, and was reserved against the coming of strangers, or sickness. When she had delivered her message she withdrew, and I told Amy it would be to no purpose to go to him again, but I would have her lie in a small bed, which I ordered immediately to be carried into my chamber. Before we went to bed, I went to his lordship to know why he would make us both look so little among our own servants, as to part bed and board so suddenly. He only said, "My lady Roxana knows the airs of quality too well to be informed that a scandal among nobility does not consist in parting of beds, to be now told it; if you cannot lie by yourself, you may send a letter to my lord —, whom you lived with as a mistress in London, perhaps, he may want a bedfellow as well as you, and come to you at once; you are too well acquainted with him to stand upon ceremony."

I left him, with my heart full of malice, grief, shame, and revenge; I did not want a good will to do any mischief; but I wanted an unlimited power to put all my wicked thoughts in execution.

Amy and I lay in our chamber, and the next morning, at breakfast, we were talking of what the servants (for there were thirteen of them in all, viz. two coachmen, four footmen, a groom, and postillion, two women cooks, two housemaids, and a laundry maid, besides Isabel, who was my waiting-maid, and Amy, who acted as housekeeper) could say of the disturbance that was in the family. "Pho!" said Amy, "never trouble your head about that, for family quarrels are so common in noblemen's houses, both here and in England, that there are more families parted, both in bed and board, than live lovingly together. It can be no surprise to the servants, and if your neighbours should hear it, they will only think you are imitating the air of nobility, and have more of that blood in you than you appeared to have when you and your lord lived happily together."

The time, I own, went very sluggishly on, I had no company but Amy and Isabel, and it was given out among the servants of noblemen and gentry that I was very much indisposed; for I thought it a very improper time either to receive or pay visits.

In this manner I lived till the month was up that my daughter was to come again to my lord, for although I went morning, noon, and night, into his apartment to see him, I seldom had a quarter of an hour's discourse with him, and oftentimes one of his valets would be sent to tell me his lord was busy, a little before the time I usually went, which I found was to prevent my going in to him, but this was only when he was in an ill-humour, as his man called it.

Whether my lord used to make himself uneasy for want of mine, or other company, I cannot tell, but the servants complained every day, as I heard by Amy, that his lordship eat little or nothing, and would sometimes shed tears when he sat down by himself to breakfast, dinner, or supper; and, indeed, I began to think that he looked very thin, his countenance grew pale, and that he had every other sign of a grieved or broken heart.

My daughter came to him one Monday morning, and stayed with him in his study near two nours; I wondered at the reason of it, but could guess at nothing certain; and at last she went away, but I fixed myself so as to see her as she passed by me, and she appeared to have a countenance full of satisfaction.

In the evening, when I went in as usual, he spoke to me in a freer style than he had done since our breach. "Well, madam," (for he had not used the words 'my lady' at any time after my daughter's coming to our house,) said he, "I think I have provided for your daughter."—"As how, my lord, pray will you let me know?" said I. "Yes," replied he, "as I have reason to think you will be sorry to hear of her welfare in any shape; I will tell you. A gentleman who is going factor for the Dutch East India Company, on the coast of Malabar, I have recommended her to; and he, on my character and promise of a good fortune, will marry her very soon; for the company's ships sail in about twelve days; so, in a fortnight, like a great many mothers as there are now-a-days, you may rejoice at having got rid of one of your children, though you neither know where, how, or to whom."

Although I was very glad my lord spoke to me at all, and more especially so at my daughter's going to be married, and settling in the Indies, yet his words left so sharp a sting behind them as was exceeding troublesome to me to wear off. I did not dare venture to make any further enquiries, but was very glad of what I heard, and soon bidding my lord good night, went and found Amy, who was reading a play in the chamber.

I waited with the greatest impatience for this marriage; and when I found the day was fixed, I made bold to ask my lord if I should not be present in his chamber when the ceremony was performed? This favour was also denied me. I then asked my lord's chaplain to speak to him on that head, but he was deaf to his importunities, and bade him tell me that I very well knew his mind. The wedding was performed on a Wednesday evening, in my lord's presence, and he permitted nobody to be there but a sister of the bridegroom's, and Thomas, (now my lord's secretary or chief clerk,) who was brother to the bride, and who gave her away. They all supped together after the ceremony was over, in the great dining room, where the fortune was paid, which was 2,000*l.*, (as I heard from Thomas afterwards,) and the bonds for the performance of the marriage were re-delivered.

Next morning my lord asked me if I was willing to see my daughter before she sailed to the Indies. "My lord," said I, "as the seeing of her was the occasion of this great breach that has happened between us, so, if your lordship will let me have a sight of her and a reconciliation with you at the same time, there is nothing can be more desirable to me, or would more contribute to my happiness during the rest of my life."

"No, madam," says he, "I would have you see your daughter, to be reconciled to her, and give her your blessing, (if a blessing can proceed from you,) at parting; but our reconciliation will never be completed till one of us comes near the verge of life, if then; for I am a man that am never reconciled without ample amends, which is a thing that is not in your power to give, without you can alter the course of nature, and recall time."

On hearing him declare himself so open, I told him that my curse instead of my blessing would pursue my daughter, for being the author of all the mischiefs that had happened between us. "No, madam," said he, "if you had looked upon her as a daughter heretofore, I should have had no occasion to have had any breach with you; the whole fault lies at your own door; for whatever your griefs may inwardly be, I would have you recollect they were of your own choosing."

I found I was going to give way to a very violent passion, which would, perhaps, be the worse for me, so I left the room and went up to my own chamber, not without venting bitter reproaches both against my daughter and her unknown husband.

However, the day she was to go on shipboard, she breakfasted with my lord, and as soon as it was over, and my lord was gone into his study to fetch something out, I followed him there, and asked him if he would give me leave to present a gold repeating watch to my daughter before she went away? I thought he seemed somewhat pleased with this piece of condescension in me, though it was done more to gain his good will than to express any value I had for her. He told me that he did not know, who I could better make such a present to, and I might give it to her if I pleased. Accordingly I went and got it out of my cabinet in a moment, and bringing it to my lord, desired he would give it her from me. He asked me if I would not give it her myself? I told him no. I wished her very well, but had nothing to say to her till I was restored to his lordship's bed and board.

About two hours after all this, the coach was ordered to the door, and my daughter, and her new husband, the husband's sister, and my son Thomas, all went into it, in order to go to the house of a rich uncle of the bridegroom's, where they were to dine before they went on board, and my lord went there in a sedan about an hour after, and having eaten their dinner, which on this occasion was the most elegant, they all went on board the Indiaman, where my lord and my son Thomas stayed till the ship's crew was hauling in their anchors to sail, and then came home together in the coach, and it being late in the evening, he told Thomas, he should sup with him that night; after which they went to bed in their several apartments.

Next morning when I went to see my lord, as usual, he told me, that as he had handsomely provided for my daughter, and sent her to the Indies with a man of merit and fortune, he sincerely wished her great prosperity; and he added, "To let you see, madam, that I should never have parted from my first engagements of love to you, had you not laid yourself so open to censure for your misconduct, my next care shall be to provide for your son Thomas, in a handsome manner, before I concern myself with my son by you."

This was the subject of our discourse, with which I was very well pleased; I only wished my daughter had been married and sent to the Indies before I had married myself; but I began to hope that the worst would be over when Thomas was provided for too, and the son my lord had by me, who was now at the university, was at home; which I would have brought to pass, could my will be obeyed; but I was not to enjoy that happiness.

My lord and I lived with a secret discontent of each other for near a twelvemonth, before I saw any provision made for my son Thomas, and then I found my lord bought him a very large plantation in Virginia, and was furnishing him to go there in a handsome manner; he also gave him four quarter parts, in four large trading West-India vessels, in which he boarded a great quantity of merchandize to traffic with, when he came to the end of his voyage; so that he was a very rich man, before he (what we call) came into the world.

The last article that was to be managed, was to engage my son to a wife, before he left Holland; and it happened that the gentleman who was the seller of the plantation my husband bought, had been a Virginia planter in that colony a great many years; but his life growing on the decline, and his health very dubious, he had come to Holland with an intent to sell his plantation, and then had resolved to send for his wife, son, and daughter, to come to him with the return of the next ships. This gentleman had brought over with him the pictures of all his family, which he was showing to my lord, at the same time he was paying for the effects; and on seeing the daughter's picture, which appeared to him very beautiful, my lord enquired if she was married; "No my lord," says the planter, "but I believe I shall dispose of her soon after she comes to me."—"How old is your daughter?" said my lord. "Why my lord," replied the planter, "she is twenty-two years of age." Then my lord, asked my son, if he should like that young lady for a wife? "Nothing, my lord, said Thomas, could lay a greater obligation upon me than your lordship's providing me with a wife."

"Now sir," said my lord to the planter, "what do you say to a match between this young gentleman and your daughter? their ages are agreeable, and if you can, or will, give her more fortune than he has, his shall be augmented; you partly know his substance, by the money I have now paid you."

This generous proposal of my lord's pleased the planter to a great degree, and he declared to my lord that he thought nothing could be a greater favour done him, for two reasons; one of which was, that he was certain the young gentleman was as good as he appeared, because he had taken, for his plantation, so large a sum of money, as none but a gentleman could pay. The next reason was, that this marriage, to be performed as soon as my son arrived there, would be a great satisfaction to his wife, whose favourite the daughter was; "For," added he, "my wife will not only have the pleasure of seeing her daughter settled on what was our own hereditary estate, but also see her married to a man of substance, without the danger of crossing the seas to be matched to a person equal to herself."

"Pray, sir," said my lord, "let me hear what fortune you are willing to give with your daughter; you have but two children, and I know you must be rich."—"Why, my lord," replied the planter, "there is no denying that; but you must remember I have a son as well as a daughter to provide for, and he I intend to turn into the mercantile way as soon as he arrives safe from Virginia. I have, my lord," continued he, "a very large stock in trade there, as warehouses of tobacco, &c. lodged in the custom-houses of the ports, to the value of 7,000*l.*, to which I will add 3,000*l.* in money, and I hope you will look upon that as a very competent estate; and when the young gentleman's fortune is joined to that, I believe he will be the richest man in the whole American colonies of his age."

It was then considered between my lord and Thomas, that no woman with a quarter of that fortune, would venture herself over to the West Indies with a man that had ten times as much; so it being hinted to the planter that my lord had agreed to the proposals, they promised to meet the next morning to settle the affair.

In the evening my lord, with Thomas in his company, hinted the above discourse to me. I was frightened almost out of my wits to think what a large sum of money had been laid out for my son; but kept what I thought to myself. It was agreed that my son was to marry the old planter's daughter, and a lawyer was sent for, with instructions to draw up all the writings for the marriage settlement, &c. and the next morning a messenger came from the planter with a note to my lord, letting him know, if it was not inconvenient, he would wait on his lordship to breakfast; he came soon after with a Dutch merchant of great estate, who was our neighbour at the Hague, where they settled every point in question, and the articles were all drawn up and signed by the several parties the next day before dinner.

There was nothing now remaining but my son's departure to his new plantation in Virginia; great dispatch was made that he might be ready to sail in one of his own ships, and take the advantage of an English convoy, which was almost ready to sail. My lord sent several valuable presents to my son's lady, as did her father; and as I was at liberty in this case to do as I would, and knowing my lord had a very great value for my son, I thought that the richer my presents were, the more he would esteem me, (but there was nothing in it, the enmity he took against me had taken root in his heart) so I sent her a curious set of china, the very best I could buy, with a silver tea-kettle and lamp, tea-pot, sugar-dish, cream-pot, tea-spoons, &c. and as my lord had sent a golden repeater, I added to it a golden equipage, with my lord's picture hanging to it, finely painted. (This was another thing I did purposely to please him, but it would not do.) A few days after he came to take his leave of me, by my lord's order, and at my parting with him I shed abundance of tears, to think I was then in an almost strange place, no child that could then come near me, and under so severe a displeasure of my lord, that I had very little hopes of ever being friends with him again.

My life did not mend after my son was gone, all I could do would not persuade my lord to have any free conversation with me; and at this juncture it was, that the foolish jade, Amy, who was now advanced in years, was caught in a conversation with one of my lord's men, which was not to her credit; for it coming to his ears, she was turned out of the house by my lord's orders, and was never suffered to come into it again during his life-time, and I did not dare to speak a word in her favour, for fear he should retort upon me, like mistress like maid.

I could hear nothing of Amy for the first three months after she had left me, till one day, as I was looking out of a dining-room window, I saw her pass by, but I did not dare ask her to come in, for fear my lord should hear of her being there, which would have been adding fuel to the fire; however, she looking up at the house saw me, I made a motion to her to stay a little about the door, and in the mean time, I wrote a note, and dropped it out of the window, in which I told her how I had lived in her absence, and desired her to write me a letter, and carry it the next day to my sempstress's house, who would take care to deliver it to me herself.

I told Isabel, that she should let me know when the milliner came again, for I had some complaints to her about getting up my best suit of Brussels lace night-clothes: on the Saturday following, just after I had dined, Isabel came into my apartment. "My lady," says she, "the milliner is in the parlour, will you be pleased to have her sent up stairs, or will your ladyship be pleased to go down to her?"—"Why, send her up, Isabel," said I, "she is as able to come to me, as I am to go to her, I will see her here."

When the milliner came into my chamber, I sent Isabel to my dressing-room to fetch a small parcel of fine linen which lay there, and in the interim she gave me Amy's letter, which I put into my pocket, and having pretended to be angry about my linen, I gave her the small bundle Isabel brought, and bid her be sure to do them better for the future.

She promised me she would, and went about her business, and when she was gone, I opened Amy's letter, and having read it, found it was to the following purpose, viz. That she had opened a coffee-house, and furnished the upper part of it to let out in lodgings, that she kept two maids and a man, but that the trade of it did not answer as she had reason to expect; she was willing to leave it off, and retire into the country to settle for the rest of her life; but was continually harassed by such disturbance in her conscience as made her unfit to resolve upon any thing, and wished there was a possibility for her to see me, that she might open her mind with the same freedom as formerly, and have my advice upon some particular affairs, and such like discourse.

It was a pretty while before I heard from Amy again, and when I did, the letter was in much the same strain as the former, excepting that things were coming more to a crisis, for she told me in it, that her money was so out, that is, lent as ready money to traders, and trusted for liquors in her house, that if she did not go away this quarter, she should be obliged to run away the next. I very much lamented her unfortunate case, but that could be no assistance to her, as I had it not now in my power to see her when I would, or give her what I pleased, as it had always used to be; so all I could do was to wish her well, and leave her to take care of herself.

About this time it was that I perceived my lord began to look very pale and meagre, and I had a notion he was going into a consumption, but did not dare tell him so, for fear he should say I was daily looking for his death, and was now overjoyed that I saw a shadow of it; nevertheless, he soon after began to find himself in a very bad state of health, for he said to me one morning, that my care would not last long, for he believed he was seized by a distemper it was impossible for him to get over. "My lord," said I, "you do not do me justice in imagining anything concerning me that does not tend to your own happiness, for if your body is out of order, my mind suffers for it. Indeed had he died then without making a will, it might have been well for me, but he was not so near death as that; and, what was worse, the distemper, which proved a consumption, (which was occasioned chiefly by much study, watchings, melancholy thoughts, wilful and obstinate neglect of taking care of his body, and such like things) held him nine weeks and three days after this, before it carried him off.

He now took country lodgings, most delightfully situated, both for air and prospect, and had a maid and man to attend him; I begged on my knees to go with him, but could not get that favour granted; for, if I could, it might have been a means of restoring me to his favor, but our breach was too wide to be thoroughly reconciled, though I used all the endearing ways I had ever had occasion for, to creep into his favour.

Before he went out of town, he locked and sealed up every room in the house, excepting my bed-chamber, dressing-room, one parlour, and all the offices and rooms belonging to the servants; and, as he had now all my substance in his power, I was in a very poor state for a countess, and began to wish, with great sincerity, that I had never seen him, after I had lived so happy a life as I did at the Quaker's; for notwithstanding our estates, joined together when we were first married, amounted to 3,376*l.* per annum, and near 18,000*l.* ready money, besides jewels, plate, goods, &c., of a considerable value, yet we had lived in a very high manner since our taking the title of earl and countess upon us; setting up a great house, and had a number of servants; our equipage, such as coach, chariot, horses, and their attendants; a handsome fortune my lord had given to my daughter, and a very noble one to my son, whom he loved very well, not for his being my son, but for the courteous behaviour of him, in never aspiring to anything above a valet, after he knew who he was, till my lord made him his secretary, or clerk; besides all these expenses, my lord having flung himself into the trade to the Indies, both East and West, had sustained many great and uncommon losses, occasioned by his merchandize being mostly shipped in English bottoms, and that nation having declared war against the crown of Spain, he was one of the first and greatest sufferers by that power; so that, on the whole, our estate, which was as above, dwindled to about 1,000*l.* per annum, and our home stock, viz., about 17,000*l.*, was entirely gone. This, I believe, was another great mortification to his lordship, and one of the main things that did help to hasten his end; for he was observed, both by me and all his servants, to be more cast down at hearing of his losses, that were almost daily sent to him, than he was at what had happened between him and me.

Nothing could give more uneasiness than the damage our estate sustained by this traffic; he looked upon it as a mere misfortune that no person could avoid; but I, besides that, thought it was a judgment upon me, to punish me, in the loss of all my ill-got gain; but when I found that his own fortune began to dwindle as well as mine, I was almost ready to think it was possible his lordship might have been as wicked a liver as I had, and the same vengeance as had been poured upon me for my repeated crimes, might also be a punishment for him.

As his lordship was in a bad state of health, and had removed to a country lodging, his study and counting-house, as well as his other rooms, were locked and sealed up; all business was laid aside, excepting such letters as came to him, were carried to his lordship to be opened, read, and answered. I also went to see him morning and evening, but he would not suffer me to stay with him a single night; I might have had another room in the same house, but was not willing the people who kept it should know that there was a misunderstanding between us, so I contented myself to be a constant visitor, but could not persuade him to forgive me the denying of my daughter, and acting the part of Roxana, because I had kept those two things an inviolable secret from him, and everybody else but Amy, and it was carelessness in her conduct at last that was the foundation of all my future misery.

As my lord's weakness increased, so his ill-temper, rather than diminish, increased also; I could do nothing to please him, and began to think that he was only pettish because he found it was his turn to go out of the world first. A gentleman that lived near him, as well as his chaplain, persuaded him to have a physician, to know in what state his health was, and by all I could learn, the doctor told him to settle his worldly affairs as soon as he conveniently could; "For," says he, "although your death is not certain, still your life is very precarious."

The first thing he did after this was to send for the son he had by me, from the university; he came the week afterwards, and the tutor with him, to take care of his pupil. The next day after, my lord came home, and sending for six eminent men that lived at the Hague; he made his will, and signed it in the presence of them all, and they, with the chaplain, were appointed the executors of it, and guardians of my son.

As I was in a great concern at his making his will unknown to me, and before we were friends, I thought of it in too serious a manner not to speak about it. I did not know where to apply first, but after mature consideration sent for the chaplain, and he coming to me, I desired he would give me the best intelligence he could about it. "My lady," said he, "you cannot be so unacquainted with the duty of my function, and the trust my lord has reposed in me, but you must know I shall go beyond my trust in relating anything of that nature to you; all that I can say on that head is, that I would have you make friends with my lord as soon as you possibly can, and get him to make another will, or else, take the best care of yourself as lies in your power; for I assure you, if his lordship dies, you are but poorly provided for.

These last words of the chaplain's most terribly alarmed me; I knew not what to do, and, at last, as if I was to be guided by nothing but the furies, I went to his chamber; and after inquiring how he did, and hearing that he was far from well, I told him I heard he had made his will. "Yes," said he, "I have, and what then?"—"Why, my lord," replied I, "I thought it would not have been derogatory to both our honours for you to have mentioned it to me before you did it, and have let me known in what manner you intended to settle your estate; this would have been but acting like a man to his wife, even if you had married me without a fortune; but as you received so handsomely with me, you ought to have considered it was my substance, as well as your own, that you were going to dispose of."

My lord looked somewhat staggered at what I had said, and pausing a little while, answered, that he thought, and also looked upon it as a granted opinion, that after a man married a woman, all that she was in possession of was his, excepting he had made a prior writing or settlement to her of any part or all she was then possessed of. "Besides, my lady," added he, "I have married both your children, and given them very noble fortunes, especially your son; I have also had great losses in trade, both by sea and land, since you delivered your fortune to me, and even at this time, notwithstanding the appearance we make in the world, I am not worth a third of what I was when we came to settle in Holland; and then, here is our own son shall be provided for in a handsome manner by me, for I am thoroughly convinced there will be but little care taken of him if I leave anything in your power for that purpose,—witness Thomas and Susanna."

"My lord," said I, "I am not come into your chamber to know what care you have taken of our child; I do not doubt but you have acted like a father by it; what I would be informed in is, what I am to depend upon in case of your decease, which I, however, hope, may be a great many years off yet?"—"You need not concern yourself about that," said he; "your son will take care that you shall not want. But yet, I will tell you, too," said he, "that it may prevent your wishing for my death,—I have in my will left all I am possessed of in the world to my son, excepting 1,500*l.*; out of that, there is 500*l.* for you; 500*l.* among my executors, and the other 500*l.* is to bury me, pay my funeral expenses, and what is overplus I have ordered to be equally divided among my servants."

When I had heard him pronounce these words I stared like one that was frightened out of his senses. "Five hundred pounds for me!" says I. "Pray, what do you mean? What! am I, that brought you so handsome a fortune, to be under the curb of my son, and ask him for every penny I want. No, sir," said I, "I will not accept it; I expect to be left in full possession of one half of your fortune, that I may live the remainder of my life like your wife."—"Madam," replied my lord, "you may expect what you please. If you can make it appear, since I found you out to be a jilt, that I have looked upon you as my wife, everything shall be altered and settled just as you desire, which might then be called your will; but as the case now stands, the will is mine, and so it shall remain."

I thought I should have sunk when I had heard him make this solemn and premeditated declaration; I raved like a mad-woman, and, at the end of my discourse, told him, that I did not value what could happen to me, even if I was forced to beg my bread, for I would stand the test of my own character; and as I could get nothing by being an honest woman, so I should not scruple to declare, that the son you have left what you have to is a bastard you had by me several years before we were married.

"Oh," says he, "madam, do you think you can frighten me? No, not in the least; for if you ever mention any thing of it, the title, as well as all the estate, will go to another branch of my family, and you will then be left to starve in good earnest, without having the least glimpse of hope to better your fortune; for," added he, "it is not very probable that you will be courted for a wife by any man of substance at these years; so if you have a mind to make yourself easy in your present circumstances, you must rest contented with what I have left you, and not prove yourself a whore to ruin your child, in whose power it will be to provide for you in a handsome manner, provided you behave yourself with that respect to him and me as you ought to do; for if any words arise about what I have done, I shall make a fresh will, and, as the laws of this nation will give me liberty, cut you off with a shilling."

My own unhappiness, and his strong and lasting resentment, had kept me at high words, and flowing in tears, for some time, and as I was unwilling anybody should see me in that unhappy condition, I stayed coolly talking to him, till our son, who had been to several gentlemen's houses about my lord's business, came home, to tell his father the success he had met with abroad. He brought in with him bank-notes to the amount of 12,000*l.*, which he had received of some merchants he held a correspondence with, at which my lord was well pleased, for he was pretty near out of money at this juncture. After our son had delivered the accounts and bills, and had withdrew, I asked my lord, in a calm tone, to give me the satisfaction of knowing in what manner the losses he had complained to have suffered consisted. "You must consider, my lord," said I, "that according to what you have been pleased to inform me of, that we are upwards of 2,000*l.* per annum, besides about 17,000*l.* ready money, poorer than we were when we first came to settle in Holland."

"You talk," replied my lord, "in a very odd manner; do not you know that I had children of my own by a former wife, and of these I have taken so much care as to provide with very handsome fortunes, which are settled irrevocably upon them; I have, Providence be thanked, given each of them 5,000*l.*, and that is laid in East India Stock, sufficient to keep them genteelly, above the frowns of fortune, and free from the fear of want. This, joined to the money I mentioned to you before, as losses at sea, deaths and bankruptcies, your children's fortunes (which are larger than my own children's), the buying the estate we live on, and several other things, which my receipts and notes will account for, as you may see after my decease; I have, to oblige you, on this head, almost descended to particulars, which I never thought to have done; but as I have, rest yourself contented, and be well assured, that I have not wilfully thrown any of your substance away."

I could not tell what he meant by saying, he had not wilfully thrown any of my substance away; these words puzzled me, for I found by his discourse I was to have but 500*l.* of all I had brought him, at his decease, which I looked upon to be near at hand. I had but one thing that was any satisfaction to me, which was this, I was assured by him that he had not bestowed above the 15,000*l.* he mentioned to me, on his children by his former wife; and, on an exact calculation he made it appear, that he had bestowed on my son Thomas alone near 13,000*l.* in buying the plantation, shares in vessels, and merchandize, besides several valuable presents sent to his wife, both by him and me; and as for my daughter Susanna, she was very well married to a factor, with a fortune of 2,000*l.*, which was a great sum of money for a woman to have, who was immediately to go to the East Indies; besides some handsome presents given to her both by him and me. In fact, her fortune was in proportion as large as her brother's, for there is but very few women in England or Holland with 2,000*l.* fortune, that would venture to the coast of Malabar, even to have married an Indian king, much more to have gone over with a person, that no one could tell what reception he might meet with, or might be recalled at the pleasure of the company upon the least distaste taken by the merchants against him; neither would I, though her own mother, hinder her voyage, for she had been the author of all the misfortunes that had happened to me, and if my speaking a word would have saved her from the greatest torment, I believe I should have been quite silent. And I have but one reason to allege for the girl's going so hazardous a voyage, which is, she knew that the match was proposed by my lord, and if he had not thought it would have been advantageous for her, he would never have given 2,000*l.* to her husband as a fortune; and again, as my lord was the only friend she had in our family, she was cunning enough to know that the bare disobliging of him would have been her ruin for ever after; to which I may add, that it is possible, as she had made so much mischief about me, she was glad to get what she could, and go out of the way, for fear my lord and I should be friends; which, if that had happened, she would have been told never to come to our house any more.

As my lord's death began to be daily the discourse of the family, I thought that he might be more reconciled if I entered into the arguments again, pro and con, which we had together before;

I did so, but all I could say was no satisfaction, till I importuned him on my knees, with a flood of tears. "Madam," said he, "what would you have me do?"—"Do, my lord," said I, "only be so tender to my years and circumstances, as to alter your will, or, at least, add a codicil to it; I desire nothing more, for I declare I had rather be a beggar, than live under my child's jurisdiction." To this he agreed with some reluctance, and he added a codicil to his will.

This pleased me greatly and gave me comfort, for I dreaded nothing so much, after all my high living, as being under any person, relation, or stranger, and whether they exercised any power over me or not.

I saw the lawyer come out of the chamber first, but was above asking him any questions, the next were the executors and chaplain; I asked the last how they came to have words: he did not answer me directly, but begged to know whose pleasure it was to have the codicil annexed.—"It was mine, sir," replied I, "and it made me very uneasy before I could have the favour granted."—He only replied, by saying, "Ah! poor lady, the favour, as you are pleased to term it, is not calculated for any benefit to you; think the worst you can of it."

I was terribly uneasy at what the chaplain had said, but I imagined to myself that I could not be worse off than I thought I should be, before the codicil was annexed; and, as he withdrew without saying any more, I was fain to rest satisfied with what I had heard, and that amounted to nothing.

The next day after this, the physicians that attended my lord, told him, it was time for him to settle his worldly affairs, and prepare himself for an hereafter. I now found all was over, and I had no other hopes of his life, than the physician's declaration of his being near his death. For it often happens that the gentlemen of the faculty give out that a man is near his death, to make the cure appear to be the effect of their great skill in distempers and medicine; as others when they cannot find out the real disease, give out that a man's end is near, rather than discover their want of judgment; and this I thought might be the case with our doctors of physic.

Our son was still kept from the University, and lodged at the house of one of his future guardians; but when he heard that his father was so near his end, he was very little out of his presence, for he dearly loved him. My lord sent the day before his death, to lock and seal up all the doors in his dwelling-house at the Hague; and the steward had orders, in case of my lord's decease, not to let anybody come in, not even his lady (who had for some time lodged in the same house with her lord), without an order from the executors.

The keys of the doors were carried to him, and as he saw his death approach, he prepared for it; and in fact, resigned up the keys of everything to the executors, and having bid them all a farewell, they were dismissed; the physicians waited, but as the verge of life approached, and it was out of their power to do him any service, he gave them a bill of 100*l.* for the care they had taken of him, and dismissed them.

I now went into the chamber, and kneeling by his bed-side, kissed him with great earnestness, and begged of him, if ever I had disoblighd him in any respect, to forgive me. He sighed, and said, he most freely forgave me everything that I had reason to think I had offended him in; but, he added, "If you had been so open in your conversation to me before our marriage as to discover your family and way of life, I know not but that I should have married you as I did; I might now have been in a good state of health, and you many years have lived with all the honours due to the Countess de Wintelsheim." These words drew tears from my eyes, and they being the last of any consequence he said, they had the greater impression upon me. He faintly bid me a long farewell, and said, as he had but a few moments to live, he hoped I would retire, and leave him with our son and chaplain. I withdrew into my own chamber, almost drowned in tears, and my son soon followed me out, leaving the chaplain with his father, offering up his prayers to heaven for the receiving of his soul into the blessed mansions of eternal bliss.

A few minutes after, our son went into the chamber with me again, and received his father's last blessing. The chaplain now saw him departing, and was reading the prayer ordered by the church for that occasion; and while he was doing it, my lord laid his head gently on the pillow, and turning on his left side, departed this life with all the calmness of a composed mind, without so much as a groan, in the fifty-seventh year of his age.

As soon as he was dead, an undertaker was sent for, by order of the executors, who met together immediately to open his will, and take care of all my son's effects. I was present when it was opened and read; but how terribly I was frightened at hearing the codicil repeated any person may imagine by the substance of it, which was to this effect:—That if I had given me any more after his decease than the 500*l.* he had left me, the 500*l.* left to his executors, and the 1000*l.* of my son's estate, (which was now a year's interest,) was to be given to such poor families at the Hague as were judged to be in the greatest want of it; not to be divided in equal sums, but every family to have according to their merit and necessity. But this was not all; my son was tied down much harder; for if it was known that he gave me any relief, let my condition be ever so bad, either by himself, by his order, or in any manner of way, device, or contrivance that he could think of, one half of his estate, which was particularly mentioned, was to devolve to the executors for ever; and if they granted me ever so small a favour, that sum was to be equally divided among the several parishes where they lived, for the benefit of the poor.

Any person would have been surprised to have seen how we all sat staring at each other; for though it was signed by all the executors, yet they did not know the substance of it till it was publicly read, excepting the chaplain; and he, as I mentioned before, had told me the codicil had better never have been added.

I was now in a fine dilemma; had the title of a countess, with 500*l.*, and nothing else to subsist on, but a very good wardrobe of clothes, which were not looked upon by my son and the executors to be my late lord's property, which were worth, indeed, more than treble the sum I had left me.

I immediately removed from the lodgings, and left them to bury the body when they thought proper, and retired to a lodging at a private gentleman's house, about a mile from the Hague. I was now resolved to find out Amy, being, as it were, at liberty; and accordingly went to the house where she had lived, and finding that empty, inquired for her among the neighbours, who gave various accounts of what had become of her; but one of them had a direction left at his house where she might be found. I went to the place and found the house shut up, and all the windows broken, the sign taken down, and the rails and benches pulled from before the door. I was quite ashamed to ask for her there, for it was a very scandalous neighbourhood, and I concluded that Amy had been brought to low circumstances, and had kept a house of ill-fame, and was either run away herself, or was forced to it by the officers of justice. However, as nobody knew me here, I went into a shop to buy some trifles, and asked who had lived in the opposite house (meaning Amy's). "Really, madam," says the woman, "I do not well know; but it was a woman who kept girls for gentlemen; she went on in that wickedness for some time, till a gentleman was robbed there of his watch and a diamond ring, on which the women were all taken up and committed to the house of correction; but the young ones are now at liberty, and keep about the town."—"Pray," said I, "what may have become of the old beast that could be the ruin of those young creatures?"—"Why, I do not well know," says she; "but I have heard, that as all her goods were seized upon, she was sent to the poor-house; but it soon after appearing that she had the French disease to a violent degree, was removed to an hospital to be taken care of, but I believe she will never live to come out; and if she should be so fortunate, the gentleman that was robbed, finding that she was the guilty person, intends to prosecute her to the utmost rigour of the law."

I was sadly surprised to hear this character of Amy; for I thought whatever house she might keep, that the high-day of her blood had been over; but I found that she had not been willing to be taken for an old woman, though near sixty years of age; and my not seeing or hearing from her for some time past was a confirmation of what had been told me. I went home sadly dejected, considering how I might hear of her; I had known her for a faithful servant to me, in all my bad and good fortune, and was sorry that at the last such a miserable end should overtake her, though she, as well as I, deserved it several years before.

A few days after, I went pretty near the place I had heard she was, and hired a poor woman to go and inquire how Amy ——— did, and whether she was likely to do well. The woman returned, and told me, that the matron, or mistress, said, the person I enquired after died in a salivation two days before, and was buried the last night in the cemetery belonging to the hospital.

I was very sorry to hear of Amy's unhappy and miserable death; for when she came first into my service, she was really a sober girl, very witty and brisk, but never impudent, and her notions in general were good, till my forcing her, as it were, to have an intrigue with the jeweller. She had also lived with me between thirty and forty years, in the several stages of life as I had passed through; and, as I had done nothing but what she was privy to, so she was the best person in the universal world to consult with and take advice from, as my circumstances now were.

I returned to my lodgings much chagrined, and very disconsolate; for, as I had for several years lived at the pinnacle of splendour and satisfaction, it was a prodigious heart-break to me now to fall from upwards of 3,000*l.* per annum to a poor 500*l.* principal.

A few days after this I went to see my son, the Earl of Wintselsheim; he received me in a very courteous (though far from a dutiful) manner; we talked together near an hour upon general things, but had no particular discourse about my late lord's effects, as I wanted to have. Among other things he told me, that his guardians had advised him to go to the university for four years longer, when he would come of age, and his estate would be somewhat repaired; to which he said he had agreed: and for that purpose, all the household goods and equipages were to be disposed of the next week, and the servants dismissed. I immediately asked, if it would be looked upon as an encroachment upon his father's will if I took Isabel (who had been my waiting-maid ever since I came from England) to live with me. "No, my lady," very readily replied he, "as she will be dismissed from me, she is certainly at liberty and full freedom to do for herself as soon and in the best manner she possibly can." After this I staid about a quarter of an hour with him, and then I sent for Isabel, to know if she would come and live with me on her dismissal from her lord's. The girl readily consented, for I had always been a good mistress to her; and then I went to my own lodgings in my son's coach, which he had ordered to be got ready to carry me home.

Isabel came, according to appointment, about ten days after, and told me the house was quite cleared both of men and movables, but said, her lord (meaning my son) was not gone to the university as yet, but was at one of his guardian's houses, where he would stay about a month, and that he intended to make a visit before his departure, which he did, attended by my late chaplain; and I being in handsome lodgings, received them with all the complaisance and love as was possible, telling them, that time and circumstances having greatly varied with me, whatever they saw amiss, I hoped they would be so good as to look over it at that time, by considering the unhappy situation of my affairs.

After this visit was over, and I had myself and Isabel to provide for, handsome lodgings to keep, (which were as expensive as they were fine), and nothing but my principal money to live on, (I mean what I happened to have in my pocket at my lord's death,—for I had not been paid my 500*l.* as yet,) I could not manage for a genteel maintenance as I had done some years before. I thought of divers things to lay my small sums out to advantage, but could fix on nothing; for it always happens that when people have but a trifle, they are very dubious in the disposal of it.

Having been long resolving in my mind, I at last fixed on merchandize as the most genteel and profitable of anything else. Accordingly, I went to a merchant who was intimate with my late lord, and letting him know how my circumstances were, he heartily condoled with me, and told me he could help me to a share in two ships, one was going a trading voyage to the coast of Africa, and the other a privateering. I was now in a dilemma, and was willing to have a share in the trader, but was dubious of being concerned in the privateer; for I had heard strange stories told of the gentlemen concerned in that way of business. Nay, I had been told, but with what certainty I cannot aver that there was a set of men who took upon them to insure ships, and as they always knew to what port they are bound, notice was sent to their correspondent abroad, to order out their privateers on the coast the others sailed, and they knowing the loading, and the number of hands and guns were on board, soon made prizes of the vessels, and the profits were equally divided, after paying what was paid for their insurance, among them all.

However, I at last resolved, by the merchant's advice, to have a share in the trader, and the next day he over-persuaded me to have a share in the privateer also. But that I may not lay out my money before I have it, it may not be amiss to observe, that I went to the executors and received my 500*l.* at an hour's notice, and then went to the merchant's, to know what the shares would come to, and being told 1,500*l.*, I was resolved to raise the money; so I went home, and, with my maid Isabel, in two days' time disposed of as many of my clothes as fetched me near 1,100*l.*, which, joined to the above sum, I carried to the merchant's, where the writings were drawn, signed, sealed, and delivered to me, in the presence of two witnesses, who went with me for that purpose. The ships were near ready for sailing; the trader was so well manned and armed, as well as the privateer, that the partners would not consent to insure them, and out they both sailed, though from different ports, and I depended on getting a good estate between them.

When I was about this last ship, a letter came from the count, my son, full of tender expressions of his duty to me, in which I was informed, that he was going again to the university at Paris, where he should remain four years; after that, he intended to make the tour of Europe, and then come and settle at the Hague. I returned him thanks in a letter for his compliment, wished him all happiness, and a safe return to Holland, and desired that he would write to me from time to time, that I might hear of his welfare, which was all I could now expect of him. But this was the last time I heard from him, or he from me.

In about a month's time, the news came that the privateer (which sailed under British colours, and was divided into eight shares,) had taken a ship, and was bringing it into the Texel, but that it accidentally foundered, and, being chained to the privateer, had, in sinking, like to have lost that too. Two or three of the hands got on shore, and came to the Hague; but how terribly I was alarmed, any one may judge, when I heard the ship the privateer had was the Newfoundland, merchantman, as I had bought two shares in out of four. About two months after, news was current about the Hague, of a privateer or merchantman, one of them of the town, though not known which, having an engagement in the Mediterranean, in which action, both the privateer and trader was lost. Soon after, their names were publicly known, and, in the end, my partners heard that they were our ships, and unhappily sailing under false colours, (a thing often practised in the time of war), and never having seen each other, had at meeting, a very smart engagement, each fighting for life and honour, till two unfortunate shots, one of them, viz. the privateer was sunk by a shot between wind and water, and the trader unhappily blown up by a ball falling in the powder-room; there were only two hands of the trader, and three of the privateer that escaped, and they all fortunately met at one of the partner's houses, where they confirmed the truth of this melancholy story, and to me a fatal loss.

What was to be done now? I had no money, and but few clothes left, there was no hope of subsistence from my son or his guardians, they were tied down to be spectators of my misfortunes, without affording me any redress, even if they would.

Isabel, though I was now reduced to the last penny, would live with me still, and, as I observed before, and may now repeat, I was in a pretty situation to begin the world; upwards of sixty years of age, friendless, scanty of clothes, and but very little money.

I proposed to Isabel to remove from lodgings, and retire to Amsterdam, where I was not known, and might turn myself into some little way of business, and work for that bread now, which had been too often squandered away upon very trifles. And upon consideration, I found myself in a worse condition than I thought, for I had nothing to recommend me to Heaven, either in works or thoughts; had even banished from my mind all the cardinal and moral virtues, and had much more reason to hide myself from the sight of God, if possible, than I had to leave the Hague, that I might not be known of my fellow creatures. And further to hasten our removing to Amsterdam, I recollected I was involved in debt, for money to purchase a share in the Newfoundland trader, which was lost, and my creditors daily threatened me with an arrest to make me pay them.

I soon discharged my lodgings, and went with Isabel to Amsterdam, where I thought, as I was advanced in years, to give up all I could raise in the world, and on the sale of every thing I had, to go into one of the Proveniers' Houses, where I should be settled for life; but as I could not produce money enough for it, I turned it into a coffee-house near the Stadt House, where I might have done well; but as soon as I was settled, one of my Hague creditors arrested me for a debt of 75*l.*, and I not having a friend in the world of whom to raise the money, was, in a shameful condition, carried to the common jail, where poor Isabel followed me with showers of tears, and left me inconsolable for my great misfortunes. Here, without some very unforeseen accident, I shall never go out of it until I am carried to my grave, for which may my much offended God prepare me as soon as possible.

The Continuation of the Life of ROXANA, by Isabel Johnson, who had been her waiting maid, from the time she was thrown into jail to the time of her death.

After my lady, as it was my duty to call her, was thrown into jail for a debt she was unable to pay, she gave her mind wholly up to devotion, whether it was from a thorough sense of her wretched state, or any other reason I could never learn; but this I may say, that she was a sincere penitent, and in every action had all the behaviour of a Christian: by degrees all the things she had in the world were sold, and she began to find an inward decay upon her spirits. In this interval she repeated all the passages of her ill spent life to me, and thoroughly repented of every bad action, especially the little value she had for her children, which were honestly born and bred. And having, as she believed, made her peace with God, she died with mere grief, on the 2d of July 1742, in the sixty-fifth year of her age, and was decently buried by me in the churchyard belonging to the Lutherans in the city of Amsterdam.

MDCCCXL.

NEW VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD.

It has for some ages been thought so wonderful a thing to sail the tour or circle of the globe, that when a man has done this mighty feat he presently thinks it deserves to be recorded, like Sir Francis Drake's. So, as soon as men have acted the sailor, they come ashore and write books of their voyage, not only to make a great noise of what they have done themselves, but, pretending to show the way to others to come after them, they set up for teachers and chart-makers to posterity. Though most of them have had this misfortune, that whatever success they have had in the voyage, they have had very little in the relation, except it be to tell us that a seaman, when he comes to the press, is pretty much out of his element, and a very good sailor may make but a very indifferent author.

I do not in this lessen the merit of those gentlemen who have made such a long voyage as that round the globe; but I must be allowed to say, as the way is now a common road, the reason of it thoroughly known, and the occasion of it more frequent than in former times; so the world has done wondering at it; we no more look upon it as a mighty thing, a strange and never heard of undertaking; this cannot be now expected of us, the thing is made familiar, every ordinary sailor is able to do it, if his merchants are but qualified to furnish him for so long a voyage; and he that can carry a ship to Lisbon, may with the same ease carry it round the world.

Some tell us, it is enough to wonder at a thing nine days, one would reasonably then conclude that it is enough that sailing round the world has been wondered at above a hundred years: I shall therefore let the reader know, that it is not the rarity of going round the world that has occasioned this publication, but if some incidents have happened in such a voyage, as either have not happened to others, or as no other people, though performing the same voyage, have taken notice of, then this account may be worth publishing, though the thing, viz. The voyage round the world, be in itself of no value.

It is to be observed of the several navigators whose voyages round the world have been published, that few, if any of them, have diverted us with that variety which a circle of that length must needs offer. We have very little account of their landings, their diversions, the accidents which happened to them, or to others by their means; the stories of their engagements, when they have had any scuffle either with natives or European enemies, are told superficially and by halves; the storms and difficulties at sea or on shore have nowhere a full relation; and all the rest of their accounts are generally filled up with directions for sailors coming that way, the bearings of the land, the depth of the channels, entrances, and bars, at the several ports, anchorage in the bays and creeks, and the like things, useful indeed for seamen going thither again, and how few are they? but not at all to the purpose when we come expecting to find the history of the voyage.

Another sort of these writers have just given us their long journals, tedious accounts of their log work, how many leagues they sailed every day; where they had the winds, when it blew hard, and when softly; what latitude in every observation, what meridian distance, and what variation of the compass. Such is the account of Sir John Narbrough's voyage to the South Seas, adorned with I know not how many charts of the famous Strait of Magellan, a place only now famous for showing the ignorance of Sir John Narbrough, and a great many wise gentlemen before him, and for being a passage they had no need to have troubled themselves with, and which nobody will ever go through any more.

Such also are the voyages of Captain John Wood to Nova Zembla, at the charge of the public, in King Charles II's time, and Martin Forbisher to the North West Passages, in Queen Elizabeth's time; all which are indeed full of their own journals, and the incidents of sailing, but have little or nothing of story in them for the use of such readers who never intend to go to sea, and yet such readers may desire to hear how it has fared with those that have, and how affairs stand in those remote parts of the world.

For these reasons, when I first set out upon a cruising and trading voyage to the east, and resolved to go anywhere and everywhere that the advantages of trade or the hopes of purchase should guide us. I also resolved to take such exact notice of everything that passed within my reach, that I should be able, if I lived to come home, to give an account of my voyage, differing from all that I had ever seen before, in the nature of the observations, as well as in the manner of relating them: and as this is perfectly new in its form, so I cannot doubt but it will be agreeable in the particulars, seeing either no voyage ever made before had such variety of incidents happening in it, so useful and so diverting, or no person that sailed on those voyages has thought fit to publish them after this manner.

Having been fitted out in the river of Thames so lately as the year 1713, and on a design perhaps not very consistent with the measures taking at that time for the putting an end to the war, I must be obliged to own I was at first obliged to act not in my own name, but to put in a French commander into the ship, for the reasons which follow, and which those who understand the manner of trade upon closing the late war, I mean the trade with Spain, will easily allow to be just and well grounded.

During the late war between Great Britain and her confederates on one side, and the united crowns of France and Spain on the other side, we all know the French had a free trade into the South Seas; a trade carried on with the greatest advantage, and to the greatest degree, that any particular commerce has been carried on in the world for many ages past; insomuch that we found the return of silver that came back to France by those ships, was not only the enriching of the merchants of St Malo, Rochelle, and other ports in France, some of whom we saw get immense estates in a few years, even to a million sterling a man. But it was evident the king of France himself was enabled, by the circulation of so much bullion through his mints, to carry on that war with very great advantage.

It was just at the close of this war, when some merchants of London looking with envy on the success of that trade, and how the French, notwithstanding the peace, would apparently carry it on, for some years at least, to infinite advantage, began to consider whether it might not be possible to come in for a snack with France, as they were allied to Spain, and yet go abroad in the nature of a private cruiser.

To bring this to pass it was thought proper in the first place to get a share, if possible, in a new design of an East India trade in Flanders, just then intended to be set up by some British merchants, by the assistance of an imperial charter, or, at least, under colour of it; and so we might go to sea in a threefold capacity, to be made use of as occasion might present; viz. when on the coast of New Spain we sought to trade we were Frenchmen, had a French captain, and a sufficient number of French seamen, and Flemish or Walloon seamen, who spoke French, so to appear on all proper occasions. When at sea we met with any Spanish ship worth our while, we were English cruisers, had letters of marque from England, had no account of the peace, and were fitted for the attack. And when in the East Indies we had occasion to trade, either at the English or Dutch settlements, we should have imperial colours, and two Flemish merchants, at least in appearance, to transact everything as we found occasion. However, this last part of our project failed us, that affair not being fully ripe.

As this mysterious equipment may be liable to some exceptions, and perhaps to some inquiries, I shall for the present conceal my name, and that of the ship also. By inquiries I mean inquiries of private persons concerned; for as to public inquiries, we have no uneasiness, having acted nothing in contradiction to the rules and laws of our country; but I say, as to private persons, it is thought fit to prevent their inquiries, to which end the captain, in whose name I write this, gives me leave to make use of his name, and conceal my own.

The ship sailed from the river the 20th of December, 1713, and went directly over to the coast of Flanders, lying at anchor in Newport Pitts, as they are called, where we took in our French Captain Jean Michael Mirlotte, who, with thirty-two French seamen, came on board us in a large snow from Dunkirk, bringing with them one hundred and twenty-two small anchors or rundlets of brandy, and some hampers and casks of French wine, in wickered bottles. While we were here we lay under English colours, with pendants flying, our ship being upwards of five hundred tons, and had forty-six guns mounted, manned with three hundred and fifty-six men. We took the more men on board, because we resolved, as occasion should present, to fit ourselves with another ship, which we did not question we should meet with in the South Seas.

We had also a third design in our voyage, though it may be esteemed an accident to the rest, viz. we were resolved to make some attempts for new discoveries, as opportunity offered; and we had two persons on board who were exceedingly well qualified for our direction in this part, all which was derived from the following occasion:

The person who was principally concerned in the adventure was a man not only of great wealth, but of great worth; he was particularly addicted to what we call new discoveries, and it was indeed upon his genius to such things that the first thought of the voyage was founded. This gentleman told us that he had already sent one ship, fully equipped and furnished, for a new attempt upon the north-west or north-east passages, which had been so often in vain tried by former navigators; and that he did not question the success, because he had directed them by new measures, and to steer a course that was never attempted yet; and his design in our voyage was to make like discoveries towards the South Pole; where, as he said, and gave us very good reasons for it, he did not doubt but we might discover even to the Pole itself, and find out new worlds and new seas, which had never been heard of before.

With these designs this gentleman came into the other part of our project, and contributed the more largely, and with the more freedom, to the whole, upon that account; in particular, all the needful preparations for such discoveries were made wholly at his expense, which I take notice of here, as being most proper in the beginning of our story, and that the reader may the less wonder at the odd way we took to perform a voyage which might with much more ease have been done by the usual and ordinary way.

We sailed from the coast of Flanders the second of January, and without any extraordinary incident made the coast of Galloway in Ireland the tenth, where we staid and took in a very extraordinary store of provisions, three times as much as usual; the beef being also well pickled or doubled packed, that we might have a sufficient reserve for the length of our voyage, resolving also to spare it as much as possible.

We had a very rich cargo on board, consisting of all sorts of British manufacture suitable for the Spanish trade in their West Indies; and as we aimed at nothing of trade till we came to the Spanish coast, we sailed directly for the Canary Islands; having not fully resolved whether we would make our voyage to the South seas first, and so round the globe by the East Indies, as has been the ordinary way, or whether we would go first by the East Indies, and upon the discoveries we were directed to, and then cross the great Pacific Ocean to the west coast of America, as was at last resolved.

We made the Canaries the eleventh of February, and coming to an anchor there to take in some fresh water, we put out French colours, and sent our boat on shore, with a French boat-swain and all French seamen, to buy what we wanted. They brought us on board five butts or pipes of wine and some provisions, and having filled our water, we set sail again the thirteenth. In this time we called a council among ourselves by which way we should go, as above.

I confess I was for going by the Cape of Good Hope first, and so to the East Indies, then keeping to the south of Java, go away to the Moluccas, where I made no doubt to make some purchase among the Dutch Spice Islands, and so go away to the Philippines; but the whole ship's company, I mean of officers, were against me in this scheme, although I told them plainly that the discoveries which would be made in such a voyage as that were the principal reasons why our chief owner embarked in the adventure, and that we ought to regard the end and design of our voyage; that it would certainly in the close of things amount to the same, as to trade, as if we went the usual way, seeing the places we were to go to were the same one way as the other, and it was only putting the question which we should go to first; that all the navigators on such voyages as these went by the South seas first, which would be no honour to us at all; but if we went by the East Indies first, we should be the first that ever went such a voyage, and that we might make many useful discoveries and experiments in trying that course; that it would be worth our while, not only to go that way, but to have all the world take notice of it, and of us for it.

I used a great many arguments of the like nature, but they answered me most effectually, with laying before me the difficulties of the voyage, and the contrary methods of trade, which, in a word, made the going that way impracticable: First, the difficulty of the voyage over the vast ocean called the Pacific sea, or South sea, which, if we kept a southern latitude, and took the variable winds as we should find them, as I proposed to do, might very well be a voyage of six or eight months, without any sight of land, or supply of provisions or water, which was intolerable; that, as to trade, it was preposterous, and just setting the voyage with the bottom upward; for, as we were laden with goods, and had no money, our first business was to go to the South seas, where our goods were wanted, and would sell for money, and then to the East Indies, where our money would be wanting, to buy other goods to carry home, and not to go to the East Indies first, where our goods would not sell, and where we could buy no other for want of money.

This was so strong a way of reasoning that they were all against me, as well French as English, and even the two agents for discoveries submitted to it; and so we resolved to stand away from the Canaries to the coast of Brazil, thence upon the eastern coast of South America to Cape Horn, and then into the South seas; and if we met with anything that was Spanish by the way, we resolved to make prize of it, as in a time of war.

Accordingly we made the coast of Brazil in about twenty-six days, from the Canary islands, and went on shore at Cape St Augustine for fresh water, afterwards we put into the Bay of All Saints, got some fresh provisions there, and about a hundred very good hogs, some of which we killed and pickled up their flesh, and carried the rest on board alive, having taken on board a great quantity of roots and maize, or Indian corn, for their food, which they thrived on very well.

It was the last of March when we came to the Bay, and having stayed there fourteen days to furnish ourselves with all things we wanted, we got intelligence there that there were three ships at the Buenos Ayres, in the Rio de la Plata, which were preparing to go for Europe, and that they expected two Spanish men-of-war to be their convoy, because of the Portuguese men-of-war which were in Brazil, to convoy the Brazil fleet.

Their having two Spanish men-of-war with them for their convoy took away a great deal from the joy we had entertained at the news of their being there, and we began to think we should make little or nothing of it: however, we resolved to see the utmost of it, and particularly if our double appearance would not now stand us in some stead.

Accordingly we went away for the river of Plate, and, as usual, spreading French colours, we went boldly up to Buenos Ayres, and sent in our boat, manned with Frenchmen, pretending to be homeward bound from the South seas, and in want of provisions. The Spaniards received us with civility enough, and granted us such provisions as we wanted; and here we found, to our great satisfaction, that there was no such thing as any Spanish man-of-war there; but they said they expected one, and the governor there for the King of Spain asked our French officer if we would take one of their ships under our convoy; Monsieur Mirlotte answered him warily, that his ship was deep laden and foul, and he could not undertake anything, but if they would keep him company, he would do them what service he could; but that, also, as they were a rich ship, they did not design to go directly to France, but to Martinico, where they expected to meet with some French men-of-war to convoy them nome. This answer was so well managed, though there was not one word of truth in it, that one of the three ships, for the other two were not ready, resolved to come away with us, and, in an evil hour for them, they did so.

To be short, we took the innocent Spaniard into our convoy, and sailed away to the northward with them, but were not far at sea before we let them know what circumstances they were in, by the following method:—We were about half a league ahead of them, when our captain, bringing too and hauling up our courses, made a signal to the Spaniards for the captain to come on board, which he very readily did. As soon as he was on board our captain let him know that he was our prisoner, and all his men, and immediately manning their boat with thirty of our own men, we sent them on board their ship to take possession of her, but ordered them that they should behave civilly to the men on board, and plunder nothing, for we made a promise to the Spanish captain that his ship should not be plundered, upon condition he would give us a just account of his lading, and deliver peaceably to us what riches he had on board; then we also agreed that we would restore him his ship, which, by the way, we found was chiefly laden with hides, things of no value to us, and that the ship also was an old vessel, strong, but often doubled, and therefore a very heavy sailer, and consequently not at all fit for our purpose, though we greatly wanted a ship to take along with us, we having both too many men and being too full of goods, as I have said above.

The Spanish captain, though surprised with the stratagem that had brought him thus into the hands of his enemies, and greatly enraged in his mind at being circumvented, and trepanned out of his ship, yet showed a great presence of mind under his misfortune; and, as I verily believe, he would have fought us very bravely if we had let him know fairly what we were, so he did not at all appear dejected at his disaster, but capitulated with us as if he had been talking sword in hand; and one time when our captain and he could not agree, and the Spanish captain was a little threatened, he grew warm; told the captain that he might be ill used, being in his hands, but that he was not afraid to suffer whatever his ill fortune had prepared for him, and he would not, for fear of ill usage, yield to base conditions; that he was a man of honour, and if he (our captain) was so too, he demanded to be put on board his own ship again, and he should see he knew how to behave himself. Our captain smiled at that, and told him he was not afraid to put him on board his own ship and fight for her again, and that if he did so he was sure he could not escape him; the Spanish captain smiled too, and told him he should see (if he did) that he knew the way to heaven from the bottom of the sea, as well as any other road, and that men of courage were never at a loss to conquer their enemy one way or other, intimating that he would sink by his side rather than be taken, and that he would take care to be but a very indifferent prize to him if he was conquered.

However, we came to better terms with him afterward; and, in short, having taken on board all the silver, which was about 200,000 pieces of eight, and whatever else we met with that was valuable, among the rest his ammunition and six brass guns, we performed conditions and sent him into the Rio de la Plata again with his ship to let the other Spanish captains know what scouring they had escaped.

We got a good booty here, indeed, but were disappointed of a ship; however, we were not so sensible of that disappointment now as we were afterwards; for, as we depended upon going to the South Seas, we made no doubt of meeting with vessels enough for our purpose; what followed, we shall soon see.

We had done our work here, and had neither any occasion or any desire to lie any longer on this coast, where the climate was bad and the weather exceedingly hot, and where our men began to be very uneasy, being crowded together so close all in one ship, so we made the best of our way south.

We met with some stormy weather in these seas, and particularly a north-west blast, which carried us for eleven days, or thereabouts, a great way off to sea; but as we had sea-room enough, and a stout strong-built ship under us, perfectly well prepared, tight and firm, we made light of the storms we met with, and soon came into our voyage's way again; so that about the 4th of May we made land in the latitude of 45 degrees 12 minutes south.

We put in here for fresh water, and finding nothing of the land marked in our charts, we had no knowledge of the place, but coming to an anchor about a league from the shore, our boat went in quest of a good watering-place; in pursuit of this they went up a creek about two leagues more, where they found good water, and filled some casks, and so came on board to make their report.

The next day we came into the creek's mouth, where we found six to eight fathom water within cable's length of the shore, and found fresh water enough, but no people or cattle, though an excellent country for both.

Of this country I made many observations, suitable to the design and desire of our ingenious employer and owner, and which are one end of publishing this voyage. I shall mention only one here, because I shall come to speak of it again on another occasion more largely. My observation here is as follows:—

An observation concerning the soil and climate of the continent of America, south of the River de la Plata, and how suitable to the genius, the constitution, and the manner of living of Englishmen, and consequently of an English colony.

THE particular spot which I observe upon is that part of the continent of America which lies on the shore of the North Seas, as they are called, though falsely, for they are more properly the East Seas, being extended along the east shores of South America. The land lies on the same east sides of America, extended north and south from Costa Deserta, in 42 degrees, to Port St Julian, in 49 and a half degrees, being almost 500 miles in length, full of very good harbours, and some navigable rivers; the land is a plain for several scores of miles within the shore, with several little rising hills, but nowhere mountainous or stony, well adapted for enclosing, feeding, and grazing cattle; also for corn, all sorts of which would certainly not only grow, but thrive very well here, especially wheat, rye, peas, and barley, things which would soon be improved by Englishmen, to the making the country rich and populous, the raising great quantities of grain of all sorts, and cattle in proportion. The trade which I propose for the consumption of all the produce, and the place whither to be carried, I refer to speak of by itself, in the further pursuit of this work.

I return now to the pursuit of our voyage. We put to sea again the tenth of May, with fair weather and a fair wind, though a season of the year, it is true, when we might have reason to expect some storms, being what we might call the depth of their winter. However, the winds held northerly, which there are to be esteemed the warm winds, and bringing mild weather; and so they did, till we came into the latitude of fifty degrees, when we had strong winds and squally weather, with much snow and cold, from the S. W. and S. W. by W., which blowing very hard, we put back to Port St Julian, where we were not able to stir for some time.

We weighed again the 29th, and stood south again, passed the mouth of the straits of Magellan, a strait famous for many years for being thought to be the only passage out of the North Seas into the South Seas, and therefore, I say, famous some ages, not only in the discovery of it by Magellan, a Spanish captain, but of such significance, that for many years it was counted a great exploit to pass this strait, and few have ever done it of our nation but that they have thought fit to tell the world of it, as an extraordinary business, fit to be made public, as an honour to their names. Nay, King Charles the Second thought it worth while to send Sir John Narbrough on purpose to pass and take an exact survey of this strait, and the map or plan of it has been published by Sir John himself, at the public expense, as a useful thing.

Such a mighty and valuable thing also was the passing this strait, that Sir Francis Drake's going through it gave birth to that famous old wives' saying, viz., that Sir Francis Drake shot the gulf, a saying that was current in England for many years, I believe near a hundred after Sir Francis Drake was gone his long journey of all, as if there had been but one gulf in the world, and that passing it had been a wonder next to that of Hercules cleaning the Augean stable.

Of this famous place I could not but observe on this occasion, that as ignorance gave it its first fame, and made it for so many ages the most eminent part of the globe, as it was the only passage by which the whole world could be surrounded, and that it was every man's honour that had passed it as above; so now it has come to the full end or period of its fame, and will, in all probability, never have the honour to have any ship, vessel, or boat, go through it more, while the world remains, unless (which is very improbable) that part of the world should come to be fully inhabited. I know some are of opinion that before the full period of the earth's existence all the remotest and most barren parts of it shall be peopled; but I see no ground for such a notion, but many reasons which would make it appear to be impracticable, and indeed impossible, unless it should please God to alter the situation of the globe, as it respects the sun, and place it in a direct, as it now moves in an oblique position; or that a new species of mankind should be produced, who might be as well qualified to live in the frozen zone as we are in the temperate, and upon whom the extremity of cold could have no power. I say, as there are several parts of the globe where this would be impracticable, I shall say no more than this, that I think it is a groundless suggestion.

But to return to our voyage. We passed by the mouth of this famous strait De Magellan, and those others which were passed through by Le Maire, the Dutchman, afterwards, and keeping an offing of six or seven leagues, went away south, till we came to the latitude of fifty-eight, when we would, as we had tried three days before, have stretched away south-west, to have got into the South Seas, but a strong gale of wind took us at W. N. W., and though we could (lying near to it) stretch away to the southward, yet, as it over-blown, we could make no westward way; and though we had under us an excellent strong-built vessel, that valued not the waves, and made very good work of it, yet we went away to leeward in spite of all we could do, and lost ground amain. We held it out, however, the weather being clear, but excessive cold, till we found ourselves in the latitude of sixty-four.

We called our council several times, to consider what we should do, for we did but drive to leeward; the longer we strove with it, the gale held still, and to our apprehensions, it was set in, blowing like a kind of monsoon, or trade wind, though in these latitudes I know there is no such thing, properly called, as a trade wind.

We tried (the wind abating) to beat up again to the north, and we did so, but it was by running a great way to the east; and once, I believe, we were in the latitude of St Helena, though so far south, but it cost us infinite labour, and near six weeks' time; at length we made the coast, and arrived again at the port of St Julian the 20th of June, which, by the way, is the depth of their winter.

Here we resolved to lay up for the winter, and not attempt to go so far south again at that time of year; but our eager desire of pursuing our voyage prevailed, and we put out to sea again, having taken in fresh provisions, such as are to be had there, that is to say, seals, penguins, and such like trade, and with this recruit we put to sea, I say, a second time.

We had this time worse luck than we had before, for the wind setting in at south-west, blew a storm, and drove us with such force away to sea eastward, that we were never able to make any way to the southward at all, but were carried away with a continued storm of wind, from the same corner, or near it, our pilot, or master as we called him, finding himself often obliged to go away before it, and it kept us out so long at sea, and we were gone so far to the north-east eastward, that he advised us to stand away for the Cape of Good Hope; and accordingly we did so, and arrived at the Cape the last day of July. We were now dead-hearted indeed, and I began to revive my proposal of going to the East Indies, as I had at first intended; and to answer the objection which they made against it, as being against the nature of trade, and that we had nothing on board but European goods, which were not fitted for the East Indies, where money only was suitable to the market we were to make. I say to answer this objection, I told them I would engage that I would sell our whole cargo at the Philippine Islands, as well as on the coast of America; so that those islands being Spanish, our disguise of being French would serve us as well at the Philippines as it would in New Spain; and with this particular advantage, that we should sell here for four times the value as we should on the coast of Chili or Peru; and that when we had done, we could load our ship again there, or in other places in the Indies, with such goods as would come to a good market again in New Spain.

This I told them was indeed what had not been practised, nor at any other time would it be practicable. For as it was not usual for any ships to go from the East Indies to the Philippines, so neither was it usual for any European ships to trade with freedom to the South Seas, till since the late war, when the French had the privilege; and I could not but be amazed that the French had never gone this way, where they might have made three or four voyages in one, and with much less hazard of meeting with the English or Dutch cruisers; and have made twice the profits which they made the other way, where they were frequently out three or four years upon one return; whereas here they might make no less than three returns, or perhaps four, in the same voyage, and in much less time.

They were now a little surprised, for in all our first debates we had nothing of this matter brought in question; only they entertained a notion that I was going upon strange projects, to make discoveries, search for the South Pole, plant new colonies, and I know not how many whims of their own, which were neither in my design, or in my instructions. The person therefore who was our supercargo, and the other captain whose name I have not mentioned, together with the French Captain Merlotte, and the rest who had all opposed me before, came cheerfully into my proposal, only the supercargo told me in the name of the rest that he began to be more sensible of the advantages of the voyage I had proposed than he was before; but that as he was intrusted, together with me, in the government of the trading part, for I was empowered equally with him too, he begged I would not take it ill that he desired I would let him further into that particular, and explain myself at least as far as I thought fit.

This was so just a request, and so easy for me to do, and, above all, was made with so much good manners and courtesy, that I told him, if I had been otherwise determined, the courteous and good-humoured way with which he required it, would constrain me to it; but that, however, I was very ready to do it, as he was intrusted with the cargo equally with me, and that it was a piece of justice to the owners, that whom they thought fit to trust, I should trust also; upon this I told him my scheme was as follows:—

First, I told him, that as the Philippine Islands received all their European goods from Acapulco, in America, by the King of Spain's ships, they were obliged to give what price was imposed upon them by the merchants, who brought those goods by so many stages to Acapulco. For example, the European goods, or suppose English goods in particular, with which they were laden, went first from England to Cadiz, from Cadiz by the galloons to Porto Bello, from Porto Bello to Panama, from Panama to Acapulco; in all which places, the merchants had their several commissions and other profits upon the sale; besides the extravagant charges of so many several ways of carriage, some by water, some by land, and besides the king's customs in all those places; and that after all this, they were brought by sea from Acapulco to the Philippine Islands, which was a prodigious voyage, and were then generally sold in the Philippine Islands at three hundred per cent. advance.

That in the room of all this, our cargo being well bought and well sorted, would come to the Philippine Islands at once, without any landing or relanding, and without any of all the additions of charge to the first cost, as those by the way of New Spain had upon them; so that if we were to sell them at the Philippine Islands a hundred per cent. cheaper than the Spaniards usually sold, yet we should get abundantly more than we could on the coast of Peru, though we had been allowed a free trade there.

That there were but two objections to this advantage, and these were, our liberty of trading, and whether the place would consume the quantity of goods we had. And to this I had much to answer; first, that it was well known at the Philippine Isles, that the Kings of France and Spain were united firmly together; that the King of Spain had allowed the King of France's subjects a free trade in his American dominions, and consequently that it would not be denied there; but, on the other hand, that if it was denied by the governor, yet there would be room to find out a trade with the inhabitants, and especially with the Chinese and Japan merchants, who were always there, which trade the governor could not prevent; and thus we could not fear a market for all our cargo, if it was much greater than it was.

That as to the returns, we had the advantage either way. For first, we should be sure to receive a great part of the price of our goods in Chinese or Japan gold and silver, or in pieces of eight; or, if we thought fit to trade another way, we might take on board such a quantity of China damasks, and other wrought silks, muslins, and chintz, China ware, and Japan ware; all which would be immediately sold in America; that we should carry a cargo of these goods to New Spain, infinitely to our advantage, being the same cargo which the four great Acapulco ships carry back with them every year. That when we had gone to the South Seas with this cargo, of which we knew we should make a good market, we had nothing to do but to come back if we thought fit, to the East Indies again, where we might load, for England or Flanders, such goods as we thought proper; or, if we did not think fit to take so great a run, we might go away to the south, and round by Cape Horn into the Atlantic Ocean, and perfect those discoveries which we made part of in the beginning of our voyage.

This was so clear a scheme of trade, that he seemed surprised with it, and fully satisfied in every part of it. But the captain then objected against the length of the voyage to the South Seas from the Philippines, and raised several scruples about the latitude which we should keep in such a voyage; that we should not be able to carry any provisions which we could take on board in these hot countries, that would keep for so long a run, and several other difficulties; to all which, I made answer, that when we had sold our cargo at the Philippines, and found our advantages there to answer our desires, I would not oppose our returning from thence directly to England, if they found it needful; or if they thought a further adventure would not answer the risks we were to expect in it, and that we would never have any dispute about that.

This satisfied them fully, and they went immediately with the news to the men, as what they thought would please them wonderfully, seeing they were mighty uneasy but two or three days before, about their being to go back again to the south of America, and the latitude of 64, where we had not only been twice driven back, as if Heaven had forbidden us to pass that way, but had been driven so far to the south that we had met with a most severe cold, and which pinched our men exceedingly, who being come, as we might say, a hot weather voyage, were but ill furnished for the weather usual in the latitudes of 64.

But we had a harder task to go through than we expected upon this occasion, and it may stand here upon record, as a buoy or beacon, to warn officers and commanders of ships, supercargoes, and such as are trusted in the conduct of the voyage, never to have any disputes among themselves (I say not among themselves) about the course they shall take, or whither they shall go; for it never fails to come among the men after them; and if once the debate is but named on the outside of the great cabin door, it becomes immediately a dispute among the officers upon the quarter-deck, the lieutenants, mates, purser, &c.; from thence it gets afore the mast, and into the cook-room, and the whole ship is immediately divided into factions and parties; every foremast man is a captain; every boatswain, gunner, carpenter, cockswain, nay, and even the cook, sets up for a leader of the men; and if two of them join parties, it is ten to one but it comes to a mutiny, and perhaps to one of the two last extremes of all mutinies, viz., running away from the ship, or running away with the ship.

Our case was exactly thus, and had issued accordingly, for ought I know, if we had not been in a port where we got immediate assistance, and that by a more than ordinary vigour in the management too.

I have mentioned the first time when we called a council about our voyage at the Canaries, and how it was carried against my opinion not to go to the East Indies, but to go to the South Seas, about by Cape Horn. As the debate of this was not at all concealed, the officers of the ship, viz., the two lieutenants and two mates, the purser, and others, came in and went out, and not only heard all we said, but talked of it at liberty on the quarter-deck, and where they pleased, till it went among the whole ship's crew. It is true, there came nothing of all this at that time, because almost all the votes being against my opinion, as I have said already, the ship's company seemed to join in naturally with it, and the men were so talked into the great prospects of gain to themselves by a voyage to the South Seas, that they looked upon me, who at the bottom had the chief direction of things, to be nobody, and to have only made a ridiculous proposal, which was against all their interest; and I perceived clearly after this, that they looked upon me with an evil eye, as one that was against their interest, nay, and treated me with a sort of contempt too, as one that had no power to hurt them, but as one, that if things were left to me, would carry them on a wild-goose chase, they knew not whither.

I took no notice of this at first, knowing that in the process of things I should have opportunity enough to let them know I had power to oblige them many ways; as also, that I had authority sufficient to command the whole ship, and that the direction of the voyage was principally in me, though I being willing to do everything friendly, had too easily, and I may say, too foolishly, put that to the vote which I had a right to have commanded their compliance with, the consequences of which appeared not for some time, but broke out upon the occasion of our new measures, as you shall hear.

As soon as we had determined, as you have heard, our voyage among ourselves in the great cabin, the supercargo and Captain Mirlotte, as above, went out upon the quarter-deck, and began to talk of it among the officers, midshipmen, &c.; and, to give them their due, they talked of it very honestly, not with any complaint of being overruled, or over-persuaded, or the like, but as a thing that was fully agreed to among us in the great cabin.

The boatswain, a blunt, surly, bold fellow, as soon as he heard of it—"Very well" says he; "so we are all come back into Captain ——'s blind proposal. Why this is the same that every body rejected at the Canaries; and now, because we are driven hither by contrary winds, those winds must be a reason why we must undertake a preposterous, ridiculous voyage, that never any sailor would have proposed, and that man never went before. What! does Captain —— think that we cannot find our way to the coast of America again? and because we have met with cross winds we must never meet with fair ones? I warrant him, let us but go up the heights of St Helena, we will soon reach the Rio de la Plata and Port St Julian again, and get into the South Seas too, as others have done before us.

The gunner took it from the boatswain, and he talks with one of the midshipmen in the same dialect. "For my part," says he, " shipped myself for the South Seas when I first came on board the ship, and in hopes of good booty, and if we go thither, I know nothing can hinder us, wind and weather permitting; but this is such a voyage as no man ever attempted before; and whatever he proposes can have nothing in it for the men but horrid fatigue, violent heats, sickness, and starving."

One of the mates takes it from him, and he says as openly, "I wonder what a plague the rest of the gentlemen mean, they were all against Captain ——— when he started this whimsical voyage before, and now they come all into it of a sudden, without any consideration; and so the project of one man must ruin the most promising voyage in the world, and be the death of above two hundred as stout fellows as ever were together in one ship in this part of the world."

One of the midshipmen followed the mate, and said we were all promised that another ship should be gotten, either purchased or taken, and that the first ship we took, should be manned and victualled out of this ship, where we were double manned and crowded together enough to bring an infection among us, in such hot climates as we are going into; and if we were in the South Seas, we should easily buy a ship, or take a ship for our purpose, almost where we would; but in all this part of the world there is no such thing as a ship fit for an Englishman to set his foot in. We were promised too, that when we got into such a ship, we that entered as midshipmen should be preferred to offices as we were qualified, and as our merit should recommend us. What they are going to do with us now I can't imagine, unless it be to turn us afore the mast when half the foremast men are dead, and thrown overboard.

The master or pilot of the ship heard all these things, and sent us word into the great cabin of all that passed, and, in short, assured us, that if these things went a little further, he was afraid they would come up to a mutiny; that there was great danger of it already, and that we ought to apply some immediate remedy to it, or else he thought it would be too late. He told me the particulars also, and how the whole weight of their resentment seemed to tend to a quarrelling at my command, as believing that this project of going to the East Indies, was wholly mine; and that the rest of the officers being a little influenced by the accident of our being driven so far out of our way, were only biassed in the rest by my opinion; and as they were all against it before, would have been so still if it had not been for me; and he feared, if they went on, they might enter into some fatal measures about me, and perhaps resolve to set me ashore in some barren, uninhabited land or other, to give me my bellyful of new discoveries, as it seems some of them had hinted, and the second mate in particular.

I was far from being insensible of the danger I was in, and indeed of the danger the whole voyage, ship and all, was in; for I made no question, but that if their brutish rage led them to one villanous action, they would soon go on to another; and the devil would take hold of that handle to represent the danger of their being punished for it when they came home; and so, as has often been the case, prompt them to mutiny against all command, and run away with the ship.

However, I had presence of mind enough to enter into proper measures for our general safety, and to prevent the worst in case of any attempt upon me, first I represented the case to the rest of the gentlemen, and asked if they would stand by me, and by the resolutions which we had taken for the voyage; then I called in to our assistance the chief mate, who was a kinsman of one of our owners, a bold, resolute gentleman, and the purser, who we knew was faithful to us; as also, the surgeon and the carpenter: I engaged them all to give me first their opinions whether they were convinced of the reasonableness of my scheme for the voyage I had proposed; and that they might judge for themselves, laid it all before them again, that they were convinced entirely of its being the most rational prospect of the voyage for us, of any we could go about.

When I had done this, I recommended it to them to expostulate with the men, and, if possible, to keep them in temper, and keep them to their duty; but at the same time, to stand all ready, and upon a signal which I gave them, to come all to the steerage, and defend the great cabin door with all the other hands, whom they could be sure of; and in the mean time to be very watchful over the motions of the men, and see what they drove at.

At the same time, I fortified myself with the French captain, and the supercargo, and the other captain; and by the way, all the French captain's men were true to him (and he true to us) to a man. We then brought a sufficient store of ammunition and small arms into the great cabin, and secured the steerage, as also the round-house, so that we could not possibly be surprised.

There was nothing done that night; but the next morning I was informed that the gunner and second mate were in close cabal together, and one or two of the midshipmen, and that they had sworn to one another, not that they would not go the voyage as was proposed, for that might have ended in their running away, which I should not have been sorry for; but in short, their oath was, that the ship should not go the voyage, by which I was presently to understand that they had some measures to take to prevent my design of the voyage to the Philippines, and that perhaps this was to run away with the ship to Madagascar, which was not far off.

I had, however, this apparent encouragement in this case, viz., that as the contrivance was yet but two days old, for it was but two days since they had any notice of our intentions to go, they would be some days caballing and forming an interest among the men, to make up a party strong enough to make any attempt, and that as I had a strong set of men who would be as diligent the other way, they would be heaving and contriving one way and the other way to get the men over to their opinion, so that, at least, it would be some time before they could make their party up.

The thing was rightly conjectured, and the three men above, who had made themselves the head of the mutineers, went on apace, and my men increased too, as much as could be desired for the time; but the Friday after, which was about five days from the first discovery, one of the midshipmen came and desired to speak with me, and desired it might not, if possible, be known that he was with me. I asked him if he desired to be alone; he said no, I might appoint who I thought convenient that I could trust, but that what he had to say was of the last importance to all our lives, and that therefore he hoped I would be very sure of them who I trusted in such a case. Upon this I told him I would name the chief mate, the French captain, and the supercargo, and in the meantime I bid him not be too much surprised, for that I had already some warning of the thing which I believed he had to tell me of, and that I was preparing all things to disappoint it; that, however, I should not value his fidelity the less, and that he might speak freely his mind before those men, for they were all in the secret already, and he might be sure both of protection and reward.

Accordingly, I bid him go out upon the quarter-deck, and walk there, and that when the chief mate went off into the round-house, he should go down between decks, as if he was going into his cabin to sleep, and that when he heard the chief mate call the cabin-boy, a black of mine, whose name was Spartivento, he should take that for a signal that the steerage was clear, and he might come up, and should be let into the great cabin; all which was so managed, and in so short a time, that he was with us in the great cabin in a quarter of an hour after the first conference, and none of the men perceived it.

Here he let me into the whole secret, and a black project it was, viz., that the second mate, the gunner, three midshipmen, the cockswain, and about six-and-thirty of the men, had resolved to mutiny and seize upon all us who were in the new project, as they called it; and to confine us first, then to set us on shore, either there where we were, or somewhere else, and so carry the ship away to the South Seas, and then to do as they found convenient; that is to say, in a word, to seize upon me, the other captain, the French captain, the supercargo, chief mate, doctor, and carpenter, with some others, and run away with the ship.

He told me that they had not fully consulted all their measures, nor gained so many of the men as they intended; that they were to sound some more of the men the next morning; and as soon as they had made their number up fifty, they were resolved to make the attempt, which they did not question would be by Thursday, and this was Monday morning; and that if they were then ready, they would make the onset at changing the watch the same evening. He added, that as they were to go on shore the next morning for fresh water, I should know the truth of it by this, that the second mate would come to me, and tell me that they wanted more water, and to know, if I pleased, the boats should go on shore, and that, if I pleased, he would go with them, or any else whom I pleased to appoint; and that upon supposition that I would leave it to him, to take who he thought fit to go with him, he would then take occasion to choose the principal conspirators, that they might, when they were on shore, consult their measures for good and all.

I had all that day (Monday) to order my preparations, and upon this plain intelligence I resolved to lose no time, nor was it long before I resolved what to do; for as their design was desperate, so I had nothing but desperate remedies to provide. Having therefore, as I say, settled my measures, I called for the cockswain, and bid him man the pinnace, for that I was to go on shore, and I appointed only the supercargo, and the surgeon, and the French captain to go with me.

There were no English ships in the road, but there were about five Dutch ships, homeward bound, waiting for more, and three outward bound. As I passed by one of the outward bound East India ships, the French captain, as we had agreed before, pretended to know the ship, and that the commander was his old acquaintance, and asked me to give him leave to visit him, and told me he was sure he would make us all welcome. I seemed unwilling at first, telling him I intended to go on shore, and pay my respects to the governor, and, as was usual, to ask him leave to buy some provisions, and that the governor would take it very ill if I did not go. However, upon his alleging that we would not stay, and that the Dutch captain, upon his going on board, would, he was sure, give us a letter of recommendation to the governor, by which we should have everything granted that we could desire. Upon this, and his importunity, I seemed to consent, and we all went on board.

Captain Merlotte, who spoke Dutch very well, hailed the ship, asked the captain's name, and then asked if he was on board; they answered yes. Then he bid them tell him that the captain of the English ship was come to visit him; upon which, immediately, their chief mate bade them man the side, and stood at the side to receive us, and before we could get up, the Dutch captain came upon the quarter-deck to meet me, and with great civility invited me into his cabin; and while we were there, the chief mate, by the captain's order, entertained the boat's crew with like civility.

When we were in the cabin, Captain Merlotte told the Dutch captain that we came indeed to him in the form of a visit, but that our business was of the greatest importance, and begged we might speak to him of it in the hearing of none but such as he could trust. The captain told us with the greatest open-heartedness imaginable, that though we were strangers to him, yet we looked like honest men, and he would grant our desire; we should speak it in the hearing of none but those we could trust, for there should be nobody by but ourselves.

We made him fully sensible that we knew how obliging that compliment was, but begged he would admit any whom he thought worthy to be trusted with a secret of the last importance. He then carried it as far the other way, and told us, that then he must call in the whole ship's company, for that there was not a man in the ship but he could trust his life in his hands. However upon the whole, he sent everybody out of the cabin but us three and himself, and then desired we would speak our minds freely.

Captain Merlotte, who spoke Dutch, began, but the captain interrupted him, and asked if the English captain (meaning me) spoke Dutch; he said no; upon which he asked Captain Merlotte if he spoke English, and he said, "Yes." Upon which he let me know that he understood English, and desired I would speak to him in English.

I was heartily glad of this, and began immediately with the story, for we had time little enough. I told him that he was particularly happy that, as he said, he could put his life in the hand of any man, the meanest in his ship; that my men were unhappily the reverse of his; and then beginning at the first of the story, I gave him a full account of the whole, as related above.

He was extremely affected with it, and asked me what he could do to serve me, and assured me that he would not only do what in him lay, but would engage all the ships in the road to do the like, and the governor also on shore. I thanked him very sincerely, and told him, that what at present was the thing I thought lay before me was this, viz., that the chief conspirators would be on shore to-morrow, with one, or perhaps two, of our boats, to fetch water, and get some fresh provisions, and I would be very glad to have them seized upon by surprise when they were on shore, and that I then thought I could master the rest on board well enough.

"Leave that to me," says he, "I'll give the governor notice this evening, and as soon as they come on shore they shall be all seized. But," says he, "if you think they may incline to make any resistance, I'll write a line to the governor, and give it you now; then, when your men go on shore, order one or two of the principal rogues to go and wait on the governor with the letter from you, and when he receives it, he shall secure them there; so they will be divided and taken with the more ease."

"In the meantime," adds he, "while this is doing on shore, I'll come on board your ship, with my long-boat and pinnace, and as many men as you please, to repay you the compliment of this visit, and assist you in reducing the rest."

This was so kind and so completely what I desired, that I could have asked nothing more or less; and I accepted his visit in his barge, which I thought would be enough, but was afraid that if more came, our men might be alarmed, and take arms before I was ready; so we agreed upon that, and that if I desired more help, I should hang out a signal, viz., a red antient on the mizen top.

All things being thus consulted, I returned on board, pretending to our men that I had spent so much time on board the Dutch ship, that I could not go on shore; and indeed some of my men were so drunk that they could scarce sit to their oars; and the cockswain was so very drunk, that I took occasion to ask leave publicly to leave him on board till the next day, giving the Dutch captain, also, a hint that he was in the conspiracy, and I should be glad to leave him on that account.

The next day, about nine o'clock, the second mate came to me, and told me they wanted more water, and if I pleased to order the boat on shore, he would go, if I thought fit, and see if he could get any fresh provisions, the purser being indisposed. I told him—Yes, with all my heart, that the Dutch captain, last night, had given me a letter to the governor, to desire we might be furnished with whatever we had occasion for, and that I had thoughts of calling for him to go on shore and deliver it, and that perhaps the governor might make him some present in compliment to the English nation.

He seemed extremely pleased at this, and even elevated, and going out to give orders about the boat, ordered the long-boat and the shallop, and came in again, and asked me who I pleased to have go along with him. I answered smilingly to him, "Pick and choose them yourself; only leave the pinnace's crew, that went with me yesterday, because they must go on board again to carry the Dutch captain a little present of English beer that I am going to send him, and fetch a-board their drunken cockswain, who was so drunk we were fain to leave him behind us."

This was just what he wanted; and we found he chose all the chief rogues of the conspiracy; such as the boatwain, the gunner, the midshipmen we spoke of, and such of the foremast-men as he had secured in his design; and of the rest, we judged they were in the plot, because he took them with him; and thus, having the long-boat and the shallop, with about six-and-thirty men with them, away they went to fill water.

When they came on shore they had presently three Dutchmen, set by the Dutch captain, unperceived by them, to be spies upon them, and to mark exactly what they did; and at the same time, they found three boats of Dutchmen at the watering-place, for the captain had gotten two boats to go on shore from two other ships, full of men also, having acquainted them with the design. As soon as our boats came on shore, the men appeared to be all very much engaged in something more than ordinary, and instead of separating, as it was expected they should, they went all into one boat, and there they were mighty busily engaged in discourse one with another.

The Dutch captain had given the charge of these things to a brisk, bold fellow, his mate, and he took the hints the captain gave him so well, that nothing could have been better; for finding the men thus in a kind of cabal, he takes four of his men, with muskets on their shoulders, like the governor's men, and goes with them to the Englishmen's boat, and asks for their officer, the second mate, who upon this appears. He tells them he comes from the governor, to know if they were Englishmen, and what their business was on shore there. The mate answered, they came from on board the English ship, that they were driven there from stress of weather, and hoped they might have leave to fill water and buy necessaries for their money. He told them he supposed the governor would not refuse them when he knew who they were, but that it was but good manners to ask leave. The Englishman told him that he had not yet filled any water, or bought any provisions, and that he had a letter to the governor from the captain, which he supposed was to pay the usual civilities to him, and to give him the civility of asking leave, as was expected.

The Dutchman answered, that was "Hael weel," that he might go and carry it, if he pleased, then, and if the governor gave them leave, all was right, and as it should be; but that the men could not be admitted to come on shore till his return. Upon this, away goes the second mate of our ship, and three of the men with him, whereof the gunner was one; for he had asked the Dutchman how many he might carry with him, and he told him, three or four; and those he took, you may be sure, were of the particular men whom he had a confidence in, because of their conversing together by the way.

When they came to the governor, the mate sent in a message first, viz.—That he was come from on board the English ship in the Road, and that he had a letter from the captain to his excellency. The governor, who had notice given him of the business, sends out word, that the gentlemen should send in the letter, and the governor would give them an answer. In the meantime, there appeared a guard of soldiers at the governor's house, and the four Englishmen were let into the outer room, where the door was shut after them, and the soldiers stood without the door, and more soldiers in another room, between them and the parlour which the governor sat in.

After some time the mate was called in, and the governor told him that he had read the letter which he had brought, and asked him, by an interpreter, if he knew the contents of it. He answered—No. The governor replied, he supposed not; for if he had, he would scarce have brought it; at the same time told him, he was obliged to make him and all his men prisoners, at the request of their own captain, for a conspiracy to raise a mutiny, and run away with the ship. Upon which two great fat Dutchmen came up to him, and bid him deliver his sword, which he did, with some reluctance, for he was a stout, desperate, and strong fellow; but he saw it all to no purpose to dispute or resist.

At the same time, the three men without were made prisoners also by the soldiers. When the governor had thus secured these men, he called them in, and inquired the particulars of the case, and expostulated with them very courteously upon such a horrid, villanous practice, and inquired of them what the occasion could be, and hearing all they had to say in their defence, told them he could do nothing in it more till their captain came on shore, which would be in a day or two, and that in the mean time they must be content to remain in custody, which they did, separated from one another. They were very civilly treated, but strictly kept from speaking with one another, or sending any messages to one another, or to the boats.

When this was done, the governor sent six files of musqueteers down to the watering-place, with orders to secure all the Englishmen in the two boats, which was done. They pretended to make some resistance at first, being all very well armed; but the seamen of the three Dutch long-boats, joining themselves to the soldiers, and notice being given to the English seamen, that if they fired one gun, they should have no quarter, and especially their two principal men, the chief mate and the gunner, being absent, they submitted, and were all made prisoners also.

When this was done, of which the Dutch captain had notice by a signal from the shore, he came off in his shallop, with about sixteen seamen, and five or six gentlemen and officers, to pay his visit to me. I received him with all the appearance of ceremony imaginable, caused a handsome dinner to be prepared for him, and caused his men to be all treated upon the deck, and made mighty preparations for a feast.

But in the middle of all this Captain Merlotte, with all his Frenchmen, being thirty-two, appeared in arms on the quarter-deck; the Dutch captain's attendants stood to their arms on the main deck, and I, with the supercargo, the doctor, and the other captain, leaving the Dutch captain and some men in the great cabin as a reserve, came to the steerage-door, cleared the steerage behind me, and stood there with a cutlas in my hand, but said nothing; neither was there a word spoke anywhere all the while.

In this juncture the chief mate, the faithful midshipmen, the carpenter, and the gunner's mate, with about twenty men who they could trust, went fore and aft between decks, and secured all the particular men that we had the least suspicion of, being no less than thirty-five more; these they secured, bringing them up into the steerage, where their hands were tied behind them, and they were commanded not to speak one word to another, upon pain of present death.

When this was done the chief mate came to me to the steerage-door, and passing by, went forward on with his men, entered the cook-room, and posted himself at the cook-room door. There might be still about eighty men upon the forecastle, and midships upon the open decks; and there they stood staring, and surprised at what what was doing; but not being able to guess in the least what was meant, what was the cause of it, or what was intended to be done farther.

When I found all things ready, I stepped forward a step or two, and beckoning to the mate to command silence, I told the men that I was not disposed to hurt any man, nor had I done what I now did, but by necessity, and that I expected they should all submit; that if any one of them made the least resistance he was a dead man, but that if they would be easy and quiet, I should give a very good account to them all of every part of the voyage, or scheme of a voyage which I had laid, and which had been so ill represented to them.

Then I caused my commission, or letter of marque, to be read to them all, by which it appeared that I was really chief commander of the ship, and had a right to direct the voyage as I thought best; with a paper of written instructions, signed by the owners and adventurers, and directed to me, with another paper of instructions to all the officers, to be directed by me in all things; which indeed was all news to them, for they did not think I was the chief captain or commander of the ship and voyage.

When I had done this, I gave them a long and full account of the reasons why I thought it best, as our present circumstances were stated, not to go to the South Seas first, but to go away to the Philippine Islands, and what great prospect of advantage to the owners there was, as well as to the men; and that I wondered much that such measures were taking in the ship, as I heard there were; and that I was not, they might see, unprovided of means to reduce every one of them to their duty by force, and to punish those that were guilty as they deserved; but that I rather desired to win them by kindness; and that therefore, I had resolved, that if any of them had any reason to dislike the voyage, they should be fairly set on shore, and should go to the second mate and his comrades; and as I named the second mate I told them what circumstances they were in, and how effectually they were secured.

This astonished them, and surprised them exceedingly, and some of them inquired more particularly into the circumstances of the said second mate and his fellows. I told them they were safe enough, and should remain so; for as I could prove they had all a villanous design to run away with the ship, and set me on shore, either here or in a worse place, I thought that only on account of my own safety, such men were not fit to go in the ship, being once capable to entertain such horrid, mischievous thoughts, or that could be guilty of such villany; and that if any of them were of their minds, they were very welcome, if they thought fit, to go to them. At this word, some bold rogues upon the fore-castle, which I did not discern by reason of the number that stood there, cried out—"One and all,"—which was a cry at that time of mutiny and rebellion, that was certain, and its kind, very dangerous.

However, to let them see I was not to be daunted with it, I called out to one of the men among them, who I saw upon the fore-castle,—“You Jones,” says I, “tell me who that was, and come away from them, for I’ll make an example of him, whoever he is.” Will Jones slunk in among the rest, and made me no answer, and immediately “One and all” was cried again, and a little huzza with it, and some of the men appeared to have some fire-arms with them. There was a great many of them, and I presently foresaw, that if I went to the extremity, I should spoil the voyage though conquered them; so I bridled my passion with all my might, and said calmly, “Very well, gentlemen, let me know what it is you mean by ‘One and all;’ I offered any of you that did not like to go the voyage, might quit the ship. Is it that you intend by ‘One and all?’ If so, you are welcome, and pray take care to do it immediately. As for what chests and clothes you have in the ship, you shall have them all with you. Upon this I made the chief mate, who was now come to me again, advance a little with some more men, and get between the men upon the fore-castle and those who were upon the main deck; and, as if he had wanted room, when he was gotten between them, he said to them, “Stand a little aft, gentlemen,”—and so crowded them towards me.

As they came nearer and nearer to where I stood, I had opportunity to speak to them singly, which I did calmly and smiling:—“Why, how now, Tom,” says I to one of them, “what! are you among the mutineers?”—“Lord, sir,” says Tom, “not I, they are mad, I think, I have nothing to say to them, I care not where I go, not I; I’ll go round the globe with you; it’s all one to me.”—“Well, Tom,” says I, “but what do you do among them, then? Come away into the steerage, and show yourself an honest man.” So Tom comes in, and after him another, and then two more. Upon my saying to Tom, “What do you do among them?” one of the fellows says to one of the officers that stood at a little distance from me, “What does the captain mean by saying ‘among them.’ What! does he reckon us to be in the plot? He is quite wrong; we are all ignorant, and quite surprised at it.” He immediately tells me this, and I was glad, you may be sure, to hear it, and said aloud to the man he spoke to,—“If they are honest men, and would not appear in this villany, let them go down between decks, and get out of the way, that they may have no share in the punishment, if they have none in the crime.” “With all my heart,” says one. “God bless you, captain,” says another.”—And away they dropped, one by one, in at the steerage door, and down between decks, every one to his hammock or cabin, till there was not above five or six of them left.

By this time our two boats appeared from the shore, being both manned with Dutchmen, viz., the Dutch captain’s mate, and about twenty of his men, all the water-casks full, but not a man of mine with them, for they were left a shore in safe custody.

I waited till they came on board, and then, turning to the men on the fore-castle, I told them they should go on board the boats immediately, as soon as the butts of water were hoisted in. They still said, “One and all,” they were ready, and desired they might go and fetch their clothes. “No, no,” says I, “not a man of you shall set your foot any more into the ship; but go, get you into the boats, and what is your own shall be given you into the boat.”

As I spoke this in an angry tone, and with a kind of passion, that looked provoked to a high degree, they began to see they had no room to choose; and some of them slipped down the scuttle into the cook-room. I had ordered the officer who was there, who was one of the midshipmen, to wink at it, and let as many come down as offered it; and the honest man did more than that; for he went to the scuttle himself, and as if he had whispered, so that I should not hear him, called them one by one by their names, and argued with them:—“Prithee, Jack,” says he to one of them, “don’t you be distracted and ruin yourself, to gratify a rash drunken humour; if you go into the boat, you are undone, you will be seized as soon as you come ashore, as the rest are, and will be sent to England in irons, and there you will be infallibly hanged. Why you are certainly all mad.” Jack replies, he had no design to mutiny, but the second mate drew him in, and he did not know what to do; he wished he had not meddled, but he was undone; now what could he do? “Do,” says the midshipman, “leave them for shame, and slip down here, and I'll see and get you off, if I can." Accordingly, he pulled him down, and after him so many got out of sight the same way, that there was not above seventeen or eighteen left upon the fore-castle.

I seemed to take no notice of that; till at last one of the men that was left there, with his hat in his hand, stepping just to the edge of the fore-castle, which was next to me, said in a very respectful manner, that I saw how many had slunk away and made their peace, or at least obtained pardon, and that I might, perhaps, know that they who were left were only such as had their duty there, being placed there of course, before the mutiny began, and that they had no hand in it, but abhorred it with all their hearts, which he hoped I would consider, and not join them with those that had offended, merely because they came upon the fore-castle, and mixed there with the men who had the watch.

I told him if that was true it would be in their favour, but I expected he would prove it to my satisfaction before I accepted that for an excuse. He told me it might, perhaps, be hard to prove it, seeing the boatswain and his mate, and the second mate were gone, but the rest of the ship's crew could all testify that they were a part of the men whose watch it was, and that they were upon the fore-castle by the necessity of their duty, and no otherwise, and called such and such men who were upon duty with them to witness it, who did confirm it.

Upon this I found myself under a necessity, in justice to the men, to approve it: but my own management was a bite upon myself in it; for though I did allow the midshipmen to wink at their slipping away as before, yet I made no question but I should have some left to make examples of; but as I could not go back from the promise of mercy which I had allowed the midshipman to offer in my name, so I tricked myself by their mistake into a necessity of pardoning them all, which was very far from my design; but there was no remedy.

However, the men, when they were so happily escaped, desired the midshipmen, who had been instrumental to deliver them, to assure me, that as they were sensible they had deserved very ill at my hands, and that yet I had treated them thus kindly, they would not only reveal to me all the particulars of the conspiracy and the names of those principally concerned in it, but that they would assure me they would never more dispute any of my measures, but were very ready to do their duty as seamen to what part of the world soever I might think fit to go, or which way I thought fit to carry them; whether outward or homeward, and that they gave me the tender of their duty in this manner with the utmost sincerity and with thankfulness for my having forgiven them that conduct which was the worst that a seaman could be guilty of.

I took this very kindly, and sent them word I did so, and that they should find they had taken the wiser course, that I had an entire confidence in their fidelity, and that they should never find I would reproach them with or use them the worse for what had passed.

I must confess I was very glad of this submission of the men; for though by the measures

I had taken I was satisfied I should conquer them, and that I was safe from their attempts; yet carrying it on by resentment, and doing justice upon the offenders, whatever advantage it had one way, had this disadvantage in the consequence, viz., that it would ruin the voyage, for at least half the men were in the plot.

But having thus conquered them by good usage, I thought my next work was to inquire into the mistakes which had been the foundation of all this; so before I parted with the men who had returned to their duty, I told them that as I had freely forgiven what was past, so I would keep my word with them that I would never reproach them with it; but that I thought it was necessary their judgments should be convinced how much they were imposed upon, as well as their tempers be reduced by my kindness to them. That I was of opinion that they had been abused in the account given them of what I had designed to do, and of the reasons I had to give for doing it; and I would desire them to let me know afterwards whether they had been faithfully informed of things or not; and whether, in their own judgment, now when they were freed from the prepossessions they were under, they could object anything against it or no.

This I did with respect to the other men whom I had made prisoners in the steerage, whom I had the same desire to be kind to as I had to these; but upon whom I resolved to work this way, because, after all, I might have this work to do over again, if I should meet with any disappointment or miscarriage in the voyage; or especially if we should be put to any straits or distress in the pursuing of it.

In order to this, I caused the voyage itself, and the reasons of it, the nature of the trade I was to carry on by it, the pursuit of it to the South Seas,—in a word, everything just as we had argued and settled it in the great cabin, to be put in writing and read to them.

The fellows, every one of them, declared they were fully satisfied in the voyage itself, and that my reasons for it were perfectly good; and that they had received a quite different account of it; as that I would carry them into the island of the Moluccas, which was the most unhealthy part of the East Indies; that I would go away to the south for new discoveries; and that I would go away thence to the South Seas; which was a voyage of such a length that no ship could victual for; that it was impossible to carry fresh water such a length; and, in a word, that it was a voyage that would destroy us all.

It was the chief mate and the midshipman who took them all down the scuttle that brought me this account from them; so I made him take two of those penitent mutineers with him, and go to the men in the steerage, whom he had made prisoners at first, and see whether their delusions were of the same kind, and what kind of temper they were in. Accordingly, he went to them directly, for this was not a business that admitted giving them time to club and cabal together, and form other societies or combinations which might have consequences fatal to us still.

When he came to them, he told them the captain was willing to do all the justice possible to his men, and to use them on all occasions with equity and kindness; I ordered him to inquire calmly what it was had moved them to these disorders, and what it was which they had been made to believe was doing, that they could enter into measures so destructive to themselves, and to those who had entrusted them all with the ship and cargo; for that in a voyage, every foremast-man, in his degree, is trusted with the safety of the whole ship.

They answered it was the mate: that they had never shown themselves discontented, much less disorderly in the ship; that they had on all occasions done their duty through the whole voyage till now, and that they had no ill design upon any one, much less had they any design to destroy the voyage, or injure the captain; but that they were all told by the second mate that the captain had imposed upon them, that he had proposed a mad voyage to the South Pole, that would murder them all, and that they were to lay aside the trading and cruising voyages which they came out upon, and were now to spend the whole voyage in new discoveries, by which the men could propose nothing to themselves but hardships, and perhaps perishing with hunger and cold; whereas, had they gone to the South Seas, as was intended, they might all have been made, and that the hazards, with that prospect, had some sense in them; whereas in this project there was nothing but certain destruction.

The mate delivered them a copy of the scheme I had proposed, the reasons of it, the trade I had designed, the return I was to make, and everything as I have already mentioned it, and bid them take it and consider of it.

As I was justly provoked to see how I had been abused and misrepresented to the men, so they were astonished when they read my scheme, and saw what mischiefs they had been led into, for they know not what, and without any reason or just consideration. And after they had debated things a while among themselves, they desired the chief mate might come to them again, which he did. Then they told him that, as they had been thus grossly abused and drawn into mischiefs which they never designed, by such plausible pretences, and by being told such a long story full of lies, and to carry on a hellish project of the second mate's, they hoped then, being so much imposed upon would a little extenuate their fault; that they were convinced that the captain had proposed nothing but what was very rational, and a voyage that might be very profitable to the owners and to themselves, and that they entirely threw themselves upon the captain's mercy, and humbly begged pardon; that if I pleased to forgive them, they would endeavour to merit such forgiveness by their future behaviour; and that in the meantime they submitted to what punishment I pleased to lay upon them; and particularly, that as they had forfeited, by their conspiracy, all the claim they had upon the ship, and might justly have been turned ashore at the first land they came to, they were willing to sign a discharge for all their wages due to them, which was now near eight months a-man, and to be considered for the rest of the voyage as they deserved; that they would all take a solemn oath of fidelity to me to do their duty, to go wherever I would carry them, and to behave with the greatest submission and diligence, in hopes to regain my favour by their future behaviour, and to show their gratitude for the pardon I should grant them.

This was, indeed, just as I would have it, for I wanted nothing more than to have something offered, which I might give them back again; for I ever thought, and have found it by experience to be the best way, and men were always secured in their duty by a generous kindness, better than by the absolute dominion and severity; indeed my opinion was justified in all the measures I took with these men; for as I found they were sufficiently humbled, and that I had brought them low enough, I let them know that it was not their punishment, but their amendment I desired; that I scorned to make a prey of them, and take that forfeiture they had offered, so putting the wages due to them for their labour in my pocket. But I sent them word I was very glad to hear that they were sensible how much they had been imposed upon; that as it was not my design to offer anything to them which they or any honest men ought to refuse, so it was not my desire to make any advantages of their follies, but what might tend to bring them back to their duty; that as I had no prospect that was inconsistent with their safety and interest, so I scorned to make a profit of their submission; that as to their wages, though they had forfeited it by their mutiny, yet God forbid I should make it my profit; and, since forgiving their offence was in my power, the crime being in one particular an offence against me, they should never be able to say I made a gain of their submission, and like the Pope, should sell them my pardon; that upon their solemn engaging to me never to offer the least disturbance of any kind in the ship for the future, but to do their duty faithfully and cheerfully, I would forget all that was past, only this excepted, viz., that two of them who were particularly guilty of threatening the life of Captain Merlotte, should be punished as they deserved.

They could not deny but this was most just; and they did not so much as offer to intercede for those two; but when one of the two moved the rest, they answered they could not do it, for they had received favour enough for themselves, and they could not desire anything of the captain for their sakes, for they had all deserved punishment as well as they.

In a word, the two men were brought to the geers, and soundly whipped and pickled; and they all proved very honest ever after. And these, as I said at first, were two-and-thirty in all.

All this while Captain Merlotte, with his Frenchmen, were in arms, and had possession on the quarter-deck, to the number of twenty-three stout men; I had possession of the main-deck, with eighteen men and the sixteen Dutchmen, and my chief mate, with the midshipman, had possession of the cook-room and the quarter-deck; the Dutch captain, our supercargo, the surgeon, and the other captain, kept the great cabin, with a guard of twelve musqueteers without the door, and about eight more within, besides servants. Captain Merlotte's men, also, had a guard of eight men in the round-house. I had now nothing to do but with my men who were on shore; and of these, six of them were indifferent, being men not embarked in the design, but carried on shore by the chief mate, with a design to engage them with him; so that indeed, they fell into a punishment before they fell into the crime, and what to do with these men was the case.

The first thing I did was to dismiss my visitor, the Dutch captain, whom I had a great deal of reason to think myself exceedingly obliged to; and first, I handsomely rewarded his men, to whom I gave four pieces of eight a-man; and having waited on the captain to the ship's side, and seen him into his boat, I fired him twenty-one guns at his going off, for which he fired twenty-five when he came on board his ship. The same afternoon, I sent my pinnace on board for my drunken cockswain, and with the pinnace I sent the captain three dozen bottles of English beer, and a quarter-cask of Canary, which was the best present I had to make him, and sent every one of his other seamen a piece of eight per man; and indeed the assistance I had from the ship deserved it; and to the mate, who acted so bravely with my men on shore, I sent fifty pieces of eight.

The next day, I went on shore to pay my respects to the governor, when I had all the prisoners delivered up to me; the six men, I caused to be immediately set at liberty, as having been innocent, and brought all the rest on board, tied hand and foot, as prisoners, and continued them so a great while afterward, as you shall hear. As for the second mate, I tried him formally by a council of war, as I was empowered by my commission to do, and sentenced him to be hanged at the yard-arm; and though I suspended the execution from day to day, yet I kept him in expectation of the halter every hour, which, to some, would have been as grievous as the hanging itself.

Thus we conquered this desperate mutiny, all principally proceeding from suffering the private disputes among ourselves, which ought to have been the arcana of the whole voyage, and kept as secret as death itself could have kept it, I mean so as not to come among the seamen afore the mast.

We lay here twelve days, during which time we took in fresh water, as much as we had casks for, and were able to stow. On the 13th day of August we weighed and stood away to the east, designing to make no land any more till we came to Java Head, and the Straits of Sunda, for that way we intended to sail; but the wind sprung up at E., and at E. S. E., and blew so fresh that we were obliged, after two days' beating against it, to bear away afore it, and run back to the Cape of Good Hope.

While we were here, there came in two Dutch East Indiamen more, homeward bound, to whom had happened a very odd accident, as follows:—They had been attacked by a large ship of forty-four guns, and a stout sloop of eight guns; the Dutch ships, resolving to assist one another, stood up to the Frenchman, for such it seems he was, and fought him very warmly. The engagement lasted six or seven hours, in which the privateer had killed them some men; but in the heat of the fight, the sloop received a shot, which brought her main-mast by the board, and this caused the captain of the frigate to sheer off, fearing his sloop would be taken; but the sloop's men took care of themselves, for hauling a little out of the fight, they got into their own boats, and a boat which the frigate sent to their help, and abandoned the sloop, which the Dutchmen perceiving, they manned out their boats, and sent and took the sloop, with all that was in her, and brought her away with them.

The Dutchmen came into the road at the Cape with this prize while our ship was there the second time, and we saw them bringing the sloop in a tow, having no mast standing but a little pole-mast set up for the present, and her mizen, which was also disabled and of little use to her.

I no sooner saw her, but it came into my thoughts that if she was anything of a sea-boat, she would do our business to a tittle; and as we had always resolved to get another ship, but had been disappointed, this would answer our end exactly. Accordingly, I went with my chief mate in our shallop, on board my old acquaintance the Dutch captain, and inquiring there, was informed of the case, that it was a prize, taken as above, and that in all probability the captain that took her would be glad to part with her, and the captain promised me to go on board the ship that brought her in, and inquire about it, and let me know.

Accordingly, the next morning, the captain sent me word I might have her; that she carried eight guns, had good store of provisions on board, with ammunition sufficient, and I might have her and all that was in her for 1,200 pieces of eight. In a word, I sent my chief mate back with the same messenger and the money, giving him commission to pay the money and take possession of her, if he liked her, which he did; and the Dutch captain, my friend, lent him twelve men to bring her off to us, which they did the same day.

I was a little put to it for a mast for her, not having anything on board that we could spare that was fit for a main-mast; but resolving at last to mast her, not as a sloop, but as a brigantine, we made shift with what spare pieces we had, and a spare foretop-mast, which one of the Dutch ships helped me to, so we fitted her up very handsomely, made her carry twelve guns, and put sixty men on board. One of the best things we found on board her was cask, which we greatly wanted, especially for barrelling up beef, and other provisions, which we found very difficult; but our cooper eked them out with making some new ones out of her old ones.

After staying here sixteen days more, we sailed again, indeed. I thought once we should never have gone away at all; for it is certain above half the men in the ship were made uneasy, and there remained still some misunderstanding of my design, and a supposition of all the frightful things the second mate had put into their heads; and by his means, the boatswain and gunner. As these three had the principal management of the conspiracy, and that I had pardoned all the rest, I had some thoughts of making an example of these. I took care to let them know it, too, in a manner that they had no room to think it was in jest, but that I intended to have them all three hanged; I kept them above three weeks in suspense about it. However, as I had no intention to put them to death, I thought it was a piece of cruelty, something worse than death, to keep them continually in expectation of it, and in a place, too, where they had but little more than room to breathe.

So having been seventeen days gone from the Cape, I resolved to relieve them a little, and yet at the same time remove them out of the way of doing me any capital injury, if they should have any such design still in their heads. For this purpose, I caused them to be removed out of the ship into the brigantine, and there I permitted them to have a little more liberty than they had on board the great ship, and where two of them entered into another devilish conspiracy, as wild and foolish as ever I heard of, or as, perhaps, was ever heard of, of which I shall say more in its place.

We were now to sail in company, and we went away from the Cape the third of September, anno 1740. We found the brigantine an excellent sea-boat, and could bear the weather to a miracle, and no bad sailer; she kept pace with us on all occasions, and in a storm we had at S. S. E., some days after, she shifted as well as we did in the great ship, which made us all in love with her.

This storm drove us away to the northward, and I once thought we should have been driven back to the Cape again; which if it had happened, I believe we should never have gone on with the voyage; for the men began to murmur again, and say we were bewitched, that we were beaten off first from the south of America, that we could never get round there, and now driven back from the South of Africa; so that it looked as if Fate had determined this voyage to be pursued no further. The wind continued, and blew exceeding hard; and in short, we were driven so far to the north, that we made the south point of the island of Madagascar.

My pilot knew it to be Madagascar as soon as he had a clear view of the land, and having beaten so long against the sea to no purpose, and being in want of many things, we resolved to put in; and accordingly made for Port St Augustine, on the west side of the island, where we came to an anchor in eleven fathom water, and a very good road.

I could not be without a great many anxious thoughts upon our coming into this island, for I knew very well that there were a gang of desperate rogues here, especially on the northern coast, who had been famous for their piracies, and I did not know but that they might be either strong enough as pirates to take us, or rogues enough to entice a great many of my men to run away; so I resolved neither to come near enough the shore to be surprised, nor to suffer any of my men to go on shore, such excepted as I could be very secure of.

But I was soon informed by a Dutchman, who came off to me with some natives in a kind of a canvas boat, that there were no Europeans there but himself, and that the pirates were on the north part of the island; that they had no ship with them of any force, and that they would be glad to be fetched off by any Christian ship; that they were not above two hundred in number, their chief leaders, with the only ships of force they had, being out a cruising on the coast of Arabia and the Gulf of Persia.

After this, I went on shore myself, with Captain Merlotte, and some of the men who I could trust, and we found it true, as the Dutchman had related. The Dutchman gave us a long history of his adventures, and how he came to be left there by a ship he came in from Europe, which, he running up into the country for sport, with three more of his comrades, went away without them, and left them among the natives, who, however, used them very well, and that now he served them for an interpreter and a broker, to bargain for them with the European ships for provisions. Accordingly, he engaged to bring us what provisions we pleased, and proposed such trinkets in return as he knew the natives desired, and as were of value little enough to us, but he desired a consideration for himself in money, which, though it was of no use to him there, he said it might be hereafter; and as his demand was but twenty pieces of eight, we thought he very well deserved it.

Here we bought a great quantity of beef, which, having no casks to spare, we salted, and then cured it in the sun, by the Dutchman's direction, and it proved of excellent use to us through the whole voyage, for we kept some of it till we came to England, but it was then so hard that a good hatchet would hardly cut it.

While we lay here, it came into my thoughts that now was a good time to execute justice upon my prisoners; so I called a council of war, and proposed it to them in general terms, not letting them know my mind as to the manner of it. They all agreed that it was necessary, and the second mate, boatswain, and gunner, had so much intelligence of it from the men, that they prepared for death as much as if I had signed a death-warrant for their execution, and that they were to be hanged at the yard-arm. But in the middle of those resolves I told the council of officers that my design was to the north part of the island, where a gang of pirates were said to be settled, and that I was persuaded I might get a good ship among them, and as many men as we desired, for that I was satisfied the greatest part of them were so wearied of their present government, that they would be glad of an opportunity to come away, and especially such as had by force, or rash hasty resolutions, been, as it were, surprised into that sort of life; that I had been informed they were very far from being in such a formidable posture as they had been represented to us in Europe, or anything near so numerous, but that on the contrary we should find them poor, divided, in distress, and willing to get away upon any terms they could.

Some of the officers of the ship differed from me in my opinion; they had received such ideas of the figure those people made at Madagascar, from the common report in England, that they had no notion of them, but as of a little commonweath of robbers; that they were immensely rich, that Captain Avery was king of the island; that they were near eight thousand men, that they had a good squadron of stout ships, and that they were able to resist a whole fleet of men-of-war, having a harbour so well fortified at the entrance into it that there was no coming at them without a good army for land service and the like.

I convinced them how impossible this was to be true, and told them all the discourse I had had with the Dutchman at the place where I now was, who had had a full account of it from several of them who had come down to St Augustine's in little boats, in order to make their escape from them, and to get passage for Europe, whom he had always assisted, and got them off as any ship touched at that port, and who all agreed in their relation of their particulars, which were indeed miserable enough, saving that they wanted neither victuals nor clothes.

In a word, I soon brought them to enter into the reason of it, and to be of my opinion; and accordingly I ordered to get ready, and in three days' time weighed, and stood away for the north of the island; for, by the way, we did not now communicate our debates or resolves to the men before the mast, as had been done before,—we had indeed had enough of that already.

While we were thus coasting the island to the north, and in the channel or sea between the island and the main of Africa, it came into my thoughts that I might now make use of my traitors to my advantage and their own too, and that I might, if they were honest, gain my end, and get full intelligence of the people I had my eye upon, and if they were still traitors, they would desert and go over to the pirates, and I should be well rid of them, without the necessity of bringing them to the yard-arm; for I was very uneasy in my mind about hanging them too, nor could I ever have been brought to do it, I believe, whatever risk I had run from their mutinous disposition.

I was now got into the latitude of fifteen degrees and a half south of the line, and began to think of standing in for the shore, when I ordered the second mate, who lay in irons in the brigantine, to be brought on board the ship, and to be called up into the great cabin. He came in great concern; though he was of himself a very bold and resolute fellow, yet as he made no doubt that he was sent for to execution, he appeared thoroughly softened, and quite another man than he was before.

When he was brought in, I caused him to be set down in a nook of the cabin, where he could not stir to offer any violence to me, if he had had any will to it, two large chests being just before him; and I ordered all my people to withdraw, except Captain Merlotte and the supercargo, and then, turning myself to the criminal, I told him he knew his circumstances, I need not repeat them, and the fact for which he was brought into that condition; that I had hitherto from time to time delayed his execution, contrary to the opinion of the rest of the chief officers, who in full council had unanimously condemned him; that I had a sudden thought came into my head, which, if he knew how to merit mercy, and to retrieve his circumstances by his future fidelity, might once again put it into his power not only to save his life, but to be trusted in the ship again, if he inclined to be honest; that, however, if he had no inclination to merit by his service, I would put it to his choice, either to undertake with courage and fidelity what I had to propose to him, in which case he might expect to be very well treated, or if not, I would pardon him as to the death he had reason to expect, and he, with his two fellow criminals, should be set on shore, to go whither they pleased.

He waited, without offering to speak a word, till I made a full stop, and then asked me if I gave him leave to answer; I told him, yes; then he asked me if I gave him leave to speak freely, and would not take offence at what he might say. I told him he should speak as freely as if he had never offended; and that as I had given him his life, I would now give him my word nothing he could say should revoke the grant; and that he should not only go freely on shore, for I expected by his words that he had made that choice, but that I would give him the lives of his two fellow-prisoners, and would give them arms and ammunition, and anything else that was reasonable for them to ask, or necessary to their subsisting on shore in such a country.

He told me then that, had it been any other part of the world than at Madagascar, he would readily have chosen to have gone on shore; nay, though the place had been really desolate and uninhabited; that he did not object because my offer was not very generous and kind, and it would be always with regret that he should look back upon the mercy he should have received, and how ill he had deserved it at my hands.

But that as it was at this place that I mentioned setting him at liberty, he told me that though he had been mutinous and disorderly, for which he acknowledged he had deserved to die, yet he hoped I could not think so ill of him as to believe he could turn pirate, and begged that, rather than entertain such hard thoughts of him, I would execute the worst part of the sentence, and send him out of the world a penitent, and an honest man; which he should esteem far better than to give him his life in a condition in which he could preserve it upon other terms than those of being the worst of villains. He added, that if there was anything he could do to deserve so much mercy as I intended him, he begged me that I would give him room to behave himself as became him, and he would leave it wholly to me to use him as he should deserve, even to the recalling the pardon that I had granted him.

I was extremely satisfied with what he said, and more particularly with the manner of his speaking it; I told him I was glad to see that he had a principle of so much honesty at the bottom of a part so unhappy as he had acted; that I would be very far from prompting him to turn pirate, and much more from forcing him to do so; and that I would, according to his desire, put an opportunity into his hands to show himself a new man; and by his fidelity to wipe out all that was past: and then without any more ceremony, I told him my whole design, which was to send him, and four or five more men with him, on shore among the pirates as spies, to see what condition they were in, and to see whether there was any apprehensions of violence from them, or whether they were in the mean circumstances that I had reason to believe they were in; and, lastly, whether they had any ship or vessel that might be bought of them, and whether men might be had to increase our company; that is to say, such men as being penitent for their rogueries, and tired with their miseries, would be glad of the opportunity of turning honest men before they were brought to it by distress and the gallows.

He embraced the opportunity with the greatest readiness, and gave me all the assurances that I could desire of his fidelity. I then asked him whether he thought his two fellow prisoners might be trusted upon the same foot. He asked me if I would take it for a piece of sincerity if, after a trial, he should tell me his mind, and would not be displeased if he declined speaking his thoughts till he had talked with them. I told him he should be at liberty to give his further answer after he had proposed it to him; but I insisted upon his opinion first, because it was only his opinion that I asked now; whereas, if he reported it to them, then he had no more to do but to report their answer. He then asked me if I would please to grant him one thing, namely, that whatever his opinion should be, that what he should say should be no prejudice to them in their present condition; I told him it was a reasonable caution in him, and I would assure him that whatever he said should not do them any prejudice, and to convince him of it, I gave him my word that I would not put them to death on any account whatsoever, merely for his sake. He bowed, and thanked me very heartily for that grant, which he said obliged him to be the plainer with me on that head, and as, he said, he would not deceive me in anything whatever, so he would not in this especially; and therefore told me it was his opinion they would not serve me faithfully; and he referred me to the experience I should find of it; and added, that he would be so just to me in the beginning, as that while he begged me to be merciful to them, yet for my own sake he would also beg me not to trust them.

I took the hint, and said no more at that time, but ordered his irons to be taken off, and ordered him to have leave to go to his former cabin, and to have his chests and things restored to him; so that he was at full liberty in the ship, though not in any office, or appointed to any particular business. A day or two after this we made land, which appeared to be the north-west part of the island, in the latitude of thirteen degrees thirty minutes; and now I thought it was time to put our design in execution; for I knew very well that it could not be a great way from this part of the island where the pirates were to be heard of: so I ordered the boat on shore, with about sixteen men, to make discoveries, and with them my new restored man. I gave him no instruction for anything extraordinary at this time, our work being now only to find out where they were. The boat came on board again at night, or we had now stood in within two leagues of the shore, and brought us an account that there were no English or Europeans at all thereabouts, but they were to be heard of a great way farther. So we stood away to the north all the night, and the next day the wind being fair and the sea smooth, and by our reckoning we went in that time about forty leagues.

The next evening the same company went on shore again, and were showed by some of the natives where the pirates inhabited; which, in short, was about five or six-and-twenty miles further north still, in a river very commodious for shipping, where they had five or six European built ships, and two or three sloops; but they were all laid up, except two sloops, with which they cruised sometimes a great distance off to the north, as far as the Arabian Gulf. He returned with this intelligence the same night, and by his direction we stood in as close under the shore as we could conveniently, about six leagues further north; here we found a very good road under a little Cape, which kept us perfectly undiscovered; and in the morning before day my man went on shore again with the boat, and, keeping only four men with him, sent the boat on board again, agreeing on a signal for us to send the boat for him again when he should return.

There was a pretty high ledge of hills to the north of the place where he landed, and which running west, made the little Cape under the lee of which our ship rode at an anchor as above. As soon as he came to the top of those hills he plainly discovered the creek or harbour where the pirate ships lay, and where they had formed their encampment on the shore. Our men took such proper observations of the situation of the place they were in upon the hill, that they might not fail to find their way back again, though it were in the night; and having agreed in the account they should give of themselves, so that they might be all found in the same tale, they boldly went down the hill, and came to the edge of the creek, the pirates' camp being on the other shore.

Here they fired a gun to raise a kind of alarm among them, and then hanging out a white cloth on the top of a pole, a signal of peace, they hailed them in English, and asked them if they would send a boat and fetch them over.

The pirates were surprised at the noise of the piece, and came running to the shore with all speed; but they were much surprised when they heard themselves hailed in English. Upon the whole they immediately sent a boat to fetch them over, and received them with a great deal of joy.

Our men pretended to be overjoyed at finding them there, told them a long story that they came on shore on the west side of the island, where, not far off, there were two English ships, but that the natives quarrelling with their men, upon some rudeness offered to their women, and they being separated from their fellows, were obliged to fly, that the natives had surrounded the rest, and they believed had killed them all; that they wandered up to the top of the hill, intending to make signals to their ship to send them some help; when seeing some ships they believed some Europeans were there, and so came down to take shelter; and they begged of them a boat to carry them round the Cape to their comrades, unless they would give them leave to stay with them, and do as they did, which they were very willing to do.

This was all a made story; but, however, the tale told so well, that they believed it thoroughly, and received our men very kindly, led them up to their camp, and gave them some victuals.

Our men observed they had victuals enough, and very good, as well beef as mutton; that is to say, of goats' flesh, which was excellent good; also pork and veal, and they were tolerable good cooks too, for they found they had built several furnaces and boilers, which they had taken out of their ships, and dressed a vast quantity of meat at a time; but they observed they had no liquor, upon which the mate pulled a large bottle of good cordial waters out of his pocket, and gave it about as far as it would go, and so did two others of the men, which their new landlords took very kindly.

They spent good part of the first day in looking about them, seeing the manner of the pirates living there, and their strength; and soon perceived that they were indeed but in a sorry condition every way, except that they had cattle and flesh meat sufficient. They had a good platform of guns indeed, and a covered place pallisadoed round where they lodged their ammunition. But as for fortifications to the landward they had none, except a double pallisado round their camp, and a sort of a bank thrown up within to fire from, and stand covered from the enemies lances, which was all they had to fear from the natives. They had no bread but what they made of rice, and the store they had of that was very small. They told our men indeed, that they had two ships abroad, which they expected back every day with a quantity of rice, and what else they could get, especially with some arrack, which they were to trade for with the Arabian merchants, or take it by force, which should first offer.

Our men pretended to like their way of living mighty well, and talked of staying with them, if they would let them, and thus they passed the first day of conversation.

Our men had two tents or huts given them to lodge in, and hammocks hung in the huts very agreeably, being such I suppose as belonged to some of their company that were dead, or were out upon adventures, here they slept very secure, and in the morning walked about, as strangers might be suffered to do to look about them; but my new manager's eye was chiefly here upon two things, first, to see if they had any shipping for our purpose, and, secondly, to see if he could pitch upon one man more particular than the rest, to enter into some confidence with, and it was not long before he found an opportunity for both, the manner was thus:—

He was walking by himself, having ordered his other men to straggle away two and two, this way and that, as if they had not minded him, though always to keep him in sight, I say, he walked by himself towards that part of the creek, where, as was said, three of their biggest ships lay by the walls, and when he came to the shore right against them, he stood still looking at them very earnestly; while he was here he observed a boat put off from one of them, with four oars and one sitter only, whom they set on shore just by him, and then put off again; the person whom they set on shore was, it seems, one who had been with our men the evening before, but having some particular office on board one of those ships, lay on board every night, with about ten or twelve men, just to watch and guard the ship, and so came on shore in the morning, as is usual in men of war laid up.

As soon as he saw our man he knew him, and spoke very familiarly to him, and seeing he was looking so earnestly at the ship, he asked him if he would go on board, our man faintly declined it, as on purpose to be asked again, and upon just as much further pressing as was sufficient to satisfy him that the gunner, for that was his office, was in earnest he yielded, so the gunner called back the boat, and they went on board.

Our man viewed the ship very particularly, and pretended to like everything he saw; but, after some conversation, asks him this home question, namely, why they did not go to sea, and seek purchase, having so many good ships at their command? He shook his head, and told him very frankly that they were in no condition to undertake anything, for that they were a crew of unresolved divided rogues; that they were never two days of a mind; that they had nobody to command, and therefore nobody to obey; that several things had been offered, but nothing concluded; that in short, they thought of nothing but of shifting every one for themselves, as well as they could.

My mate replied, he thought it had been quite otherwise, and that made him tell them last night that he had an inclination to stay with them. "I heard you say so," said the gunner, "and it made me smile; I thought in myself that you would be of another mind when you knew us a little better; for, in a word," said he, "if they should agree to lend you a boat to go back to your ship, they would go together by the ears about who should go with you; for not a man of them that went with you would ever come back again hither, if your captain would take them on board, though the terms were, to be hanged when they came to England."

My mate knew that this was my opinion before, but he was really of another mind himself, till he saw things, and till he talked with this gunner; and this put new things in his head. So he entertained the gunner with a scheme of his own, and told him, if things were so as he related it, and that he had really a mind to come off from that gang, he believed that he could put him in a way how to do it to his advantage, and to take a set of his people with him, if he could pick out some of them that might be depended upon.

The gunner replied that he could pick out a set of very brave fellows, good seamen, and most of them such as having been forced into the pirates' ships, were dragged into that wicked life they had lived, not only against their consciences, but by a mere necessity to save their lives, and that they would be glad at any price to come off. The mate asked him how many such he could answer for. He told him above a hundred. Upon this the mate told him the circumstances we were in, the voyage we were upon, that we were a letter of marque ship of such force, but that were over-manned and double stored, in hopes of getting a good ship upon our cruise, to man out of the other, that we had been disappointed, and had only got the sloop or brigantine which we bought, as before, at the Cape, that if he could persuade the men to sell us one of their ships, we would pay them for it in ready money, and perhaps entertain a hundred of their men into the bargain.

The gunner told him he would propose it to them, and added, in positive terms, that he knew it would be readily accepted, and that he should take which of the three ships I pleased. The mate then desired that he would lend them his shallop to go on board our ship, to acquaint me with it, and bring back sufficient orders to treat. He told them he would not only do that, but before I could be ready to go he would propose it to the chief men he had his eye upon, and would have their consent, and that then he would go along with him on board to make a bargain.

This was as well as our mate could expect, and the gunner had either so much authority among them, or the men were so forward to shift their station in the world that the gunner came again to our mate in less than two hours, with an order, signed by about sixteen of their officers, empowering him to sell us the ship which the gunner was on board of, and to allot so many guns, and such a proportion of ammunition to her as was sufficient, and to give the work of all their carpenters for so many days as were necessary to repair her, calk and grave her, and put her in condition to go to sea.

She was a Spanish-built ship; where they had her, the gunner said he did not know; but she was a very strong tight ship, and a pretty good sailer. We made her carry two-and-thirty guns, though she had not been used to carry above twenty-four.

The gunner being thus empowered to treat with my mate, came away in their shallop, and brought the said gunner and two more of their officers with him, and eight seamen. The gunner and I soon made a bargain for the ship, which I bought for five thousand pieces of eight, most of it in English goods, such as they wanted; for they were many of them almost naked of clothes, and as for other things they had scarce a pair of shoes or stockings among them. When our bargain was made, and the mate had related all the particulars of the conference he had had with the gunner, we came to talk of the people who were to go with us. The gunner told us that we might indeed have good reason to suspect a gang of men who had made themselves infamous all over the world by so many piracies and wicked actions; but if I would put so much confidence in him, he would assure me that as he should have the power in his hands to pick and choose his men, so he would answer body for body the fidelity of all the men he should choose; and that most, if not all of them, would be such as had been taken by force out of other ships, or wheedled away when they were drunk; and in a word, he told me there never was a ship-load of such penitents went to sea together as he would bring us. When he had said so, he began to move me that I would please to give him the same post which he held in the ship, viz., that of gunner, which I promised him, and then he desired I would permit him to speak with me in private, and I was not at first very free to it, but he having consented to let the mate and Captain Merlotte be present, I yielded.

When all the rest were withdrawn he told me that having been five years in the pirates' service, as he might call it, and being obliged to do as they did, I might be sure he had some small share in the purchase, and, however, he had come into it against his will, yet as he had been obliged to go with them, he had made some advantage, and that being resolved to leave them, he had a good while ago packed up some of the best of what he had got, to make his escape, and begged I would let him deposit it with me as a security for his fidelity. Upon this he ordered a chest to be taken out of the shallop, and brought into my great cabin, and besides this gave me out of his pocket a bag sealed up, the contents of which I shall speak of hereafter.

The shallop returned the next day, and I sent back the mate with my long boat and twenty-four men to go and take possession of the ship, and appointed my carpenter to go and see to the repairs that were necessary to be done to her; and some days after I sent Captain Marlotte with the supercargo in our sloop, to go and secure the possession, and to cover the retreat of any of the men that might have a mind to come away, and might be opposed by the rest; and this was done at the request of the gunner, who foresaw there might be some squabble about it.

They spent six weeks and some odd days in fitting out this ship, occasioned by the want of a convenient place to lay her on shore in, which they were obliged to make with a great deal of labour; however, she was completely fitted up. When she was fitted they laid in a good store of provisions, though not so well cured as to last a great while. One of the best things we got a recruit of here, was casks; which, as before we greatly wanted, and which their coopers assisted us to trim, season, and fit up.

As to bread, we had no help from them, for they not only had none but what they made of rice, but they had no sufficient store of that, as I have hinted before.

But we had more to do yet; for when the ship was fitted up and our men had the possession of her, they were surprised one morning on a sudden with a most horrible tumult among the pirates, and had not our brigantine been at hand, (as above,) to secure the possession, I believe they had taken the ship from our men again, and, perhaps, have come down with her and their two sloops, and have attacked us. The case was this:—The gunner, who was a punctual fellow to his word, resolved that none of the men should go in the ship but such as he had singled out, and they were such as were generally men taken out of of merchant ships by force, as before; but when he came to talk to the men of who and who should go and stay, truly they would all go to a man, there was not a man of them would stay behind; and, in a word, they fell out about it to that degree, that they came to blows, and the gunner was forced to fly for it, with about twenty-two men that stood to him, and six or seven were wounded in the fray, whereof two died.

The gunner thus being driven to his shifts, made down to the shore to his boat, but the rogues were too nimble for him, and had got to his boat before him, and prepared to man her and two more, to go on board and secure the ship. In this distress, the gunner, who had taken sanctuary in the woods at about a mile distance, but unhappily above the camp, so that the platform of guns was between him and the ship, had no remedy, but to send one of his men, who swam very well, to take a compass round behind the pirate's camp, and come to the water side below the camp and platform, so to take the water and swim on board the ship, which lay nearly a league below their said camp, and give our men notice of what had happened, to warn them to suffer none of their men to come on board, unless the gunner was with them; and, if possible, to send a boat on shore to fetch off the gunner and his men, who were following by the same way, and would be at the same place, and make a signal to them to come for him.

Our men had scarce received this notice when they saw a boat full of men put off from the platform, and row down under shore towards them; but as they resolved not to suffer them to come on board, they called to them by a speaking trumpet, and told them they might go back again, for they should not come on board, nor any other boat, unless the gunner was on board.

They rowed on for all that, when our men called to them again, and told them if they offered to put off, in order to come on board, or, in short, to row down shore any further than a little point which our man named, and which was just a-head of them, they would fire at them. Well, they rowed on for all this, and that though they were past the point, which our men seeing, they immediately let fly a shot, but fired a little a-head of them, so as not to hit the boat, and this brought them to a stop; so they lay upon their oars a while, as if they were considering what to do; when our men perceived two boats more come off from the platform likewise, full of men, and rowing after the first. Upon this they called again the first boat with their speaking-trumpet, and told them if they did not go immediately on shore they would sink the boat. They had no remedy, seeing our men resolved, and that they lay open to the shot of the ship, so they went on shore accordingly, and then our men fired at the empty boat, till they split her in pieces, and made her useless to them.

Upon this firing, our brigantine, which lay about two leagues off in the mouth of a little creek, on the south of that river, weighed immediately, and stood away to the opening of the road where the ship lay, and the tide of flood being still running in, they drove up towards the ship for her assistance, and came to an anchor about a cable's length a-head of her, but within pistol-shot of the shore, at the same time sending two-and-thirty of her men on board the great ship, to reinforce the men on board, who were but sixteen in number.

Just at this time the gunner and his twenty-one men, who heard the firing, and had quickened their pace, though they had a great compass to fetch, through woods and untrod paths, and some luggage to carry too, were come to the shore, and made the signal, which our men in the ship observing, gave notice to the officer of the brigantine to fetch them on board, which he did very safely; by the way, as the officer afterwards told us, most of their luggage consisted of money, with which it seems every man of them was very well furnished, having shared their wealth at their first coming on shore. As for clothes, they had very few, and those all in rags; and as for linen, they had scarce a shirt among them all, or linen enough to have made a white flag for a truce, if they had had occasion for it. In short, a crew so rich and so ragged were hardly ever seen before.

The ship was now pretty well manned, for the brigantine carried the gunner and his twenty-one men on board her; and the tide by this time being spent, she immediately unmoored and loosened her topsails, which, as it happened, had been bent to the yards two days before, so, with the first of the ebb, she weighed and fell down about a league further, by which she was quite out of reach of the platform, and rode in the open sea; and the brigantine did the same.

But by this means they missed the occasion of the rest of the gunner's men, who, having got together to the number of between seventy and eighty, had followed him and come down to the shore and made the signals, but were not understood by our ship, which put the poor men to great difficulties; for they had broken away from the rest by force, and had been pursued half a mile by the whole body, and particularly at the entrance into a very thick, woody place, were so hard put to it that they were obliged to make a desperate stand and fire at their old friends, which had exasperated them to the last degree. But, as the case of these men was desperate, they took an effectual method for their own security, of which I shall give a further account presently.

The general body of the pirates were now up in arms, and the new ship was, as it were, in open war with them, or at least they had declared war against it; but as they had been disappointed in their attempt to force it, and found they were not strong enough at sea to attack it, they sent a flag of truce on board. Our men admitted them to come to the ship side, but as my mate, who now had the command, knew them to be a gang of desperate rogues that would attempt anything, though never so rash, he ordered that none of them should come on board the ship, except the officer and two more, who gave an account that they were sent to treat with us. So we called them the ambassadors.

When they came on board they expostulated very warmly with my new agent the second mate, that our men came in the posture of friends, and of friends too in distress, and had received favours from them, but had abused the kindness which had been shown them; that they had bought a ship of them, and had had leave and assistance to fit her up and furnish her, but had not paid for her, or paid for what assistance and what provisions had been given to them; and that now, to complete all, their men had been partially and unfairly treated; and when a number of men had been granted us, an inferior fellow, a gunner, was set to call such and such men out, just whom he pleased, to go with us, whereas the whole body ought to have had the appointing whom they would or would not give leave to go in the ship; that when they came in a peaceable manner to have demanded justice, and to have treated amicably of these things, our men had denied them admittance, had committed hostilities against them, had fired at their men and staved their boat, and had afterwards received on board their deserters, all contrary to the rules of friendship; and in all these cases they demanded satisfaction.

Our new commander was a ready man enough, and he answered all their complaints with a great deal of gravity and calmness: he told them that it was true we came to them as friends, and had received friendly usage from them, which we had not in the least dishonoured; but that, as friends in distress, we had never pretended to be, and really were not; for that we were neither in danger of anything or in want of anything; that, as to provisions, we were strong enough, if need were, to procure ourselves provisions in any part of the island, and had been several times supplied from the shore by the natives, for which we had always fully satisfied the people who furnished us, and that we scorned to be ungrateful for any favour we should have received, much less to abuse it, or them for it.

That we had paid the full price of all the provisions we had received, and for the work that had been done to the ship, that what we had bargained for, as the price of the ship, had been paid, as far as the agreement made it due, and that what remained was ready to be paid as soon as the ship was finished, which was our bargain.

That as to the people who were willing to take service with us and enter themselves on board, it is true that the gunner and some other men offered themselves to us, and we had accepted of them, and we thought it was our part to accept or not to accept of such men as we thought fit. As for what was among themselves, that we had nothing to do with; that if we had been publicly warned by them not to have entertained any of their men, but with consent of the whole body, then indeed we should have had reason to be cautious; otherwise we were not in the least concerned about it. That it is true we refused to let their boats come on board us, being assured that they came in a hostile manner, either to take away the men by force, which had been entered in our service, or perhaps even to seize the ship itself; and why else was the first boat followed by two more full of men, armed and prepared to attack us? That we not only came in a friendly manner to them, but resolved to continue in friendship with them, if they thought fit to use us as friends; but that considering what part of the world we were in, and what their circumstances were, they must allow us to be on our guard, and not put ourselves in a condition to be used ill.

While he was talking thus with them in the cabin he had ordered a can of flip to be made and given their men in the boat, and every one a dram of the bottle, but would not suffer them to come on board; however, one or two of them got leave to get in at one of the ports, and got between decks among our men; here they made terrible complaints of their condition, and begged hard to be entertained in our service; they were full of money, and gave twenty or thirty pieces of eight among our men, and by this present prevailed for two men to speak to my mate, who appeared as captain, to take the boat's crew on board; the mate very gravely told the two ambassadors of it, and told them that, seeing they were come with a flag of truce, he would not stop their men without their consent, but the men being so earnest he thought it would do better not to oppose them; the ambassadors, as I call them, opposed it, however, vehemently, and at last desired to go and talk with the men, which was granted them readily. When they came into their boat, their men told them plainly that one and all they would enter themselves with their countrymen; that they had been forced already to turn pirates, and they thought they might very justly turn honest men again by force, if they could not get leave to do it peaceably; and that, in short, they would go on shore no more; that if the ambassadors desired it they would set them on shore with the boat, but, as for themselves, they would go along with the new captain.

When the ambassadors saw this they had no more to do but to be satisfied, and so were set on shore where they desired, and their men stayed on board.

During this transaction my mate had sent a full account to me of all that passed, and had desired me to come on board and give further directions in all that was to come; so I took our supercargo and Captain Merlotte along with me, and some more of our officers, and went to them; it was my lot to come on board just when those famous ambassadors were talking with my mate, so I heard most of what they had to say, and heard the answer my mate gave them, as above, which was extremely to my satisfaction; nor did I interrupt him or take upon me any authority, though he would very submissively have had me shown myself as captain, but I bid him go on, and sat down as not concerned in the affair at all.

After the ambassadors were gone the first thing I did was in the presence of all the company, and having before had the opinion of those I brought with me to tell my second mate how well we were all satisfied with his conduct, and to declare him captain of the ship that he was in, only demanding his solemn oath to be under orders of the great ship as admiral, and to carry on no separate interest from us, which he thankfully accepted, and, to give him his due, as faithfully performed all the rest of our very long voyage, and through all our adventures.

It was upon my seeming intercession, that he gave consent to the boat's crew who brought the ambassadors to remain in our service, and set their statesmen on shore; and, in fine, I told him that as far as about one hundred and fifty, or two hundred men, he should entertain whom he thought fit; thus having settled all things in the ship to our satisfaction, we went back to our great ship the next day.

I had not been many hours on board our ship, but I was surprised with the firing of three muskets from the shore; we wondered what should be the meaning of it, knowing that it was an unusual thing in that place, where we knew the natives of the country had no firearms, so we knew not what to make of it, and therefore took no notice of it other than, as I say, to wonder at it; about half an hour after that we heard three muskets more, and still not knowing anything of the matter, we made them no return to the signal; some time after three muskets were fired again, but all was one, we took no notice, for we knew nothing of what return was to be made to it.

When night came on we observed two great fires upon two several hills on that part of the shore opposite to us, and after that three rockets were fired, such as they were, but they went off ill; I suppose their gunner was ill provided for such things; but all signified nothing. We would have made any return to them that would have been understood, but we knew nothing of any agreed signal; however, I resolved that in the morning I would send a boat on shore well manned, to learn if possible what the meaning of all this was, and accordingly in the morning I sent our long boat and shallop on shore, with thirty-two men in them both, to get intelligence, ordering them, if possible, to speak with somebody before they went on shore, and know how things stood; that then, if it was a party of the pirates, they should by no means come near them but parley at a distance, till they knew what the meaning of it all was.

As soon as my men came near the shore they saw plainly that it was a body of near a hundred of the pirates, but seeing them so strong they stood off, and would not come nearer, nor near enough to parley with them; upon this the men on shore got one of the islanders' canvas boats, or rather boats made of skins, which are but sorry ones at best, and put off, with two men to manage the sails, and one sitter, and two paddles for oars, and away they came towards us, carrying a flag of truce, that is to say an old white rag; how they came to save so much linen among them all was very hard to say.

Our men could do no less than receive their ambassador, and a flag of truce gave no apprehension, especially considering the figure they made, and that the men on shore had no other boats to surprise or attack us with, so they lay by upon their oars till they came up, when they soon understood who they were: viz., that they were the gunner's selected men, that they came too late to have their signal perceived from the other ship, which was gone out of sight of the place they were directed to; that they had with great difficulty, and five days' and nights' marching, got through a woody and almost impassable country, to come at us; that they had fetched a circuit of near an hundred miles to avoid being attacked by their comrades, and that they were pursued by them, with their whole body, and therefore they begged to be taken on board; they said if they should be overtaken by their comrades they should be all cut in pieces, for that they had broke away from them by force, and moreover, had been obliged, at the first of their pursuit, to face about and fire among them, by which they had killed six or seven of them, and wounded others, and that they had sworn they would give them no quarter if they could come fairly up with them.

Our men told them they must be contented to remain on shore where they were for some time, for that they could do nothing till they had been on board and acquainted their captain with all the particulars; so they came back immediately to me for orders.

As to me, I was a little uneasy at the thoughts of taking them on board. I knew they were a gang of pirates at best, and what they might do I knew not; but I sent them this message, that though all their tale might be very good for ought I knew, yet that I must take so much time as to send an express to the captain of the other ship, to be informed of the faith of it, and that if he brought a satisfactory answer, I would send for them all on board.

This was very uncomfortable news to them, for they expected to be surrounded every hour by their comrades, from whom they were to look for no mercy; however seeing no remedy, they resolved to march about twenty miles farther south, and lie by in a place near the sea, where we agreed to send to them; concluding that their comrades not finding them near the place where we lay, would not imagine they could be gone farther that way. As they guessed, so it proved, for the pirates came to the shore, where they saw tokens enough of their having been there, but concluded that, seeing they could not be found there, they were all gone on board our ship.

The wind proving contrary, it was no less than four days before our boat came back, so that the poor men were held in great suspense; but when they returned, they brought the gunner with them, who had selected those men from all the rest for our new ship; and who, when he came, gave me a long account of them, and what care he had taken to pick them out for our service, delivering me also a letter from my new captain to the same purpose. Upon all which concurring circumstances we concluded to take them on board; so we sent our boats for them, who at twice brought them all on board, and very stout, honest fellows they were.

When they had been on board some days, and refreshed themselves, I concluded to send them all on board the new ship; but upon advice I resolved to send sixty of my own men joined to forty of these, and keep thirty-four of them on board my ship, for their number was just seventy-four, which, with the gunner and his twenty-one men, and the sixteen men who came with the worthy ambassadors, and would not go on shore again, made one hundred and twelve men; and as we all thought were enough for us, though we took in between forty and fifty more afterwards.

We were now ready to go to sea, and I caused the new ship and the brigantine to come away from the place where they lay and join us; which they did, and then we unloaded part of our provisions and ammunition; of which, as I observed at first, we had taken in double quantity; and having furnished the new ship with a proportion of all things necessary, we prepared for our voyage.

I should here give a long account of a second devilish conspiracy, which my two remaining prisoners had formed among the men, which was to betray the new ship to the pirates; but it is too long a story to put in here, nor did I make it public among the ships' company; but as it was only, as it were, laid down in a scheme, and that they had no opportunity to put it in practice, I thought it was better to make as little noise of it as I could. So I ordered my new captain, for it was he who discovered it to me, to punish them in their own way, and without taking notice of their new villanies, to set them on shore, and leave them to take their fate with a set of rogues whom they had intended to join with, and whose profession was likely, some time or other, to bring them to the gallows; and thus I was rid of two incorrigible mutineers. What became of them afterwards I never heard.

We were now a little fleet; viz. two large ships and a brigantine, well manned and furnished with all sorts of necessaries for any voyage or any enterprise that was fit for men in our posture to undertake; and particularly here, I made a full design of the whole voyage, to be again openly declared to the men, and had them asked, one by one, if they were willing and resolved to undertake it, which they all very cheerfully answered in the affirmative.

Here we had opportunity to furnish ourselves with a vast stock of excellent beef, which, as I said before, we cured with little or no salt by drying it in the sun; and I believe we laid in such a store that in all our three vessels we had near a hundred and fifty tons of it; and it was of excellent use to us, and served us through the whole voyage. There was little else to be had in this place that was fit to be carried to sea, except that as there was plenty of milk, some of our men that were more dexterous than others, made several large cheeses; nor were they very far short of English cheese, only that we were but indifferent dairy-folks. Our men made some butter also, and salted it to keep, but it grew rank and oily, and was of no use to us.

It was on the fifteenth of December that we left this place, a country fruitful, populous, full of cattle, large and excellent good beef, and very fat, and the land able to produce all manner of good things; but the people wild, naked, black, barbarous, perfectly untractable, and insensible of any state of life being better than their own.

We stood away toward the shore of Arabia till we past the line, and came into the latitude of eighteen degrees north, and then stood away east, and east by north, for the English factories of Surat and the coast of Malabar; not that we had any business there, or designed any, only that we had a mind to take on board a quantity of rice, if we could come at it; which at last we effected by a Portuguese vessel, which we met with at sea, bound to Goa from the Gulf of Persia. We chased her and brought her too indeed, as if we resolved to attack and take the ship; but finding a quantity of rice on board, which was what we wanted, with a parcel of coffee; we took all the rice, but paid the supercargo, who was a Persian or Armenian merchant, very honestly for the whole parcel his full price, and to his satisfaction. As for the coffee we had no occasion for it. We put in at several ports on the Indian coast for fresh water and fresh provisions, but came near none of the factories, because we had no mind to discover ourselves; for though we were to sail through the very centre of the India trade, yet it was perfectly without any business among them. We met, indeed, on this coast with some pearl fishers, who had been in the mouth of the Arabian Gulf, and had a large quantity of pearl on board. I would have traded with them for goods, but they understood nothing but money, and I refused to part with it. Upon which the fellows gave our supercargo some scurvy language, which, though he did not well understand what they said, yet he pretended to take it as a great affront, and threatened to make prize of their barks and slaves of the men; upon which they grew very humble, and one of them, a Malabar Indian, who spoke a little English, spoke for them that they would willingly trade with us for such goods as we had; whereupon I produced three bales of English cloth, which I showed them would be of good merchandize at Gomboroon in the Gulf, for that the Persians made their long vests of such cloths.

In short, for this cloth, and some money, we bought a box of choice pearls, which the chief of them had picked out from the rest for the Portuguese merchants at Goa, and which, when I came to London, was valued at two thousand two hundred pounds sterling.

We were near two months on our voyage from Madagascar to the coast of India, and from thence to Ceylon, where we put in on the southwest part of the island to see what provisions we could get, and to take in a large supply of water. The people here we found willing to supply us with provisions, but withal so sharp, imposing upon us their own rates for every thing; and withal so false, that we were often provoked to treat them very rudely. However I gave strict orders that they should not be hurt upon any occasion, at least till we had filled all our water casks, and taken in what fresh provisions we could get, and especially rice, which we valued very much; but they provoked us at last beyond all patience, for they were such thieves when they were on board, and such treacherous rogues when we were on shore, that there was no bearing it; and two accidents fell out upon this occasion, which fully broke the peace between us. One was on board, and the other was on shore, and both happened the same day. The case on board was this:—There came on board us a small boat, in which was eleven men and three boys, to sell us roots, yams, mangoes, and such stuff as it was frequent for them to do every day; but this boat having more goods of that kind than usual, they were longer than ordinary making their market. While they were thus chaffering on board, one of them having wandered about the ship, and pretending to admire everything he saw, and being gotten between decks, was taken stealing a pair of shoes, which belonged to one of the seamen. The fellow being stopt for his theft, appeared angry, raised a hideous, screaming noise to alarm his fellows, and at the same time, having stolen a long pair of scissars, pulled them out and stabbed the man that had laid hold of him into the shoulder, and was going to double his blow, when the poor fellow that had been wounded having struck up his heels and fallen upon him, had killed him if I had not called to take him off and bring the thief up to me.

Upon this order, they took up the barbarian and brought him up with the shoes and the scissars that he had stolen, and as the facts were plain, and needed no witnesses, I caused all the rest of them to be brought up also; and, as well as we could, made them understand what he had done. They made pitiful signs of fear, lest they should all be punished for his crime, and particularly when they saw the man whom he had wounded brought in; then they expected nothing but death, and they made a sad lamentation and howling, as if they were all to die immediately. It was not without a great deal of difficulty that I found ways to satisfy them, that nobody was to be punished but the man that had committed the fact; and then I caused him to be brought to the geers, with a halter about his neck, and be soundly whipped; and indeed our people did scourge him severely from head to foot; and I believe if I had not run myself to put an end to it, they had whipped him to death.

When this execution was over, they put him into their boat and let them all go on shore; but no sooner were they on shore but they raised a terrible hubbub among all the villages and towns near them, and they were now a few, the country being very populous, and a vast multitude of them came down to the shore, staring at us, and making confused ugly noises, and abundance of arrows they shot at the ship, but we rode too far from the shore for them to do us any hurt.

While this was doing, another fray happened on shore, where two of our men chaffering with an islander and his wife for some fowls, they took his money, or what else it was he was to give, and gave him part of the fowls, but they pretended the woman should go and fetch the rest. While the woman was gone, three or four more of the same sort came to the man that was left, and talking a while together, seeing they were so many, and our men but two, they began to take hold of the fowls they had sold, and would take them away again; at which one of our men stepped up to the fellow that had taken them up, and went to lay hold of him, but he was too nimble for him, and ran away and carried off the fowls and the money too. The seaman was so enraged to be served so, that he took up his piece, for they had both fire-arms with them, and fired immediately after him, and aimed his shot so luckily, that, though the fellow flew like the wind, he shot him through the head, and he dropped down dead upon the spot.

The rest of them, though terribly frightened, yet seeing our men were but two, and the noise bringing twenty or thirty more immediately to them, attacked our men with their lances, and bows and arrows; and in a moment there was a pitched battle of two men only against twenty or thirty, and their number increasing too.

In short, our men spent their shot freely among them as long as it lasted, and killed six or seven, besides wounding ten or eleven more; and this cooled their courage, and they seemed to give over the battle; and our men, whose ammunition was almost spent, began to think of retreating to their boat, which was near a mile off, for they were very unhappily gotten from their boat so far up the country.

They made their retreat pretty well for about half the way, when, on a sudden, they saw they were not pursued only, but surrounded, and that some of their enemies were before them. This made them double their pace, and seeing no remedy, they resolved to break through those that were before them, who were about eleven or twelve. Accordingly, as soon as they came within pistol shot of them, one of our men having, for want of shot, put almost a handful of gravel and small stones into his piece, and fired among them, and the gravel and stones scattering, wounded almost all of them; for they being naked from the waist upwards, the least grain of sand scratched and hurt them, and made them bleed if it did but touch them.

Being thus completely scared, and, indeed, more afraid than hurt, they all run away except two, who were really wounded with the shot or stones, and lay upon the ground. Our men let them lie, and made the best of their way to their boat, where at last they got safe, but with five hundred of the people at their heels; their fellows did not stay to fire from the boat, but put off with all the speed they could, for fear of their poisoned arrows, and the country people poured so many of their arrows into the boat after them, and aimed them also so true, that two of our men were hurt with them, but whether they were poisoned or no, our surgeons cured them both.

We had enough of Ceylon, and having no business to make such a kind of a war as this must have been, in which we might have lost, but could get nothing, we weighed and stood away to the east; what became of the fellow that we lashed, we know not, but as he had but little flesh left on his back, which was not mangled and torn with our whipping him, and we suppose they are but indifferent surgeons, our people said the fellow could not live; and the reason they gave for it was, because they did not pickle him after it. Truly, they said, that they would not be so kind to him as to pickle him; for though pickling, that is to say, throwing salt and vinegar on the back after the whipping be cruel enough as to the pain it is to the patient, yet 'tis certainly the way to prevent mortification, and causes it to heal again with more ease.

We stood over from Ceylon E. S. E. across the great Bay of Bengal, leaving all the coast of Coromandel, and standing directly for Anchin, on the north point of the great Island of Sumatra, and in the latitude of six degrees thirty-one minutes north.

Here we spread our French colours, and coming to an anchor, suffered none of our men to go on shore but Captain Merlotte and his French men; and having nothing to do there, or anywhere else in the Indian Seas but to take in provisions and fresh water, we stayed but five days; in which time we supplied ourselves with what the place would afford; and pretending to be bound for China, we went on to the south, through the Straits of Malacca, between the Island of Sumatra, and the Main or Isthmus of Malacca.

We had here a very difficult passage, though we took two pilots on board at Anchin, who pretended to know the Straits perfectly well; twice we were in very great danger of being lost, and once our Madagascar ship was so entangled among rocks and currents that we gave her up for lost, and twice she struck upon the rocks, but she did but touch, and went clear.

We went several times on shore among the Malays, as well on the shore of Malacca itself as on the side of Sumatra. They are a fierce, cruel, treacherous, and merciless set of human devils as any I have met with on the face of the whole earth, and we had some skirmishes with them, but not of any consequence. We made no stay anywhere in this Strait but just for fresh water, and what other fresh provisions we could get such as roots, greens, hogs, and fowls, of which they have plenty and a great variety; but nothing to be had but for ready money, which our men took so unkindly, and especially their offering two or three times to cheat them, and once to murder them; that, after that, they made no scruple to go on shore a hundred or more at a time, and plunder and burn what they could not carry off; till at last we began to be such a terror to them that they fled from us wherever we came.

On the fifth of March we made the southernmost point of the Isthmus of Malacca, and the Island and Straits of Singapore, famous for its being the great outlet into the Chinese sea, and lying in the latitude of one degree fifteen minutes north latitude.

We had good weather through these Straits, which was very much to our comfort; the different currents and number of little islands making it otherwise very dangerous, especially to strangers. We got by very good luck a Dutch pilot to carry us through this Strait, who was a very useful skilful fellow, but withal so very impertinent and inquisitive, that we knew not what to say to him or what to do with him. At last he grew saucy and insolent, and told our chief mate that he did not know but we might be pirates, or at least enemies to his countrymen the Dutch; and if we would not tell him who we were, and whither we were bound, he would not pilot us any further.

This I thought very insolent, to a degree beyond what was sufferable; and I bid the boatswain put a halter about the fellow's neck, and tell him that the moment he omitted to direct the steerage as a pilot, or the moment the ship came to any misfortune, or struck upon any rock, he should be trussed up. The boatswain, a rugged fellow, provides himself with a halter, and coming up to the pilot, asked him, "What it was he wanted to be satisfied in?" The pilot said "He desired to have a true account whither we were going." "Why," says the boatswain, "we are a going to the devil, and I shall send you before us to tell him we are coming;" and with that he pulls the halter out of his pocket, and puts it over his head, and taking the other end of it in his hand, "Come," says the boatswain, "come along with me; do you think we can't go through the Strait of Singapore without your help? I warrant you," says he, "we will do without you."

By this time, you may suppose the Dutchman to be in a mortal fright, and half choked too with being dragged by the throat with the halter, and full heartily he begged for his life. At length the boatswain, who had pulled him along a good way, stopped, and the Dutchman fell down upon his knees, but the boatswain said he had the captain's orders to hang him, and hang him he would unless the captain recalled his orders; but that he would stay so long if anybody would go up to the captain and tell him what the Dutchman said, and bring back an answer.

I had no design to hang the poor fellow, you may be sure, and the boatswain knew that well enough. However, I was resolved to humble him effectually, so I sent back two men to the boatswain, the first was to tell the boatswain aloud that the captain was resolved to have the fellow hanged for having been so impudent to threaten to run the ship aground: but then the second, who was to stay a little behind, was to call out as if he came since the first from me, and that I had been prevailed with to pardon him on his promises of better behaviour. This was all acted to the life; for the first messenger called aloud to the boatswain that the captain said he would have the Dutchman hanged for a warning to all pilots, and to teach them not to insult men when they were in difficulties, as the midwives do whores in travail, and won't deliver them till they confess who is the father.

The boatswain had the end of the halter in his hand all the while: "I told you so," says he, "before; come, come along, Mynheer," says he, "I shall quickly do your work, and put you out of your pain"—and then he dragged the poor fellow along to the main-mast. By this time the second messenger came in and delivered his part of the errand, and so the poor Dutchman was put out of his fright, and they gave him a dram to restore him a little, and he did his work very honestly afterwards.

And now we were got loose again, being in the open sea, which was what we were very impatient for before. We had now a long run over that part which we call the sea of Borneo, and the upper part of the Indian Arches, called so for its being full of islands, like the Archipelago of the Levant. It was a long run, but as we were to the north of the islands we had the more sea-room, so we steered east half a point, one way or other for the Manillas, or Philippine Islands, which was the true design of our voyage, and, perhaps, we were the first ship that ever came to those islands freighted from Europe since the Portuguese lost their footing there.

We put in on the north coast of Borneo, for fresh water, and were civilly enough used by the inhabitants of the place, who brought us roots, and fruits of several kinds, and some goats, which we were glad of. We paid them in trifles, such as knives, scissars, toys, and several sorts of wrought iron, hatchets, hammers, glass work, looking glasses, drinking glasses, and the like. From hence we went away, as I say, for the Philippine Islands. We saw several islands in our way, but made no stop, except once for water, and arrived at Manilla the 22nd of May, all our vessels in very good condition, our men healthy, and our ships sound, having met with very few contrary winds, and not one storm in the whole voyage from Madagascar, having been seventeen months and two days on the voyage from England.

When we came hither we saluted the Spanish flag, and came to an anchor, carrying French colours. Captain Merlotte, who now acted as commander, sent his boat on shore the next day to the governor, with a letter in French, very respectful, and telling the governor, that having the King of France's commission, and being come into those seas, he hoped, that for the friendship which was between their most Christian and Catholic Majesties, he should be allowed the freedom of commerce and the use of the port, the like having been granted to his most Christian Majesty's subjects in all the ports of New Spain as well in the Southern as in the Northern Seas. The Spanish governor returned a very civil and obliging answer, and immediately granted us to buy what provisions we pleased for our supply, or anything else for our use; but answered, that as for allowing any exchange of merchandizes, or giving leave for European goods to be brought on shore there, that he was not empowered to grant.

We made as if this answer was satisfactory enough to us, and the next morning Captain Merlotte sent his boat on shore with all French sailors, and a French midshipman, with a handsome present to the governor, consisting of some bottles of French wine, some brandy, two pieces of fine Holland, two pieces of English black baize, one piece of fine French drugget, and five yards of scarlet woollen cloth.

This was too considerable a present for a Spaniard to refuse, and yet these were all European goods, which he seemed not to allow to come on shore. The governor let the captain know that he accepted his present, and the men who brought it were handsomely entertained, by the governor's order, and had every one a small piece of gold, and the officer who went at their head had five pieces of gold given him; what coin it was I could not tell, but I think it was a Japan coin, and the value something less than a pistole. The next day the governor sent a gentleman with a large boat, and in it a present to our captain, consisting of two cows, ten sheep, or goats rather, for they were between both, a vast number of fowls of several sorts, and twelve great boxes of sweetmeats and conserves, which were indeed very valuable, and invited the captain and any of his attendants on shore, offering to send hostages on board for our safe return; and concluding with his word of honour for our safety and free going back to our ships.

The captain received the present with very great respect, and indeed it was a very noble present; for at the same time a boat was sent to both the other ships with provisions and sweetmeats, in proportion to the bigness of the vessels. Our captains caused the gentleman who came with this present to have a fine piece of crimson English cloth given him, sufficient to make a waistcoat and breeches of their fashion, with a very good hat, two pair of silk stockings, and two pair of gloves; and all his people had a piece of drugget given them sufficient to make them the like suit of clothes. The persons who went to the other ship, and to the brigantine, had presents in proportion.

This, in short, was nothing more or less than trading and bartering, though for the grimace of it, we were in a manner denied. The next day the captain went on shore to visit the governor, and with him several of our officers and the captain of the Madagascar ship, formerly my second mate, and the captain of the brigantine. I did not go myself for that time, nor the supercargo, because whatever might happen I would be reserved on board; besides I did not care to appear in this part of the work.

The captain went on shore like a captain, attended with his two trumpeters, and the ship firing eleven guns at his going off. The governor received him like himself, with prodigious state and formality, sending five gentlemen and a guard of soldiers to receive them on their landing, and to conduct them to his palace. When they came there they were entertained with the utmost profusion and wonderful magnificence, after the Spanish manner, and they all had the honour to dine with his excellency, that is to say, all the officers. At the same time the men were entertained very handsomely in another house, and had very good cheer; but it was observed that they had very little wine, except what we had sent them, which the governor excused, his store, which he had yearly from New Spain, being spent; which deficiency we supplied the next day, and sent him a quarter cask of very good Canary, and a half hogshead of Madeira, which was a present so acceptable, that, in short, after this we might do just as we pleased with him and all his men.

While they were thus conversing together after dinner, Captain Merlotte was made to understand that though the governor could not admit an open avowed trade, yet that the merchants would not be forbid coming on board our ship, and trading with us in such manner as we should be very well satisfied with, after which we should be at no hazard of getting the goods we should sell put on shore; and we had an experiment of this made in a few days, as follows:—

When Captain Merlotte took his leave of the governor, he invited his excellency to come on board our ship, with such of his attendants as he pleased to bring with him, and in like manner offered hostages for his return. The governor accepted the invitation, and, with the same generosity, said, he would take his parole of honour given, as he was the King of France's captain, and in the name of his most Christian majesty, and would come on board.

The governor did not come to the sea side with them, but stood in the window of the palace, and gave them his hat and leg at going into their boats, and made a signal to the platform to fire eleven guns at their boats putting off.

These were unusual and unexpected honours to us, who, but for this stratagem of the French commission, had been declared enemies. It was suggested to me here, that I might with great ease surprize the whole island, nay, all the islands, the governor putting such confidence in us, that we might go on shore in the very port unuspected. But though this was true, and that we did play them a trick at the Rio de la Plata, I could not bear the thoughts of it here; besides, I had quite another game to play, which also was more advantageous to us and to our voyage than an enterprise of so much treachery could be to England; which, also, we might not be able to support from England before the Spaniards might beat us out again from Acapulco, and then we might pass our time ill enough.

Upon the whole, I resolved to keep every punctilio with the governor very justly, and we found our account in it presently.

About three days afterwards we had notice that the governor would make us a visit, and we prepared to entertain his excellency with as much state as possible; by the way, we had private notice that the governor would bring with him some merchants, who, perhaps, might lay out some money, and buy some of our cargo; nor was it without a secret information that even the governor himself was concerned in the market that should be made.

Upon this intelligence, our supercargo caused several bales of English and French goods to be brought up and opened, and laid so in the steerage and upon the quarter deck of the ship, that the governor and his attendants should see them of course, as they passed by.

When the boats came off from the shore, which we knew by their fort firing eleven guns, as before, our ship appeared as fine as we could make her, having the French flag at the main top, as admiral, and streamers and pennants at the yard arms, waste cloths out, and a very fine awning over the quarter deck. When his excellency entered the ship we fired twenty-one guns, the Madagascar ship fired the like number, and the brigantine fifteen, having loaded her guns nimbly enough to fire twice.

As the governor's entertainment to us was more meat than liquor, so we gave him more liquor than meat, for as we had several sorts of very good wines on board, we spared nothing to let him see he was very welcome. After dinner we brought a large bowl of punch upon the table, which was a liquor he did not understand at all; however, to do him justice, he drank very moderately, and so did most of those that were with him. As to the men who belonged to his retinue, (I mean servants and attendants, and the crews of the boats,) we made some of them drunk enough.

While this was doing, we found two gentlemen of the governor's company took occasion to leave the rest, and walked about the ship, and in doing this they seemed as it were by chance to cast their eyes upon our bales of cloth and stuffs, and baize, linen, silks, &c., and our supercargo and they began to make bargains apace, for he found they had not only money enough, but had abundance of other things, which we were as willing to take as money, and of which they had brought specimens with them, as particularly spices, such as cloves and nutmegs, China ware, tea, japaned ware, wrought silks, raw silks, and the like.

However, our supercargo dealt with them at present for nothing but ready money, and they paid all in gold. The price he made here was, to us, indeed extravagant, though to them moderate, seeing they had been used to buy these goods from the Acapulco ships, which came in yearly, from whom, to be sure, they bought dear enough. They bought as many goods at this time as they paid the value of fifteen thousand pieces of eight for, but all in gold by weight.

As for carrying them on shore, the governor being with them, no officer had anything to say to them; it seems they were carried on shore as presents made by us to the governor and his retinue.

The next day three Spanish merchants came on board us, early in the morning before it was light, and desired to see the supercargo. They brought with them a box of diamonds and some pearl, and a great quantity of gold, and to work they went with our cargo, and I thought once they would have bought the whole ship's lading; but they contented themselves to buy about the value of two-and-twenty thousand pieces of eight, which, I suppose, might cost in England one-sixth part of the money, or hardly so much. We had some difficulty about the diamonds, because we did not understand them very much, but our supercargo ventured upon them at eight thousand pieces of eight, and took the rest in gold. They desired to stay on board till the next night, when, soon after it was dark, a small sloop came on board and took in all their goods, and, as we were told, carried them away to some other island.

The same day, and before these merchants were gone, came a large shallop on board with a square sail, towing after her a great heavy boat, which had a deck, but seemed to have been a large ship's long boat, built into a kind of yacht, but ill masted, and sailed heavily. In these two boats they brought seven ton of cloves in mats, some chests of China ware, some pieces of China silks of various sorts, and a great sum of money also.

In short, they sold so cheap and bought so dear, that our supercargo declared he would sell the whole cargo for goods, if they would bring them, for, by his calculation, he had disposed of as many goods as he received the value of one hundred thousand pieces of eight for, all which, by his accounts, did not amount to, first cost, above three thousand pounds sterling in England. Our ship was now an open fair for two or three days after the vessel came back, which went away in the night, and with them a Chinese jonque and seven or eight Chinese or Japanners; strange, ugly, ill-looking fellows they were, but brought a Spaniard to be their interpreter, and they came to trade also, bringing with them seventy great chests of China ware, exceeding fine, twelve chests of China silks of several sorts, and some lacquered cabinets, very fine. We dealt with them for all those, for our supercargo swept all clean, and took everything they brought. But they were more difficult in the goods, for as for baize, and druggets, and such goods, they would not meddle with them; but our fine cloths and some bales of linen they bought very freely. So we unloaded their vessel, and put our goods on board; we took a good sum of money of them besides, but whither they went we knew not, for they both came and went in the night too, as the other did.

This trade held a good while, and we found that our customers came more from other islands than from the island where the governor resided, the reason of which, as we understood afterwards, was, because, as the governor had not openly granted a freedom of commerce, but privately winked at it, so they were not willing to carry it on openly before his face, or as we say, under his nose, whereas in other islands they could convey their goods on shore with very little hazard, agreeing with the custom-house officer for a small matter.

These boats came and went thus several times, till, in short, we had disposed almost of the whole cargo; and now our men began to be convinced that we had laid out our voyage very right, for never was cargo better sold; and as we resolved to pursue our voyage for New Spain, we had taken in a cargo very proper to sell there, and so perhaps to double the advantage we had already made.

In the meantime all our hands were at work to store ourselves anew with such provisions as could be had here for so long a run as we knew we were to have next, namely, over the vast Pacific Ocean or South Sea, a voyage where we might expect to see no land for four months, except we touched at the Ladrões, as it might happen; and our greatest anxiety was for want of water, of which our whole ship could scarce be able to stow sufficient for our use; and if they could, our want of casks was still as bad as the want of water, for we really knew not what to put water in when we had it.

The Spaniards had helped us to some casks, but not many; those that they could spare were but small, and at last we were obliged to make use of about two hundred large earthen jars, which were of singular use to us. We got a large quantity of good rice here, which we bought of a Chinese merchant, who came in here with a large China vessel to trade, and who bought of us also several of our European goods.

Just as we were ready to sail, a boat came from the town of Manilla, and brought a new merchant, who wanted more English goods, but we had but few left. He brought with him thirty chests of calicoes, muslins, wrought silks, some of them admirably fine indeed, with fifteen bales of romals, and twelve ton of nutmegs. We sold them what goods we had left, and gave them money for the rest, but had them at a price so cheap as was sufficient to let us know that it was always well worth while for ships to trade from Europe to the East Indies, from whence they are sure to make five or six of one. Had more of these merchants come on board, we were resolved to have laid out all the gold and silver we had on board, which, I assure you, was a very considerable quantity.

The last merchant who came on board us was a Spaniard, but I found that he spoke very good French and some English, that he had been in England some years ago, and understood English woollen manufactures very well. He told me they had these goods all from Acapulco, but that they were then excessive dear; he had considerable dealings with the Chinese, and some with the coast of Coromandel, and Bengal, and kept a vessel or two of his own to go to Bengal, which generally went twice in a year.

I found he had great business with New Spain, and that he generally had one of the Acapulco ships chiefly consigned to him, so that he was full of all such goods as those ships generally carried away from the Manillas; and had we traded with him sooner, we had had more calicoes and muslins than we now had. However, we were exceedingly well stored with goods of all sorts, suitable for a market in Peru, whither I resolved to go.

We continued chaffering after this manner about nine weeks, during which time we careened our ships, cleaned their bottoms, rummaged our gold, and repacked some of our provisions, endeavouring, as much as possible, to keep all our men as fully employed as we could, to preserve them in health, and yet not to overwork them, considering the heat of the climate.

Some time before we were ready to sail, I called all the warrant officers together, and told them, that as we were come to a country where abundance of small things were to be bought, and going to a country where we might possibly have room to sell them again to advantage, I would advance to every officer an hundred dollars, upon account of their pay, that they might lay it out to their advantage here, and dispose it again on the coast of New Spain; this was very acceptable to them, and they acknowledged it. And here, besides this, by the consent of all our superior officers, I gave a largess or bounty of five dollars a man to all our fore-mast men, most of which, I believe, they laid out in arrack and sugar, to cheer them up in the rest of the voyage, which they all knew would be long enough.

We went away from Marcilla in the island of Luzon or Luconia the fifteenth of the month of August and in the year 1714; and sailing awhile to the southward, passed the Straits between that island and Mindanao, another of the Philippines, where we met with little extraordinary, except extraordinary lightning and thunders, such as we never heard or saw before, though it seems it is very familiar in that climate, till about sixteen days sailing we saw the Isle of Guam, one of the Ladrões, or Isle of Thieves, for so much the word imports. Here we came to an anchor, September 3rd, under the lee of a steep shore, on the north side of the Isle of Guam; but, as we wanted no trade here, we did not at first inquire after the chief port, or Spanish governor, or anything of that kind, but we changed our situation the next day, and went through the passage, to the east side of the island, and came to an anchor off of the town.

The people came off, and brought us hogs and fowls, and several sorts of roots and greens, things which we were very glad of, and which we bought the more of because we always found that such things were good to keep the men from the scurvy, and even to cure them of it, if they had it. We took in fresh water here also, though it was with some difficulty, the water lying half a mile from the shore.

When I parted from Manilla, and was getting through the strait between the island Lucon and that of Mindanao, I had some thoughts of steering away north, to try what land we might meet with to the north-east of the Philippines, and with intent to have endeavoured to make up into the latitude of fifty or sixty degrees, and have come about again to the south, between the Island of California and the main land of America, in which course I did not question meeting with extraordinary new discoveries, and perhaps such as the age might not expect to hear of, relating to the northern world, and the possibility of a passage out of those seas, either east or west, both which I doubt not would be found, if they were searched after this way, and which, for aught I know, remain undiscovered for want only of an attempt being made by those seas, where it would be easy to find whether the Tartarian Seas are navigable or not; and whether Nova Zembla be an island or joined to the main; whether the inlets of Hudson's Bay have any opening into the West Sea; and whether the vast lakes, from whence the Great River of Canada is said to flow have any communication this way or not.

But though these were valuable discoveries, yet when I began to cast up the account in a more serious manner, they appeared to have no relation to or coherence with our intended voyage, or with the design of our employers, which we were to consider in the first place; for though it is true that we were encouraged to make all such kinds of useful discoveries, as might tend to the advantage of trade, and the improvement of geographical knowledge and experience, yet it was all to be so directed as to be subservient to the profits and advantages of a trading and cruising voyage.

It is true that these northern discoveries might be inimitably fine, and most glorious things to the British nation, and infinitely for the future advantage of commerce in general, yet, as I have said, it was evident that they tended directly to destroy the voyage, either as to trading or to cruising, and might perhaps end in our own destruction also; for example, first of all, if adventuring into those northern seas, we should, by our industry, make out the discovery, and find a passage, either east or west, we must follow the discovery so as to venture quite through, or else we could not be sure that it was really a discovery, for these passages would not be like doubling Cape de Bon Esperance, on the point of Africa, or going round Cape Horn, the southernmost point of America, either of which were compassed in a few days, and then immediately gave an opening into the Indian or Southern oceans, where good weather and certain refreshment were to be had.

Whereas, for the discovery of the north, after having passed the northernmost land of Grand Tartary, in the latitude of seventy-four, even to eighty degrees, and perhaps to the very North Pole; there must be a run west beyond the most northerly point of Nova Zembla, and on again W. S. W. about the North Kyn and North Cape above six hundred leagues, before we could have any relief of the climate after that, one hundred and sixty leagues more, and even to Shetland and the north of Scotland, before we could meet with any relief of provisions, which, after the length we must have run, from the latitude of three degrees and a half, where we now were at the Philippine islands, to seventy-four degrees north, being near five thousand miles, would be impossible to be done, unless we were sure to victual, and furnish ourselves again with provisions and water by the way, and that in several places.

As to the other passage east towards the continent of America, we had this uncertainty also, namely, that it was not yet discovered whether the land of California was an island or a continent, and that if it should prove the latter, so as that we should be obliged to come back to the west, and not be able to find an opening between California and the land of North America, so as to come away to the coast of Mexico, to Aca-pulco, and so into the South Sea, and at the same time should not find a passage through Hudson's Bay, &c., into the North Sea, and so to Europe, we should not only spoil the voyage that way also, but should infallibly perish by the severity of the season and want of provisions.

All these things argued against any attempt that way, whereas on the other hand, for southern discoveries we had this particular encouragement,—that whatever disappointment we might meet with in the search after unknown countries, yet we were sure of an open sea behind us, and that whenever we thought fit to run south, beyond the tropic, we should find innumerable islands, where we might get water and some sort of provisions, or come back into a favourable climate, and have the benefit of the trade winds to carry us either backward or forward, as the season should happen to guide us.

Last of all, we had this assurance, that the dangers of the seas excepted, we were sure of an outlet before us if we went forward, or behind us if we were forced back, and having a rich cargo, if we were to do nothing but go home, we should be able to give our employers such an account of ourselves as that they would be very far from being losers by the voyage; but that if we reached safe to the coast of New Spain, and met with an open commerce there, as we expected, we should perhaps make the most prosperous voyage that was ever made round the globe before.

These considerations put an end to all my thoughts of going northward; some of our secret council,—for, by the way, we consulted our foremast-men no more, but had a secret council among ourselves, the resolutions of which we solemnly engaged not to disclose,—some of these, I say, were for steering the usual course from the Philippines to New Spain, viz., keeping in the latitudes of eleven or thirteen degrees north of the line, and so making directly for California, in which latitude they proposed that we might perhaps, by cruising there about, meet with the Manilla ships, going from New Spain to Manilla, which we might take as a prize, and then stand directly for the coast of Peru.

But I opposed this, principally because it would effectually overthrow all my meditated discoveries to the southward, and secondly, because I had observed that on the north of the line there are no islands to be met with in all the long run of near two thousand leagues, from the Guam, one of the Ladrões, to the land of California, and that we did not find we were able to subsist during so long a run, especially for want of water, whereas on the south of the line, as well within the tropic as without, we were sure to meet with islands innumerable, and that even all the way, so that we were sure of frequent relief of fresh water, of plants, fowl and fish, if not bread and flesh, almost all the way.

This was a main consideration to our men, and so we soon resolved to take the southern course; yet, as I said, we stood away for the Ladrões first. These are a cluster of islands, which lie in about eleven to thirteen degrees north latitude, north-east from the Moluccas, or Spice Islands, and E. and by N. from that part of the Philippines where we were, and at the distance of about four hundred leagues, and all the ships which go and come between the Philippines and New Spain, touch at them for the convenience of provisions, water, &c., those that go to Spain put in there, in order to recruit and furnish for, and those that come from Spain, to relieve themselves after so long a run as that of six thousand miles, for so much it is at least from Guam to Acapulco; on these accounts and with these reasonings, we came to the islands of the Ladrões.

During our run between the Philippine and Ladrone islands, we lived wholly upon our fresh provisions, of which we laid in a great stock at Manilla, such as hogs, fowls, calves, and six or seven cows, all alive, so that our English beef and pork, which lay well stored, was not touched for a long time.

At the Ladrões we recruited, and particularly took on board, as well alive as pickled up, near two hundred hogs, with a vast store of roots, and such things as are their usual food in that country. We took in also above three thousand cocoa-nuts and cabbages, yams, potatoes, and other roots, for our own use, and in particular we got a large quantity of maize, or Indian wheat, for bread, and some rice.

We stored ourselves likewise with oranges and lemons, and buying a great quantity of very good limes, we made three or four hogsheads of lime-juice, which was a great relief to our men in the hot season, to mix with their water; as for making punch, we had some arrack and some sugar, but neither of them in any quantity, so as to have much punch made afore the mast.

We were eighteen days on our passage from the strait of Mindanao to Guam, and stayed six days at Guam, furnishing ourselves with provisions, appearing all this while with French colours, and Captain Merlotte as commander. However, we made no great ceremony here with the Spanish governor, as I have said already, only that Captain Merlotte, after we had been here two days, sent a letter to him by a French officer, who showing his commission from the King of France, the governor presently gave us product, as we called it, and leave to buy what provisions we wanted. In compliment for this civility, we sent him a small present of fine scarlet camblet, and two pieces of baize; and he made a very handsome return, in such refreshments as he thought we most wanted.

There was another reason for our keeping in this latitude till we came to the Ladrões, namely, that all the southern side of that part of the way between the Philippines and the Ladrões is so full of islands, that unless we had very good pilots it would have been very hazardous; and add to this, that beyond these islands, south, is no passage, the land which they call Nova Guinea lying away East and E. S. E., farther than has yet been discovered, so that it is not yet known whether that country be an island or the continent.

Having, for all these reasons, gone to the Ladrões, and being sufficiently satisfied in our reasons for going away from thence to the southward, and having stored ourselves as above, with whatever those islands produced, we left the Ladrões about the tenth day of September, in the evening, and stood away E. S. E., with the wind N. N. W., a fresh gale; after this, I think it was about five days, when having stretched by our account about a hundred and fifty leagues, we steered away more to the southward, our course S. E. by S.

And now, if ever, I expected to do something by way of discovery; I knew very well there were few, if any had ever steered that course; or, that if they had, they had given very little account of their travels. The only person who leaves anything worth notice being Cornelius Vanscotton and Francis Le Mare, who, though they sailed very much south, yet say very little to the purpose, as I shall show presently.

The sixteenth day after we parted from the Ladrões being, by observation, in the latitude of seventeen degrees south of the line, one of our men cried, "A sail, a sail,"—which put us into some fit of wonder, knowing nothing of a ship of any bulk could be met with in those seas; but our fit of wonder was soon turned into a fit of laughter, when one of our men from the fore-top cried out, "Land,"—which indeed was the case; and the first sailor was sufficiently laughed at for his mistake, though, give him his due, it looked at first as like a sail as ever any land at a distance could look.

Towards evening, we made the land very plain, distance about seven leagues S. by E. and found that it was not an island, but a vast tract of land, extending, as we had reason to believe, from the side of Gillolo, and the Spice Islands, or that which we call Nova Guinea, and never yet fully discovered; the land lying away from the west N. W. to the S. E. by south, still southerly.

I, that was for making all possible discovery, was willing, besides the convenience of water, and perhaps fresh provisions, to put her in, and see what kind of a country it was; so I ordered the brigantine to stand in for the shore. They sounded, but found no ground within half a league of the shore; so they hoisted out their boat, and went close in with the shore, where they found good anchor-hold in about thirty-six fathom, and a large creek, or mouth of a river; here they found eleven to thirteen fathom soft oozy sand, and the water half fresh at the mouth of the creek.

Upon notice of this we stood in, and came all to an anchor in the very creek; and sending our boats up the creek, found the water perfectly fresh, and very good upon the ebb, about a league up the river.

Among all the islands in this part of the world that is to say, from the Philippines eastward, of which there are an infinite number, we never came near any but we found ourselves surrounded with canoes, and a variety of boats, bringing off to us cocoa-nuts, plantains, roots, and greens, to traffic for such things as they could get, and that in such numbers that we were tired of them, and sometimes alarmed and obliged to fire at them; but here, though we saw great numbers of people at a distance from the shore, yet we saw not one boat or bark, nor anything else upon the water.

We stayed two or three days taking in fresh water, but it was impossible to restrain our men from going on shore to see what sort of a country it was; and I was very willing they should do so. Accordingly, two of our boats, with about thirty men in both of them, went on shore on the east side of the creek or harbour where our ship lay.

They found the country looked wild and savage enough; but though they could find no houses or speak with the inhabitants, they saw their footsteps and their seats, where they had sat down under some trees; and after wandering about a little, they saw people, both men and women, at a distance; but they ran away from our men at first sight, like frightened deer, nor could they make any signal to them to be understood, for when our men hallooed and called after them, they ran again as if they had been bewitched.

Our men gathered a great variety of green stuff, though they knew not of what kind, and brought it all on board, and we eat a great deal of it; some we boiled and made broth of; and some of our men, who had the scurvy, found it did them a great deal of good; for the herbs eat all spicy, and had a most pleasant agreeable taste, but none of us could tell what to call it, though we had several men on board who had been among the Spice Islands before in Dutch ships.

We were very uneasy that we could get nothing here but a little grass and potherbs, as our men called it, and they moved me to let them have two boats and go up the river, as high as the tide would carry them. This I consented to, being as willing to make the discovery as they; so I ordered the captain of the Madagascar ship, who had, as I have said, been formerly my second mate, I say I ordered him to go along with them.

But in the morning, a little before the flood was made, I was called out of my cabin to see an army, as they told me, coming out to attack us. I turned out hastily enough, you may be sure, and such an army no ship was ever attacked with, for we spied three or four hundred black creatures come playing and tumbling down the stream towards us like so many porpoises in the water. I was not satisfied at first that they were human creatures, but would have persuaded our men that they were sea monsters, and that they were certainly fishes of some strange kind.

But they quickly undeceived us, for they came swimming about our ships, staring and wondering and calling to one another, but said not one word to us, at least if they did we could not understand it.

Some of them came very near our ship, and we made signs to them to come on board, but they would not venture. We tossed one of them a rope, and he took hold of it boldly, but as soon as we offered to pull, he let go and laughed at us; another of them did the like, and when he let go turned up his black buttocks as in sport at us, the language of which, in our country, we all knew, but whether they meant it so or not, that we cannot tell.

However, this dumb conversing with them we did not like, neither was it to any purpose to us, and I was resolved, if possible, to know something more of them than we could get thus: so I ordered out our pinnace, with six oars, and as many other men well armed, to row among them, and, if possible, to take some of them and bring them on board. They went off; but the six-oared pinnace, though a very nimble boat, could not row so fast as they could swim; for, if pulling with all their might, they came near one of them, immediately, like dog and duck, they would dive and come up again thirty or forty yards off, so that our men did not know which way to row after them. However, at last getting among the thickest of them they got hold of two, and with some difficulty dragged them in; but were surprised to find they were both women: however, they brought them on board naked as they were. When they came on board I ordered they should have two pieces of linen wrapped round their waists to cover them, which they seemed extraordinarily glad of. We gave them also several strings of beads, and our men tied them about their necks and about their arms like bracelets, and they were wonderfully pleased with that. Others of our men gave each of them a pair of scissars, with needles and some thread, and threading the needles, showed them how to sew with them. We gave them food and each of them a dram of arrack, and made signs to know of them where they lived; they pointed up to the river, but we could by no means understand them. When we had dressed them up thus with necklaces, and bracelets, and linen, we brought them up upon the deck and made them call to their country folk, and let them see how well they were used, and ask them to come on board, but they would not venture.

However, as I thought the discovery we were to make would be something the easier on the account of the usage of these two young women, for they were not, as we guessed, above twenty or two and twenty years of age, we resolved that the boat should go on, as we intended, up the river; and that as these two women pointed that way they should carry them along with them.

Accordingly we sent two shallops, or large boats, which carried together sixty men all well armed. We gave them a store of beads, knives, and scissars, and such baubles with them, with hatchets and nails, and hooks, looking-glasses, and the like; and we built up the sides and stern of the boat, and covered them with boards to keep off arrows and darts, if they should find occasion, so that they looked like London barges. In this posture, as soon as the tide of flood was made up, our men went away, carrying a drum and trumpet in each boat, and each boat had also two pattereroes fixed on the gunnel near the bow.

Thus furnished, they went off at about eleven o'clock in the forenoon, and, to my very great uneasiness, I heard no more of them for four days; and the whole ship's company were indeed surprised at their stay, and the captain of the sloop would fain have had me let him have sailed up the river with the sloop as far as the channel would serve, which indeed we found was deep enough. Indeed, as I was unwilling to run any more risks, I could not persuade myself but that the force I had already sent was sufficient to fight five thousand naked creatures such as the natives seemed to be; and therefore I was very unwilling to send. However, I consented at last to have our long boat and two smaller boats manned with fifty-four men more, well armed and covered from arrows and darts, as the other had been, go up the river, upon their solemn promise, and with express order to return the next day at farthest; ordering them to fire guns as they went up the river to give notice to their fellows, if they could be heard, that they were coming; and that in the mean time if I fired three guns they should immediately return.

They went away with the tide of flood, a little before noon, and went up the river about five leagues, the tide running but slowly up, and a strong fresh of land water, that checked the tide coming down; so that when the tide was spent they came to an anchor. They found the river, contrary to their expectation, continued both deep enough and was wider in breadth than where the ships were at anchor, and that it had another mouth or outlet into the sea some leagues farther east, so that the land to the east of us, where our men went on shore, was but an island, and had not many inhabitants, if any at all; the people they had seen there having possibly swam over the other arm or branch of the river to observe our ships the nearer.

As our men found they could go no farther for want of the tide, they resolved to come to an anchor; but just as they were sounding, to see what ground they had and what depth, a small breeze at N.E. sprung up, by which they stemmed the current and reached up about two leagues farther, when they hove over their grappling in five fathom water, soft ground; so that all this way, and much farther, all our ships might have gone up the channel, being as broad as the Thames is about Vauxhall.

It must be observed, that all along this river they found the land, after they came past the place where the other branch of the river broke off eastward, was full of inhabitants on both sides, who frequently came down to the water side to gaze and look at our boats; but always when our men called to them, as if they thought our men inquired after their fellows, they pointed up the river, which was as much as to say they were gone farther that way.

However, our men not being able to go any farther against the tide, took no notice of that; but after a little while some of them, in one of the smaller boats, rowed towards the shore, holding a white flag to the people, in token of peace. But it was all one, and would have been all one for aught we know, if they had held up a red flag, for they all ran away, men, women, and children, nor could our men by any persuasions, by gestures and signs of any kind, prevail on them to stay, or hardly so much as to look at them.

The night coming on, our men knew not well what course to take. They saw several of the Indians' dwellings and habitations, but they were all at a distance from the river, occasioned, as our men supposed, by the rivers overflowing the flat grounds near its banks so as to render those lands not habitable.

Our men had a great mind to have gone up to one of the towns they saw, but he that commanded would not permit it, but told them that if they could find a good landing place that they might all go on shore, except a few to keep the boats, if they would venture: upon which the smallest boat rowed up about a mile, and found a small river running into the greater, and here there they all resolved to land; but first they fired two muskets to give notice, if possible, to their comrades that they were at hand; however, they heard nothing of them.

What impression the noise of the two muskets made among the Indians they could not tell, for they were all run away before.

They were no sooner on shore, but considering they had not above two hours day, and the Indian villages were at least two miles off, they called a council, and resolved not to march so far into a country they knew so little of, and be left to come back in the dark, so they went on board again and waited till morning; however, they viewed the country, found it was a fertile soil, and a great herbage on the ground. There were a few trees near the river; but farther up where the Indian dwellings were, the little hills seemed to be covered with woods, but of what kind they knew not.

In the morning, before break of day, some of our men fancied they heard a gun fired up the river, upon which the officer ordered two muskets to be fired again, as had been done the evening before. In about a quarter of an hour they were answered by the like firing, by which our men knew that their comrades heard them; so without pursuing their intended landing, the tide being then running upwards, they weighed and set to their oars, having little or no wind, and that which was, blowing down the stream.

After they had gone about a league, they heard a confused noise at a great distance, which surprised them a little at first, but as they perceived it drew nearer and nearer, they waited awhile, when they perceived first here and there some people, then more, and then about two or three hundred men and women together, running, and every one carrying something.

Whither it was they were going, or what it was they carried, we could not tell till they came nearer, when we found that they were all loaded with provisions, cocoa nuts, roots, cabbages, and a great variety of things which we knew little of, and all these they were carrying down to our ships, as we understood afterwards, in gratitude for our good usage of the two young women.

When these people saw our men and their three boats, they were at a full stop, and once or twice they were ready to lay down all their loads and run for it; but ours made signs of peace, and held up a white flag to them.

Some of them, it seems, having, as we found, conversed with our men, had a little more courage than the rest, and came to the water side and looked at the boats. One of our men bethought himself of a stratagem to make known to them our desire of peace with them, and taking a string of beads and some toys, he held them up at the end of the boat-hook staff and showed them to the Indians, pointing to them with his hand, and then pointing with the other hand to what the Indians carried, and to his mouth, intimating that we wanted such things to eat, and would give them the beads for them.

One of the Indians presently understood him, and threw himself into the water, holding a bundle of plants, such as he had trussed up together, upon his head, and swimming with the other hand, came so near the boat where our men held out the staff as to reach the end of the staff, take off the string of beads and toys, and hang his bunch of trash (for it was no better) upon the hook, and go back again, but would come no nearer.

When he got on shore again all his comrades came about him to see what he had got; he hung the string of beads about his neck, and run dancing about with the other things in his hand, as if he had been mad.

What our men got was a trifle of less worth than a good bunch of carrots in England, but yet it was useful, as it brought the people to converse with us; for after this they brought us roots and fruits innumerable, and began to be very well acquainted with us.

By that time our men had chattered thus four or five times, they first heard, and in a little while after saw their two great boats with their fellows coming down the river, at about two miles distance, with their drums and trumpets, and making noise enough.

They had been, it seems, about three leagues higher up, where they had been on shore among the Indians, and had set at liberty the two maidens, for such, they understood, they were; who, letting their friends see how fine they were dressed, and how well they were used, the Indians were so exceedingly obliged, and showed themselves so grateful that they thought nothing too much for them; but brought out all the sorts of provisions which their country produced, which, it seems, amounted to nothing but fruits, such as plantains, cocoa nuts, oranges, and lemons, and such things, and roots, which we could give no name to; but that which was for our use was a very good sort of maize or Indian corn, which made us very good bread.

They had, it seems, some hogs and some goats, but our men got only six of the latter, which were at hand, and were very good. But that which was most remarkable was, that whereas in all the islands within the tropics, the people are thievish, treacherous, fierce, and mischievous, and are armed with lances or darts, or bows and arrows: these appeared to be a peaceable, quiet, inoffensive people, nor did our men notice any weapon among them, except a long staff which most of the men carried in their hands, being made of a cane, about eight feet long, and an inch and a half diameter, much like a quarter-staff, with which they would leap over small brooks of water with admirable dexterity.

The people were black, or rather of a tawny dark brown, their hair long, but curling in very handsome rings. They went generally quite naked, both men and women, except that in two places our men said they found some of the women covered, from the middle downward. They seemed to have no conversation with the sea at all, nor did we see so much as any one boat among them; nor did any of the inhabitants dwell near the sea, but cultivated their lands very well in their way, having abundance of greens and fruits growing about their houses, and upon which we found they chiefly lived. The climate seemed to be very hot, and yet the country very fruitful.

These people, by all we could perceive, had never had any converse with the rest of the world by sea; what they might have by land we know not; but as they lay quite out of the way of all commerce, so it might be probable they never had seen a ship or boat, whether any European ship, or so much as a periagua of the islands. We have mentioned their nearest distance to the Ladrões, being at least four hundred leagues, and from the Spice Islands, and the country of New Guiana, much more; but as to the European shipping I never heard of any that ever went that way, neither do I believe any ever did.

I take the more notice of these people's not having conversed, as I say, with the world, because of the innocence of their behaviour, their peaceable disposition, and their way of living upon the fruits and produce of the earth; also their cultivation, and the manner of their habitations; no signs of rapine or violence appearing among them. Our stay here was so little that we could make no inquiry into their religion, manner of government, and other customs; nor have I room to crowd many of these things into this account. They went, indeed, naked, some of them stark naked, both men and women; but I thought they differed in their countenances from all the wild people that I ever saw; that they had something singularly honest and sincere in their faces, nor did we find anything of falsehood or treachery among them.

The gratitude they expressed for our kindly using the two young women I have mentioned was a token of generous principles; and our men told us that they would have given them whatever they could have asked, if they had had it.

In a word, it was on their account they sent that little army of people to us, loaded with provisions, which our men met before the two shallops came down; but all the provisions they had consisted chiefly in fruits of the earth, cocoa nuts, plantains, oranges, lemons, &c., and maize, or Indian corn. We had not any sufficient time with them to inquire after what traffic they had, or whether anything fit for us. That they had several fragrant plants, and, I believe, some spices, as particularly cinnamon, that we found; but what else the country produces we know not.

We came away from hence, after seven days' stay, having observed little of the country more than that it seemed to be very pleasant, but very hot. The woods were all flourishing and green, and the soil rich, but no great matter that could be the subject of trade; but an excellent place to be a bait land, or port of refreshment, in any voyage that might afterwards be undertaken that way.

We set sail, I say, from hence, in seven days, and finding the coast lie fairly on our starboard side, kept the land on board all the way, distance about three leagues; and it held us thus about an hundred and twenty leagues due east, when, on a sudden, we lost sight of the land: whether it broke off, or whether it only drew off farther south, we could not tell.

We went on two or three days more, our course S. E., when we made land again, but found it to be only two small islands, lying S. and by E., distance nine leagues. We stood on to them, and two of our boats went on shore, but found nothing for our purpose; no inhabitants, nor any living creatures, except sea fowls, and some large snakes, neither was there any fresh water. So we called that land Cape Dismal.

The same evening we stood away full south, to see if we could find out the continuance of the former land; but as we found no land, so a great sea coming from the south, we concluded we should find no land that way; and varying our course easterly, we ran, with a fair, fresh gale, at N. W. and by W. for seven days more, in all which time we saw nothing but the open sea every way, and, making an observation, found we had passed the Southern Tropic, and that we were in the latitude of six-and-twenty degrees and thirteen minutes, after which we continued our course still southerly, for several days more, till we found by another observation that we were in two-and-thirty degrees and twenty minutes.

This evening we made land over our starboard bow, distance six leagues, and stood away south and by east; but the wind slackening, we lay by in the night, and in the morning found the land bearing east and by south distance one league and a half; a good shore and sounding we found about five-and-thirty fathom, stony ground. Then we hoisted our boat out, and sent it on shore for discoveries, to sound the depth of the water and see for a good harbour to put in at.

They went quite in with the shore, where they found people, men and women, crowding together to look at us. When our men came close to the land they hung out a white flag, but the wild people understood nothing of the meaning of it, but stood looking and amazed; and we have great reason to believe that they never had seen any ship or bark of any nation in all their lives, but their own. We found no boats, or sails, or anything they had to make use of on the water; but some days after we saw several small canoes, with three or four men in each.

Our men not being able to speak anything for them to understand, or to understand anything they said, the first thing they did was to make signs to them for something to eat; upon which three of them seemed to go away, and coming again in a few minutes, brought with them several bundles or bunches of roots, some plantains, and some green lemons or limes, and laid down all upon the shore. Our men took courage then to go on shore, and taking up what they brought, they set up a stick, and upon the end of it hung five bunches or strings of blue and white beads, and went on board again.

Never was such joy among a wild people discovered as these people showed when they took the beads off the stick: they danced, and capered, and made a thousand antic gestures; and, inviting our men on shore, laid their hands upon their breasts across, and then looked up, intimating a solemn oath not to hurt us.

Our men made signs by which they made them understand that they would come again next morning, and also that they should bring us more eatables; accordingly, we sent three boats the next morning, and our men carried knives, scissors, beads, looking glasses, combs, and any toys they had, not forgetting glass beads, and glass ear-rings in abundance.

The Indians were very ready to meet us, and brought us fruits and herbs as before; but three of them, who stood at a distance, held each of them a creature exactly like a goat, but without horns or beard, and these were brought to traffic with us.

We brought out our goods, and offered every one something, but the variety was surprising to them, who had never seen such things before. But that which was most valuable of all our things was a hatchet, which one of their principal men took up, and looked at it, felt of the edge, and laid it down, then took it up again, and wanted to know the use of it; upon which one of our men took it, and stepping to a tree that stood near, cut off a small bough of it at one blow. The man was surprised, and run to the tree with it, to see if he could do so too; and finding the virtue of it, he laid it down, ran with all his might into the country, and by-and-by returning, came with two men more with him, to show them this wonderful thing called a hatchet.

But if they were surprised with the novelty of a hatchet, our men were as much surprised to see hanging round the ears of both the men that he brought with him large flat pieces of pure gold, and the thread which they hung by was made of the hair of the goats twisted very prettily together, and strong enough.

Our men offering to handle them to see if they were gold, one of the men takes off his two bobs, or what we might call them, and offered them to our men for the hatchet; our men seemed to make some difficulty of it, as if the hatchet was of much greater value than those trifles; upon which, he being, as we found, superior, made the other that came with him pull off his two ear-jewels also; and so our unreasonable people took them all four, being of pure gold, and weighing together some grains above two ounces, in exchange for an old rusty hatchet. Well, however unreasonable the price was, they did not think it so; and so over-fond was he of the hatchet that as soon as he had it for his own he ran to the tree, and in a few minutes had so laid about him with the hatchet that there was not a twig left on it that was within his reach.

This exchange was a particular hint to me; and I presently directed my chief mate and Captain Merlotte to go on shore the next day and acquaint themselves as much as they could with the natives, and, if possible, to find out where they had this gold, and if any quantity was to be found.

They bestowed their time so well, and obliged the natives so much by the toys and trifles they gave them, that they presently told them that the gold, which they called aarah, was picked up in the rivers that came down from a mountain which they pointed to, a great way off. Our men prevailed with three of them to go with them to one of these rivers, and gave them beads and such things to encourage them, but, by the way, no hatchet; that was kept up at a high rate, and as a rarity, fit only for a king or some great man that wore aarah on his ears.

In a word, they came to the river where they said they found this aarah; and the first thing our men observed there was an Indian sitting on the ground and beating something upon a great stone with another stone in his hand for his hammer. They went to see what he was doing, and found he had picked up a lump of gold in the sand as big as a swan-shot, of no regular shape, but full of corners, neither round nor square, and the man was beating it flat as well as he could.

One of our men, who had a hatchet in his hand, made signs to him to let him flat it for him; and so, turning the back part of the hatchet, which, by the way, turned the hatchet into a hammer, he beat the piece of gold flat in an instant, and then, turning the edges, beat it that way, till he brought it to be round also.

This was so surprising to the man that was beating, that he stood looking on with all the tokens of joy and amazement; and, desiring to see the hatchet, looked this way and that way upon those of his countrymen who came with us, as if asking them if ever they saw the like.

When our man had done he made signs to know if he had any more aarah; the man said nothing, but went down to the brink of the river, and putting his hand into a hole, he brought out three little lumps of gold, and a great many smaller, some of them about as big as a great pin's head; all which he had laid up there in the hollow of a pretty big stone. Our man thought it was too much to take all that for the hatchet, and therefore pulled out some beads and pieces of glass, and such toys; and, in short, bought all this cargo of gold, which, in the whole, weighed near five ounces, for about the value of two shillings.

Though these bargains were very agreeable to us, yet the discovery of such a place and of such a fund of treasure in a part of the world which it is very probable was never seen before by any European eyes, nor so much as inquired after, was the greatest satisfaction imaginable to me, knowing the adventurous temper of the gentleman who was our principal employer. Upon this account, while my men busied themselves in their daily search after gold, and in finding out the rivers from whence it came, or rather where it was found, I employed myself to be fully informed where this place was, whether it was an island or a continent; and having found a tolerable good road for our ships to ride in, I caused my two shallops, well manned, to run along the coast, both east and west, to find which way it lay, and whether they could find any end of it; as also to see what rivers, what people, and what provisions they could meet with.

By my observation I found, as above, that we were in the latitude of seven-and-twenty degrees and thirteen minutes south meridian; distance from the Ladrões about sixteen degrees east. While my shallops were gone I went on shore, and some of my men set up tents on shore, as well for the convenience of their traffic as for their resting on shore all night, keeping, however, a good guard, and having two of our ship-dogs with them, who never failed giving them notice whenever any of the natives came near them; for what ailed the dogs I know not, but neither of them could bear the sight of the Indians, and we had much to do to keep them from flying at them.

While we rode here we had the most violent storm of wind, with rain and with great claps of thunder, that we had yet sustained since we came out of England. It was our comfort that the wind came off shore, for it blew at south, and shifting between the S. S. E. and S. W. with such excessive gusts, and so furious, and, withal, not only by squalls and sudden flaws, but a settled terrible tempest, that, had it been from off sea, as it was off shore, we must have perished, there had been no remedy; and even as it was, we rode in great danger. My boatswain called twice out to me, to cut my masts by the board, protesting we should either bring our anchors home or founder as we rode; and, indeed, the sea broke over us many times in a terrible manner. As I said before, we had an indifferent good road, and so we had, but not a very good one, for the land was low, and on the east we lay a little open; however, our ground tackle was good, and our ship very tight, and I told the boatswain I would rather slip the cable and go off to sea than cut the masts. However, in about four hours' time more, we found the wind abate, but it blew very hard for three days after that.

I was in great pain for my two shallops in this tempest, but they had both the good luck to lie close under the shore; and one indeed had hauled quite upon the land, where the men lay on shore under their sail, so that they got no damage; and about three days after one of them returned, and brought me word they had been to the west, where they had made very little discovery as to the situation of the country, and whether it was an island or a continent, but they had conversed with the natives very often, and had found several that had pieces of gold hanging, some in their hair, some about their necks; and they made a shift to bring as many with them as weighed, all put together, as seventeen or eighteen ounces, for which they had bartered toys and trifles, as we did; but they found no rivers where they could discover any gold in the sands, as we had done, so that they believed it all came from that side where we were.

But our other shallop had much better luck: she went away to the east, and by the time she had gone about sixteen leagues, she found the shore break off a little, and soon after a little more, till at length they came, as it were, to the land's end; when the shore running due south, they followed, according to their account, near thirteen leagues more.

In this time they went several times on shore, entered three rivers indifferently large, and one of them very large at the mouth, but grew narrow again in three or four leagues, but a deep channel, with two-and-twenty to eight-and-twenty fathom water in it all the way, as far as they went.

Here they went on shore and trafficked with the natives, whom they found rude and unpolished, but a very mild, inoffensive people; nor did they find them anything thievish, much less treacherous, as in some such countries is the case. They had the good luck to find out the place where, as they supposed, the king of the country resided, which was a kind of a city encompassed with a river almost all round, the river making a kind of double horse-shoe. The manner of their living is too long to describe, neither could our men give any account of their government or of the customs of the place; but what they sought for was gold and provisions, and of that they got pretty considerable.

They found the Indians terribly surprised at the first sight of them, but after some time they found means to let them know they desired a truce, and to make them understand what they meant by it.

At length a truce being established, the king came, and with him near three hundred men; and soon after the queen, with half as many women. They were not stark naked, neither men or women, but wearing a loose piece of cloth about their middles. What it was made of we could not imagine, for it was neither linen or woollen, cotton, or silk; nor was it woven, but twisted and braided by hand, as our women make bone lace with bobbins. It seems it was the stalk of an herb which this was made with, and was so strong that I doubt not it would have made cables for our ships if we had wanted to make such an experiment.

When the king first came to our men, they were a little shy of his company, he had so many with him, and they began to retire, which the king perceiving, he caused all his men to stop and keep at a distance, and advanced himself, with about ten or twelve of his men, and no more.

When he was come quite up, our men, to show their breeding, pulled off their hats, but that he did not understand, for his men had no hats on; but the officer making a bow to him, he understood that presently, and bowed again, at which all his men fell down flat upon their faces, as flat to the ground as if they had been shot to death with a volley of our shot, and they did not fall so quick, but they were up again as nimbly, and then down flat on the ground again; and this they did three times, their king bowing himself to our men at the same time.

This ceremony being over, our men made signs to them that they wanted victuals to eat and something to drink, and pulled out several things, to let the people see they would give something for what they might bring them.

The king understood them presently, and turning to some of his men, he talked awhile to them, and our men observed that while he spoke they seemed to be terrified as if he had been threatening them with death. However, as soon as he had done, three of them went away, and our men supposed they went to fetch something that the king would give them; upon which, that they might be beforehand with them, our men presented his majesty with two pair of bracelets of fine glass-beads of several colours, and put them upon his arms, which he took most kindly; and then they gave him a knife, with a good plain ivory handle, and some other odd things. Upon receiving these noble presents, he sends away another of his men, and a little after two more.

Our men observed that two of the men went a great way off towards the hill, but the other man that he sent away first went to his queen, who with her retinue of tawny ladies, stood but a little way off, and soon after her majesty came with four women only attending her.

The officer who commanded our men, finding he should have another kind of compliment to pay the ladies, retired a little; and being an ingenious, handy sort of a man, in less than half an hour he and another of his men made a nice garland, or rather a coronet of sundry strings of beads, and with glass bobs and pendants all hanging about it most wonderful gay; and when the queen was come, he went up to the king, and showing it to him, made signs that he would give it to the queen.

The king took it, but was so pleased with it that truly he desired our officer to put it upon his own head, which he did; but when he had got it upon his own head he made bold to let our men see he was king over his wife as well as over the rest of the country, and that he would wear it himself.

With that our man pulled out a little pocket looking-glass, and holding it up, he let his majesty see his own face, which we might reasonably suppose he had never seen before, especially not with a crown on his head too. That till that looking-glass came, and he saw his own face, he was grave and majestic, and carried it something like a king, but he was so ravished with this that he was quite beside himself, and jumped, and capered, and danced about like a madman.

All this while our men saw nothing coming, but that all was given on their side; whereupon they made signs again that they wanted provisions. He made signs again, pointing to a hill a good way off, as if it would come from thence very quickly, and then looked to see if they were coming, as if he was impatient till they came as well as our people.

During this time one of our men observed that the queen had several pieces of gold, as they thought them to be, hanging about her, as particularly in her hair, and large flat plaits of gold upon the hinder part of her head, something in the place of a roll as our women wear; that her hair was wound about it in rolls braided together very curiously; and having informed our officer, he made signs to the king for leave to give the queen something, which he consented to. So he went to her majesty, making a bow as before; but this complaisance surprised her, for upon his bowing himself, on a sudden falls the queen and all her four ladies flat on the ground, but were up again in a moment; and our people wondered how they could throw themselves so flat on their faces and not hurt themselves; nor was it less to be wondered at how they could so suddenly jump up again, for they did not rise up gradually as we must do, with the help of our hands and knees, if we were extended so flat on our faces, but they with a spring, whether with their hands or their whole bodies we know not, jumped up all at once, and were upon their feet immediately.

This compliment over, our officer stepped up to the queen, and tied about her neck a most delicate necklace of pearl; that is to say, of large, handsome white glass beads, which might in England cost about four-pence halfpenny, and to every one of her ladies he gave another of smaller beads and different colours than those which he gave the queen. Then he presented her majesty with a long string of glass-beads which being put over her head, reached down to her waist before, and joined in a kind of a tassel, with a little knot of blue ribbon, which she was also extremely pleased with; and very fine she was.

The queen made, it seems, the first return, for stepping to one of her women, our men observed that she took something out of her hair, and she let her tie her hair up again; after which she brought it and gave it to our officer, making signs to know if it was acceptable. It was a piece of gold that weighed about two ounces and a half; it had been beaten as flat as they knew how to beat it; but the metal was of much more beauty to our men than the shape.

Our officer soon let them see that he accepted the present, by laying it to his mouth and to his breast, which he found was the way when they liked anything. In short, our officer goes to work again, and in a little while he makes a little coronet for the queen, as he had done before, though less, and without asking leave of the king went up to her and put it upon her head, and then gave her a little looking-glass, as he had done to the king, to look at herself.

She was so surprised with this that she knew not what to do with herself; but to show her gratitude she pulled out another plate of gold out of her own hair, and gave it to our officer; and not content with that, she sent one of her women to the crowd of women that first attended her, and whether she stripped them of all the gold they had we know not, but she brought so many pieces, that when our men had them (for she gave all to them) they weighed almost two pounds weight.

But this was not all; when she was thus dressed up she stepped forward, very nimbly and gracefully, towards the king to show him what she had got; and finding the king dressed up as fine as herself, they had work enough for near two hours to look at one another, and admire their new ornaments.

Our men reported that the king was a tall, well-shaped man, of a very majestic deportment, only that when he laughed he showed his teeth too much, which however were as white as ivory. As for the queen, saying that her skin was of a tawny colour, she was a very pretty woman; very tall, a sweet countenance, admirable features, and, in a word, a completely handsome lady.

She was very oddly dressed; she was quite naked from her head to below her breasts. Her breasts were plump and round, not flaggy and hanging down, as it is general with all the Indian women, some of whose breasts hang as low as their bellies, but sitting as beautifully up as if they had been laced up with stays round her body; and below her breast she had a broad piece of a skin of some curious creature, spotted like a leopard, or rather, as I believe it was, some fine spotted deer. This was wrapped round her very tight, like a body-girth to a horse; and under this she had a kind of petticoat, as before described, hanging down to her ankles. As for shoes or stockings, they were only such as nature had furnished. Her hair was black, and, as they supposed, very long, being wreathed up, twisted in long locks about the plate of gold she wore; and when she pulled off the plate of gold as above, it hung down her back and upon her shoulders gracefully enough; but it seems she did not think so, for as soon as she found it so fallen down, she caused one of her women to roll it all up and tie it in a great knot, which hung down in her neck, and did not look so well as when it was loose.

While the king and the queen were conversing together about their fine things as above, our men went back to their boat where they left the purchase they had got, and furnished themselves with other things fit to traffic with, as they saw occasion; and they were not quite come up to the king again, when they perceived that the men the king had sent up into the country were returned, and that they brought with them a great quantity of such provisions as they had, which chiefly consisted in roots and maize, or Indian corn, and several fruits which we had never seen before: some of them resembled the large European figs, but were not really figs; with some great jars of water, having herbs steeped in it, and roots, that made it look as white as milk, and drank like milk sweetened with sugar, but more delicious, and exceedingly cool and refreshing. They brought also a great quantity of oranges, but they were neither sweet nor sour, and our men believed they were not ripe; but when they were dressed after the manner of the country, which they showed our men how to do: that is to say, to roast them in the fire, they eat admirably well, and our men brought a great many away to us, and when we roasted them, they exceeded all that ever I tasted.

After our men had received what they brought, and shown that they were acceptable to them, the king made signs that he would be gone, but would come again to them the next morning, and pointing to the queen's head, where the plate of gold had been that she gave to our men, intimated that he would bring some of that with him the next day; but while he was making these signs one of his other messengers came back and gave the king something into his hand, wrapped up, which our men could not see. As soon as the king had it, as if he had been proud to show our men that he could make himself and his queen as fine as they could make them, he pulled it out, and first put it on his queen, (a short thing like a robe,) which reached from her neck, for he put it over her head, only down to the spotted skin which she wore before, and so it covered her shoulders and breast. It was made of an infinite number and variety of feathers, oddly and yet very curiously put together, and was spangled, as we may call it, all over, with little drops or lumps of gold, some no bigger than a pin's head, which had holes made through them and were strung six or seven together, and so tied on to the feathers; some as big as a large pea, hanging single, some as big as a horse bean, and beaten flat, and all hanging promiscuously among the feathers without any order or shape; which, notwithstanding, were very beautiful in the whole, and made the thing look rich and handsome enough.

As soon as he had thus equipped his queen, he put the other on upon himself, which, as it was larger, so it had a particular in its shape, namely, that it covered his arms almost to his elbows, and was so made that it came round under the arm, and being fastened there with a string, made a kind of sleeve.

As the king's robe, or whatever it may be called, was larger, (for it came down to his waist,) so it had a great deal more gold about it, and larger pieces than what the queen wore. When their majesties had thus put on their robes, you may guess how glorious they looked, but especially the queen, who, being a most charming, beautiful creature before, was much more so, when she glittered thus all with gold. Our men looked very narrowly to observe whether there were no diamonds, and particularly whether any pearl was among their finery, but they could not perceive any.

In this manner they parted for that evening; but the people did not leave them so, for they thronged about them, and some brought them jars of the white liquor, some brought them roots, some fruits, some one thing and some another; and our men gave every one of them some small matter or other in proportion to what they brought. At last there came four particularly tall lusty men, with bows and arrows, but before they came close up to our men, they laid down their bows and arrows on the ground and came forward with all the tokens of friendship they were able to make.

They had two youths with them, each of which led a tame fawn of pretty large growth, and when the men came up they gave the two fawns to our men, who, in return, gave each of them a knife and some strings of beads, and such toys as they had.

Our men observed that all these men had little bits of gold, some of one shape and some of another, hanging at their ears; and when our men came to be familiar, they asked them as well as they could where they found that stuff, and they made signs to the sand in the river, and then pointed towards that part of the country where our ships lay, which signified to our men that the gold was most of it where we lay, not there, where the king and queen resided. Nay, when our men pointed again to the river where they were, and went and took up some of the sand, as if they would look for gold in it, they made signs of laughing at it, and that there was nothing to be found there, but that it lay all the other way.

And yet two or three of the men, who, when the tide was out, went up the bank of the river two or three miles upon the sands, peeping and trying the sands as they went, found three or four little bits of pure gold in the sand, though not bigger than pin's heads; but no doubt, farther up the country, they might have found more.

These four men, seeing how fond our people were of the gold, made signs that they could fetch gold for them if they would give them such things as they liked; and ours again told them they should have anything they pleased, and as earnest gave them pieces of iron and bits of glass of small value, both of which they were much delighted with beforehand.

Early in the morning their four customers came again, and brought several men, who seemed to be servants, along with them, laden with refreshments, such as the white water mentioned above, which they brought in earthen pots, very hard, but made so by the sun, not by any fire. They brought also three small deer with them, and a kind of coney or rabbit, but larger, which our men were very glad of. But that which was above all the rest, they brought a good quantity of gold dust, that is to say, some in small lumps, some in bigger, and one of them had nearly a pound weight, wrapped up in a piece of coney skin, which was all so very small that it was like dust, which, as our men understood afterwards, was reckoned of little worth, because all the bigger lumps had been picked out of it.

Our men, you may be sure, were very willing to trade for this commodity, and therefore they brought out a great variety of things to truck with them, making signs to them to pick out what they liked, but still keeping a reserve for the king and queen, whom they expected. Above all, they had made a reserve for the king of some extraordinary hatchets, which they had not yet suffered to be seen, with a hammer or two, and some drinking glasses and the like, with some particular toys for the queen.

But they had variety enough besides this for the four men, who, in short, bought so many trinkets and trifles, that our men not only got all the gold they brought, but the very pieces of gold out of their ears; in return for which our men gave every one of them a pair of ear-rings to hang about their ears, with a fine drop, some of green glass, some red, some blue, and they were wonderfully pleased with the exchange, and went back, we may venture to say, much richer than they came.

As soon as these had finished their market, and indeed a little before, they perceived at a distance the king and the queen, coming with a great retinue, so they made signs to our men that they must be gone, and that they would not have the king know that they had been there.

I must confess the relation of all this made me very much repent that I had not happened to have put in there with the ships; though, indeed, as the road lay open to the east and south winds, it might have been worse another way, I mean when the storm blew. However, as it is, I must report this part from the account given us by my men.

When the king and queen came the second time they came together, and dressed up, as our men supposed, with the utmost magnificence, having the fine feathered spangled things about their shoulders, and the king had over all his habit a fine spotted robe of deer skins, neatly joined together, and which, as he managed it, covered him from head to foot ; and, in short, it was so very beautiful that he really looked like a king with it.

When he came to our men and the ceremony of their meeting was over, the king, turning round, showed them that he had brought them stores of provisions, and indeed so he had, for he had at least fifty men attending him, laden with roots, and oranges, and maize, and such things ; in short, he brought them above twenty thousand oranges, a great parcel of that fruit like a fig, which I mentioned above, and other fruits ; after which another party followed, and brought twenty live deer, and as many of their rabbits dead ; the latter as big as our hares.

As they came up, the king made signs to our men to take them ; and our officer making signs to thank his majesty, he orders one of the attendants to give him one of the feathered robes, such an one as the king himself had on, and made mighty fine with lumps and tassels of gold, as the other ; and the tawny lass advancing to him, offered to put it over his head, but he took it in his hand and put it on himself, and looked as like a jackpudding in it as any one could desire, for it made no figure at all upon him, compared to what it did upon the Indians.

When they had received all this, they could not but make a suitable return ; and therefore our officer caused his reserve to be brought out ; and first he gave his majesty a dozen very handsome drinking-glasses, of several sizes, with half-a-dozen glass beakers, or cups, to the queen, for the same use. Then he gave the king a little hanger, and a belt to wear by his side, and showed him how to buckle it on and take it off, and how to draw it out and put it in again.

This was such a present, and the king was so delighted with it, that our officer said, he believed the king, for two hours together, did nothing but draw it and put it up again, put it on and pull it off, and the like.

Besides this, he gave the king three hatchets, and showed them the uses of them ; also, two hammers and a pair of very large shears, particularly showing him, that with those hammers they might beat out the gold lumps which they found in the rivers, and with the shears might cut the edges round, or into what shape they pleased, when they were beaten thin.

To the queen he gave six little knives, and a dozen small looking-glasses for her ladies. Six pair of scissars, and a small box full of large needles ; he then gave her some coarse brown thread, and showed her how to thread the needle, and sow anything together with the thread ; all which she admired exceedingly, and called her tawny maids of honour about her, that they might learn also. And whilst they were standing all together, our officer (to make the king laugh) sewed two of her women to one another by the lap of their waistcoats, or what else it might be called ; and when they were a little surprised at it, and began (as he thought) to be a little uneasy, he took the scissars, and at one snap, set them at liberty again ; which passed for such an extraordinary piece of dexterity, that the king would needs have two of them sewed together again, on purpose to see it cut again ; and then the king desired he might have a needle and thread himself, and a pair of scissars ; then he would sew some things together, and cut them asunder again several times, and laugh most heartily at the ingenuity of it.

Besides these things, they gave her majesty a pair of ear-rings, to hang on her ears, the glass in them looking green like an emerald ; a ring of silver with false stones in it, like a rose diamond ring, the middle stone red like a ruby, which she went presently and gave to the king ; but our officers made signs that he had one that was bigger for the king, and accordingly gave the king one that was much larger. And now they had done giving presents, as they thought, when the king made a sign to the queen, which she understood, and calling one of her women, she brought a small parcel, which the queen gave our officer into his hand ; wherein was about eleven pounds weight of gold-dust, but, as before, no big lumps in it.

Our men having thus finished their traffic, and being about to come away, they made signs to the king, that they would come again and bring him more fine things, at which the king smiles, and pointed to the gold, as if telling them he would have more of that for them when they came again.

Our men had now their expectations fully answered ; and as I said, had ended their traffic, and taking leave of the king and all his retinue, retired to their shallop, and the king and queen going away to their city as above ; the wind blowing northerly, they were seven days before they got down to us in the ship, during which time they had almost famished the deer they had left, five of which they had kept to bring us alive, and yet they went two or three times on shore to get food for them by the way.

We were all glad to see them again, and I had a great deal of reason to be satisfied with the account of their traffic, though not so much with their discovery ; for they were not able to give us the least account whether the land was a continent or an island.

But let that be how it will, it is certainly a country yet unfrequented by any of the Christian part of mankind, and perhaps may ever be so, and yet be as rich as any other part of the world yet discovered. The mountains in most of the islands, as well as of the main land in those parts, abounding in gold or silver, and no question, as well worth searching after as the coast of Guinea, where, though the quantity they find is considerable, yet, it is at this time sought after by so many, and the negroes taught so well how to value it, that but a little is brought away at a time, and so much given for it, that computing the charge of the voyage, is oftentimes more than it is worth.

Whereas, though it is true that what gold is found here is a great way off, yet I am persuaded such quantities are to be had, and the price given for it so very trifling, that it would be well worth searching for.

I reckon, that including the gold our shallop brought, and what we got on shore where we lay, we brought away about twenty-four pound weight of gold, the expense of which we could not value at above ten or eleven pounds in England, put it all together, and reckoning for all the provisions we got there, which supplied us for twenty days after we came away.

For while our shallop was making her visit thus to the royal family, &c., as is related, our men were not idle on shore, but partly by trade with the natives, and by washing the sands in the small rivers, we got such a quantity of gold as well satisfied us for the stay we made.

We had been about eighteen days here when our shallop returned, and we stayed a week more, trafficking with the people; and I am persuaded, if we had a mind to have settled there, and stay till now, we should have been very welcome to the people. We saw neither horse or cow, mule, ass, dog or cat, or any of our European sort of creatures (except that our men shot some wild ducks, and wigeon, exactly the same which we see in England, and very fat and good, but much easier to shoot than in England, having never been acquainted with the flash and noise of guns, as ours have been). We also found a sort of partridge in the country, not much unlike our own, and a great many of the whistling plover, the same with ours.

Though this month's stay was unexpected, yet we had no reason to think our time ill spent. However, we did not think we ought to lie here too long, whatever we got; so we weighed and stood off to sea, steering still S. E., keeping the shore of this golden country in sight, till our men told us they found the land fall off to the south; then we steered away more southerly for six or eight days, not losing sight of land all the time, till by an observation we found we were in the latitude of thirty-four degrees and a half, south of the line; our meridian distance from the Ladrões, twenty-two degrees, thirty minutes east; when a fresh gale of wind springing up at south and by east, obliged us to haul close for that evening; at night it blew such a storm that we were obliged to yield to the force of it, and go away afore it to the N., or N. by W., till we came to that point of land we passed before; here, the land tending to the west, we ran in under the lee of a steep shore, and came to an anchor in twenty-five fathom water, being the same country we were in before. Here we rode very safe for five days, the wind continuing to blow very hard all the time from the south-east.

My men would fain have had me gone a-shore again, and traffic with the people for more gold; but I, who was still in quest of further discoveries, thought I knew enough of this place to tempt my friend the merchant, whose favourite design was that of making new discoveries, to another voyage there, and that was enough for me; so I declined going on shore again, except that we sent our boats for a recruit of fresh water; and our men, while they were filling it, shot a brace of deer, as they were feeding by the side of a swamp, or moist ground; and also some wild ducks. Here we set up a great wooden cross, and wrote on it the names of our ships and commanders, and the time that we came to an anchor there.

But we were obliged to a rather discovery of this country than we intended, by the following accident:—We had unmoored early in the morning, and by eight o'clock were under sail; by ten we had doubled the point I mentioned above, and stood away S., keeping the shore on board, at the distance of about two leagues west.

The next day, the officer who had been with the shallop showed us the opening or mouth where he put in, and where he had made his traffic with the king of the country, as you have heard.

We went on for two days more, and still we found the land extending itself south, till the third day in the morning, we were a little surprised to find ourselves as it were embayed, being in the bottom of a deep gulf, and the land appearing right a-head, distance about three leagues, the coast having turned away to the east and by south, very high land, and mountainous, and the tops of some of the hills covered with snow.

Our second mate and the boatswain, upon this discovery, were for coming about, and sent to me for orders to make signals to the other ship and our brigantine, who were both a-head to do the like; but I, who was willing to acquaint myself as fully as I could with the coast of the country, which I made no question I should have occasion to come to again, said, "No, no, I will see a little further first." So I run on, having an easy gale at N. E., and good weather, till I came within about a league and a half of the shore, when I found that in the very bite or nook of the bay, there was a great inlet of water, which either must be a passage or strait between the land we had been on shore upon; which in that case must be a great island, or that it must be the mouth of some extraordinary great river.

This was a discovery too great to be omitted, so I ordered the brigantine to stand in with an easy sail, and see what account could be had of the place. Accordingly they stood in, and we followed about a league, and then lay by, waiting their signals. I had particularly ordered them to keep two boats a-head to sound the depth all the way, and they did so; and how it happened we know not, but on a sudden we heard the sloop fire two guns first, and then one gun; the first was a signal to us to bring to, and come no further, the next was a signal of distress. We immediately tacked to stand off, but found a strong current setting directly into the bite, and there not being wind enough for us to stem the current, we let go our anchor in twenty-two fathom water.

Immediately we manned out all the boats we had, great and small, to go and assist our brigantine, not knowing what distress she might be in; and they found she had driven up, as we were like to have done, too far into the channel of a large river, the mouth of which, being very broad, had several shoals in it; and though she had dropped her anchor just upon notice which the boats who were sounding gave her, yet she tailed aground upon a sand, and stuck fast; our men made no doubt but she would be lost, and began to think of saving the provisions and ammunition out of her. The two long-boats accordingly began to lighten her; and first they took in her guns, and let out all her casks of water; then they began to take in her great shot and the heavy goods. But by this time they found their mistake, for the current which I mentioned was nothing but a strong tide of flood, which, the indraught of the river being very great, ran up with a very great force; and, in something less than an hour the brigantine floated again.

However she stuck so long upon the sand, and the force of the current or tide was so great that she received considerable damage, and had a great deal of water in her hold. I immediately ordered our boats to row to the land on both sides, to see if they could find a good place to lay her on shore in; they did so, and found a very convenient harbour in the mouth of a small river, which emptied itself into the great river about two leagues within the foreland of it, on the north side, as the river Medway runs into the Thames within the mouth of it, on the south side; only this was not so far up.

Here they ran in the sloop immediately, and the next day we came thither also; our boats having sounded the whole breadth of the main river, and found a very good channel half a league broad, having from seventeen to four-and-twenty fathom water all the way, and very good riding.

Here we found it absolutely necessary to take everything out of the brigantine to search her bottom; for her lying on shore had strained her seams, and broke one of her floor timbers; and having hands enough, our men unloaded her in a very little time, and making a little dock for her, mended all the damage in about ten days' time. But seeing her in so good a condition, and the place so convenient, I resolved to have her whole bottom new caulked and payed; so we made her as clean as she was when she first came off the stocks.

This I took for a good opportunity to careen and clean our other ships too; for we had done little to them since we came from Madagascar. We found our Madagascar ship much wormeaten in her sheathing, which we helped as well as we could by new nailing, and by taking out some pieces of her sheathing and putting new ones in. But as to our great ship, she was sheathed with lead, and so had received no damage at all, only that she was very foul, which we remedied by scraping and cleaning, and new graving her quite over.

We were not all employed in this work, and therefore we had leisure to make the best of our time for the main work of new discoveries. And now I resolved to leave it no more to under-officers as I had done before, viz. when I gave the command of the shallop that traded with the king and queen, as above, to a midshipman, which I was very sorry for, though the fellow did his business very well too; but I say, I resolved not to trust any one now but myself.

In the first place, I took the shallops and went across the mouth of the great river to the south shore, to see what kind of a country was to be found there. For, as to the north side where we were, we found it to be much the same with that part where we had been before; only that we found no gold, nor did we perceive that the people had any.

I found the mouth of this river or inlet to be about four leagues over, where I crossed it which was about three leagues and a half within the inlet itself. But the weather being very calm, and the flood-tide running sharp, we let our boat drive up in our crossing about two leagues more; and we found the channel grew narrow so fast, that where we came to land it was not a league over; that about three leagues farther we found it a mere river, not above as broad as the Thames at Blackwall.

We found it a steep shore, and observing a little creek very convenient for our purpose, we ran in our boats among some flags or rushes, and laid them as soft and as safe as if they had been in a dock; we went all on shore immediately except two men in each boat left to guard our provisions.

We had for arms, every man a musket, a pistol, and a cutlass; and in each boat we had six half-pikes to use as we might have occasion. We had also every man a hatchet, hung in a little frog at his belt, and in each boat a broad axe and a saw.

We were furnished with strings of beads, bits of glass, glass rings, earrings, pearl necklaces, and such like jewellery ware, innumerable; besides knives, scissars, needles, pins, looking-glasses, drinking-glasses and toys a great store.

We were no sooner on shore but we found people in abundance, for there were two or three small towns within a little way of the shore; and I suppose we might have the more people about us, because, as we understood afterwards, they had seen us before, though we had not seen them.

We made signs to them by putting our fingers to our mouths, and moving our chops, as if we were eating, that we wanted provisions; and we hung up a white flag for a truce. They presently understood the first signal, but knew nothing of the last; and as to provisions, just as had been the case before, they brought us out roots and fruits, such as they eat themselves; but such as we had never seen before. Some of them however, were very sweet and good, and when we boiled them, they eat much like an English parsnip; and we gave them strings of beads, pieces of glass, and such things as we found they were always very fond of.

We found the people, as I observed of the other, very inoffensive and sincere; not quarrelsome, nor treacherous or mischievous in the least; and we took care not so much as to let them know the use or manner of our fire-arms a great while; neither was there one piece fired all the time we were among the other people, where we had so much gold. If there had, it had been very probable that they would have fled the country, in spite of all the good usage we could have been able to have shown them.

The people where we were now were not so rich in gold as those where we were before, but we found them much better stored with provisions; for besides deer, of which they had great plenty and variety, for they had some of a sort, which I had never seen before, and besides an infinite number of those rabbits which I mentioned before, which were as big as our hares, and which do not burrow in the ground as our conies do, they had a kind of sheep, large (like those of Peru, where they are used to carry burdens) and very good. They have no wool nor horns, but are rather hairy, like a goat; nor should I call them sheep, but that their flesh eats like mutton; and I know not what else to call them. The natives call them huttash; but what breed, or from what part of the world, or whether created for a peculiar purpose to this part, I know not.

However, their flesh was very agreeable, and they were fat and good; and as the Indians were mightily pleased with the price we paid them, and the goods we paid them in, they brought us more of these huttashes than we knew what to do with; and as I can calculate the rate, I suppose we might have them for about eightpence, or sometimes not above sixpence cost each; for they would give us one very thankfully for a string or two of small beads, and think themselves mighty well paid.

I found them so plentiful and so easy to come at, that in short I sent fifty of them alive tied neck and heels, in one of the shallops back to our ships, and ordered them to send their long boats over for more; for though it was so little a way over, we did not find they had any of them on that side the river.

We did the Indians another piece of service, for if they gave us meat we taught them to be cooks; for we showed them how to roast it upon a stick or spit before the fire, whereas they eat all their meat before either stewed in earthen pots over the fire, with herbs, such as we did not understand, or thrown on the coals of green wood into the fire; which, by the way, always made it stink of the smoke most intolerably.

We had a great deal of opportunity now to converse with the people on both sides of the river, and we found them to be not only different nations, but of a differing speech and differing customs. These on the south sides where I now was, seemed to be the best furnished with provisions, and to live in the greatest plenty; but those on the north side appeared better clothed, and a more civilized sort of people; and of the two seemed to have, in their countenances, something the more agreeable.

However, as they were near neighbours, for the river only parted them, they were not very much unlike neither. That which seemed most strange to me was, that we found that they had little knowledge or communication one with another. They had indeed some boats in the river, but they were but small, and rather served to just waft them over, or to fish in them, than for any carriage, for we found none that could carry above four men, and these very oddly made; partly as a canoe, by hollowing a tree, and partly by skins of beasts, dried and stuck on so as they made waste clothes to the other, yet they would paddle along at a great rate with them.

For want of understanding their language, I could come at no knowledge of their religion or worship; nor I did see any idols among them, or any worshipping of the sun or moon. But yet, as a confirmation that all nations, however barbarous, have some notion of a God, and some awe of a superior power; so I observed here, that being making a bargain with one of the principal men, such I perceived him to be by the respect the rest showed him; I say, being making a bargain with him as well as could be done between people that understood not one word of what either of us said, he had made signs to bring me twelve sheep the next morning for some things that I was to deliver him of mine. I am sure the goods were not all of them of value sufficient to give me the least distrust, but when I gave him the goods without the sheep, being as I said to trust him till the next day, he called two men to him, and pointing to the goods that I had put into his hands, he tells upon his fingers twelve, letting them know (as I suppose) that he was to give me twelve sheep the next day, so far it seems they were to be witnesses of the agreement. Then he places his two hands one upon each breast, turned very accurately with the fingers towards the face, and holding them there, he looks towards heaven, with his face turned upward and with the most gravity, seriousness, and solemnity in his countenance that ever I saw in any man's face in my life. When he had continued in this posture about a quarter of a minute, he takes the two men and puts them just in the same posture; and then points to me and then to himself, by which I understood, first, that he solemnly swore to me that he would bring the sheep punctually and faithfully to me, and then he brought the two men to be bail or security for the performance; that is to say, to oblige themselves to perform it if he did not.

Doubtless, those people who have any notion of a God, must represent Him to themselves as something superior, and something that sees and hears and knows what they say or do. Whether these people meant the sun or the moon, or the stars, or what else I do not determine for them, but it is visible they understood it to be something to swear by,—something that could bear witness of their engagement, and that being called to witness of it, could resent the breach of promise. As to those whose gods are monsters, and hideous shapes, frightful images and terrible figures, the motive of their adoration being that of mere terror, they have certainly gross ideas. But these people seem to act upon a more solid foundation, paying their reverence in manner much more rational, and to something which it was much more reasonable to worship; this appeared in the solemnity of their countenances, and their behaviour in making a solemn promise.

We found those people clothed, generally speaking, over their whole bodies, their heads, arms, legs, and feet excepted, but not so agreeably as those we mentioned above; and we found that the clothing of these were generally the skins of beasts, but very artfully put together, so that though they had neither needle or thread, yet they had the same plant as I mentioned before, the stalk of which would so strongly tie like a thread, that they peeled it off thicker or finer as they had occasion, and made use of it in abundance of ways, to tie, and twist, and make their clothes with it, as well for their occasion as if it had been woven in a loom.

We found several of these people had little bits of gold about them; but when we made signs to them to know where they got it and where it might be had, they made signs again, pointing to the country on the north side of the river, so that we had, it seems, chopped upon the right gold coast in our first coming. They pointed indeed, likewise, to some very high mountains which we saw at a great distance S. W., so that it seems as if there was gold found that way also, but it seems the people here had not much for their share.

The men here had bows and arrows, and they used them so dexterously that a wild goose flying over our heads, one of the Indians shot it quite through with an arrow. One of our men was so provoked to see them, as it were, outdo him, that some time after seeing a couple of ducks flying fair for a mark, he presented his piece and shot them both flying.

I was very angry when I heard the gun; had I been there he had never got leave to shoot. However, when it was done, I was pleased well enough to see the effect it had upon these poor innocent well-meaning people: at first it frightened them to the last degree, and I may well say it frightened them out of their wits, for they that were near it started so violently that they fell down and lay speechless for some time; those that were farther off ran away as if it had been some new kind of lightning and thunder, and came out of the earth instead of out of the clouds; but when they saw the two creatures fall down dead out of the air, and could see nothing that flew up to them to kill them, they were perfectly astonished, and laid their two hands on their breasts and looked up to heaven as if they were saying their prayers in the most solemn manner imaginable. However, this accident gave them terrible ideas of us, and I was afraid at first they would run all away from us for fear; I therefore used them after it with all the kindness and tenderness imaginable, gave them every day one trifle or other, which, though of no value to me, they were exceedingly fond of, and as we asked nothing of them but provisions, of which they had great plenty, and gave us enough every day to satisfy us. As for drink, they had none of the milky liquor which we had on the other part of the country, but they had a root which they steeped in their water and made it drink hot, as if pepper had been in it, which made it so strong, that though it would not make our men drunk, it was worse, for it made them mad.

I was so pleased with these people that I came over to them every other day, and some of our men lay on shore under a sail pitched for a tent, and they were so safe that at last they kept no watch, for the poor people neither thought any harm or did any, and we never gave them the least occasion to apprehend anything from us, at least not till our man fired the gun, and that only let them know we were able to hurt them, not giving them the least suspicion that we intended it: on the contrary, one of our men played an odd prank with them, and fully satisfied them that we would do them no harm: this man having seen one of their children, a little laughing speechless creature of about two years old, the mother having gone from it a little way on some particular occasion, the fellow took it and led it home to the tent, and kept it there all night. The next morning he dressed it up with beads and jewels wondrous fine, a necklace about its neck, and bracelets of beads about its wrist, and several strings of beads wrapped up and tied in its hair, having fed it and laid it to sleep, and made much of it all night. In this figure he carried it up in his arms to the Indian huts or houses, where he had found it, and where there had been, it seems, a great outcry for the child all the night, the mother crying and raising her neighbours, and in a most strange concern.

But when some of the women, her neighbours, saw the child brought back, there was a contrary extreme of joy, and the mother of it being, I suppose, fetched, she fell a jumping and dancing to see her child, but also making so many odd gestures, as our men could not well tell for awhile whether she was pleased or not. The reason, it seems, was, she did not know whether to hope or fear, for she did not know whether the man would give back her child or take it away again. But when the man who had the child in his arms, had been told by signs that this was the mother, he beckoned to have her come to him, and she came, but trembling for fear. Then he took the child, and kissing it two or three times he gave it into her arms. But it is impossible to express by words the agony the poor woman was in; she took the child, and holding it in her arms, fixed her eyes upon it without motion, or as it were without life, for a good while, then she took it and embraced it in the most passionate manner imaginable. When this was over, she fell a crying so vehemently till she sobbed, and all this while spoke not one word. When the crying had given sufficient vent to her passion, then she fell a dancing, and making a strange odd noise that we cannot describe; and, at last, she leaves the child and comes back to the place where our men were, and to the man that brought her the child, and as soon as she came up to him she fell flat on the ground, as I have described above, the queen and her women did, and up again immediately, and thus she did three times, which it seems was her acknowledgment to him for bringing it back.

The next day, for her gratitude did not end here, she came down to our tent, and brought with her two sheep, with a great back-burthen of roots, of the kind which I said they steeped in the water; and several fruits of the country, as much as two men, who came with her, could carry; and these she gave all to the man that had brought back her child. Our men were so moved at the affectionate carriage of this poor woman to her child, that they told me it brought tears out of their eyes.

They took her present, but the man that received it took the woman and dressed her up as almost as he had done the child, and she went home like a kind of a queen among them.

We observed, while we stayed here, that this was a most incomparable soil, that the earth was a fat loomy mould, that the herbage was strong, that the grass, in some places, was very rank and good, being as high as our mid-thigh; and that the air was neither very hot, nor, as we believe, very cold; we made an experiment of the fruitfulness of the soil, for we took some white peas, and digging the ground up with a spade, we sowed some, and before we went away we saw them come out of the ground again, which was in about nine days.

We made signs to the people that they should let them grow, and that if they gathered them, they were good to eat. We also sowed some English wheat, and let them know, as well as we could, what the use of them both was. But I make no doubt but they have been better acquainted with them both by this time, by an occasion which followed.

Our men were so fond of this place, and so pleased with the temper of the people, the fruitfulness of the soil, and agreeableness of the climate, that about twenty of them offered me, if I would give them my word to come again, or send to them to relieve and supply them with necessaries, they would go on shore and begin a colony, and live all their days there. Nay, after this, their number came up to three-and-thirty: or they offered, that if I would give them the sloop, and leave with them a quantity of goods, especially such toys as they knew would oblige the people to use them well, they would stay at all hazards, not doubting, as they told me, but they should come to England again at last, with the sloop full of gold.

I was not very willing to encourage either of these proposals; because, as I told them, I might perhaps find a place as fit to settle a colony in before we came home, which was not at such an excessive distance from England, so that it was scarce possible ever to relieve them. This satisfied them pretty well, and they were content to give over the project; and yet, at last, which was more preposterous than all the rest, five of our men and a boy ran away from us, and went on shore, and what sort of life they led, or how they manage, we are scarce ever likely to know, for they are too far off us to inquire after them again. They took a small yaul with them, and, it seems, had furnished themselves privately with some necessary things, especially tools, a grindstone, a barrel of powder, some peas, some wheat, and some barley; so that, it seems they are resolved to plant there. I confess I pitied them, and when I had searched for them, and could not find them, I caused a letter to be written to them, and fixed it up upon a post, at the place where our ship careened, and another on the south side, to tell them, that in such a certain place I had left other necessaries for them, which I did, made up in a large case of boards, or planks, and covered with boards, like a shed.

Here I left them hammocks for lodging, all sorts of tools for building them a house, spades, shovels, pickaxes, an axe, two saws, with clothes, shoes, stockings, hats, shirts, and, in a word, everything that I could think of for their use, and a large box of toys, beads, &c., to oblige the trade with the natives.

One of our men, whom they had made privy to their design, but made him promise not to reveal it till they were gone, had told them that he would persuade me, if he could, to leave them a further supply, and bid them come to the place, after the ships were gone, and that they should find directions left for them on a piece of a board, or a letter from him, set up upon a post. Thus they were well furnished with all things for immediate living.

I make no doubt but they came to find these things; and since they had a mind to make trial of a wild retired life, they might shift very well; nor would they want anything but Englishwomen to raise a new nation of English people, in a part of the world that belongs neither to Europe, Asia, Africa, or America. I also left them every man another gun, a cutlass, and a horn for powder, and I left two barrels of fine powder, and two pigs of lead for shot, in another chest by itself.

I doubt not but the natives will bestow wives upon them, but what sort of a posterity they will make I cannot foresee. For I do not find by enquiry that the fellows had any great store of knowledge or religion in them, being all Madagascar men, as we called them,—that is to say, pirates and rogues; so that for aught I know, there may be a generation of English heathens in an age or two more, though I left them five Bibles, and six or seven Prayer-books, and good books of several sorts, that they might not want instruction, if they thought fit to make use of it for themselves or their progeny.

It is true this is a country that is most remote from us of any in the yet discovered world, and consequently it would be suggested as unprofitable to our commerce; but I have something to allege in its defence which will prove it to be infinitely more advantageous to England than any of our East India trade can be, or that can be pretended for it: the reason is plain in a few words; our East India trade is all carried on, or most of it, by an exportation of bullion in specie, and a return of foreign manufactures or produce, and most of these manufactures, also, either trifling and unnecessary in themselves, or such as are injurious to our own manufactures. The solid goods brought from India, which may be said to be necessary to us, and worth sending our money for, are but few; for example:—

I. The returns which I reckon trifling and unnecessary are such as china ware, coffee, tea, japan works, pictures, fans, screens, &c.

II. The returns that are injurious to our manufactures, or growth of our own country are printed calicoes, chintz, wrought silks, stuffs of herba and barks, block-tin, cotton, arrack, copper, indigo.

III. The necessary or useful things are pepper, saltpetre, dying-woods and dying-earths, drugs, lacs, such as shellac, stick-lac, &c., diamonds, and some pearl, and raw silk.

For all these we carry nothing or very little but money, the innumerable nations of the Indies, China, &c., despising our manufactures, and filling us with their own.

On the contrary, the people in the southern unknown countries, being first of all very numerous, and living in a temperate climate, which requires clothing, and having no manufactures, or materials for manufactures of their own, would consequently take off a very great quantity of English woollen manufactures, especially when civilized by our dwelling among them, and taught the manner of clothing themselves for their ease and convenience; and in return for these manufactures, it is evident we should have gold in specie, and perhaps spices, the best merchandise and return in the world.

I need say no more to excite adventurous heads to search out a country by which such an improvement might be made, and which would be such an increase of, or addition to, the wealth and commerce of our country.

Nor can it be objected here that this nook of the country may not easily be found by any one but us that have been there before, and perhaps not by us again exactly; for not to enter into our journal of observations for their direction, I lay it down as a foundation, that whosoever, sailing over the South Seas, keeps a stated distance from the tropic to the latitude of fifty-six to sixty degrees, and steers eastward, towards the straits of Magellan, shall never fail to discover new worlds, new nations, and new inexhaustible funds of wealth and commerce, such as never were yet known to the merchants of Europe.

This is the true ocean called the South Sea; that part that we corruptly call so, can be so in no geographical account, or by any rule, but by the mere imposition of custom, it being only originally called so, because they that sailed to it were obliged to go round the southernmost part of America to come into it; whereas it ought indeed to be called the West Sea, as it lies on the west side of America, and washes the western shore of that great continent for near eight thousand miles in length, to wit, from fifty-six degrees south of the line, to seventy degrees north, and how much farther we know not. On this account I think it ought to be called the American Ocean, rather than with such impropriety the South Sea.

But this part of the world where we were may rightly be called the South Sea, by way of distinction, as it extends from India round the globe to India again, and lies all south of the line (even for aught we know) to the very South Pole, and which, except some interposition of land, whether islands or continent, really surrounds the South Pole.

We were now in the very centre or middle of the South Sea, being, as I have said, in the latitude of thirty-four degrees twenty minutes; but having had such good success in our inquiry or search after new continents, I resolved to steer to the S. and S. E., as far as till we should be interrupted by land or ice, determining to search this unknown part of the globe as far as nature would permit, that I might be able to give some account to my employers, and some light to other people that might come that way, whether by accident or by design.

We had spent six-and-twenty days in this place, as well in repairing our brigantine and careening and trimming our ship, that we had not been so long but that we did not resolve to careen our ships, till we had spent ten days about the brigantine, and then we found more work to do to the sheathing of the Madagascar ship than we expected.

We stored ourselves here with fresh provisions and water, but got nothing that we could call a store, except the flesh of about thirty deer, which we dried in the sun, and which eat indifferently well afterwards, but not extraordinary.

We sailed again the six-and-twentieth day after we came in, having a fair wind at N. and N. N. W., and a fresh gale, which held us five days without intermission, in which time, running away S. and

S. S. E., we reached the former latitude, where we had been; and meeting with nothing remarkable, we steered a little farther to the eastward, but keeping a southerly course still, till we came into the latitude of forty-one; and then going due east, with the wind at N. and by W., we reckoned our meridian distance from the Ladrões to be fifty degrees and a half.

In all this run we saw no land, so we hauled two points more southerly, and went on for six or seven days more, when one of our men on the round top cried "land!" It was a clear fine morning, and the land he spied being very high, it was found to be sixteen leagues distance, and the wind slacking, we could not get in that night, so we lay by till morning, when being fair with the land, we hoisted our boat to go and sound the shore, as usual. They rowed in close with the shore, and found a little cove, where there was good riding, but very deep water, being no less than sixty fathom, within cable's length of the shore.

We went in, however, and after we were moored, sent our boat on shore to look for water, and what else the country afforded. Our men found water, and a good sort of country, but saw no inhabitants, and upon coasting a little both ways on the shore, they found it to be an island, and without people; but found that about three leagues off, to the southward, there seemed to be a terra firma, or continent of land, where it was more likely we should make some discovery.

The next day we filled water again, and shot some ducks, and the day after weighed, and stood over for the main, as we thought it to be; here, using the same caution as we always had done, viz., of sounding the coast, we found a bold shore, and very good anchor-hold in six-and-twenty to thirty fathom water.

When we came on shore here we found people, but of quite a different condition from those we had met with before, being wild, furious, and untractable; surprised at the sight of us, but not frightened; preparing for battle, not for trade; and no sooner were we on shore but they saluted us with their bows and arrows. We made signals of truce to them, but they did not understand us, and we knew not what to offer them more but the muzzle of our muskets, for we were resolved to see what sort of folks they were, either by fair means or foul.

The first time therefore that they shot at our men with their bows and arrows we returned the salute with our musquet ball, and killed two of their best archers: we could easily perceive that the noise of our pieces terrified them; and the two men being killed, they knew not how, or with what, perfectly astonished them, so that they ran as it were clean out of the country, that is to say, clean out of our reach; for we could never set our eyes upon any of them after it. We coasted this place also according to our usual customs, and to our great surprise found it was an island too, though a large one, and that the main land lay still more to the southward, about six leagues distance; so were resolved to look out farther, and accordingly set sail the next day and anchored under the shore of this last land, which we were persuaded was really the main.

We went on shore here peaceably, for we neither saw any people nor the appearance of any, but a charming pleasant valley, of about ten or eleven miles long and five or six miles broad; and then it was surrounded with mountains which reached the full length, running parallel with the valley, and closing it into the sea at both ends, so that it was a natural park, having the sea on the north side, and the mountains in a semicircle round all the rest of it. These hills were so high, and the ways so untrod and so steep, that our men, who were curious enough to have climbed to the top of them, could find no way that was practicable to get up, and so after two or three attempts gave it over.

In this vale we found abundance of deer, and abundance of the same kind of sheep which I mentioned lately. We killed as many of both as we had occasion for; and finding nothing here worth our staying any longer for, except that we saw something like wild rice growing here, we weighed after three days, and stood away still to the south.

We had not sailed above two days with little wind and an easy sail, but we perceived this also was an island, though it must be a large one; for by our own account we sailed near a hundred and fifty miles along the shore of it, and we found the south part a flat pleasant country enough, and our men said they saw people upon it on the south side, but we went not on shore there any more.

Steering due south from hence in quest of the main land we went on eleven days more, and saw nothing significant; and upon a fair observation, I found we were in the latitude of seven and forty degrees and eight minutes south; then I altered my course a little to the eastward, finding no land and the weather very cold, and going on with a fresh gale at S.S.W. for four days, we made land again; but it was now to the E.N.E., so that we were gotten as we may say beyond it.

We fell in with this land in the evening, so that it was not perceived till we were within half a league of it, which very much alarmed us; the land being low, and having found our error, we brought to and stood off and on till morning, when we saw the shore lie as it were under our larboard-bow, within a mile and a quarter distance; the land low, but the sea deep, and soft ground. We came to an anchor immediately, and sent our shallops to sound the shore, who found very good riding in a little bay under the shelter of two points of land, one of which made a kind of nook, under which we lay secure from all winds that could blow, in seventeen fathom good ground. Here we had a good observation, and found ourselves in the latitude of fifty degrees twenty-one minutes. Our next work was to find water, and our boats going ashore found plenty of good water and some cattle, but told us they could give no account what they were or what they were like. In searching this coast we soon found this was an island also, about eleven leagues in length from N.W. to S.E., what breadth we could not tell. Our men also saw some signs of inhabitants; the next day six men appeared at a distance, but would take notice of no signals, and fled as soon as our men advanced. Our people went up to the place where they lay and found they had had a fire of some dry wood; that they had lain there as they supposed all night, though without covering; they found two pieces of old ragged skins of deer, which looked as if worn out by some that had used them for clothing; one piece of a skin of some other creature which had been rolled up into a cap for the head, and a couple of arrows of about four feet long, very thick, and made of a hard and heavy wood; so they must have very large and strong bows to shoot such arrows, and consequently must be men of an uncommon strength.

Our men wandered about the country here three or four days, with less caution than the nature of the thing required; for they were not among a people of an innocent, inoffensive temper here as before, but among a wild and untractable nation, that perhaps had never seen creatures in their own likeness before, and had no thoughts of themselves but of being killed and destroyed, and consequently had no thoughts of them they had seen but as of enemies, whom they must either destroy if they were able, or escape from them if they were not. However, we got no harm; neither would the natives ever appear to accept any kindnesses from us.

We had no business here after we found what sort of people they were who inhabited this place. So soon as we had taken in fresh water and caught some fish, of which we found good store in the harbour or bay where we rode, we prepared to be gone. Here we found the first oysters that we saw anywhere in the South Seas, and as our men found them but the day before we were to sail, they made great entreaty to me to let them stay one day to get a quantity on board; they being very refreshing as well as nourishing to our men.

But I was more easily prevailed with to stay, when Captain Merlotte brought me out of one oyster that he happened to open a true oriental pearl, so large and so fine, that I sold it since my return for three and fifty pounds.

After taking this oyster I ordered all our boats out a dredging, and in two days' time so great a quantity there was, that our men had taken above fifty bushels, most of them very large. But we were surprised you may be sure, when, at the opening all these oysters, we found not one pearl, small nor great, of any kind whatever; so we concluded that the other was a lucky hit only, and that perhaps there might not be any more of that kind in these seas.

While we were musing on the oddness of this accident, the boatswain of the Madagascar ship, whose boat's crew had brought in the great oyster in which the pearl was found, and who had been examining the matter, came and told me that it was true that their boat had brought in the oyster, and that it was before they went out a dredging in the offing; but that their boat took these oysters on the west side of the island, where they had been shoring as they call it, that is to say, coasting along the shore, to see if they could find anything worth their labour; but that afterwards the boats went a dredging in the mouth of the bay where we rode, and where finding good store of oysters they had gone no farther

Upon this intelligence we ordered all hands to dredging again on the west side of the island. this was in a narrow channel, between this island and a little cluster of islands, which we found together extended west; the channel where our men fished might be about a league over, something better, and the water about five or seven fathom deep.

They came home well tired and ill pleased, having taken nothing near so many oysters as before. But I was much better pleased, when in opening them, we found a hundred and fifty eight pearls, of the most perfect colour, and of extraordinary shape and size; besides double the number of a less size, and irregular shape.

This quickened our diligence and encouraged our men, for I promised the men two pieces of eight to each man above his pay, if I got any considerable quantity of pearl. Upon this they spread themselves among the islands and fished for a whole week, and I got such a quantity of pearl as made it very well worth our while; and besides that, I had reason to believe, the men, at least the officers, who went with them, concealed a considerable quantity among themselves; which, however, I did not think fit to inquire very strictly after at that time.

Had we been nearer home, and not at so very great an expense as three ships, and so many men at victuals and wages, or had we been where we might have left one of our vessels to fish and have come to them again, we would not have given it over while there had been an oyster left in the sea; or at least, that we could come at. But as things stood, I resolved to give it over and put to sea.

But when I was just giving orders, Captain Merlotte came to me and told me, that all the officers in the three ships had joined together to make an humble petition to me; which was, that I would give them one day to fish for themselves; that the men had promised, that if I would consent, they would work for them gratis, and they promised, if they gained anything considerable, they would account for as much out of their wages, as should defray the ships' expense, victuals, and wages, for the day.

This was so small a request that I readily consented to it, and told them I would give them three days, provided they were willing to give the men a largess as I had done, in proportion to their gain. This they agreed to, and to work they went; but whether it was that the fellows worked with a better will, or that the officers gave them more liquor, or that they found a new bank of oysters, which had not been found out before, but so it was, that the officers got as many pearls, and some of extraordinary size and beauty, as they afterwards sold when they came to Peru for 3,217 pieces of eight.

When they had done this, I told them it was but meet that as they had made so good a purchase for themselves by the labour of the men, the men should have the consideration which I had proposed to them; but now I would make another condition with them, that we should stay three days more, and whatever was caught in these three days should be shared among the men at the first port we came at, where they could be sold; that the men who had now been out so long might have something to buy clothes and liquors without anticipating their wages; but then I made a condition with the men too; viz. that whatever was taken they should deposit it in my hands, and with the joint trust of three men of their own choosing, one out of each ship, and that we would sell the pearl, and I should divide the money among them equally, that so there might be no quarrelling or discontent, and that none of them should play any part of it away. These engagements they all came willingly into, and away they went a dredging, relieving one another punctually, so that in the whole three days every man worked an equal share of hours with the rest.

But the poor men had not so good luck for themselves, as they had for their officers. However they got a considerable quantity, and some very fine ones; among the rest they had two, in the exact shape of a pear, and very exactly matched, and these they would needs make me a present of, because I had been so kind to them to make the proposal for them. I would have paid for them two hundred pieces of eight, but one and all they would not be paid, and would certainly have been much affronted if I had not accepted of them; and yet the success of the men was not so small, but joined with the two pieces of eight a man which I allowed them on the ship's account, and the like allowance the officers made them, and the produce of their own purchase they divided afterwards, about fifteen pieces of eight a man, which was a great encouragement to them.

Thus we spent in the whole near three weeks here and called these the Pearl Islands, though we had given no names to any places before. We were the more surprised with this unexpected booty, because we all thought it very unusual to find pearl of so excellent a kind in such a latitude as that of forty-nine to fifty; but it seems there are riches yet unknown in those parts of the world, where they have never been yet expected; and I have been told by those who pretend to give a reason for it, that if there was any land directly under the poles, either south or north, there would be found gold of a fineness more than double to any that was ever yet found in the world; and this is the reason they say why the magnetic influence directs to the poles, that being the centre of the most pure metals; and why the needle, touched with the loadstone or magnet, always points to the north or south pole; but I do not recommend this as a certainty, because it is evident no demonstration could ever be arrived to, nor could any creature reach to that particular spot of land under the pole, if such there should be, these lands being surrounded with mountains of snow and frozen seas, which never thaw, and are utterly unpassable, either for ships or men.

But to return to our voyage, having thus spent, as I have said, three weeks on this unexpected expedition, we set sail; and as I was almost satisfied with the discoveries we had made, I was for bending my course due east, and so directly for the south part of America; but the wind now blowing fresh from the north-west, and good weather, I took the occasion, as a favourable summons, to keep still on southing as well as east, till we came into the latitude of 66, when our men, who had been all along a warm-weather voyage, began to be pinched very much with the cold, and particularly complained that they had not clothes sufficient for it. But they were brought to be content by force, for the wind continuing at N. and N.N.W. and blowing very hard, we were obliged to keep on our course farther south, indeed, than I ever intended, and one of our men swore we should be driven to the South Pole; indeed, we rather ran afore it than kept our course, and in this run we suffered the extremest cold, though a northerly wind in those latitudes is the warm wind, as the southerly is here, but it was attended with rain and snow, and both freezing violently. At length one of the men cried out "land," and our men began to rejoice; but I was quite of a different opinion, and my fears were but too just, for as soon as ever he cried land, and that I asked him in what quarter and he answered due south, which was almost right a-head, I bid wear the ship and put her about immediately, not doubting but instead of finding land I should find it a mountain of ice, and so it was; and it was happy for us that we had a stout ship under us, for it blew a fret of wind. However, the ship came very well about, though, when she filled again, we found the ice not half a league distance under our stern. As I happened to be the headmost ship, I fired two guns to give notice to our other vessels, for that was our signal to put about; but that which was very uneasy to me, the weather was hazy and they were both out of sight, which was the first time that we lost sight of one another in those seas. However, being both to windward and within hearing of my guns, they took warning, and came about with more leisure and less hazard than I had done.

I stood away now to the eastward, firing guns continually, that they might know which way to follow, and they answered me duly, to let me know that they heard me.

It was our great good-hap, also, that it was day when we escaped this danger. In the afternoon the wind abated and the weather cleared up; we then called a council, and resolved to go no farther south, being then in the latitude of 67 S., which I suppose is the farthest southern latitude that any European ship ever saw in those seas.

That night it froze extremely hard, and the wind veering to the S. W., it was the severest cold that ever I felt in my life. A barrel or cask of water, which stood on the deck, froze entirely in one night into one lump, and our cooper knocking off the hoops from the cask, took it to pieces, and the barrel of ice stood by itself in the true shape of the vessel it had been in. This wind was, however, favourable to our deliverance, for we stood away now N. E. and N. E. by N., making fresh way with a fair wind. We made no more land till we came into the latitude of 62, when we saw some islands at a great distance, on both sides of us; we believed them to be islands because we saw many of them with large openings between. But we were all so willing to get into a warmer climate that we did not incline to put in anywhere, till having run thus fifteen days, and the wind still holding southerly with small alteration and clear weather, we could easily perceive the climate altered, and the weather grew milder; and here taking an observation, I found myself in the latitude of fifty and a-half, and that our meridian distance from the Ladrões West was eighty-seven degrees, being almost one semi-diameter of the globe, so that I could not be far from the coast of America, which was my next design, and indeed the chief design of the whole voyage.

On this expectation I changed my course a little and went away N. by E., till by an observation, I found myself in forty-seven degrees seven minutes, and then standing away east for about eleven days more, we made the tops of the Andes, the great mountains of Chili, in South America, to our great joy and satisfaction, though at a very great distance.

We found our distance from the shore not less than twenty leagues, the mountains being so very high; and our next business was to consider what part of the Andes it must be, and to what port we should direct ourselves first. Upon the whole, we found we were too much to the south still, and resolved to make directly for the river or port of Valdivia or Baldivia, call it which you please, in the latitude of forty degrees, so we stood away to the north. The next day this Pacific, Quiet Sea, as they called it, showed us a very frowning rough countenance, and proved the very extreme of a contrary disposition, for it blew a storm of wind at E. by S., and drove us off the coast again; but it abated again for a day or two, and then for six days together it blew excessive hard, almost all at E., so that I found no possibility of getting into the shore; and, besides, I found that the winds came off that mountainous country in squalls, and that the nearer we came to the hills the gusts were more violent; so I resolved to run for the island of Juan Fernandes, to refresh ourselves there until the weather was settled; and, besides, we wanted fresh water very much.

The little that the wind stood southerly helped me in this run, and we came in five days more fair with the island, to our great joy, and brought all our ships to an anchor as near the watering place as is usual, where we rode easy though the wind continued to blow very hard; and being, I say, now about the middle of our voyage, I shall break off my account here as of the first part of my work, and begin again at our departure from hence.

It is true we had got over much the greater run, as to length of way, but the most important part of our voyage was yet to come, and we had no inconsiderable length to run neither; for as we purposed to sail north the height of Panama, in the latitude of nine degrees north, and back again by Cape Horn, in the latitude, perhaps, of sixty degrees south, and that we were now in forty degrees south; those three added to the run from Cape Horn home to England, made a prodigious length, as you will see by the following account, in which also the meridian distances are not at all reckoned, though those also are very great.

N.B. Only you must deduct from this account the distance from Lima to Panama, because we did not go up to Panama, as we intended to do.

By this account we had almost thirty degrees to run more than a diameter of the globe, besides our distance west, where we then were, from the meridian of England, whither we were to go; which, if exactly calculated, is above seventy degrees, take it from the island of Juan Fernandes. But to return a little to our stay in this place, for that belongs to this part of my account, and of which I must make a few short observations.

It was scarce possible to restrain Englishmen after so long beating the sea from going on shore, when they came to such a place of refreshment as this; nor indeed was it reasonable to restrain them, considering how we all might be supposed to stand in need of refreshment, and considering that here was no length of ground for the men to wander in, no liquors to come at to distract them with their excess; and, which was still more, no women to disorder or debauch them. We all knew their chief exercise would be hunting goats for their subsistence, and we knew also, that, however they wanted the benefit of fresh provision, they must work hard to catch it before they could taste the sweets of it. Upon these considerations, I say, our ships being well moored and riding safe, we restrained none of them except a due number to take care of each ship; and those were taken out by lot, and then had their turn also to go on shore some days afterwards, and, in the meantime, had both fresh water and fresh meat sent them immediately, and that in sufficient quantity to their satisfaction. As soon as we were on shore and had looked about us, we began first with getting some fresh water, for we greatly wanted it, then carrying a small cask of arrack on shore, I made a quantity of it be put into a whole butt of water before I let our men drink a drop; so correcting a little the chillness of the water, because I knew they would drink an immoderate quantity and endanger their healths. And the effect answered my care, for those who drank at the spring where they took in the water before I got this butt filled, and before the arrack was put into it, fell into swoonings and faint sweats, having gorged themselves too much with the cool water; and two or three I thought would have died, but our surgeons took such care of them that they recovered.

While this was doing others cut down branches of trees, and built us two large booths, and five or six small, and we made two tents with some old sails; and thus we encamped as if we had been to take up our dwelling, and intended to people the island.

At the same time others of our men began to look out for goats, for you may believe we all longed for a little fresh meat. They were a little too hasty at their work at first; for firing among the first goats they came at, when there were but a few men together, they frightened the creatures, and they ran away into holes, and among the rocks and places where we could not find them, so that for that day they made little of it. However, sending for more firemen, they made a shift to bring in seventeen goats the same day; whereof we sent five on board the ships, and feasted with the rest on shore. But the next day the men went to work in another manner, and with better conduct; for as we had hands enough, and fire-arms enough, that they spread themselves so far, that they as it were surrounded the creatures; and so driving them out of their fastnesses and retreats they had no occasion to shoot, for the goats could not get away from them, and they took them every where with their hands, except some of the old he-goats, which were so surly, that they would stand at bay and rise at them, and would not be taken; and these, as being old also, and as they thought good for nothing, they let go.

In short, so many of our men went on shore, and these divided themselves into so many little parties, and plied their work so hard, and had such good luck, that I told them it looked as if they had made a general massacre of the goats rather than a hunting.

Our men also might be said not to refresh themselves, but to feast themselves here with fresh provisions; for, though we stayed but thirteen days, yet we killed three hundred and seventy goats, and our men who were on board were very merrily employed I assure you, for they might be said to do very little but roast and stew, and broil and fry from morning to night; it was indeed an exceeding supply to them, for they had been extremely fatigued with the last part of their voyage, and had had no fresh provisions for six weeks before.

This made them hunt the goats with the more eagerness; and, indeed, they surrounded them so dexterously, and followed them so nimbly, that, notwithstanding the difficulties of the rocks, yet the goats could hardly ever escape them. Here our men found also very good fish, and some few tortoises, or turtles, as the seamen call them; but they valued them not, when they had such plenty of venison. Also they found some very good herbs in the island, which they boiled with the goat's flesh, and which made their broth very savoury and comfortable, and withal very healing and good against the scurvy, to which in those climates Englishmen are very subject.

We were now come to the month of April, 1715, having spent almost eight months in this trafficking wandering voyage from Manilla hither; and whoever shall follow the same, or a like track, if ever such a thing shall happen, will do well to make a year of it, and may find it very well worth while.

I doubt not but there are many undiscovered parts of land to the west and to the south also of the first shore of which I mentioned that we stayed trafficking for little bits of gold. And though it is true that such a traffick as I have given an account of is very advantageous in itself, and worth while to look for, especially after having had a good market for an outward bound European cargo, according to the pattern of ours at the Philippines, and which, by the way, they need not miss; I say, as this trade for gold would be well worth while, so had we gone the best way, and taken a course more to the south from Manilla, not going away E. to the Ladrones, we should certainly have fallen in with a country from the coast of Guinea, where we might have found plenty of spices as well as of gold.

For why should we not be allowed to suppose that the country on the same continent and in the same latitude should produce the same growth? especially considering them situated, as it may be called, in the neighbourhood of one another.

Had we then proceeded this way, no question but we might have fixed on some place for a settlement, either English or French; whence a correspondence being established with Europe, either by Cape Horn east, or the Cape de Bonne Esperance west, as we had thought fit; they might have found as great a production of the nutmegs and the cloves, as at Banda and Ternate, or have made those productions have been planted there for the future, where no doubt they would grow and thrive as well as they do now in the Moluccas.

But we spun out too much time for the business; and though we might, as above, discover new places, and get very well too, yet we did nothing in comparison of what we might be supposed to do, had we made the discovery more our business.

I cannot doubt also but that when I stood away south it was too late, for had I stood into the latitude of sixty-seven at first as I did afterwards, I have good reason to believe that those islands which we call the Moluccas, and which lie so thick, and for so great an extent, go on yet farther, and it is scarce to be imagined that they break off just with Gilloto.

This I call a mistake in me, namely, that I stood away east from the Philippines to the Ladrones, before I had gone any length to the south.

But to come to the course set down in this work, namely, S. E. and E. from the said Ladrones, the places I have taken notice of, as these do not in my opinion appear to be inconsiderable and of no value; so had we searched farther into them, I doubt not but there are greater things to be discovered, and perhaps a much greater extent of land also. For as I have but just as it were described the shell, having made no search after the kernel, it is more than probable that within the country there might be greater discoveries made, of immense value too; for even as I observed several times, whenever we found any people that had gold, and asked them as well as by signs we could make them understand, they always pointed to the rivers and the mountains which lay farther up the country, and which we never made any discovery of, having little in our view but the getting what little share of gold the poor people had about them; whereas, had we taken a possession of the place, and left a number of men sufficient to support themselves in making a farther search, I cannot doubt but that there must be a great deal of that of which the inactive Indians had gotten but a little.

Nor had we any skilful man among us to view the face of the earth, and see what treasure of choice vegetables might be there. We had indeed six very good surgeons; and one of them, whom we took in among the Madagascar men, was a man of very great reading and judgment, but he acknowledged he had no skill in Botany, having never made it his study.

But to tell the truth, our doctors themselves, so we call the surgeons at sea, were so taken up in the traffic for gold, that they had no leisure to think of anything else. They did indeed pick up some shells, and some strange figured skeletons of fishes, and small beasts, and other things, which they esteemed as rarities; but they never went a simpling, as they call it, or to inquire what the earth brought forth that was rare and not to be found anywhere else.

I think, likewise, it is worth observing, how the people we met with, where, it is probable, no ships, much less European ships, had ever been, and where they had never conversed with enemies, or with nations accustomed to steal and plunder, —I say, the people who lived thus had no fire, no rage in their looks, no jealous fears of strangers doing them harm, and consequently no desire to do harm to others. They had bows and arrows, indeed, but it was rather to kill the deer and fowls, and to provide themselves food, than to offend their enemies, for they had none.

When, therefore, removing from thence, we came to other and different nations, who were ravenous and mischievous, treacherous and fierce, we concluded they had conversed with other nations, either by going to them, or their vessels coming there; and, to confirm me in this opinion, I found these fierce false Indians had canoes and boats, some of one kind, and some of another, by which, perhaps, they conversed with the islands, or other nations near them, and that they also received ships and vessels from other nations, by which they had several occasions to be upon their guard, and learnt the treacherous and cruel part from others, which Nature gave them no ideas of before.

As the natives of these places were tractable and courteous, so they would be made easily subservient and assistant to any European nation that would come to make settlements among them, especially if those European nations used them with humanity and courtesy; for I have made it a general observation concerning the natural dispositions of all the savage nations that ever I met with,—that if they are once but really obliged, they will be always very faithful.

But it is our people, I mean the Europeans, breaking faith with them that first teaches them ingratitude, and inures them to treat their new comers with breach of faith, and with cruelty and barbarity. If you once win them by kindness and doing them good, I mean at first, before they are taught to be rogues by example, they will generally be honest and be kind also, to the uttermost of their power.

But it is to be observed, that it has been the opinion of all the sailors who have navigated those parts of the world, that further south there have been great tracts of undiscovered land; and some have told us that they have seen them, and have called them by such and such names; as particularly the Isles of Solomon, of which, yet, we can hear of nobody that ever went on shore on them, or that could give any account of them, except such as are romantic, and not to be depended upon.

But what has been the reason why we have hitherto had nothing but guesses made at those things, and that all that has been said of such lands has been imperfect? The reason, if I may speak my opinion, has been, because it is such a prodigious run from the coast of America to the islands of the Ladrões; that few people who have performed it never durst venture to go out of the way of the trade winds, lest they should not be able to subsist for want of water and provisions; and this is particularly the case in the voyage from the coast of America only.

Whereas, to go the way which I have pointed out, had we seen a necessity, and that there was no land to be seen south of the tropic, for a supply of provisions and fresh water, it was evident we could have gone back again from one place to another, and have been constantly supplied; and this makes it certain also, that it cannot be reasonably undertaken by a ship going from the east, I mean the coast of America, to the west; but from the west, viz., the Spice Islands to America west, it may be adventured with ease, as you see.

It is true that William Cornelius Van Schouten and Francis Le Mair, who first found the passage into the South Sea by Cape Horn, and not to pass the straits of Magellan,—I say they did keep to the southward of the tropic, and pass, in part, the same way I have given here an account of, as by their journals, which I have by me at this time, is apparent.

And it is as true, also, that they did meet with many islands and unknown shores in those seas, where they got refreshment, especially fresh water. Perhaps some of the places were the same I have described in this voyage; but why they never pursued that discovery, or marked those islands and places they got refreshments at, so that others, in quest of business, might have touched at them, and have received the like benefit, that I can give no account of.

I cannot help being of opinion, let our map-makers place them where they will, that those islands where we so successfully fished for oysters, or rather for pearl, are the same which the ancient Geographers have called Solomon's Islands; and though they are so far south, the riches of them may not be the less, nor are they more out of the way; on the contrary, they lie directly in the track which our navigators would take, if they thought fit either to go or come between Europe and the West Indies, seeing they that come about Cape Horn seldom go less south than the latitude of sixty-three to sixty-four degrees; and these islands, as I have said, lie in the latitude of forty to forty-eight south, and extend themselves near one hundred and sixty leagues in breadth from north to south.

Without doubt, those islands would make a very noble settlement, in order to victual and relieve the European merchants in so long a run as they have to make; and when this trade came to be more frequented, the calling of those ships there would enrich the islands, as the English at St Helena are enriched by the refreshing which the East India ships find that meet there.

But to return to our present situation at St Juan Fernando. The refreshment which our men found here greatly encouraged and revived them, and the broths and stewings which we made of the goats' flesh which we killed there, than which nothing could be wholesomer, restored all our sick men; so that we lost but two men in our whole passage from the East Indies, and had lost but eight men in our whole voyage from England, except I should reckon those five men and a boy to be lost who ran away from us in the country among the Indians, as I have already related.

I should have added, that we careened and cleaned our ships here, and put ourselves into a posture for whatever adventures might happen; for, as I resolved upon a trading voyage upon the coast of Chili and Peru, and a cruising voyage also, as it might happen, so I resolved also to put our ships into a condition for both, as occasion should present.

Our men were nimble, at this work especially, having been so well refreshed and heartened up by their extraordinary supply of fresh meats, and the additions of good broths and soups, which they fed on every day in the island, and with which they were supplied without any manner of limitation all the while they were at work.

This, I say, being their case, they got the Madagascar ship hauled down, and her bottom washed and tallowed, and she was as clean as when she first came off the stocks, in five days' time, and she was rigged and all set to rights, and fit for sailing in two more.

The great ship was not so soon fitted, nor was I in so much haste, for I had a design in my head which I had not yet communicated to anybody, and that was to send the Madagascar ship a-cruising, as soon as she was fitted up. Accordingly, I say, the fifth day she was ready, and I managed it so that the captain of the Madagascar ship, openly before all the men, made the motion, as if it had been his own project, and desired I would let him go and try his fortune, as he called it.

I seemed loth at first, but he added to his importunity that he and all his crew were willing, if they made any purchase, it should be divided among all the crews in shares, according as they were shipped; that if it was the provisions the captain should buy it at half price, for the use of the whole, and the money to be shared.

Well, upon hearing his proposals, which were esteemed very just, and the men all agreeing, I seemed to consent, and so he had my orders and instructions, and leave to be out twelve days on his cruise, and away he went. His ship was an excellent sailer, as has been said, and being now a very clean ship, I thought he might speak with anything, or get away from anything, if he pleased. By the way, I ordered him to put out none but French colours.

He cruised a week without seeing a sail, and stood in quite to the Spanish shore in one place, but that he was wrong in ; the eighth day, giving over all expectations, he stood off again to sea, and the next morning, he spied a sail, which was a large Spanish ship, and which seemed to stand down directly upon him, which a little checked his forwardness ; however, he kept on his course, when the Spaniard seeing him plainer than, it seems, he had done at first, tacked, and crowding all the sail he could carry, stood in for the shore.

The Spaniard was a good sailer, but our ship plainly gained upon her, and in the evening came almost up with her ; when he saw the land, though at a great distance, and he was loth to be seen chasing her from the shore. However, he followed, and night coming on, the Spaniard changed his course, thinking to get away ; but, as the moon was just rising, our men, who resolved to keep her in sight if possible, perceived her, and stretched after her with all the canvas they could lay on.

This chase held till about midnight, when our ship coming up with her, took her, after a little dispute. They pretended at first to have nothing on board but timber, which they were carrying, as they said, to some port, for the building of ships ; but our men had the secret to make the Spaniards confess their treasure, if they had any ; so that after some hard words with the Spanish commander, he confessed he had some money on board, which, on our men's promise of good usage, he afterwards very honestly delivered, and which might amount to about sixteen thousand pieces of eight.

But he had what we were very glad of besides, viz., about two hundred great jars of very good wheat flour, a large quantity of oil, and some casks of sweatmeats, all which was to us very good prize.

But now our difficulty was, what we should do with the ship, and with the Spaniards ; and this was so real a difficulty, that I began often to wish he had not taken her, lest her being let go, she should alarm the country, or if detained, discover us all.

It was not above one day beyond his orders that we had the pleasure of seeing him come into the road with his prize in tow, and the flour and oil was a very good booty to us ; but upon second and better thoughts, we brought the Spaniards to a fair treaty, and which was more difficult, brought all our men to consent to it. The case is this, knowing what I proposed myself to do, namely, to trade all the way up the Spanish coast, and to pass for French ships, I knew the taking this Spanish ship would betray us all, unless I resolved to sink the ship, and murder all the men ; so I came to this resolution, namely, to talk with the Spanish captain, and make terms with him, which I soon made him very glad of.

First I pretended to be very angry with the captain of the Madagascar ship, and to have put him under confinement for having made a prize of his Catholic Majesty's subjects, we being subjects to the king of France, who was in perfect peace with the king of Spain.

Then I told him that I would restore him his ship and all his money, and as to his flour and oil, which the men had fallen greedily upon, having a want of it, I would pay him the full value in money for it all, and for any other loss he had sustained, only that I would oblige him to lie in the road where we were, till we returned from our voyage to Lima, whither we were going to trade, for which lying I also agreed to pay him demurrage for his ship, after the rate of eight hundred pieces of eight per month, and if I returned not in four months, he was to be at his liberty to go.

The captain, who thought himself a prisoner and undone, you may be sure, would embrace this offer ; and so we secured his ship till our return, and there we found him very honestly at an anchor, of which, in its place.

We were now, as I have said, much about the middle of our voyage (at least as I had intended it), and having stored ourselves with everything the place afforded, we got ready to proceed, for we had, as it were, dwelt here near a fortnight.

By this time the weather was good again, and we stood away to the S. E. for the port of Baldivia, as above, and reached to the mouth of the harbour in twelve days' sail.

I was now to change faces again, and Captain Merlotte appeared as captain, all things being transacted in his name, and French captains were put into the brigantine, and into the Madagascar ship also. The first thing the captain did, was to send a civil message to the Spanish governor, to acquaint him, that being come into those seas as friends, under his most Christian Majesty's commission, and with the king of Spain's permission, we desired to be treated as allies, and to be allowed to take water and wood, and to buy such refreshments as we wanted, for which we would pay ready money ; also we carried French colours, but took not the least notice of our intention to trade with them.

We received a very civil answer from the governor, viz., that being the king of France's subjects, and that they were in alliance with us, we were very welcome to wood and water, and any provisions the place would afford ; and that our persons should be safe, and in perfect liberty to go on shore, but that he could not allow any of our men to lie on shore, it being his express orders that he should not permit any nation, not actually in commission from the king of Spain, to come on shore and stay there, no, not one night ; and that this was done to prevent disorders.

We answered, that we were content with that order, seeing we did not desire our men should go on shore to stay there, we not being able to answer for any misbehaviour, which was frequent among seamen.

While we continued here, several Spaniards came on board and visited us, and we often went on shore on the same pretence ; but our supercargo, who understood his business too well not to make use of the occasion, presently let the Spaniards see that he had a large cargo of goods to dispose of. They as freely took the hint, and let him know that they had money enough to pay for whatever they bought. So they fell to work, and they bought East India and China silks, Japan ware, China ware, spice, and something o. everything we had. We knew we should not sell all our cargo here, nor any extraordinary quantity; but we knew, on the other hand, that what we did sell here we should sell for one hundred pounds per cent. extraordinary; I mean, more than we should sell for at Lima, or any other port on that side, and so we did; for here we sold a bottle of arrack for four pieces of eight; a pound of cloves for five pieces of eight, and a pound of nutmegs for six pieces of eight; and the like of other things.

They would gladly have purchased some European goods, and especially English cloth and baize, but as we had, indeed, very few such things left, so we were not willing they should see them, that they might not have any suspicion of our being Englishmen, and English ships, which would soon have put an end to all our commerce.

While we lay here trafficking with the Spaniards, I set some of my men to work, to converse among the native Chilians or Indians, as we call them, of the country, and several things they learned of them according to the instructions which I gave them. For example: first, I understood by them that the country people, who do not live among the Spaniards, have a mortal aversion to them; that it is riveted in their minds by tradition, from father to son, ever since the wars which had formerly been among them, and that though they did not now carry on those wars, yet the animosity remained, the pride and cruel and haughty temper of the Spaniards was such still to those of the country people who came under their government as makes that aversion continually increase. They let us know, that if any nation in the world would but come in and assist them against the Spaniards, and support them in their rising against them, they would soon rid their hands of the whole nation. This was to the purpose exactly, as to what I wanted to know.

I then ordered particular inquiry to be made whether the mountains of Andes (which are indeed prodigious to look at, and so frightful for their height, that it is not to be thought of without some horror) were in any places passable? what country there was beyond them? and whether any of their people had gone over and knew the passage?

The Indians concurred with the Spaniards in this (for our men enquired of both), that though the Andes were to be supposed, indeed, to be the highest mountains in the world, and that, generally speaking, they were impassable, yet that there had been passages found by the vales among the mountains; where, with fetching several compasses and windings, partly on the hills and partly in the valleys, men went with a great deal of ease and safety, quite through or over, call it as we will, to the other called the east side, and as often returned again.

Some of the more knowing Indians or Chilians went further than this, and when our men enquired after the manner, situation, and produce of the country on the other side, they told them that when they passed the mountains from that part of the country, they went chiefly to fetch cattle and kill deer, of which there were great numbers in that part of the land: but that when they went from St Jago, they turned away north some leagues, when they came to a town called St Antonio de los Vejos, or the town of St Anthony and the old men. That there was a great river at that city, from whence they found means to go down to the Rio de la Plata, and so to the Buenos Ayres; and that they frequently carried thither great sums of money in Chilian gold, and brought back European goods from thence.

I had all I wanted now, and bade my men say no more to them of that, only tell them that they would come back, and would travel a little that way to see the country. The people appeared very well pleased with that, assuring them, that if they would do so they should find some, as well Spaniards as Chilians, who would be guides to them through the hills; also assuring them that they would find the hills very practicable, and the people as they went along very ready to assist and furnish them with whatever they found they wanted, especially if they came to know that they were not Spaniards, or that they would protect them from the Spaniards, which would be the most agreeable thing to them in the world; for it seems many of the nations of the Chilians had been driven to live in the hills, and some even beyond them, to avoid the cruelty and tyranny of the Spaniards, especially in the beginning of their planting in that country.

The next inquiry I ordered them to make was, whether it was possible to pass those hills with horses or mules, or any kind of carriages? and they assured them they might travel with mules, and even with horses also, but rather with mules; but as to carriages, such as carts or waggons, they allowed, that was not practicable. They assured us that some of those ways through the hills were much frequented; and that there were towns, or villages rather, of people, to be found in the valleys between the said hills; some of which villages were very large, and the soil very rich and fruitful, bearing sufficient provisions for the inhabitants, who were very numerous. They told us the people were not much inclined to live in towns as the Spaniards do, but that they lived scattered up and down the country as they were guided by the goodness of the land; that they lived very secure and unguarded, never offering any injury to one another, nor fearing injury from any but the Spaniards.

I caused these inquiries to be made with the utmost prudence and caution, so that the Spaniards had not the least suspicion of our design; and thus, having finished our traffic and taken in water and provisions, we sailed from Baldivia, having settled a little correspondence there with two Spaniards, who were very faithful to us, and with two Chilian Indians, whom we had in a particular manner engaged, and who, to make sure of, we took along with us; and having spent about thirteen days here, and taken the value of about six thousand pieces of eight in silver or gold, but most of it in gold, we set sail.

Our next port was the Bay of the Conception. Here, having two or three men on board who were well acquainted with the coast, we ran boldly into the bay, and came to an anchor in the bight or little bay, under the island Quiriquina, and from thence we sent our boat, with French mariners to row and a French coxswain, with a letter to the Spanish Governor from Captain Merlotte. Our pretence was always the same as before: that we had his most Christian Majesty's commission, &c., and that we desired liberty to wood and water and to buy provisions, having been a very long voyage, and the like.

Under those pretences we lay here about ten days, and drove a very considerable trade for such goods as we were sure they wanted; and having taken about the value of eight thousand pieces of eight, we set sail for the port or river that goes up to St Jago, where we expected a very good market, being distant from the Conception about sixty-five leagues.

St Jago is the capital city of Chili, and stands twelve leagues within the land. There are two ports, which are made use of to carry on the traffic of this place, viz., R. de Ropocalmo and Port de Valparaiso. We were bound to the last, as being the only port for ships of burden, and where there is security from bad weather.

We found means here without going up to the city of St Jago to have merchants enough to come down to us; for this being a very rich city, and full of money, we found all our valuable silks of China, our atlas's, China damasks, satins, &c., were very much valued and very much wanted, and no price was too high for us to ask for them; for, in a word, the Spanish ladies, who, for pride, do not come behind any in the world, whatever they do for beauty, were so eager for those fine things, that almost any reasonable quantity might have been sold there; but the truth is, we had an unreasonable quantity, and, therefore, as we had other markets to go to, we did not let them know what a great stock of goods we had, but took care they had something of everything they wanted. We likewise found our spices an excellent commodity in those parts, and sold for a monstrous profit too, as, indeed, everything else did also, as above.

We found it very easy to sell here to the value of one hundred and thirty thousand pieces of eight, in all sorts of China and East India goods, for still, though we had some of the English cargo loose, we let none of it be seen. We took most of the money in gold uncoined, which they get out of the mountains in great quantities, and of which we shall have occasion to speak more hereafter.

Our next trading port was Coquimbo, a small town, but a good port. Here we went in without any ceremony, and upon the same footing of being French, were well received, traded underhand with the Spanish merchants, and got letters to some other merchants at Guasco, a port in a little bay about fifteen leagues north from Coquimbo.

From hence to the port of Copiapo is twenty-five leagues. Here we found a very good port, though no trading town or city, but the country being well inhabited, we found means to acquaint some of the principal Spaniards in the country of what we were, and (with which they were pleased well enough,) that they might trade with us for such things, which it was easy to see they gave double price for to the merchants who came from Lima and other places. This brought them to us with so much eagerness, that though they bought for their own use, not for sale, yet they came furnished with orders, perhaps for two or three families together, and being generally rich, would frequently lay out six hundred or eight hundred pieces of eight a man, so that we had a most excellent market here, and took above thirty thousand pieces of eight; that is to say, the value of it, for they still paid all in gold.

Here we had an opportunity to get a quantity of good flour, or wheat meal, of very good European wheat; that is to say of that sort of wheat, and withal had good biscuit baked on shore; so that now we got a large recruit of bread, and our men began to make puddings, and lived very comfortably; likewise we got good sugar at the Ingenioes or sugar mills, of which there were several here, and the further north we went their number increased, for we were now in the latitude of twenty-eight degrees two minutes south.

We had but one port now of any consequence that we intended to touch at till we came to the main place we aimed at, which was Lima, and this was about two-thirds of the way thither, (I mean Porto Rica, or Arica,) this was in the latitude of eighteen degrees, or thereabouts. They were very shy of us here, as having been much upon their guard for some years past, for fear of buccaneers and English privateers; but when they understood we were French, and our French captain sent two recommendations to them from a merchant at St Jago, they were then very well satisfied, and we had full freedom of commerce here also.

From hence we came to the height of Lima, the capital port if not the capital city of Peru, lying in the latitude of twelve degrees thirty minutes. Had we made the least pretence of trading here, we should at least have had soldiers put on board our ships, to have prevented it, and the people would have been forbidden to trade with us, upon pain of death; but Captain Merlotte having brought letters to a principal merchant of Lima, he instructed him how to manage himself at his first coming into the port, which was to ride without the town of Callao, out of the command of the puntals or castles there, and not to come any nearer upon what occasion soever, and then to leave the rest to him.

Upon this the merchant applied himself to the governor for leave to go on board the French ship at Callao. The governor understood him, and would not grant it by any means. The reason was, because there had been such a general complaint by the merchants from Carthagena, Porto Bello, and other places, of the great trade carried on here with French ships from Europe, to the destruction of the merchants, and to the ruin of the trade of the galleons, that the Governor or Viceroy of Peru had forbidden the French ships landing any goods.

Now, though this made our traffic impracticable at Lima itself, yet it did by no means hinder the merchants trading with us under cover, &c., but especially when they came to understand that we were not laden from Europe, with baize, long ells, druggets, broadcloth, serges, stuffs, stockings, hats, and such like woollen manufactures of France, England, &c., but that our cargo was the same with that of the Manilla ships at Aca-pulco, and that we were laden with calicos, muslins, fine-wrought China silks, damasks, Japan ware, China ware, spices, &c.. there was then no withholding them; but they came on board us in the night with canoes, and staying all day, went on shore again in the night, carrying their goods to different places where they knew they could convey them on shore without difficulty.

In this manner we traded publicly enough, not much unlike the manner of our trade at the Manillas; and here we effectually cleared ourselves of our whole cargo, as well English goods as Indian, to an immense sum. Here our men, officers as well as seamen, sold their fine pearl, particularly one large parcel containing one hundred and seventy-three very fine pearls, but of different sizes, which a priest bought, as we were told, to dress up the image of the blessed Virgin Mary, in one of their churches.

In a word, we came to a balance here, for we sold everything we had the least intention to part with. The chief things we kept in reserve were some bales of English goods, also the remainder of our beads and bugles, toys, iron-work, knives, scissars, hatchets, needles, pins, glass ware, and such things as we knew the Spaniards did not regard, and which might be useful in our further designs, of which my head was still very full. Those, I say, we kept still.

Here, likewise, we sold our brigantine, which, though an excellent sea boat, as may well be supposed considering the long voyage we had made in her; was yet so worm-eaten in her bottom, that unless we had new sheathed her, and perhaps shifted most of her planks too, which would have taken up a great deal of time, she was by no means fit to have gone any further, at least, not so long a run as we had now to make, viz., round the whole southern part of America, and where we should find no port to put in at (I mean where we should have been able to have got anything done for the repair of a ship), till we had come home to England.

It was proposed here to have gone to the Governor or Viceroy of Peru, and have obtained his license or pass to have traversed the isthmus of America, from Port Maria to the river of Darien; this we could easily have obtained under the character that we then bore, viz., of having the King of France's commission, and had we been really all French, I believe I should have done it; but as we were so many Englishmen, and as such were then at open war with Spain, I did not think it a safe adventure, I mean not a rational adventure, especially considering what a considerable treasure we had with us. On the other hand, as we were now a strong body of able seamen, and had two stout ships under us, we had no reason to apprehend either the toil or the danger of a voyage round Cape Horn, after which we should be in a very good condition to make the rest of our voyage to England; whereas, if we travelled over the Isthmus of America, we should be all like a company of freebooters and buccaneers, loose and unshipped, and should perhaps run some one way and some another, among the logwood cutters at the bay of Campeachy, and other places, to get passage, some to Jamaica and some to New England; and, which was worse than all, should be exposed to a thousand dangers on account of the treasure we had with us, perhaps even to that of murdering and robbing one another; and, as Captain Merlotte said, who was really a Frenchman, it was much more eligible for us, as French, or if we had been such, to have gone up to Acapulco, and there to sell our ships, and get license to travel to Mexico, and then to have got the viceroy's assent to have come to Europe in the galleons; but as we were so many Englishmen it was impracticable; our seamen also being Protestants, such as seamen generally are, and bold mad fellows, they would never have carried on a disguise both of their nation and of their religion for so long a time as it would have been necessary to do for such a journey and voyage.

But, besides all these difficulties, I had other projects in my head, which made me against all the proposals of passing by land to the North Sea; otherwise, had I resolved it, I should not have much concerned myself about obtaining a license from the Spaniards; for, as we were a sufficient number of men to have forced our way, we should not much have stood upon their giving us leave or not giving us leave to go.

But, as I have said, my views lay another way, and my head had been long working upon the discourse my men had had with the Spaniards at Baldivia. I frequently talked with the two Chilian Indians which I had on board, who spoke Spanish pretty well, and whom we had taught to speak a little English.

I had taken care that they should have all the good usage imaginable on board. I had given them each a very good suit of clothes, made by our tailor, but after their own manner, with each of them a baize cloak; and had given them hats, shoes, stockings, and everything they desired, and they were mighty well pleased; and I talked very freely with them about the passage of the mountains, for that was now my grand design.

While I was coming up the Chilian shore, as you have heard, that is to say, at St Jago, at the Conception, at Arica, and even at Lima itself, we inquired on all occasions into the situation of the country, the manner of travelling, and what kind of country it was beyond the mountains; and we found them all agreeing in the same story; and that passing the mountains of Les Cordelieras, for they so call them in Peru, though it was the same ridge of hills as we call the Andes, was no strange thing, that there were not one or two, but a great many places found out, where they passed as well with horses and mules as on foot, and even some with carriages; and in particular, they told us at Lima, that from Potosi, and the towns thereabouts, there was a long valley, which ran for one hundred and sixty leagues in length, S. and S.E., and that it continued till, the hills parting, it opened into the main level country on the other side; and that there were several rivers which began in that great valley, and which all of them ran away to the S. and the S.E., and afterwards went away E. and E.N.E., and so fell into the great Rio de la Plata, and emptied themselves into the North Seas; and that merchants travelled to those rivers, and they went down in boats as far as the town or city of the Ascension, and the Buenos Ayres.

This was very satisfying, you may be sure, especially to hear them agree in it, that the Andes were to be passed, (though passing them heareabouts, where I knew the main land from the west shore, where we now were, must be at least one thousand five hundred miles broad,) was no part of my project; but I laid up all these things in my head, and resolved to go away to the south again, and act as I should see cause.

We were now got into a very hot climate, and, whatever was the cause, my men began to grow very sickly, and that to such a degree that I was once afraid that we had got the plague amongst us, but our surgeons, whom we all call doctors at sea, assured me there was nothing of that among them, and yet we buried seventeen men here, and had between twenty and thirty more sick, and, as I thought, dangerously too.

In this extremity (for I was really very much concerned about it), one of my doctors came to me and told me he had been at the city (that is at Lima), to buy some drugs and medicines to recruit his chest, and he had fallen into company with an Irish Jesuit, whom he found was an extraordinary good physician, and that he had had some discourse with him about our sick men, and he believed, for a good word or two, he could persuade him to come and visit them.

I was very loth to consent to it; for, says I to the surgeon, if he is an Irishman, he speaks English, and he will presently perceive that we are all Englishmen, and so we shall be betrayed, all our designs will be blown up at once, and our further measures be all broken; and therefore I would not consent. This I did not speak from the fear of any hurt they could have done me by force, for I had no reason to value that, being able to have fought my way clear out of their seas, if I had been put to it. But, as I had traded all the way by stratagem, and had many considerable views still behind, I was unwilling to be disappointed by the discovery of my schemes, or that the Spaniards should know upon what a double foundation I acted, and how I was a French ally and merchant, or an English enemy and privateer, just as I pleased and as opportunity should offer, in which case they would have been sure to have trepanned me, if possible, under the pretence of the former, and have used me, if they ever should get an advantage over me, as one of the latter.

This made me very cautious, and I had good reason for it too; and yet the sickness and danger of my men pressed me very hard to have the advice of a good physician, if it was possible; and especially to be satisfied whether it was the plague or not, for I was very uneasy about that. But my surgeon told me that as to my apprehension of discovery he would undertake to prevent it by this method:—First, he said, he found that the Irishman did not understand French at all, and so I had nothing to do but to order that when he came on board as little English should be spoken in his hearing as possible; and this was not difficult, for almost all our men had a little French at their tongue's end, by having so many Frenchmen on board of them; others had the Levant jargon, which they call Lingua Frank, so that, if they had but due caution, it could not be suddenly perceived what countrymen they were.

Besides this, the surgeon ordered that as soon as the Padre came on board he should be surrounded with French seamen only, some of which should be ordered to follow him from place to place, and chop in with their nimble tongues upon some occasion or other, so that he should hear French spoken wherever he turned himself.

Upon this, which indeed appeared very easy to be done, I agreed to let the doctor come on board, and accordingly the surgeon brought him the next day, where Captain Merlotte received him in the cabin, and treated him very handsomely, but nothing was spoken but French or Spanish; and the surgeon, who had pretended himself to be an Irishman, acted as interpreter between the doctor and us.

Here we told him the case of our men that were sick: some of them indeed were French, and others that could speak French were instructed to speak to him, as if they could speak no other tongue, and then the surgeon interpreted; others, who were English, were called Irishmen, and two or three were allowed to be English seamen, picked up in the East Indies, as we had seamen, we told him, of all nations.

The matter, in short, was so carried that the good man, for such I really think he was, had no manner of suspicion; and, to do him justice, he was an admirable physician, and did our men a great deal of good: for all of them, but three, recovered under his hands, and those three had recovered, if they had not, like madmen, drank punch when they were almost well, and by their intemperance inflamed their blood, and thereby thrown themselves back again into their fever, and put themselves, as the Padre said of them, out of the reach of medicine.

We treated this man of art with a great deal of respect, made him some very handsome presents, and particularly such as he could not come at in the country where he was: besides which I ordered he should have the value of one hundred dollars in gold given him; but he, on the other hand, thanking Captain Merlotte for his bounty, would have no money, but he accepted a present of some linen, a few handkerchiefs, some nutmegs, and a piece of black baize, most of which, however, he said, he made presents of again in the city among some of his acquaintance.

But he had a further design in his head, which afterwards he communicated in confidence to the surgeon I have mentioned, who conversed with him, and by him to me, and which was to him, indeed, of the highest importance. The case was this:—

He takes our surgeon on shore with him one day from the Madagascar ship, where he had been with him to visit some of our sick men, and, drinking a glass of wine with him, he told him he had a favour to ask of him, and a thing to reveal to him in confidence, which was of the utmost consequence to himself though of no great value to him the (surgeon); and if he would promise the utmost secrecy to him on his faith and honour, he put his life into his hands. "For, signor," says he, "it will be no less, nor would anything less than my life," says he, "pay for it, if you should discover it to any of the people here, or anywhere else on this coast."

The surgeon was a very honest man, and carried indeed the index of it in his face, and the Padre said afterwards he inclined to put this confidence in him, because he said he thought he saw something of an honest man in his very countenance. After so frank a beginning, the surgeon made no scruple to tell him, that seeing he inclined to treat him with such confidence, and to put a trust of so great importance in him, he would give him all the assurance that was in his power, that he would be as faithful to him as it was possible to be to himself; and that the secret should never go out of his mouth to any one in the world, but to such and at such time as he should consent to and direct. In short, he used so many solemn protestations, that the Padre made no scruple to trust him with the secret, which, indeed, was no less than putting his life into his hands. The case was this: he told him he had heard them talk of going to Ireland in their return, and as he had been thirty years out of his own country, in such a remote part of the world, where it was never likely that he should ever see it again; the notion he had entertained that this ship was going thither and might set him on shore there, that he might once more see his native country and his family and friends, had filled his mind with such a surprising joy, that he could no longer contain himself; and that, therefore, if he would procure leave of the captain, that he might come privately on board, and take his passage home, he would willingly pay whatever the captain should desire of him; but that it must be done with the greatest secrecy imaginable, or else he was undone, for that if he should be discovered and stopped, he should be confined in the Jesuit's house there as long as he lived.

The surgeon told him the thing was easy to be done, if he would give him leave to acquaint one man in the ship with it, which was not Captain Merlotte, but a certain Englishman who was a considerable person in the ship, without whom the captain did nothing, and who would be more secure to trust by far than Captain Merlotte. The Padre told him, that without asking him any reasons, since he had put his life into his hands, he would trust him with the management of it, and, therefore, left it entirely to him.

The surgeon accordingly brought him on board to me, and making a confidence of the whole matter to me, I turned to the Padre, and told him in English, giving him my hand, that I would be under all the engagements and promises of secrecy that our surgeon had been in for his security and satisfaction; that he had merited too well of us for us to wish him any ill; and, in short, that the whole ship should be engaged for his security. I told him, that as to his coming on board and bringing anything off that belonged to him, he must take his own measures, and answer to himself for the success; but that after he was on board, we would sink the ship under him or blow her into the air before we would deliver him up on any account whatever.

He was so pleased with my frank way of talking to him, that he told me he would put his life into my hands with the same freedom as he had done before with my surgeon; so we began to concert measures for his coming on board with secrecy.

He told us there was no need of any proposals, for he would acquaint the head of their house, that he intended to go on board the French ship in the road, and to go to St Jago, where he had several times been in the same manner; and that, as they had not the least suspicion of him, he was very well satisfied that they would make no scruple of it.

But his mistake in this might have been his ruin; for though, had it been a Spanish ship, they would not have mistrusted him, yet when he named the French ship in the road of Callao, they began to question him very smartly about it. Upon which he was obliged to tell them, that since they were doubtful of him, he would not go at all, telling them withal, that it was hard to suspect him who had been so faithful to his vows as to reside for near thirty years among them, when he might frequently have made an escape from them if he had been so disposed. So for three or four days he made no appearance of going at all; but having had private notice from me the evening before we sailed, he found means to get out of their hands, came down to Callao on a mule in the night, and our surgeon lying ready with our boat about half a league from the town, as by appointment, he took him on board, with a negro, his servant, and brought him safe to the ship; nor had we received him on board half an hour, but being unmoored and ready to sail, we put out to sea, and carried him clear off.

He made his excuses to me that he was come away naked, according to his profession; that he had purposed to have furnished himself with some provisions for the voyage, but that the unexpected suspicions of the head of the college or house had obliged him to come away in a manner that would not admit of it; for that he might rather be said to have made his escape than to have been come fairly off.

I told him he was very welcome; and indeed so he was, for he had been already more worth to us than ten times his passage came to, and that he should be entered into immediate pay as physician to both the ships, which I was sure none of our surgeons would repine at, but rather be glad of; and accordingly I immediately ordered him a cabin, with a very good apartment adjoining to it, and appointed him to eat in my own mess whenever he pleased or by himself, on particular days, when he thought fit.

And now it was impossible to conceal from him that we were indeed an English ship, and that I was the captain in chief, except as has been said upon occasion of coming to any particular town of Spain. I let him know I had a commission to make prize of the Spaniards, and appear their open enemy, but that I had chosen to treat them as friends in a way of commerce, as he had seen. He admired much the moderation I had used, and how I had avoided enriching myself by the spoil as I might have done; and he made me many compliments upon that head, which I excused hearing, and begged him to forbear. I told him we were christians, and as we had made a very prosperous voyage I was resolved not to do any honest men the least injustice if I could avoid it.

But I must observe here that I did not enter immediately into all this confidence with him neither, nor all at once; neither did I let him into any part of it but under the same solemn engagements of secrecy that he had laid upon us, nor till I was come above eighty leagues south from Lima.

The first thing I took the freedom to speak to him upon was this: finding his habit a little offensive to our rude seamen, I took him into the cabin the very next day after we came to sea, and told him that I was obliged to mention to him what I knew he would soon perceive, namely, that we were all protestants except three or four of the Frenchmen, and I did not know how agreeable that might be to him. He answered that he was not at all offended with that part; that it was none of his business to enquire into any one's opinion any farther than they gave him leave; that if it was his business to cure the souls of men on shore, his business on board was to cure their bodies; and as for the rest, he would exercise no other function than that of a physician on board the ship without my leave.

I told him that was very obliging, but that then, for his own sake, I had a proposal to make to him, which was, whether it would be disagreeable to him to lay aside the habit of a religious and put on that of a gentleman, so to accommodate himself the more easily to the men on board, who, perhaps, might be rude to him in his habit, seamen being not always men of the most manners.

He thanked me very sincerely. He told me he had been in England as well as in Ireland, and that he went dressed there as a gentleman and was ready to do so now if I thought fit, to avoid giving any offence, and added that he chose to do so: but then, smiling, said he was at a great loss, for he had no clothes. I bade him take no care about that for I would furnish him, and immediately we dressed him up like an Englishman, in a suit of very good clothes which belonged to one of our midshipmen that died. I gave him also a good wig and a sword, and he presently appeared upon the quarter-deck like a grave physician and was called doctor.

From that minute, by whose contrivance we knew not, it went current among the seamen that the Spanish doctor was an Englishman and a protestant, and only had put on the other habit to disguise himself and make his escape to us; and this was so universally believed that it held to the last day of the whole voyage, for as soon as I met with it I took care that nobody that had it in their power would ever contradict it; and as for the doctor himself he was very glad of it, and when he first heard of it, said nothing could be more to his advantage, and that he would take care to humour it among the men as far as lay in his power.

However, the doctor took care of one thing, and earnestly desired we would all be mindful of it, viz., that he never offered to go on shore whatever port we came to afterwards, and what he desired of us was, that none of the Spaniards might, by inquiry, hear upon any occasion of his being on board our ship; but above all, that none of our men, the officers especially, would ever come so much in reach of the Spaniards on shore as to put it into their power to seize upon them by reprisal, and so oblige us to deliver him up by exchange.

I went so far with him, and so did Captain Merlotte also, as to assure him, that if any of the Spaniards should by any stratagem or force get any of our men, nay, though it were ourselves, into their hands yet he should upon no condition whatever be delivered up. And, indeed, for this very reason we were very shy of going on shore at all; and as we had really no business any where but just for water and fresh provisions, which we also had taken in a very good store of at Lima, so, for our part, we put in nowhere at all in the coast of Peru, because there we might have been more particularly liable to the importunities of the Spaniards' inquiry; as to force, we were furnished not to be in the least apprehensive of that.

Being thus, I say, resolved to have no more to do with the coast of Peru we stood off to sea, and the first land we made was a little unfrequented island, in the latitude of 17 deg. 13 m., where our men went on shore in the boats three or four times to catch tortoises or turtles, being the first we had met with since we came from the East Indies; and here they took so many and had such a prodigious quantity of eggs out of them, that the whole company of both ships lived on them till within four or five days of our coming to the island of Juan Fernandez, which was our next port. Some of these tortoises were so large and so heavy that no single man could turn them, and sometimes as much as four men could carry to the boats.

We met with some bad weather after this, which blew us off to sea, the wind blowing very hard at the south-east; but it was not so great a wind as to endanger us, though we lost sight of one another more in this storm than we had done in all our voyage. However, we were none of us in any great concern for it now, because we had agreed before, that if we should lose one another, we should make the best of our way to the island of Juan Fernandez; and this we observed now so directly, that all of us shaping our course for the island, as soon as the storm abated, came in sight of one another long before we came thither; which, you may be sure, was very agreeable to us all.

We were, including the time of the storm, two hundred and eighteen days from Lima to the island of Juan Fernandez, having most of the time cross, contrary winds, and more bad weather than is usual in those seas. However, we were all in good condition, both ships and men.

Here we fell to the old trade of hunting of goats. And here our new doctor set some of our men to simpling, that is to say, to gather some physical herbs, which he let them see afterwards were very well worth their while. Our surgeons assisted and saw the plants, but had never observed the same kind in England. They gave me the names of them; and it is the only discovery in all my travels which I have not reserved so carefully as to publish for the advantage of others, and which I regret the omission of very much.

While we were here, an odd accident gave me some uneasiness, which, however, did not come to much. Early in the grey of the morning, little wind, and a smooth sea, a small frigate-built vessel, under Spanish colours, pennant flying, appeared off at sea, at the opening of the N. E. point of the island; as soon as she came fair with the road, she lay by, as if she came to look into the port only, and when she perceived that we began to loose our sails to to speak with her, she stretched away to the northward, and then altering her course, stood away N. E. using oars to assist her, and so got away.

Nothing could be more evident to us, than that she came to look at us, nor could we imagine anything less; from whence we immediately concluded that we were discovered, and that our taking away the doctor had given a great alarm among the Spaniards (as indeed we afterwards came to understand it had done). But we came a little while afterwards to a better understanding about the frigate.

I was so uneasy about it that I resolved to speak with her if possible; so I ordered the Madagascar ship, which, of the two, was rather a better sailer than our own, to stand in directly to the coast of Chili, and then to ply to the northward just in sight of the shore, till he came into the latitude of 22: and if he saw nothing in all that run, then to come down again directly into the latitude of the island of Juan Fernandez, but keeping the distance of ten leagues off farther than before, and to ply off and on in that latitude five days, and then, if he did not meet with me, to stand in for the island.

While he did this, I did the same at the distance of nearly fifty leagues from the shore, being the distance which I thought the frigate kept in as she stood away from me. We made our cruise both of us very punctually, and I found him in the station I agreed on, and we both stood into the road again from whence we came.

We no sooner made the road, but we saw the frigate, as I called her, with another ship, at an anchor in the same road where she had seen us. And it was easy to see that they were both of them in a great surprise and hurry at our appearing, and that they were under sail in so very little time, as that we easily saw they had slipped their cables or cut away their anchors. They fired guns twice, which we found was a signal for their boats, which were on shore, to come on board; and soon after we saw three boats go off to them; though, as we understood afterwards, they were obliged to leave sixteen or seventeen of their men behind them, who, being among the rocks catching of goats, either did not hear the signals, or could not come to their boats time enough.

When we saw them in this hurry we thought it must be something extraordinary, and bore down directly upon them having the weather-guage.

They were ships of pretty good force, and full of men; and when they saw we were resolved to speak with them, and that there was no getting away from us, they made ready to fight us; and putting themselves upon a wind, first stretching a head to get the weather-guage of us, when they thought they were pretty well, boldly tacked, and lay by for us, hoisting the English ancient and union-jack,

We had our French colours out till now; but being just, as we thought, going to engage, I told Captain Merlotte I scorned to hide what nation I was of when I came to fight for the honour of our country; and, besides, as these people had spread English colours, I ought to let them know what I was; that if they were really English and friends, we might not fight by mistake, and shed the innocent blood of our own countrymen; and that if they were rogues, and counterfeited their being English, we should soon perceive it.

However, when they saw us put out English colours, they knew not what to think of it, but lay by a while to see what we would do. I was as much puzzled as they, for as I came nearer, I thought they seemed to be English ships, as well by their bulk as by their way of working; and as I came still nearer, I thought I could perceive so plainly by my glasses that they were English seamen, that I made a signal to our other ship who had the van, and was just bearing down upon them to bring to; and I sent my boat to him to know his opinion. He sent me word he did believe them to be English; and the more, said he, because they could be no other nation but English or French, and the latter he was sure they were not; but since we were the largest ships, and that they might as plainly see us to be English as we could see them, he said he was for fighting them, because they ought to let us know who they were first. However, as I had fired a gun to bring him to, he lay by a little till we spoke thus together.

While this was doing we could see one of their boats come off with six oars and two men (a lieutenant and a trumpeter it seems they were) sitting in the stern and one of them holding up a flag of truce. We let them come forward, and when they came nearer so that we could hail them with a speaking trumpet, we asked them what countrymen they were? and they answered Englishmen. Then we asked them whence their ship? Their answer was from London, at which we bade them come on board, which they did, and we soon found that we were all countrymen and friends, and their boat went immediately back to let them know it. We found afterwards that they were mere privateers, fitted out from London also, but coming last from Jamaica, and we let them know no other of ourselves; but declined keeping company, telling them we were bound now upon traffic and not for purchase; that we had been at the East Indies, had made some prizes, and were going back thither again. They told us they were come into the South Seas for purchase, but that they had made little of it; having heard there were three large French men of war in those seas, in the Spanish service, which made them wish that they had not come about; and that they were still very doubtful what to do.

We assured them we had been the height of Lima, and that we had not heard of any men-of-war, but that we had passed for such ourselves, and perhaps were the ships they had heard of;

for that we were three sail at first, and had sometimes carried French colours.

This made them very glad, for it was certainly so, that we had passed for three French men-of-war; and they were so assured of it, that they went afterwards boldly up the coast, and made several very good prizes. We then found also that it was one of these ships that looked into the road, as above, when we were here before, and seeing us then with French colours, took us for the men-of-war they had heard of; and they added, that when we came in upon them again, they gave themselves up for lost men, but were resolved to have sought it out to the last, or rather to have sunk by our side, or blow themselves up, than be taken.

I was not at all sorry that we had made this discovery before we engaged, for the captains were two brave resolute fellows, and had two very good ships under them, one of thirty-six guns, but able to have carried forty-four guns; the other, which we called the frigate-built ship, carried twenty-eight guns, and they were both full of men. Now, though we should not have feared their force, yet my case differed from what it did at first, for we had that on board that makes all men cowards, I mean money; of which we had such a cargo as few British ships ever brought out of those seas; and I was one of those that had now no occasion to run needless hazards; so that, in short, I was as well pleased without fighting, as they could be; besides, I had other projects now in my head, and those of no less consequence than of planting a new world, and settling new kingdoms to the honour and advantage of my country; and many a time I wished heartily, that all my rich cargo was safe at London; that my merchants were sharing the silver, and the gold, and the pearl among themselves; and that was I but safe on shore, with a thousand good families upon the south of Chili, and about fifteen hundred good soldiers, and arms for ten thousand more (of which by-and-by) and with the two ships I had now with me, I would not apprehend all the power of the Spaniards; I mean, that they could bring against me in the South Seas.

I had all these things, I say, in my head already, though nothing like to what I had afterwards, when I saw further into the matter myself. However, these things made me very glad, that I had no occasion to engage those ships.

When we came thus to understand one another, we went all into the road together, and I invited the captains of the two privateers on board me, where I treated them with the best I had, though I had no great dainties now, having been so long out of England. They invited me and Captain Merlotte, and the captain of the Madagascar ship, in return, and, indeed, treated us very nobly.

After this, we exchanged some presents of refreshments, and, particularly, they sent me a hogshead of rum, which was very acceptable, and I sent them, in return, a runlet of arrack, excusing myself, that I had no great store. I sent them also a quantity of one hundred weight of nutmegs and cloves; but the most agreeable present I sent them was, twenty pieces of my Madagascar dried beef, cured in the sun, the like of which they had never seen or tasted before; and, without question, it is such an excellent way of curing beef, that if I were to be at Madagascar again, I would take in a sufficient quantity of beef so preserved to victual the whole ship for the voyage; and I leave it as a direction to all English seamen that have occasion to use East India voyages.

I bought afterwards six hogsheads of rum of these privateers, for I found they were very well stored with liquors, whatever else they wanted.

We stayed here twelve or fourteen days, but took care, by agreement, that our men should never go on shore the same days that their men went on shore, or theirs when ours went, as well to avoid their caballing together, as to avoid quarreling, though the latter was the pretence. We agreed, also, not to receive on board any of our ships respectively any of the crews belonging to the other; and this was their advantage; for if we would have given way to that, half their men would, for aught I know, have come over to us.

While we lay here, one of them went a-cruising, finding the wind fair to run in for the shore, and in about five days she came back with a Spanish prize, laden with meal, cocoa, and a large quantity of biscuit, ready baked. She was bound to Lima, from Baldivia, or some port nearer, I do not remember exactly which. They had some gold on board, but not much, and had bought their lading at St Jago. As soon as we saw them coming in with a prize in tow we put out our French colours, and gave notice to the privateers that it was for their advantage that we did so; and so indeed it was; for it would presently have alarmed all the country, if such a fleet of privateers had appeared on the coast. We prevailed on them to give us their Spanish prisoners, and to allow us to set them on shore, I assuring them I would not land them till I came to Baldivia, nor suffer them to have the least correspondence with anybody till they came thither; the said Spaniards also giving their parole of honour not to give any account of their being taken till fourteen days after they were on shore.

This being the furthest port south which the Spaniards are masters of in Chili, or indeed on the whole continent of America, they could not desire me to carry them any further. They allowed us a quantity of meal out of their booty, for the subsistence of the prisoners; and I bought a larger quantity more of it, there being more than they knew how to stow; and they did not resolve to keep the Spanish ship which they took. By this means I was doubly stocked with flour and bread; but as the first was very good, and well packed in cask, and very good jars, it was no burden.

We bought also some of their cocoa, and made chocolate till our men gorged themselves with it, and would eat no more.

Having furnished ourselves here with goats' flesh, as usual, and taken in water sufficient, we left Juan Fernandez, and saw the cruisers go out the same tide, they steering N.N.E., and we S.S.E. They saluted us at parting, and we bid them good-bye in the same language.

While we were now sailing for the coast of Chili, with a fair wind and pleasant weather, my Spanish doctor came to me, and told me he had a piece of news to acquaint me with, which, he said, he believed, would please me very well, and this was, that one of the Spanish prisoners was a planter, as it is called in the West Indies, or a farmer, as we should call it in England, of Villa Rica, a town built by the Spaniards near the foot of the Andes, above the town of Baldivia, and that he had entered into discourse with him upon the situation of those hills, the nature of the surface, the rivers, hollows, passages into them, &c., whether there were any valleys within the hills, of what extent, how watered, what cattle, what people, how disposed, and the like, and, in short, if there was any passing over them; and he told me, in a few words, that he found him to be a very honest, frank, open sort of person, who seemed to speak without reserve, without the least jealousy or apprehension, and that, in a word, he believed I might have an ample discovery from him of all that I desired to know.

I was very glad of this news, you may be sure, and it was not many hours before I made him bring the Spaniard into the great cabin to me, where I treated him very civilly, and gave him opportunity several times to see himself very well used; and, indeed, all the Spaniards in the ship were very thankful for my bringing them out of the hands of the privateers, and took all occasions to let us see it.

I said little the first time, but discoursed in general of America, of the greatness and opulence of the Spaniards there, the infinite wealth of the country &c.; and I remember well, discoursing once of the great riches of the Spaniards in America, the silver mines of Potosi, and other places, he turned short upon me, smiling, and said "We Spaniards are the worst nation in the world that such a treasure as this could have belonged to; for if it had fallen into any other hands than ours," says he, "they would have searched further into it before now."—I asked him what he meant by that. I said I thought they had searched it thoroughly enough, for that I believed no nation in the world could ever have spread such vast dominions, and planted a country of such a prodigious extent, and have not only kept the possession of it, but have maintained the government also, and even inhabited it, with so few people.

"Perhaps, seignior," says he, "you think, notwithstanding that opinion of yours, that we have many more people of our nation in New Spain than we have."—"I do not know," said I, "how many you may have; but if I should believe you have as many here as in Old Spain, it would be but a few in comparison of the infinite extent of the King of Spain's dominions in America."—"And then," added he, "I assure you, seignior, there is not one Spaniard to a thousand acres of land, take one place with another, throughout New Spain."

"Very well," said I, "then I think the riches and wealth of America is very well searched, in comparison to the number of people you have to search after it."—"No," says he "it is not, neither; for the greatest number of our people live in that part where the wealth is not greatest, and where even the governor and viceroy, enjoying a plentiful and luxurious life, they take no thought for the increase either of the king's revenues or the national wealth." This he spoke of the city of Mexico, whose greatness, and the number of its inhabitants, he said, was a disease to the rest of the body. "And what think you, seignior," said he, "that in that one city, where is neither silver or gold but what is brought from the mountains of St Clara, the mines at St Augustine's and Our Lady, some of which are an hundred leagues from it, and yet there are more Spaniards in Mexico than in both these two prodigious empires of Chili and Peru."

I seemed not to believe him, and indeed I did not believe him at first, till he returned to me with a question,—“Pray, seignior captain,” says he, “how many Spaniards do you think there may be in this vast country of Chili?”—I told him I could make no guess of the numbers; but, without question, there were many thousands, intimating that I might suppose near an hundred thousand; at which he laughed heartily, and assured me that there were not above two thousand five hundred in the whole kingdom, besides women and children and some few soldiers, which they looked upon as nothing to inhabitants, because they were not settled anywhere.

I was indeed surprised, and began to name some large places, which I thought had singly more Spaniards in them than what he talked of. He presently ran over some of them; and naming Baldivia first, as the most southward, he asked me how many I thought were there? I told him about three hundred families. He smiled at me, and assured me there were not above three or four-and-fifty families in the whole place, and about twenty-five soldiers, although it was a fortification and a frontier. At Villa Rica, or the rich town, where he lived, he said there might be about sixty families, and a lieutenant with twenty soldiers. In a word, we passed over the many places between, and came to the capital, St Jago; where, after I had supposed there were were five thousand Spaniards, he protested to me there were not above eight hundred, including the viceroy's court, and including the families at Valparaiso, which is the seaport, and excluding only the soldiers, which, as he said, being the capital of the whole kingdom, might be about two hundred, and excluding the religious, who, he added, laughing, signified nothing to the planting a country, for they neither cultivated the land nor increased the people.

Our doctor, who was our interpreter, smiled at this, but merrily said, "That was very true, or ought to be so;" intimating that though the priests do not cultivate the land, yet they might chance to increase the people a little; but that was by the way. As to the number of inhabitants at St Jago, the doctor agreed with him, and said he believed he had said more than there was rather than less.

As then to the kingdom or empire of Peru, in which there are many considerable cities and places of note, such as Lima, Quitto, Cusco la Plata, and others, besides the great number of towns on the sea coasts, such as Port Arica, St Miguel, Payta, Guyaquil, Truxillo, and many others.

He answered, that it was true that the city of Lima, with the town of Callao, was much increased within a few years; and particularly of late by the settling of between three and four hundred French there, who came by the King of Spain's license; but that before the coming of those gentlemen, at which he shook his head, the country was richer, though the inhabitants were not so many; and that, take it as it was now, there could not be reckoned above fifteen hundred families of Spaniards, excluding the soldiers and the clergy, which as above, he reckoned nothing as to the planting the country.

We came then to discourse of the silver mines at Petosi, and here he supposed, as I did also, a very great number of people. "But, signior," says he, "what people is it you are speaking of? There are many thousands of servants but few masters; there is a garrison of four hundred soldiers, always kept in arms and in good order, to secure the place and keep the negroes and criminals who work in the mines in subjection; but that there were not besides five hundred Spaniards, that is to say men, in the whole place and its adjacents. So that, in short, he would not allow above seven thousand Spaniards in the whole empire of Peru, and two thousand five hundred in Chili; at the same time allowing twice as many as both these in the city of Mexico only.

After this discourse was over, I asked him what he inferred from it as to the wealth of the country not being discovered? He answered, it was evident that it was for want of people that the wealth of the country lay hid; that there was infinitely more lay unenquired after than had yet been known; that there were several mountains in Peru equally rich in silver with that of Potosi; and as for Chili, says he, and the country where we live, there is more gold at this time in the mountains of the Andes, and more easy to come at, than in all the world besides. "Nay," says he, with some passion, "there is more gold every year washed down out of the Andes of Chili into the sea and lost there, than all the riches that go from New Spain to Europe in twenty years amount to."

This discourse fired my imagination, you may be sure, and I renewed it upon all occasions, taking more or less time every day to talk with this Spaniard upon the subject of cultivation of the lands, improvement of the country, and the like; always making such inquiries into the state of the mountains of the Andes as best suited my purpose, but yet so as not to give him the least intimation of my design.

One day, conversing with him again about the great riches of the country and of the mountains and rivers as above, I asked him, that seeing the place was so rich, why were they not all princes, or as rich as princes, that dwelt there?

He shook his head, and said it was a great reproach upon them many ways; and when I pressed him to explain himself, he answered it was occasioned by two things—namely, pride and sloth. "Seignior," says he, "we have so much pride that we have no avarice, and we do not covet enough to make us work for it. We walk about sometimes," says he, "on the banks of the streams that come down from the mountains, and if we see a bit of gold lie on the shore, it may be we will vouchsafe to lay off our cloak and step forward to take it up; but if we were sure to carry home as much as we could stand under, we would not strip and go to work in the water to wash it out of the sand, or take the pains to get it together; nor perhaps dishonour ourselves so much as to be seen carrying a load, no, not for all the value of the gold itself.

I laughed then indeed; and told him he was disposed to jest with his countrymen, or to speak ironically; meaning, that they did not take so much pains as was required to make them effectually rich, but, that I supposed he would not have me understand him as he spoke. He said, I might understand as favourably as I pleased, but I should find the fact to be true if I would go up with him to Villa Rica when I came to Baldivia; and with that he made his compliment to me and invited me to his house.

I asked him with a con licentia, signior, that is, with pardon for so much freedom, that if he lived in so rich a country, and where there was so inexhaustible a treasure of gold, how he came to fall into this state of captivity, and what made him venture himself upon the sea to fall into the hands of pirates?

He answered, that it was on the very foot or what he had been complaining of; and that having seen so much of the wealth of the country he lived in, and having reproached himself with that very indolence which he now blamed all his countrymen for, he had resolved, in conjunction with two of his neighbours the Spaniards, and men of good substance, to set to work in a place in the mountains where they had found some gold, and had seen much washed down by the water, and to find what might be done in a thorough search after the fund or mine of it, which they were sure was not far off; and that he was going to Lima, and from thence, if he could not be supplied, to Panama, to buy negroes for the work, that they might carry it on with the better success.

This was a feeling discourse to me, and made such an impression on me, that I secretly resolved, that when I came to Baldivia, I would go up with this sincere Spaniard (for so I thought him to be, and so I found him) and would be an eye-witness to the discovery, which, I thought, was made to my hand, and which I found now I could make more effectual than by all the attempts I was like to make by second hand.

From this time I treated the Spaniard with more than ordinary courtesy, and told him if I was not captain of a great ship, and had a cargo upon me of other gentlemen's estates, he had said so much of those things that I should be tempted to give him a visit as he had desired, and see those monstrous mountains of the Andes.

He told me that if I would do him so much honour, I should not be obliged to any long stay, that he would procure mules for me at Baldivia, and that I should go, not to his house only, but to the mountain itself and see all that I desired, and be back again in fourteen days at the farthest. I shook my head as if it could not be, but he never left importuning me; and once or twice, as if I had been afraid to venture myself with him, he told me he would send for his two sons, and leave them in the ship as hostages for my safety.

I was fully satisfied as to that point, but did not let him know my mind yet; but every day we dwelt upon the same subject, and I travelled through the mountains and vallies so duly in every day's discourse with him, that when I afterwards came to the places we had talked of, it was as if I had looked over them in a map before.

I asked him if the Andes were a mere wall of mountains, contiguous and without intervals and spaces like a fortification or boundary to a country? Or, whether they lay promiscuous and distant from one another? And, whether there lay any way over them into the country beyond them.

He smiled when I talked of going over them. He told me they were so infinitely high, that no human creature could live upon the top; and withal so steep and so frightful, that if there was even a pair of stairs up on one side and down on the other, no man alive would dare to mount up or venture down.

But that, as for the notion of the hills being contiguous, like a wall that had no gates, that was all fabulous; that there were several fair entrances in among the mountains, and large, pleasant, and fruitful vallies among the hills, with pleasant rivers and numbers of inhabitants, and cattle and provisions of all sorts; and that some of the most delightful places to live in that were in the whole world, were among those vallies, in the very centre of the highest and most dreadful mountains.

"Well," said I, "seignior, but how do they go out of one valley into another? And whither do they go at last?" He answered me, those vallies are always full of pleasant rivers and brooks which fall from the hills, and are formed generally into one principal stream to every vale; and that as these must have their outlets on one side of the hills, or on the other, so, following the course of those streams, one is always sure to find the way out of one valley into another, and at last out of the whole into the open country; so that it was very frequent to pass from one side to the other of the whole body of the mountains, and not go much higher up hill or down hill, compared to the hills in other places. It was true, he said, there was no abrupt visible parting in the mountains, that should seem like a way cut through from the bottom to the top, which would be indeed frightful; but that as they pass from some of the vallies to others, there are ascents and descents, windings and turnings, sloping up and sloping down, where we may stand on those little ridges, and see the waters on one side run to the west, and on the other side to the east.

I asked him what kind of a country was on the other side? and how long time it would take up to go through from one side to the other? He told me, there were ways indeed that were more mountainous and uneasy, in which men kept upon the sides or declivity of the hills, in which the natives would go and guide others to go, and so might pass the whole ridge of the Andes in eight or nine days; but that those ways were esteemed very dismal, lonely, and dangerous, because of wild beasts; but that through the vallies the way was easy and pleasant, and perfectly safe, only farther about; and that those ways a man might be sixteen or seventeen days going through.

I laid up all this in my heart, to make use of as I should have occasion; but I acknowledge that it was surprising to me, as it was so perfectly agreeing with the notion that I always entertained of those mountains, of the riches of them, the facility of access to and from them, and the easy passage from one side to another.

The next discourse I had with him upon this subject I began thus. "Well, seignior," said I, "we are now come quite through the vallies and passages of the Andes, and methinks I see a vast open country before me on the other side; pray tell me, have you ever been so far as to look into that part of the world, and what kind of a country is it?"

He answered gravely, that he had been far enough several times, to look at a distance into the vast country I spake of. "And such indeed it is," said he; "and as we come upon the rising part of the hills, we see a great way, and a country without end; but as to any descriptions of it, I can say but little," added he, "only this, that it is a very fruitful country on that side next the hill. What it is farther, I know not."

I asked him if there were any considerable rivers in it, and which way they generally run? He said, "It could not be, but that from such a ridge of mountains as the Andes, there must be a great many rivers on that side, as there were apparently on this; and that, as the country was infinitely larger, and their course in proportion longer, it would necessarily follow, that those small rivers would run one into another, and so form great navigable rivers, as was the case in the Rio de la Plata, which originally sprung from the same hills, about the city La Plata in Peru, and swallowing up all the streams of less note, became, by the mere length of its course, one of the greatest rivers in the world." That, as he observed most of those rivers ran rather south-eastward than northward, he believed they ran away to the sea, a great way farther to the south than the Rio de la Plata; but as to what part of the coast they might come to the sea in, that he knew nothing of.

This account was so rational, that nothing could be more; and was, indeed, extremely satisfactory.

It was also very remarkable, that this agreed exactly with the accounts before given me by the two Chilian Indians, or natives, which I had on board, and with whom I still continued to discourse as occasion presented; but who, at this time, I removed into the Madagascar ship, to make room for these Spanish prisoners.

I observed the Spaniard was made very sensible by my doctor of the obligation both he and his fellow-prisoners were under to me, in my persuading the privateers to set them at liberty, and in undertaking to carry them home to that part of Spain from whence they came; for as they had lost their cargo, their voyage seemed to be at an end. The sense of the favour, I say, which I had done him, and was still doing him, in the civil treatment which I gave him, made this gentleman, for such he was in himself, and in his disposition, whatever he was by family, for that I knew nothing of; I say, it made him exceeding importunate with me, and with my doctor, who spoke Spanish perfectly well, to go with him to Villa Rica.

I made him no promise, but talked at a distance. I told him if he had lived by the sea and I could have sailed to his door in my ship I would have made him a visit. He returned that he wished he could make the river of Baldivia navigable for me, that I might bring my ship up to his door, and he would venture to say, that neither me nor all my ship's company should starve while we were with him. In the interval of these discourses I asked my doctor his opinion, whether he thought I might trust this Spaniard if I had a mind to go up and see the country for a few days?

"Seignior," says he, "the Spaniards are, in some respects, the worst nation under the sun; they are cruel, inexorable, uncharitable, voracious, and in several cases treacherous; but in two things they are to be depended upon beyond all the nations in the world, that is to say, when they give their honour to perform any thing, and when they have a return to make for any favour received;" and here he entertained me with a long story of a merchant of Chartagena, who in a sloop was shipwrecked at sea, and was taken up by an English merchant on board a ship bound to London from Barbadoes or some other of our islands; that the English merchant meeting another English ship bound to Jamaica, put the Spanish merchant on board him, paid him for his passage, and obliged him to set him on shore on the Spanish coast, as near to Chartagena as he could. This Spanish merchant could never rest until he found means to ship himself from Chartagena to the Havanna on the Galleons, from thence to Cadiz in Old Spain, and from thence to London, to find out the English merchant, and make him a present to the value of a thousand pistoles for saving his life, and for his civil returning him to Jamaica, &c. Whether the story was true or not his inference from it was just; namely, that a Spaniard never forgot a kindness; "But take it withal," says the doctor, "that I believe it is as much the effect of their pride as of their virtue; for at the same time," said he, "they never forget an ill turn any more than they do a good one, and they frequently entail their enmities on their families, and prosecute the revenge from one generation to another, so that the heir has with the estate of his ancestors all the family broils upon his hands as he comes to his estate."

From all this he inferred, that as this Spaniard found himself so very much obliged to me, I might depend upon it that he had so much pride in him, that if he could pull down the Andes for me to go through, and I wanted it, he would do it for me; and that nothing would be a greater satisfaction to him than to find some way or other how to requite me.

All these discourses shortened our voyage, and we arrived fair and softly (for it was very good weather and little wind) at Tucapel, or the river Imperial, within ten leagues of Baldivia, that is to say, off Cape Bonifacio, which is the north point of the entrance into the river of Baldivia; and here I took one of the most unaccountable, and I must needs acknowledge unjustifiable resolutions, that ever any commander entrusted with a ship of such force and a cargo of such consequence adventured upon before, and which I by no means recommend to any commander of a ship to imitate; and this was, to venture up into the country above one hundred and fifty miles from my ship, leaving the success of the whole voyage, the estates of my employers, and the richest ship and cargo that ever came out of those seas, to the care and fidelity of two or three men. Such was the unsatisfied thirst of new discoveries, which I brought out of England with me, and which I nourished at all hazards to the end of the voyage.

However, though I condemn myself in the main for the rashness of the undertaking, yet let me do myself so much justice, as to leave it on record too, that I did not run this risk without all the needful precautions for the safety of the ship and cargo.

And first, I found out a safe place for the ships to ride; and this neither in the river of Tucapel, nor in the river of Baldivia, but in an opening or inlet of water without a name, about a league to the south of Tucapel, embayed and secured from almost all the winds that could blow; here the ships lay easy, with water enough, having about eleven fathoms good holding ground, and about half a league from shore.

I left the supra-cargo and my chief mate, also a kinsman of my own, a true sailor, who had been a midshipman, but was now a lieutenant; I say to those I left the command of both my ships, but with express orders not to stir, nor unmoor upon any account whatever, life and death excepted, until my return, or until if I was dead, they heard what was become of me; no, though they were to stay there six months, for they had provisions enough, and an excellent place for watering lay just by them; and I made all the men swear to me, that they would make no mutiny or disorder, but obey my said kinsman in one ship, and the supra-cargo in the other in all things except removing from that place; and that if they should command them to stir from thence, they would not so much as touch a sail or a rope.

When I had made all these conditions, and told my men that the design I went upon, was for the good of their voyage, for the service of the owners, and should, if it succeeded, be for all their advantages; I asked them if they were all willing I should go? to which they all answered that they were very willing, and would take the same care of the ships, and of all things belonging to them as if I were on board. This encouraged me greatly, and I now resolved nothing should hinder me.

Having thus concluded every thing, then, and not until then, I told my Spaniard that I had almost resolved to go along with him; at which he appeared exceedingly pleased, and indeed in a surprise of joy. I should have told you, that before I told him this, I had set all the rest of the prisoners on shore, at their own request, just between the port of Tucapel and the bay of the conception, except two men, who as he told me, lived in the open country beyond Baldivia, and, as he observed, were very glad to be set on shore with him, so to travel home, having lost what little they had in the ship, and to whom he communicated nothing of all the discourse we had had of the affair of the mountains.

I also dismissed now the two Chilian Indians, but not without a very good reward proportioned to, not their trouble and time only, but proportioned to what I seemed to expect of them, and filling them still with expectations that I would come again and take a journey with them into the mountains.

And now it became necessary that I should use the utmost freedom with my new friend the Spaniard, being, as I told him, to put my life in his hands and the prosperity of my whole adventure, both ship and ship's company.

He told me he was sensible that I did put my life in his hands, and that it was a very great token of confidence in him, even such a one that he, being a stranger to me, had no reason to expect: but he desired me to consider that he was a Christian, not a savage; that he was one, I had laid the highest obligation upon in voluntarily taking him out of the hands of the freebooters, where he might have lost his life; and, in the next place, he said, it was some argument that he was a gentleman, and that I should find him to be a man of honour; and, lastly, that it did not appear that he could make any advantage of me, or that he could get any thing by using me ill; and if even that was no argument yet I should find when I came to his house that he was not in a condition to want any thing that might be gained, so much as to procure it by such a piece of villany and treachery, as to betray and destroy the man that had saved his life, and brought him out of the hands of the devil safe to his country and family, when he might have been carried away, God knows whither. But to conclude all, he desired me to accept the offer he had made me at sea (viz.) that he would send for his two sons, and leave them on board the ship as hostages for my safety, and desired they might be used on board no otherwise than I was used with him in the country.

I was ashamed to accept such an offer as this; but he pressed it earnestly, and importuned the doctor to move me to accept it, telling him that he should not be easy if I did not, so that, in short, the doctor advised me to agree to it; and, accordingly, he hired a messenger and a mule, and sent away for his two sons to come to him; and such expedition the messenger made, that in six days he returned with the two sons and three servants, all on horseback. His two sons were very pretty well behaved youths, who appeared to be gentlemen in their very countenances; the eldest was about thirteen years old, and the other about eleven. I treated them on board, as I had their father, with all possible respect; and having entertained them two days, left order that they should be treated in the same manner when I was gone; and to this I added, aloud, that their father might hear it, that whenever they had a mind to go away, they should let them go. But their father laid a great many solemn charges upon them that they should not stir out of the ship till I came back safe, and that I gave them leave; and he made them promise that they would not: and the young gentlemen kept their word so punctually, that when our supercargo, whom I left in command, offered to let them go on shore several times to divert them with shooting and hunting, they would not stir out of the ship, and did not till I came back again.

Having gone this length, and made everything ready for my adventure, we set out, Captain Merlotte, the Spanish doctor, the old mutineer, that was my second mate, and who was now captain of the Madagascar ship, and myself, with two midshipmen, whom we took as servants, but who I resolved to make the directors of the main enterprise. As to the number, I found my Spaniard made no scruple of that, if it had been half my ship's company.

We set out, some on horses and some on mules, as we could get them, but the Spaniard and myself rode on two very good horses, being the same that his two sons came on. We arrived at a noble country seat about a league short of the town, where, at first, I thought we had been only to put in for refreshment; but I soon found, that it was really his dwelling house, and where his family and servants resided.

Here we were received like princes, and with as much ceremony as if he had been a prince that entertained us. The mayor domo, or steward of his house, received us, took in our baggage, and ordered our two servants to be taken care of.

I need not tell you that the Spaniard did all that pride and ostentation was capable of inspiring him with to entertain us; and the truth is, he could not have lived in a country in the world more capable of gratifying his pride; for here, without anything uncommon, he was able to show more gold plate than many good families in our country have of silver; and as for silver, it quite eclipses the appearance, or rather took away the very use of pewter, of which we did not see one vessel, no, not in the meanest part of his house. It is true, I believe, the Spaniard had not a piece of plate or of any household furniture which we did not see, except what belonged to the apartment of his wife; and it is to be observed, that the women never appeared, except at a distance and in the gardens, and then being under veils, we could not know the lady from her women, or the maids from the mistress.

We were lodged every one in separate apartments, very well furnished, but two of them very nobly indeed; though all the materials for furniture must be there at an excessive price. The way of lodging upon quilts, and in beds, made pavillion-wise, after the Spanish custom, I need not describe; but it surprised me to see the rooms hung with very rich tapestries, in a part of the world where they must cost so dear.

We had Chilian wine served us up in round gold cups, and water in large silver decanters, that held, at least, five quarts a piece; these stood in our chamber. Our chocolate was brought us up in the same manner in deep cups, all of gold, and it was made in vessels all of silver.

It would be troublesome to the very reader to interrupt my account with the relation of all the fine things he had in his house, and I could not be persuaded but that he had borrowed all the plate in the town to furnish out his sideboard and table; but my doctor told me it was nothing but what was very usual among them that were men of any substance, as it was apparent he was; and that the silversmiths at St Jago supplied them generally with their plate ready wrought, in exchange, with allowance for the quality, for the gold which they found in the mountains, or in the brooks and streams which came from the mountains, into which the hasty showers of winter rain frequently washed down pretty large lumps; and others, which were smaller, they washed out of the sands by the ordinary methods of washing of ore.

I was better satisfied in this particular, when the next day, talking to our new landlord about the mountains, and the wealth of them, I asked him if he could show me any of the gold which was usually washed out of the hills by the rain, in the natural figure in which it was found? He smiled, and told me yes, he would show us a little; and with that, carried us up into a kind of a closet, where he had a great variety of odd things gathered up about the mountains and rivers, such as fine shells, strange stones in the form of stars, heavy pieces of ore, but such as neither he nor any of us could tell what they were, and the like; and after this, he pulled out a great leather bag, which had, I believe, near fifty pounds weight in it, here, seignior, says he, here is some of the dirt of the earth, and turning it out upon the table, it was easy to see that it was all gold, though the pieces were of different forms, and some scarce looking like gold at all, being so mixed with the spar, or with earth, that it did not appear so plain; but in every bit there was something of the clear gold to be seen, and the smaller the lumps the purer the gold appeared.

I was surprised at the quantity more than at the thing itself, having, as I have said, seen the gold which the Indians found in the countries I have described, which seemed to have little or no mixture; but then I was to have considered that what those Indians gathered was farther from the hills which it came from, and that those rough irregular pieces would not drive so far in the water, but would lodge themselves in the earth and sand of the rivers nearer home; and also that the Indians, not knowing how to separate the gold by fire from the dross and mixture above, did not think those rough pieces worth their taking up, whereas the Spaniards here understood much better what they were about.

But to return to the closet. When he had shown us this leather pouch full, he sweeps it by to one side of the table, which had ledges round it to keep it from running off, and takes up another bag full of large pieces of stone, great lumps of earth, and pieces of various shapes, all of which had some gold in them, but not to be gotten out but by fire. These, he told us, their servants bring them home as they find them in the mountains, lying loose here and there, when they run after their cattle.

But still I asked him if they found no pieces of pure gold? upon this, he turned to a great old cabinet full of pretty large drawers, and pulling out one drawer, he showed us a surprising number of pieces of pure clean gold, some round, some long, some flat, some thick, all of irregular shapes, and worked roundish at the ends, with rolling along, some of these weighed a quarter of an ounce, some more, and some less, and as I lifted the drawer, I believe there could not be less than between twenty and thirty pounds' weight of it.

Then he pulled out another drawer, which was almost full of the same kind of drug, but as small as sand, the biggest not so big as pins' heads, and which might very properly be called gold dust.

After this sight a man was to be surprised at nothing he could see. I asked him how long such a treasure might be amassing together in this country? he told me that was according to the pains they might take in the search; that he had been twelve years here, and had done little or nothing; but had he had twenty negroes to have set on work, as he might have had, he might have had more than this in one year. I asked him how much gold in weight he thought there might be in all this he had shown me? he told me he could not tell; that they never troubled themselves to weigh, but when the silversmith at St Jago came to bring home any vessel, or when the merchants from Lima came to Baldivia with European goods, then they bought what they wanted of them; that they were sensible they gave excessive dear for every thing, even ten or twenty for one. But as gold, he said, was the growth of that country, and the other things, such as cloth, linen, fine silks, &c. were the gold of Europe, they did not think much to give what they asked for those things. In short, I found that the people in this country, though they kept large plantations in their hands, had great numbers of cattle, ingenios, as they call them, for making sugar, and land, under management, for the maintenance of themselves and families; yet did not wholly neglect the getting gold out of the mountains, where it was in such plenty; and therefore it seems the town adjacent is called Villa Rica, or the Rich Town, being seated as it were at the foot of the mountains, and in the richest part of them.

After I had sufficiently admired the vast quantity of gold he had, he made signs to the doctor that I should take any piece or any quantity that I pleased; but thought I might take it as an affront to have him offer me any particular small parcel. The doctor hinted it to me, and I bade him return him thanks; but to let him know that I would by no means have any of that, but that I would be glad to take up a piece or two, such as chance should present to me in the mountains; that I might show in my own country, and tell them that I took it up with my own hands. He answered he would go with me himself; and doubted not but to carry me where I should fully satisfy my curiosity, if I would be content to clamber a little among the rocks.

I now began to see plainly that I had no manner of need to have taken his sons for hostages for my safety; and would fain have sent for them back again; but he would by no means give me leave; so I was obliged to give that over. A day or two after I desired of him that he would give me leave to send for one more person from the ships, who I had a great mind should see the country with me, and to send for some few things that I should want, and, withal, to satisfy my men that I was safe and well.

This he consented to; so I sent away one of the two midshipmen, who I called my servants, and with him two servants of the Spaniard, my landlord, as I called him, with four mules and two horses. I gave my midshipman my orders and directions under my hand to my supercargo what to do, for I was resolved to be even with my Spaniard for all his good usage of me; the midshipman was gone ten days, for they came back pretty well laden, as you shall hear, and the men were obliged to come all on foot.

All the while they were gone, my landlord and I spent in surveying the country and viewing his plantation. As for the city of Villa Rica, it was not the most proper to go there in public; and the doctor knew that as well as the Spaniard; and therefore, though we went several times incognito, yet it was of no consequence to me, neither did I desire it.

One night I had a very strange fright here, and behaved myself very much like a fool about it. The case was this; I waked in the middle of the night, and chancing to open my eyes, I saw a great light of fire, which to me seemed as if the house or some part of it had been on fire; I, as if I had been at Wapping or Rotherhithe, where people are always terrified with such things, jumped out of bed and called my friend Captain Merlotte, and cried out fire, fire! The first thing I should have thought of, on this occasion, should have been that the Spaniard did not understand what the words fire, fire! meant; and, that if I expected they should understand me, I should have cried fuego, fuego!

However, Captain Merlotte got up and my Madagascar captain, for we all lay near one another, and with the noise they waked the whole house, and my landlord, as he afterwards confessed, began to suspect some mischief; his steward having come to his chamber door and told him that the strangers were up in arms, in which mistake we might all have had our throats cut, and the poor Spaniard not to blame neither.

But our doctor coming hastily in to me, unridled the whole matter, which was this, that a volcano, or burning vent among the hills, being pretty near the Spanish side of the country, as there are many of them in the Andes, had flamed out that night, and gave such a terrible light in the air, as made us think the fire had at least been in the out-houses, or in part of the house, and accordingly had put me in such a fright.

Upon this, having told me what it was, he ran away to the Spanish servants, and told them what the meaning of it all was, and bade them go and satisfy their master, which they did, and all was well again; but as for me, I sat almost all the night staring out at the window at the eruption of fire upon the hills, and the like bonfire I had never seen before, I assure you.

I sincerely begged my landlord's pardon for disturbing his house; and asked him if those eruptions were frequent. He said no, they were not frequent, for they were constant, either in one part of the hills or another; and that in my passing the mountains I should see several of them. I asked him if they were not alarmed with them, and if they were not attended with earthquakes. He said he believed that among the hills themselves they might have some shakings of the earth, because sometimes they should find pieces of the rocks break off and fall down, and that it was among those little fractures that sometimes pieces of stone were found which had gold interspersed in them, as if they had been melted and run together, of which he had shown me some; but that, as for earthquakes in the country, he had never heard of any since he came thither, which had been upwards of fifteen years, including three years that he dwelt at St Jago.

One day, being out on horseback with my landlord, we rode up close to the mountains, and he showed me at a distance an entrance, as he called it, into them, frightful enough indeed, as you shall hear in its place. Then he told me that was the way he intended to carry me when he should go to show me the highest hills in the world; but he turned short, and, smiling, said it should not be yet, for though he had promised me a safe return, and left hostages for it, yet he had not capitulated for time.

I told him he need not capitulate with me for time, for if I had not two ships to stay my coming, and between three and four hundred men eating me up all the while, I did not know whether I would ever go away again or no, if he would give me house-room. He told me, as to that, he had sent my men some victuals, so that they would not starve if I did not come back for some days. This surprised me a little, and I discovered it in my countenance. "Nay, seignior," says he, "I have only sent them some victuals to maintain my two hostages, for, you know, they must not want." It was not good manners in me to ask what he had sent; but I understood, as soon as my midshipman returned, that he had sent down sixteen cows, or runts, I know not what to call them but black cattle; thirty hogs, thirteen large Peruvian sheep, as big as great calves; and three casks of Chilian wine, with an assurance that they should have more provisions when that was spent.

I was amazed at all this munificence of the Spaniard, and very glad I was that I had sent my midshipman for the things I intended to present him again, for I was as well able to requite him for a large present as he was to make it, and had resolved it before I knew he had sent anything to the ship; so that this exchanging of presents was but a kind of generous barter or commerce; for, as to gold, we had either of us so much that it was not at all equal in value to what we had to give on both sides, as we were at present situated.

In short, my midshipman returned with the horses and servants; and when we had brought what I had sent for into a place which I desired the Spaniard to allow me to open my things in, I sent my doctor to desire the Spaniard to let me speak with him.

I told him, first, that he must give me his parole of honour not to take amiss what I had to say to him; that it was the custom in our country, at any time, to make presents to the ladies, with the knowledge and consent of their husbands or parents, without any evil design, or without giving any offence, but that I knew it was not so among the Spaniards; that I had not had the honour yet either to see his lady or his daughter, but that I had heard he had a lady and a daughter also; however, that if he pleased to be the messenger of a trifle I had caused my man to bring, and would present it for me, and not take it as an offence, he should see beforehand what it was, and I should content myself with his accepting it in their behalf.

He told me, smiling, he did not bring me thither to take any presents of me; I had already done enough, in that I had given him his liberty, which was the most valuable gift in the world; and as to his wife, I had already made her the best present I was able, having given her back her husband; that it is true it was not the custom of the Spaniards to let their wives appear in any public entertainment of friends, but that he had resolved to break through that custom, and that he had told his wife what a friend I had been to her family, and that she should thank me for it in public; and that then, what present I had designed for her, since I would be a maker of presents, she should do herself the honour to take it with her own hands, and he would be very far from mistaking them, or taking it ill from his wife.

As this was the highest compliment he was able to make me, the more he was obliging in the manner, for he returned in about two hours, leading his wife into the room by the hand, and his daughter following.

I must confess I was surprised, for I did not expect to have seen such a sight in America. The lady's dress, indeed, I cannot describe, but she was really a charming woman in her person, of about forty years of age, and covered over with emeralds and diamonds, I mean as to her head. She was veiled till she came into the room, but gave her veil to her woman when her husband took her by the hand. Her daughter I took to be about twelve years old, which the Spaniards count marriageable; she was pretty, but not so handsome as her mother.

After the compliments on both sides, my landlord, as I now called him, told her very handsomely what a benefactor I had been to her family, by redeeming him from the hands of villains; and she, turning to me, thanked me in the most obliging manner, and with a modest, graceful way of speech, such as I cannot represent, and which, indeed, I did not think the Spaniards, who are said to be so haughty, had been acquainted with.

I then desired the doctor to tell the Spaniard her husband that I desired his lady to accept a small present which my midshipman had brought for her from the ship, and which, with his words, I took in my hand, and the Spaniard led his wife on to take it; and I must needs say it was not a mean present, besides, its being of ten times the value in that place as it would have been at London, and I was now very glad that, as I mentioned above, I always reserved a small quantity of all sorts of goods unsold, that I might have them to dispose of as occasion should offer.

First, I presented her with a very fine piece of Dutch holland, worth in London about seven shillings an ell, and thirty-six ells in length, and worth in Chili, to be sure, fifteen pieces of eight per ell, at least; or it was rather likely that all the kingdom of Chili had not such another.

Then I gave her two pieces of China damask, and two pieces of China silks, called atlases, flowered with gold; two pieces of fine muslin, one flowered, the other plain, and a piece of very fine chintz, or printed calico; also a large parcel of spices, made up in blue papers, being about six pounds of nutmegs, and about twice as many cloves.

And, lastly, to the young lady I gave one piece of damask, two pieces of China taffety, and a piece of fine striped muslin.

After all this was delivered, and the ladies had received them, and given them their women to hold, I pulled out a little box, in which I had two couple of large pearls, of that pearl which I mentioned we found at the Pearl Islands, very well matched for ear-rings, and gave the lady one pair and the daughter the other; and now, I think, I had made a present fit for an ambassador to carry to a prince.

The ladies made all possible acknowledgment, and we had the honour that day to dine with them in public. My landlord the Spaniard told me I had given them such a present as the Viceroy of Mexico's lady would have gone fifty leagues to have received.

But I had not done with my host, for, after dinner, I took him into the same room, and told him I hoped he did not think I had made all my presents to the ladies, and had nothing left to show my respect to him; and, therefore, first I presented him with three negro men, which I had bought at Callao for my own use, but knew I could supply myself again in my way home, at a moderate price; in the next place I gave him three pieces of black Colchester bays, which, though they are coarse ordinary things in England, that a footman would scarce wear, are a habit for a prince in that country. I then gave him a piece of very fine scarlet English serge, which was really very valuable in England, but much more there; and another piece of crimson broad-cloth, and six pieces of fine silk druggets for his two sons, and thus I finished my presents. The Spaniard stood still, and looked on all the while I was laying out my presents to him, as one in a transport, and said not one word till all was over; but then he told me very gravely that it was now time for him to turn me out of his house; "For, seignior," says he, "no man ought to suffer himself to be obliged beyond his power of return, and I have no possible way of making any return to you equal to such things as these."

It is true the present I had made him, if it was to be rated by the value of things in the country where it then was, would have been valued at six or seven hundred pounds sterling, but to reckon them as they might cost me, did not altogether amount to above one hundred pounds, except the three negroes, which, indeed, cost me at Lima one thousand two hundred pieces of eight.

He was as sensible of the price of those negroes as I was of the occasion he had of them, and of the work he had to do for them; and he came to me about an hour after, and told me he had looked over all the particulars of the noble presents which I had made them; and, though the value was too great for him to accept, or for any man to offer him, yet, since I had been at so much trouble to send for the things, and that I thought him worthy such a bounty, he was come back to tell me that he accepted, thankfully, all my presents, both to himself and to his wife and daughter, except only the three negroes, and as they were bought in the country, and were the particular traffic of the place, he could not take them as a present, but would be equally obliged, and take it for as much a favour, if I would allow him to pay for them.

I smiled, and told him he and I would agree upon that; for he did not yet know what favours I had to ask of him, and what expense I should put him to; that I had a great design in my view, which I was to crave his assistance in, and which I had not yet communicated to him, in which he might perhaps find that he would pay dear enough for all the little presents I had made him; and, in the mean time, to make him easy as to the three negro men, I gave him my word that he should pay for them; only not yet.

He could have nothing to object against an offer of this kind, because he could not guess what I meant, but gave me all the assurances of service and assistance that lay in his power, in anything that I might have to do in that country.

But here, by the way, you are to understand, that all this was carried on with a supposition, that we acted under a commission from the king of France; and though he knew many of us were English, and that I was an Englishman, in particular, yet, as we had such a commission and produced it, we were Frenchmen, in that sense, to him, nor did he entertain us upon any other footing.

The sequel of the story will also make it sufficiently appear, that I did not make such presents as these in mere ostentation, or only upon the compliment of a visit to a Spanish gentleman, any more than I would leave my ship, and a cargo of such value, in the manner I had done, to make a tour into the country, if, had not views sufficient to justify such beginnings, and the consequence of these things will be the best apology for me, to those who shall have patience to put them all together.

We had now spent a fortnight, and something more, in ceremony and civilities, and in now and then taking a little tour about the fields, and towards the mountains. However, even in this way of living, I was not so idle as I seemed to be for I had not only made due observations of all the country which I saw, but informed myself sufficiently of the parts which I did not see. I found the country not only fruitful in the soil, but wonderfully temperate and agreeable in its climate. The air, though hot, according to its proper latitude, yet that heat so moderated by the cool breezes from the mountains, that it was rather equal to the plain countries in other parts of the world, in the latitude of fifty, than to a climate in thirty-eight to forty degrees.

This gave the inhabitants the advantages, not only of pleasant and agreeable living, but also of a particular fertility, which hot climates are not blessed with, especially as to corn, the most necessary of all productions, such as wheat, I mean European wheat, or English wheat, which grew here as well and as kindly as in England; which in Peru, and the Isthmus of America, will by no means thrive for want of moisture and cold.

Here were, also, an excellent middling breed of black cattle, which they fed under the shade of the mountains, and on the banks of the rivers, till they came to be very fat. In a word, here were, or might be produced, all the plants, fruits and grain, of a temperate climate; at the same time, the orange, lemon, citron, pomegranate, and figs, with a moderate care, would come to a very tolerable perfection in their gardens, and even sugar-canes, in some places, though these last but rarely, and not without great art in the cultivation, and chiefly in gardens.

They assured me, that further southward beyond Baldivia, and to the latitude of forty-seven to forty-nine, the lands were esteemed richer than where we now were; the grass more strengthening and nourishing for the cattle, and that, consequently, the black cattle, horses, and hogs, were all of a larger breed; but that as the Spaniards had no settlement beyond Baldivia to the south, so they did not find the natives so tractable as where we then were; where, though the Spaniards were but few, and the strength they had, was but small, yet, as upon any occasion they had always been assisted with forces sufficient from St Jago, and if need were, even from Peru, so the natives had always been subdued, and had found themselves obliged to submit, and that now they were entirely reduced, and were, and had been, for several years, very easy and quiet. Besides the plentiful harvest which they made of gold from the mountains, (which appeared to be the great allurements of the Spaniards), had drawn them rather to settle here, than further southward, being naturally addicted, as my new landlord confessed to me, to reap the harvest which had the least labour and hazard attending it, and the most profit.

Not but that at the same time he confessed, that he believed, and had heard, that there was as much gold to be found further to the south, as far as the mountains continued; but that, as I have said, the natives were more troublesome, and more dangerous, than where they now lived, and that the king of Spain did not allow troops sufficient to civilize and reduce them.

I asked him concerning the natives in the country where we were;—he told me they were the most quiet and inoffensive people, since the Spaniards had reduced them by force, that could be desired,—that they were not, indeed, numerous or warlike, the warlike and obstinate part of them having fled farther off to the south, as they were overpowered by the Spaniards;—that for those that were left, they lived secure, under the protection of the Spanish governor;—that they fed cattle and planted the country, and sold the product of their lands very much to the Spaniards, but that they did not covet to be rich only to obtain clothes, arms, powder and shot, which however, they let them have but sparingly and with good assurance of their fidelity. I asked him if they were not treacherous and per-fidious, and if it was not dangerous trusting themselves among them in the mountains, and among the retired places where they dwelt;—he told me that it was quite the contrary, that they were so honest, and so harmless, that he would at any time venture to send his two sons into the mountains a hunting, with each of them a Chilian for his guide, and let them stay with the said natives two or three nights and days at a time, and be in no uneasiness about them; and that none of them were ever known to do any foul or treacherous thing by the Spaniards, since he had been in that country.

Having thus fully informed myself of things, I began now to think it was high time to see the main sight which I came to enquire after, (viz.) the passages of the mountains, and the wonders that were to be discovered on the other side; and accordingly I took my patron the Spaniard by himself, and told him, that as I was a traveller, and was now in such a remote part of the world, he could not but think I should be glad to see everything extraordinary, that was to be seen; that I might be able to give some account of the world when I came into Europe, better, and differing from what others had done, who had been there before me; and that I had a great mind, if he would give me his assistance, to enter into the passages and valleys which he had told me so much of in the mountains, and, if it was possible, which, indeed, I had always thought it was not, to take a prospect of the world on the other side.

He told me, it was not a light piece of work, and, perhaps, the discoveries might not answer my trouble, there being little to be seen but steep precipices, inhospitable rocks, and unpassable mountains, immuring us on every side, innumerable rills and brooks of water falling from the cliffs, making a barbarous and unpleasant sound; and that sound echoed and reverberated from innumerable cavities and hollows among the rocks, and these all pouring down into one middle stream, which we should always find on one side or other of us as we went, and that sometimes, we should be obliged to pass those middle streams, as well as the rills and brooks on the sides, without a bridge, and at the expence of pulling off our clothes.

He told us, that we should meet, indeed, with provisions enough, and with an innocent, harmless people, who, according to their ability, would entertain us very willingly; but that I who was a stranger, would be sorely put to it for lodging, especially for so many of us.

However, he said, as he had, perhaps, at first, raised this curiosity in me, by giving me a favourable account of the place, he would be very far from discouraging me now; and that if I resolved to go, he would not only endeavour to make every thing as pleasant to me as he could, but that he and his major domo would go along with me, and see us safe through, and safe home again; but desired me, not to be in too much haste, for that he must make some little preparation for the journey, which, as he told us, might, perhaps, take us up fourteen or sixteen days forward, and as much back again; not, he said, that it was necessary that we should be so long going and coming, as that he supposed I would take time to see every thing which I might think worth seeing, and not be in so much haste, as if I was sent express. I told him, he was very much in the right; that I did not desire to make a thing, which I expected so much pleasure in, be a toil to me more than needs must; and above all, that, as I supposed, I should not return into these parts very soon, I would not take a cursory view of a place, which I expected would be so well worth seeing, and let it be known to all, I should speak of it to, that I wanted to see it again, before I could give a full account of it.

“Well, seignior,” says he, “we will not be in haste, or view it by halves; for if wild and uncouth places will be a diversion to you, I promise myself your curiosity shall be fully gratified; but as to extraordinary things, rarities in nature, and surprising incidents which foreigners expect, I cannot say much to that. However, what think you, seignior, says he, if we should take a tour a little way into the entrance of the hills, which I showed you the other day, and look upon the gate of this gulph? perhaps your curiosity may be satisfied with the first day’s prospect, which I assure you, will be none of the most pleasant, and you may find yourself sick of the enterprize.”

I told him, no; I was so resolved upon the attempt, since he, who, I was satisfied, would not deceive me, had represented it as so feasible, and especially since he had offered to conduct me through it, that I would not, for all the gold that was in the mountains, lay it aside. He shook his head at that expression, and smiling at the doctor, says he, “this gentleman little thinks that there is more gold in these mountains, nay, even in this part where we are, than there is now above ground in the whole world: partly understanding what he said, I answered, my meaning was, to let him see, that nothing could divert me from the purpose of viewing the place, unless he himself forbid me, which, I hoped he would not; and that as for looking a little way into the passage, to try if the horror of the place would put a check to my curiosity, I would not give him that trouble, seeing the more terrible and frightful, the more difficult and impracticable it was, provided it could be mastered at last, the more it would please me to attempt and overcome it.

“Nay, nay, seignior,” said he pleasantly, “there is nothing difficult or impracticable in it, nor is it any thing but what the country people, and even some of our nation, perform every day; and that, not only by themselves, either for sport in pursuit of game, but even with droves of cattle, which they go with from place to place, as to a market, or a fair; and, therefore, if the horror of the clefts and precipices, the noises of the volcanos, the fire, and such things as you may see and hear above you, will not put a stop to your curiosity, I assure you, you shall not meet with any thing unpassable or impracticable below, nor any thing but what, with the assistance of God, and the blessed virgin (and then he crossed himself, and so we did all) we shall go cheerfully over.”

Finding, therefore, that I was thus resolutely bent upon the enterprize, but not in the least guessing at my design, he gave order to have servants and mules provided, for mules are much fitter to travel among the hills than horses; and in four days he promised to be ready for a march.

I had nothing to do in all these four days, but to walk abroad, and, as we say, look about me; but I took this opportunity to give instructions to my two midshipmen, who were called my servants, in what they were to do.

First, I charged them to make land-marks, bearings, and beacons, as we might call them, upon the points of the rocks above them, and at every turning in the way below them, also at the reaches and windings of the rivers or brooks, falls of water, and every thing remarkable; and to keep each of them separate and distinct journals of these things; not only to find the way back again by the same steps; but that they might be able to find that way afterwards by themselves, and without guides, which was the bottom and true intent of all the rest of my undertakings; and as I knew these were both capable to do it, and had courage and fidelity to undertake it, I had singled them out for the attempt and had made them fully acquainted with my whole scheme, and, consequently, they knew the meaning, and reason of my present discourse with them: they promised not to fail to shew me a plan of the hills, with the bearings of every point, one with another, where every step was to be taken, and every turning to the right hand, or to the left, and such a journal, I believe, was never seen before, or since; but it is too long for this place. I shall, however, take out the heads of it as I go along, which may serve as a general description of the place.

The evening of the fourth day, as he had appointed, my friend the Spaniard let me know that he was ready to set out, and accordingly we began our cavalcade: my retinue consisted of six, as before, and we had mules provided for us; my two midshipmen, as servants, had two mules given them also for their baggage; the Spaniard had six also, viz. his gentleman, or, as I called him before, his major domo, on horse-back, that is to say, on mule-back, with mules for his baggage, and four servants on foot. Just before we set out, his gentleman brought every one of us a fuzee, and our two servants, each a harquebush, or short musket, with cartouches, powder and ball, and adjoined a pouch with small shot, such as we call swan shot, for fowls, or deer, as we saw occasion.

I was as well pleased with this, as with any thing, because I had not so entire a confidence in the native Chilians as he had; but I saw plainly, some time after, that I was wrong in that, for nothing could be more honest, quiet, and free from design, than those people, except the poor honest people where we dressed up the king and queen, as above.

We were late in the morning before we got out, having all this equipage to furnish, and travelling very gently, it was about two hours before sun-set when we came to the entrance of the mountains, where, to my surprise, I found we were to go in upon a level, without any ascent, at least, that was considerable: we had, indeed, gone up upon a pretty sharp ascent for near two miles before we came to the place.

The entrance was agreeable enough, the passage being near half a mile broad. On the left hand was a small river, whose channel was deep but the water shallow, there having been but little rain for some time; the water ran very rapid, and, as the Spaniard told me, was sometimes exceeding fierce; the entrance lay inclining a little south, and was so straight that we could see near a mile before us, but the prodigious height of the hills on both sides and before us, appearing one over another, gave such a prospect of horror, that I confess it was frightful at first to look on the stupendous height of the rocks. Everything before us looking one higher than another was amazing, and to see how, in some places, they hung over the river and over the passage, it threatened a man with being some time or other swallowed up.

The rocks and precipices on our right hand had here and there vast clefts and entrances, which looked as if they had been different thoroughfares, but when we came to look full into them we could see them close up at the further end, and go off in slopes, and with gullies made by the water which, in hasty rains, came pouring down from the hills, and which at a distance made such noises as it is impossible to conceive, unless by having seen and heard the like, for the water falling sometimes from a height twenty times as high as the Monument, and perhaps much more, and meeting in the passage with many dashes and interruptions, it is impossible to describe how, the sound crossing and interfering, mingled with itself, and the several noises sunk one into another, increasing the whole, as the many waters joining increased the main stream.

We entered this passage about two miles the first night: after the first length which, as I said, held about three-quarters of a mile, we turned away to the south, short on the right hand; the river leaving us, seemed to come through a very narrow but deep hollow of the mountains, where there was little more breadth at the bottom than the channel took up, though the rocks gave back as they ascended, as placed in several stages, though all horrid and irregular, and we could see nothing but blackness and terror all the way. I was glad our way did not turn on that side, but wondered that we should leave the river, and the more when I found that, in the way we went, having first mounted gently a green pleasant slope; when it declined again we found, as it were, a new rivulet began in the middle, and the water ran S. E., or thereabouts. This made me begin to ask if the water went away into the New World beyond the hills? My patron smiled, and said, "No, seignior, not yet; we shall meet with the other river again very quickly;" and so we found it the next morning.

When we came a little further we found the passage open, and we came to a very pleasant plain, which declined a little gradually, widening to the left or east side. On the right side of this we saw another vast opening like the first, which went in about half a mile, and then closed up as the first had done, sloping up to the top of the hills a most monstrous inconceivable height.

My patron stopping here, and getting down or alighting from his mule gave him to his man, and asking me to alight, told me, this was the first night's entertainment I was to meet with in the Andes, and hoped I was prepared for it. I told him, that I might very well consent to accept of such entertainment in a journey of my own contriving, as he was content to take up with in compliment to me.

I looked around me to see if there were any huts or cots of the mountaineers thereabouts, but I perceived none; only I observed something like a house, and it was really a house of some of the said mountaineers upon the top of a precipice as high from where we stood as the top of the cupola of St Paul's, and I saw some living creature, whether men or women I could not tell, looking from thence down upon us. However, I understood afterwards that they had ways to come at their dwelling, which were very easy and agreeable, and had lanes and plains where they fed their cattle, and had everything growing that they desired.

My patron making a kind of invitation to me to walk, took me up that dark chasm or opening on the right hand, which I have just mentioned, "Here, sir," said he, "if you will venture to walk a few steps 'tis likely we may show you some of the product of this country;" but as it grew towards night, he added, "But I see it is too dark, perhaps we may do it in the morning." And with this we walked back towards the place where we left our mules and servants, and when we came thither there was a complete camp fixed. Three very handsome tents raised and a bar set up at a distance where the mules were tied one to another to graze, and the servants and the baggage lay together with an open tent over them.

My patron led me into the first tent, and told me he was obliged to let me know that I must make shift with that lodging, the place not affording any better.

Here we had quilts laid very artificially and clever for me and my three comrades, and we lodged very comfortably; but before we came to that we had the third tent to go to, in which there was a very handsome table covered with all conveniences, and, in a word, with a cold treat, that is to say, cold roasted mutton and beef, very well dressed, and after that, some potted or baked venison, with pickles, preserves, and very fine sweetmeats.

Here we ate very freely, but he bid us depend upon it that we should not fare so well the next night, and so it would be worse every night, till we came to lie entirely at a mountaineer's; but he was better to us than he pretended.

In the morning we had our chocolate as regularly as we used to have it in his own house, and we were up and ready to travel in a moment. We went winding now from the S.E. to the left, till our course looked E. by N., when we came again to have the river in view. But I should have observed here that my two midshipmen and two of my patron's servants had, by his direction, been very early in the morning clambering up the rocks in the opening on the right hand, and had come back again about a quarter of an hour after we set out, when missing my two men, I inquired for them, and my patron said they were coming, for, it seems, he saw them at a distance, and so we halted for them.

When they were come almost up to us, he called to his men in Spanish to ask if they had had una bon vejo? They answered, Poco, Poco:

and when they came quite up, one of my midshipmen showed me three or four small bits of clean perfect gold, which they had picked up in the hill or gullet where the water trickled down from the rocks, and the Spaniards told them, that had they had time they should have found much more, the water being quite down, and nobody having been there since the last hard rain. One of the Spaniards had three small bits in his hand also; I said nothing for the present, but charged my midshipmen to mark the place, and so we went on.

We followed up the stream of this water for three days more, encamping every night as before; in which time we passed by several such openings into the rocks on either side. On the fourth day we had the prospect of a very pleasant valley and river below us on the north side, keeping its course almost in the middle, the valley reaching near four miles in length, and in some places near two miles broad.

This sight was perfectly surprising, because here we found the vale fruitful, level, and inhabited, there being several small villages or clusters of houses such as the Chilians live in, which are low houses covered with a kind of sedge, and sheltered with little rows of thick grown trees, of what kind we knew not.

We saw no way through, nor which way we were to go out; but saw it everywhere bounded with prodigious mountains, look to which side of the valley we would. We kept still on the right, which was now the south-east side of the river, and as we followed it up the stream it was still less than at first, and lessened every step we went, because of the number of rills we left behind us. And here we encamped the fifth time, and all this while the Spanish gentleman victualled us. Then we turned again to the right, where we had a new and beautiful prospect of another valley as broad as the other, but not above a mile in length.

After we were through this valley my patron rides up to a poor little cottage of a Chilian Indian without any ceremony, and calling us all about him, told us that there we would go to dinner. We saw a smoke indeed in the house, rather than come out of it, and it smothered through a hole in the roof instead of a chimney. However, to this house, as to an inn, my patron had sent away his major domo and another servant, and there they were as busy as two cooks, boiling and stewing goat's flesh and fowls, making us soup, broth, and such hodge-podge, as it seems they were used to provide, and which, however homely the cottage was, we found very savoury and good.

Immediately a loose tent was pitched, and we had our table set up and dinner served in, and within about two hours we had eaten it, reposed ourselves after it (as the custom there is) and were ready to travel again.

I had room all this while to observe and wonder at the admirable structure of this place, which may serve, in my opinion, for the eighth wonder of the world, that is to say, supposing there were but seven before. We had in the middle of the day, indeed, a very hot sun, and the reflection from the mountains made it still hotter, but the height of the rocks on every side began to cast long shadows before three o'clock, except where the openings looked towards the west, and as soon as those shadows reached us the cool breezes of the air came naturally on, drawing every way exceeding pleasant and refreshing.

The place we were in was green and flourishing, and the soil well cultivated by the poor industrious Chilians, who lived here in perfect solitude, and pleased with their liberty from the tyranny of the Spaniards, who very seldom visited them, and never molested them, being pretty much out of their way, except when they came for hunting and diversion; and then they used the Chilians always civilly, because they were obliged to them for their assistance in their diversions, the Chilians of those valleys being very active, strong, and nimble fellows.

By this means most of them were furnished with fire-arms, powder, and shot, and were very good marksmen, but as to violence against anybody, they entertained no thoughts of that kind, as I could perceive, but were content with their way of living, which was easy and free.

The tops of the mountains here, the vallies being so large, were much plainer to be seen than where the passages were narrow, for there the height was so great that we could see nothing. Here, at several distances, (the rocks towering one over another) we might see smoke come out of some, snow lying upon others, trees and bushes growing upon others, and goats, wild asses, and other creatures which we could hardly distinguish, running about on others.

When we had passed through this second valley, I perceived we came to a narrower passage, and something like the first; the entrance into it indeed was smooth, and above a quarter of a mile broad, and it went winding away to the N., and then again turned round to the N.E., afterwards almost due E., and then to the S.E. and so to S.S.E., and this frightful narrow strait, with the hanging rocks almost closing on the top, whose height we could neither see nor guess at, continued about three days' journey more, most of the way ascending gently upwards; and as to the river, it was by this time quite lost, but we might see, that on any occasion of rain, or of the melting of the snow on the mountains, there was a hollow in the middle of the valley, through which the water made its way, and on either hand the sides of the hills were full of the like gullies, made by the violence of the rain, where, not the earth only, but the rocks themselves, even the very stone, seemed to be worn and penetrated by the continual fall of the water.

Here my patron showed me, that in the hollow which I mentioned, in the middle of this way, and at the bottom of those gullies, or places worn, as above, in the rocks, there were often found pieces of gold, and sometimes, after a rain, very great quantities: and that there were few of the little Chilian cottages which I had seen, where they had not sometimes a pound or two of gold dust and lumps of gold by them; and he was mistaken, if I was willing to tarry and make the experiment, if we did not find some, even then, in a very little search.

The Chilian mountaineer at whose house we had stopped to dine, had gone with us, and he hearing my patron say thus, runs presently to the hollow channel in the middle; there was a kind of a fall, or break in it, where the water by falling perhaps two or three feet, had made a little place deeper than the rest; and which, though there was no water then running, yet had water in it, perhaps the quantity of a barrel or two; here, with the help of two of the servants and a kind of scoop, he presently threw out the water, with the sand and whatever was at bottom among it, into the ordinary water-course; the water falling thus hard, every scoopful upon the sand or earth that came out of the scoop before it, washed a great deal of it away; and among that which remained, we might plainly see little lumps of gold shining, as big as grains of sand, and sometimes one or two a little bigger.

This was demonstration enough to us; I took up some small grains of it, about the quantity of half a quarter of an ounce, and left my midshipmen to take up more, and they stayed indeed so long, that they could scarce see their way to overtake us, and brought away about two ounces in all, the Chilian and the servants very freely giving them all they found.

When we had travelled about nine miles more in this winding frightful narrow way, it began to grow towards night, and my patron talked of taking up our quarters as we had before; but his gentleman put him in mind of a Chilian, one of their old servants, who lived in a turning among the mountains, about half a mile out of our way, and where we might be accommodated again with the helps of a house, and place, at least, for our cookery. "Very true," says our patron, "we will go thither, and there, seignior," says he, turning to me, "you shall see an emblem of complete felicity, even in the middle of this place of horror; and you shall see a prince greater, and more truly so, than King Philip, who is the greatest man in the world."

Accordingly we went softly on, his gentleman having advanced before, and, in about half a mile we found a turning or opening on our left, where we beheld a deep, large valley, almost circular, and of about a mile diameter, and abundance of houses or cottages interspersed all over it, so that the whole valley looked like an inhabited village, and the ground like a planted garden.

We who, as I said, had been for some miles ascending upwards, were so high above them, that the low valley looked as the low lands in England look below Box hill, in Surrey; and I began to ask how we should get down? But as we were come into a wider space than before, so we had more daylight; for though the hollow way had rendered it near dusk before, now it was almost clear day again.

Here we parted with the first Chilian that I mentioned, and I ordered one of my midshipmen to give him a hat and a piece of black baize, enough to make him a cloak; which so obliged the man, that he knew not what way to testify his joy; but I knew what I was doing in this, and I ordered my midshipman to do it, that he might make his acquaintance with him against another time, and it was not a gift ill bestowed, as will appear in its place.

We were now obliged to quit our mules, who all took up their quarters at the top of the hill, while we, by footings made in the rocks, descended, as we might say, down a pair of stairs of half a mile long, but with many plain places between, like foot paces, for the ease of going and coming.

Thus winding and turning to avoid the declivity of the hill, we came very safe to the bottom, where my patron's gentleman and our new landlord that was to be, came to pay his compliment to us.

He was dressed in a jerkin made of an otter skin, like a doublet, a pair of long Spanish breeches of leather, dressed after the Spanish fashion, green, and very soft, and which looked very well, but what the skin was I could not guess; he had over it a mantle of a kind of cotton, dyed in two or three grave brown colours, and thrown about him like a Scotchman's plaid; he had shoes of a particular make, tied on like sandals, flat-heeled, no stockings, his breeches hanging down below the calf of his leg, and his shoes lacing up above his ankles; he had on a cap of the skin of some small beast like a racoon, with a bit of the tail hanging out from the crown of his head backward, a long pole in his hand, and a servant, as oddly dressed as himself, carried his gun: he had neither spado nor dagger.

When our patron came up the Chilian stepped forward and made him three very low bows, and then they talked together, not in Spanish, but in a kind of mountain jargon, some Spanish, and some Chilian, of which I scarce understood one word. After a few words, I understood he said something about a stranger come to see, and then, I suppose, added the passages of the mountains; then the Chilian came towards me, made me three bows, and bade me welcome in Spanish. As soon as he had said that, he turns to his barbarian, I mean his servant, for he was as ugly a looking fellow as ever I saw, and taking his gun from him, presented it to me; my patron bade me take it, for he saw me a little at a loss what to do, telling me, that as it was the greatest compliment that a Chilian could pay to me, he would be very ill pleased and out of humour if it was not accepted, and would think we did not care to be friendly with him.

As we had given this Chilian no notice of our coming, no, not a quarter of an hour, we could not expect great matters of entertainment, and, as we carried our provision with us, we did not stand in much need of it; but we had no reason to complain.

This man's habitation was all the same as the rest, low, and covered with a sedge, or a kind of reed, which we found grew very plentifully in the valley where he lived. He had several pieces of ground round his dwelling, inclosed with stone walls, made very artificially with small stones, and no mortar; these enclosed grounds were planted with several kinds of garden-stuff for his household, such as plantains, Spanish cabbages, green cocoa, and other things, of the growth of their own country, and two of them with European wheat.

He had five or six apartments in his house, every one of them had a door into the air, and into one another, and two of them were very large and decent, had long tables on one side, made after their own way, and benches to sit to them like our country people's long tables in England, and mattresses, like couches, all along the other side, with skins of several sorts of wild creatures, laid on them to repose on in the heat of the day, as is the usage among the Spaniards.

Our people set up their tents and beds abroad, as before; but my patron told me the Chilian would take it very ill if he and I did not take up our lodging in his house, and we had two rooms provided, very magnificent in their way. The mattress we lay on had a large canopy over it, spread like the crown of a tent, and covered with a large piece of cotton, white as milk, and which came round every way like a curtain, so that if it had been in the open field, it would have been a complete covering; the bed, such as it was, might be as hard as a quilt, and not more, and the covering was of the same cotton as the curtain work, which, it seems, is the manufacture of the Chilian women, and is made very dextrously; it looked wild, but was pleasant enough, and proper to the place, so I slept very comfortably in it.

But, I must confess, I was surprised at the aspect of things in the night here. It was, as I told you above, very near night when we came to this man's cottage (palace I should have called it), and while we were taking our repast, which was very pretty, it grew quite night; we had wax candles brought in for light, which, it seems, my patron's man had provided, and the place had so little communication with the air by windows, that we saw nothing of what was without doors.

After supper, my patron turns to me; "Come, seignior," said he, "pray prepare yourself to take a walk."—"What! in the dark!" said I, "in such a country as this?"—"No, no," says he, "it is never dark here; you are now come to the country of everlasting day. What think you,—is not this Elysium?"—"I do not understand you," says I.—"But you will presently," says he, "when I shall show you that it is now lighter abroad than when we came in." Soon after this some of the servants opened the door that went into the next room, and the door of that room, which opened into the air, stood open, from whence a light of fire shone into the outer room, and so further into ours. "What are they burning there?" says I to my patron. "You will see presently," says he, adding, "I hope you will not be surprised." So he led me out to that door.

But who can express the thoughts of a man's heart, coming on a sudden into a place where the whole world seemed to be of a fire-light? The valley was on one side so exceeding bright, the eye could scarce bear to look at it; the sides of the mountains were shining like the fire itself; the flame from the top of the mountain on the other side casting its light directly upon them, from thence the reflection into other parts looked red, and more terrible; for the first was white and clear, like the light of the sun, but the other being, as it were, a reflection of light, mixed with some darker cavities, represented the fire of a furnace, and, in short, it might well be said, here was no darkness; but, certainly, at the first view, it gives no traveller any other idea than that of being at the very entrance of eternal horror.

All this while there was no fire, that is to say, no real flame to be seen, only, that where the flame was, it shone clearly into the valley; but the volcano, or volcanoes, from whence the fire issued out (for it seems there were no less than three of them, though at the distance of some miles from one another), were on the south and east sides of the valley, which was so much on that side where we were that we could see nothing but the light, neither on the other side could they see any more, it seems, than just the top of the flame: not knowing anything of the places from whence it issued out, which no mortal creature, no, not of the Chilians themselves, were ever hardy enough to go near; nor would it be possible, if any should attempt it, the tops of the hills, for many leagues about them, being covered with new mountains of ashes and stones, which are daily cast out of the mouths of those volcanoes, by which they grew everyday higher than they were before, and which would overwhelm not only men, but whole armies of men, if they should venture to come near them.

When first we came into the long narrow way I mentioned last, I observed that, as I thought, the wind blew very hard aloft among the hills, and that it made a noise like thunder, which I thought nothing of but as a thing usual; but now that I came to this terrible sight, and that I heard the same thunder and yet found the air calm and quiet, I soon understood that it was a continued thunder, occasioned by the roaring of the fire in the bowels of the mountains.

It was some time, you may suppose, before a traveller, unacquainted with such things, could make them familiar to him; and though the horror and surprise might abate after proper reflections on the nature and reason of the thing, yet I had a kind of astonishment upon me for a great while; every different place to which I turned my eye presented me with a new scene of horror. I was for awhile frightened at the fire being, as it were, over my head, for I could see nothing of it, but that the air looked as if it were all on fire, and I could not persuade myself but it would cast down the rocks and mountains on on my head. But they laughed me out of that part. After a while I asked them if these volcanoes did not cast out a kind of liquid fire; as I had seen an account of on the monstrous eruptions of Mount Etna, which cast out a prodigious stream of fire and run eight leagues into the sea. Upon my putting this question to my patron, he asked the Chilian how long ago it was since such a stream, calling it by a name of their own, ran fire? He answered, it ran now; and if we were disposed to walk but three furlongs, we should see it.

He said little to me, but asked me if I cared to walk a little way by this kind of light? I told him, it was a surprising place we were in, but I supposed he would lead me into no danger. He said he would assure me he would lead me into no danger; that these things were very familiar to them; but that I might depend there was no hazard, and that the flames which gave all this light were six or seven miles off, and some of them more. We walked along the plain of the valley about half a mile, when another great valley opened to the right, and gave us a more dreadful prospect than any we had seen before; for at the farther end of this second valley, but at the distance of about three miles from where we stood, we saw a livid stream of fire come running down the sides of the mountain for near three quarters of a mile in length, running like melted metal into a mould or out of a furnace, till, I suppose, as it came nearer the bottom it cooled and separated, and so went out of itself.

Beyond this, over the summit of a prodigious mountain, we could see the tops of the clear flame of a volcano, a dreadful one, no doubt, could we have seen it all, and from the mouth of which, it was supposed, this stream of fire came; though the Chilian assured us that the fire itself was eight leagues off, and that the liquid fire which we saw came out of the side of the mountain, and was two leagues off from the great volcano itself, running like metal out of a furnace. They told me there was a great deal of melted gold run down with the other inflamed earth in that stream, and that much gold was afterwards found there. But this I was to take upon trust.

This sight was, as you will easily suppose, best at a distance, and indeed I had enough of it. As for my two midshipmen, they were almost frightened out of all their resolutions of going any further in this horrible place, and when we came back they came mighty seriously to me, and begged of me for God's sake not to venture any further upon the faith of these Spaniards, for that they would certainly carry us all into some mischief or other, and betray us.

I bade them be easy, for I saw nothing in it at all that looked like treachery. That it was true, indeed, it was a terrible place to look on, but it seemed to be nothing but what was natural and familiar there, and we should be soon out of it. They told me very seriously that they believed it was the very mouth of hell, and that, in short, they were not able to bear it, and begged of me to go back; I told them no, I could not think of going back; but if they could not endure it, I would give consent that they should go back in the morning. However, we went, for the present, to the Chilian's house again, where we got a plentiful draught of Chilian wine, for my patron had taken care to have a good quantity of it with us, and in the morning my two midshipmen, who got very drunk over night, had courage enough to venture forward again; for the light of the sun put quite another face upon things, and nothing of the fire was then to be seen, only the smoke.

All our company lodged in the tents here, but I and my patron the Spaniard, who lodged within the Chilian's house, as I told you. This Chilian was a great man among the natives, and all the valley I spoke of, which lay round his dwelling, was called his own; he lived in a state of perfect tranquillity, neither enjoying nor coveting anything but what was necessary, and wanting nothing that was so; he had gold, as it might be said, for picking it up off the dunghill, for it was found in all the little gullies and rills of water, which, as I have said, come down from the mountains on every side; yet I did not find that he troubled himself to lay up any great quantity more than served to go to Villa Rica, and buy what he wanted for himself and family; he had, it seems, a wife and some daughters, but no sons; these lived in a separate house, about a furlong from this where he lived, and were kept there as a family by themselves, and if he had had any sons they would have lived with him.

He did not offer to go with us any part of our way, as the other had done; but having entertained us with great civility took his leave. I caused one of my midshipmen to make him a present, when we came away, of a piece of black baize, enough to make him a cloak, as I did the other, and a piece of blue English serge, enough to make him a jerkin and breeches, which he accepted as a great bounty.

We set out again, though not very early in the morning, having, as I said, sat up late and drank freely over night, and we found that after we had gone to sleep it had rained very hard, and though the rain was over before we went out, yet the falling of the water from the hills made such a confused noise, and was echoed so backward and forward from all sides, that it was like a strange mixture of distant thunder, and though we knew the causes yet it could not be but surprising to us for awhile.

However, we set forward, the way under foot being pretty good, and first we went up the steps again by which we had come down, (our last host waiting on us thither,) and there I gave him back his gun, for he would not take it before.

In this valley, which was the pleasantest by day and the most dismal by night that ever I saw, I observed abundance of goats, as well tame in the inclosures as wild upon the rocks; and we found afterwards that the latter were perfectly wild, and to be had, like those at Juan Fernandez, by anybody that could catch them. My patron sent off two of his men, just as a huntsman casts off hounds, to go and catch goats, and they brought us in three, which they shot in less than half an hour; and these we carried with us for our evening supply, for we made no dinner this day, having fed heartily in the morning about nine, and had chocolate two hours before that.

We travelled now along the narrow winding passage, which I mentioned before, for about four hours, till I found, that though we had ascended but gently, yet that, as we had done so for almost twenty miles together, we were got up to a frightful height, and I began to expect some very difficult descent on the other side; but we were made easy about two o'clock, when the way not only declined again to the east, but grew wider, though with frequent turnings and winding about, so that we could seldom see above half a mile before us. We went on thus pretty much upon a level, now rising, now falling, but still I found that we were a very great height from our first entrance; and as to the running of the water, I found that it showed neither east nor west, but ran all down the little turnings that we frequently met with on the north side of our way, which my patron told me went all into the great valley where we saw the fire, and so went away by a general channel north-west, till it found its way out into the open country of Chili, and so to the South Seas.

We were now come to another night's lodging, which we were obliged to take up with on the green grass, as we did the first night; but by the help of our proveditor-general, my patron, we fared very well, our goat's flesh being reduced into so many sorts of venison, that none of us could distinguish it from the best venison we ever tasted.

Here we slept without any of the frightful things we saw the night before, except that we might see the light of the fire in the air, at a great distance, like a great city on fire, but that gave us no disturbance at all.

In the morning our two hunters shot a deer, or rather a young fawn, before we were awake, and this was the first we met with in this part of our travel, and thus we were provided for dinner even before breakfast time. As for our breakfast, it was always a Spanish breakfast, that is to say, about a pint of chocolate.

We set out very merrily in the morning, and we that were Englishmen could not refrain smiling at one another, to think how we passed through a country where the gold lay in every ditch, as we might call it, and never troubled ourselves so much as to stoop to take it up; so certain is it that it is easy to be placed in a station of life where that very gold, the heaping up of which is here made the main business of man's living in the world, would be of no value, and not worth taking off from the ground; nay, not of signification enough to make a present of; for that was the case here. Two or three yards of Colchester baize, a coarse rug-like manufacture, worth in London about fifteen-pence halfpenny per yard, was here a present for a man of quality; when, for a handful of gold dust, the same person would scarcely thank you, or, perhaps, would think himself not kindly treated to have it offered him.

We travelled this day pretty smartly, having rested at noon about two hours, as before, and, by my calculation, went about 22 English miles in all. About five o'clock in the afternoon we came into a broad, plain, open place, where, though it was not properly a valley, yet we found it lay very level for a good way together. Our way lying almost E. S. E., after we had marched so about two miles, I found the way go evidently down hill, and in half a mile more, to our singular satisfaction, we found the water from the mountains ran plainly eastward, and, consequently, to the North Sea.

We saw at a distance several huts, or houses of the mountaineer inhabitants, but we came near none of them, but kept on our way, going down two or three pretty steep places, not at all dangerous, though somewhat difficult.

We encamped again the next night, as before, and still our good caterer had plenty of food for us; but I observed that the next morning, when we set forward, our tents were left standing, the baggage-mules tied together to graze, and our company lessened by all my patron's servants, which, when I inquired about, he told me he hoped we should have good quarters quickly without them. I did not understand him for the present, but it unriddled itself soon after; for though we travelled four days more in that narrow way, yet he always found us lodging at the cottages of the mountaineers. The sixth day we went all day up hill. At last, on a sudden, the way turned short east, and opened into a vast wide country, boundless to the eye every way, and delivered us entirely from the mountains of the Andes, in which we had wandered so long.

Any one may guess what an agreeable surprise this was to us, to whom it was the main end of our travels. We made no question that this was the open country extending to the North or Atlantic Ocean, but how far it was thither, or what inhabitants it was possessed by, what travelling, what provisions to be found in the way, what rivers to pass, and whether any navigable or not; this our patron himself could not tell us one word of, owning frankly to us that he had never been one step further than the place where we then stood, and that he had been there only once to satisfy his curiosity, as I did now.

I told him that if I had lived where he did, and had had servants and provisions at command, as he had, it would have been impossible for me to have restrained my curiosity so far as not to have searched that whole country to the sea side long ago. I told him it seemed to be a pleasant and fruitful soil, and, no doubt, was capable of cultivation and improvement; and if it had been only to have possessed such a country in his Catholic Majesty's name, it must have been worth while to undertake the discovery for the honour of Spain; and that there could be no room to question, but his Catholic Majesty would have honoured him that should have undertaken such a thing with some particular mark of his favour, which might be of consequence to him and his family.

He told me that as to that, the Spaniards seemed already to have more dominions in America than they could keep, and much more than they were able to reap the benefit of, and still more infinitely than they could improve, and especially in those parts called South America.

That it was next to miraculous that they could keep the possession where they were, and were not the natives so utterly destitute of support from any other part of the world, as not to be able to have either arms or ammunition put into their hands, it would be impossible, since I might easily see they were men that wanted not strength of body nor courage, and it was evident they did not want numbers, seeing they were already ten thousand natives to one Spaniard, taking the whole country from one end to the other.

He went on—"Then you see, seignior," says he, "how far we are from improvement in that part of the country which we possess, and many more, which, you may be sure are among these vast mountains, and which we never discovered, seeing all these valleys and passages among the mountains, where gold is to be had in such quantities, and with so much ease, that every poor Chilian gathers it up with his hands, and may have as much as he pleases; all are left open, naked and unregarded, in the possession of the wild mountaineers, who are heathens and savages; and the Spaniards, you see," says he, "are so few, and these few so indolent, so slothful, and so satisfied with the gold they get of the Chilians for things of small value in trade, that all this vast treasure lies unregarded by them.

Nay," adds he, "is it not very odd to observe, that when for our diversion we come out into the hills, and among these places where you see the gold is so easily found, we come, as we call it, a-hunting, and divert ourselves more with shooting wild parrots, or a fawn or two, for which also we ride and run, and make our servants weary themselves more than they would in fishing up the gold among the gullies and holes that the water makes in the rocks, and more than would suffice to find fifty, nay, one hundred times the value in gold.

"To what purpose, then, should we seek the possession of more countries, who are already possessed of more land than we can improve, and of more wealth than we know what to do with?" Perceiving me very attentive, he went on thus:—

"Were these mountains," said he, "valued in Europe, according to the riches to be found in them, the viceroy would obtain orders from the king to have strong forts erected at the entrance in, and at the coming out of them, as well on the side of Chili as here, and strong garrisons maintained in them, to prevent foreign nations landing, either on our side in Chili, or on this side in the North Seas, and taking the possession from us; he would then order thirty thousand slaves, negroes, or Chilians, to be constantly employed, not only in picking up what gold might be found in the channels of the water, which might easily be formed into proper receivers, so as that if any gold washed from the rocks, it should soon be found, and be so secured, as that none of it would escape; also others, with miners and engineers, might search into the very rocks themselves, and would, no doubt, find out such mines of gold, or other secret stores of it in those mountains, as would be sufficient to enrich the world.

"While we omit such things as these, seignior," says he, "what signifies Spain making new acquisitions, or the people of Spain seeking new countries? This vast tract of land you see here, and some hundreds of miles every way, which your eye cannot reach to, is a fruitful, pleasant, and agreeable piece of God's creation, but perfectly uncultivated, and most of it uninhabited; and any nation in Europe that thinks fit to settle in it are free to do so, for anything we are able to do to prevent them."

"But, seignior," said I, "does not his Catholic Majesty claim a title to the possession of it? and have the Spaniards no governor over it; nor any ports or towns, settlements or colonies in it, as is the case here in Chili?"—"Seignior," replies he, "the king of Spain is lord of America, as well that which he possesses as that which he possesses not, that right being given him by the Pope, in the right of his being a Christian prince, making new discoveries for propagating the Christian faith among infidels; how far that may pass for a title among the European powers I know not; I have heard that it has always passed for a maxim in Europe, that no country which is not planted by any prince or people can be said to belong to them; and, indeed, I cannot say but it seems to be rational that no prince should pretend to any title to a country where he does not think fit to plant, and to keep possession; for if he leaves the country unpossessed, he leaves it free for any other nation to come and possess; and this is the reason why the former king of Spain did not dispute that right of the French to their colonies of Mississippi and Canada, or the right of the English to the Caribbee Islands, or to their colonies of Virginia and New England.

"In like manner from Buenos Ayres, in the Rio de la Plata, which lies that way," says he, pointing N.E., "to the Fretum Magellanicum, which lies that way (pointing S.E.), which comprehends a vast number of leagues, is called by us Coasta Deserta, being unpossessed by Spain, and disregarded of all our nation; neither is there one Spaniard in it. Nevertheless, you see how fruitful, how pleasant, and how agreeable a climate it is, how apt for planting and peopling it seems to be,—and, above all, what a place of wealth here would be behind them, sufficient, and more than enough, both for them and us; for we should have no reason to offer them any disturbance; neither should we be in any condition to do it, the passages of the mountains being but few and difficult, as you have seen, and our numbers not sufficient to do anything more than block them up, to keep such people from breaking in upon our settlements on the coast of the South Seas."

I asked him if these notions of his were common among those of his country who were settled in Chili and Peru, or whether they were his own private opinions only. I told him I believed the latter; because I found he acted in all his affairs upon generous principles, and was for propagating the good of mankind: but that I questioned whether the governor of Old Spain, or the sub-governor, and viceroy of New Spain, acted upon those notions or no; and since he had mentioned the Buenos Ayres and the Rio de la Plata, I should take that as an example, seeing the Spaniards would never suffer any nation to set foot in that great river, where so many countries might have been discovered, and colonies planted, though at the same time they had not possessed or fully discovered those places themselves.

He answered me, smiling: "Seignior," says he, "you have given the reason for this yourself in that very part which you think is a reason against it. We have a colony at Buenos Ayres, and at the city of Ascension, higher up in the Rio de la Plata; and we are not willing to let any other nation settle there, because we would not let them see how weak we are, and what a vast extent of land we possess there with a few men, and this for two reasons:—First, we are possessed of the country, and daily increasing there, and may, in time, extend ourselves further. The great rivers Parana and Paraguay being yet left for us to plant in, and we are not willing to put ourselves out of a capacity of planting further, and therefore we keep the possession. Secondly, we have a communication from thence with Peru. That great river La Plata rises at the city La Plata, and out of the mountain Potosi, in Peru, and a great trade is carried on by that river, and it would be dangerous to let foreigners into the secret of that trade, which they might entirely cut off, especially when they should find that small number of Spaniards which are planted there to preserve it, seeing there are not six hundred Spaniards in all that vast country, which, by the course of that river is more than one thousand six hundred miles in length."

"I confess," said I, "these are just grounds for your keeping the possession of that river."—"They are so," said he, "and the more, because of so powerful a colony as the Portuguese have in the Brazils, which bound immediately upon it, and who were always encroaching upon it from the land side, and would gladly have a passage up the Rio Parana to the back of their colony."

"But here, seignior," says he, "the case is different, for we neither take nor keep possession here; neither have we one Spaniard, as I said, in the whole country now before you; and therefore we call this country Coasta Deserta; not that it is a desert, as that name is generally taken to signify, a barren, sandy, dry country; on the contrary, the infinite, prodigious increase of the European black cattle, which were brought by the Spaniards to the Buenos Ayres, and let run loose, is a sufficient testimony of the fruitfulness and richness of the soil, their number being such, that they kill above twenty thousand of them in a year, for nothing but the hides, which they carry away to Spain, leaving the flesh, though fat and wholesome, to perish on the ground, or to be devoured by birds of prey."

"And the number is so great, notwithstanding all they destroy, that they are found to wander sometimes in droves of many thousands together, over all the vast country between the Rio de la Plata, and the city of the Ascension, and the frontier of Peru, and even down into this country which you see before us, and up to the very foot of these mountains."

"Well," said I, "and is it not a great pity that all this part of the country, and in such a climate as this is, should lie uncultivated, or uninhabited rather? for I understand there are not any great numbers of people to be found among them."

"It is true," added he, "there are some nations of people spread about in this country; but as the terror of our people, the Spaniards, drove them at first from the sea coast towards these mountains, so the greatest part of them continue on this side still: for, towards the coast it is very rare that they find any people."

I would have inquired of him about rivers and navigable streams which might be in this country, but he told me frankly that he could give me no account of them, only thus, that if any of the rivers went away towards the north, they certainly run all into the great Rio de la Plata, but that if they went east, or southernly, they must go directly to the coast, which was ordinarily called, as he said, La Coasta Deserta, or as by some, the coast of Patagonia; that as to the magnitude of those rivers, he could say little, but that it could not be rational but there must be some very considerable rivers, and whose streams must needs be capable of navigation, seeing abundance of water must continually flow from the mountains where we then were, and its being at least four hundred miles from the sea side, those small streams must necessarily join together, and make large rivers in the plain country.

I had enough in this discourse fully to satisfy all my curiosity, and sufficiently to heighten my desire of making the farther discoveries I had in my thoughts.

We pitched our little camp here, and sat down to our repast; for I found that though we were to go back to lodge, yet my patron had taken care we should be furnished sufficiently for dinner, and have a good house to eat it in; that is to say, a tent, as before.

The place where we stood, though we had come down-hill for a great way, yet seemed very high from the ordinary surface of the country, and gave us, therefore, an exceedingly fine prospect of it, the country declining gradually for near ten miles; and we thought, as well as the distance of the place would allow us, we saw a great river, but, as I learnt afterwards, it was rather a great lake than a river, which was supplied by the smaller rivers, or rivulets, from the mountains, which met there in a great receptacle of waters, and out of this lake they all issued again in one river, of which I shall have occasion to give a farther account hereafter.

While we were at dinner I ordered my midshipman to take their observations of every distant object, and to look at everything with their glasses, which they did, and told me of this lake; but my patron could give no account of it, having never been, as he said before, one step farther that way than where we were. However, my men showed me plainly that it was a great lake, and that there went a large river from it towards the E.S.E., and this was enough for me, for that way lay all the schemes I had laid.

I took this opportunity to ask my midshipmen, first, if they had taken such observations in their passage of the mountains, as that they were sure they could find their way through to this place again without guides? They assured me they could.

Then I put it to them—whether they thought it might not be feasible to travel over that vast level country to the North Seas? And to make a sufficient discovery of the country, so as that hereafter Englishmen coming to the coast on that side of the North Seas might penetrate to these golden mountains, and reap the benefit of the treasure without going a prodigious length about Cape Horn, and the Terra del Fuego, which was always attended with innumerable dangers; and without breaking through the kingdom of Chili, and the Spaniards' settlements, which, perhaps, we might soon be at peace with, and so be shut out that way by our own consents?

One of my men began to speak of the difficulties of such an attempt, the want of provisions, and other dangers which we should be exposed to on the way; but the other, a bold, brisk fellow, told me he made no question but it might be easily done, and especially because all the rivers they should meet with would, of course, run along with us, so that we should be sure to have the tide with us, as he called it; and at last he added that he would be content to be one of those men who should undertake it, provided he should be assured that the ships would not go away, and pretend that they could not be found. I told him we would talk farther about it; that I had such a thing in my head, and I had a strong inclination to undertake it myself; but that I could not answer it to leave the ships, which depended so much upon my care of the voyage.

After some talk of the reasonableness of such an undertaking, and the methods of performing it, my second midshipman began to come into it, and to think it was practicable enough, and added, that though he used some cautions in his first hearing proposals, yet, if he undertook that enterprise, I should find that he would do as much of his duty in it as another man; and so he did at last, as will appear in its place.

We were, by this time, preparing to be satisfied with our journey, and my patron coming to me and asking if I was for returning, I told him I could not say how many days it would be before I should say I had enough of that prospect, but that I would return when he pleased, only I had one question to ask him, which was—whether the mountain was as full of gold on this side as they were on the side of Chili.

"As to that, seignior," says he, "the best way to be certain is to make a trial, that you may be sure we do not speak without book;" so he called his gentleman, and another servant that was with him, and desired me to call my two midshipmen, and speaking something to his own servants first, in the language of the country, as I suppose, he turned to me and said—"Come, let us sit down and repose ourselves, and let them go altogether, and see what they can do."

Accordingly they went away; and, as my men told me afterwards, they searched in the small streams of water which they found running, and in some large gullies, or channels, where they found little or no water running; but where, upon hasty rains, great shoots of water had been used to run, and where water stood still in the holes and falls, as I have described once before on the like occasion.

They had not been gone above an hour when I plainly heard my two Englishmen halloo, which I could easily distinguish from the voices of any other nation, and immediately I ran out of the tent, Captain Merlotte followed, and I then saw one of my midshipmen running towards us, so we went to meet him, and what with hallooing, and running, he could hardly speak; but recovering his breath, said, "He came to desire me to come to them, if I would see a sight which I never saw in my life." I was eager enough to go, so I went with him, and left Captain Merlotte to go back to the tent to my patron the Spaniard, and the Spanish doctor, who had not so much share in the curiosity. He did so, and they followed fair and softly.

When we came to the place we saw such a sight, indeed, as I never saw before; for there they were sitting down round a little puddle, or hole, as I might call it, of water, where, in the time of rain, the water running hastily from a piece of the rock, about two feet higher than the rest, had made a pit under it with the fall like the tail of a mill, only much less.

Here they took up the sand, or gravel, with their hands, and every handful brought up with it such a quantity of gold as was surprising; for there they sat picking it out just as the boys in London that go with a broom and a hat, pick old iron, nails, and pins out of the channels, and it lay as thick.

I stood and looked at them awhile, and, it must be confessed, it was a pleasant sight enough. But reflecting immediately that there was no end of this, and that we were only upon the inquiry, "Come away," says I, laughing to my men, "and do not stand picking up of trash there all day; do you know how far we have to go to our lodging?"

I can make no guess what quantity might have been found here in places, which had, for hundreds of years, washed gold from the hills, and, perhaps, never had a man come to pick any of it up before; but I was soon satisfied here was enough even to make all the world say they had enough; and so I called off my people, and came away.

It seems the quantity of gold which is thus washed down is not small, since my men, inquiring afterwards among the Chilians, heard them talk of the great lake of water which I mentioned just now that we saw at a distance, which they call the Golden lake, and where was, as they said, prodigious quantities of it; not that our men supposed any gold was there in mines, or in the ordinary soil, but that the waters from the hills, running with very rapid currents at certain times in the rainy seasons, and after the melting of the snows, had carried the gold so far as that lake; and as it has been so, perhaps, from the days of the general deluge, no people ever applying themselves to gather the least grain of it up again, it might well be increased to such a quantity as might entitle that water to the name of the Golden lake, and all the little streams and sluices of water that run into it deserved the name of Golden rivers, as much as that of the Golden lake.

But my business was to know if the gold was here, not to trouble myself to pick it up; my views lay another way, and my end was fully answered; so I came back to my patron, and brought all my men with me. "You live in a golden country, seignior," says I; "my men are stark mad to see so much gold, and nobody to pick it up; should the world know what treasure you have here, I would not answer for it that they should not flock hither in armies, and drive you all away."—"They need not do that, seignior," says he, "for here is enough for them and for us too."

We now packed up, and began our return, but it was not without regret that I turned my back upon this pleasant country, the most agreeable place of its kind that ever I was at in all my life, or ever shall be in again. A country rich, pleasant, fruitful, wholesome, and capable of everything for the life of man that the heart could entertain a wish for.

But my present work was to return; so we mounted our mules, and had, in the meantime, the pleasure of contemplating what we had seen, and applying ourselves to such farther measures as we had concerted among us. In about four hours we returned to our camp, as I called it, and by the way we found, to our no little pain, that though we had come down hill easily, and insensibly to the opening for some miles, yet we had a hard pull up hill to go back again. However, we reached to our tents in good time, and made our first encampment with pleasure enough, for we were very weary with the fatigue of a hard day's journey.

The next day we reached our good Chilian's mansion house, or palace, for such it might be called, considering the place, and considering the entertainment; for now he had some time to provide for us, knowing we would come back again.

He met us with three mules, and two servants, about a mile before we came to the descent going down to his house, of which I took notice before, and this he did to guide us a way round to his house, without going down those uneasy steps; so we came on our mules to his door, that is to say, on his mules, for he would have my patron, the Spaniard, to whom I observed he showed an excellent respect, and Captain Merlotte and myself, mount his fresh mules to carry us to his house.

When we came thither I observed he wanted the assistance of my patron's servants for his cookery; for though he had provided abundance of food, he owned he knew not how to prepare it to our liking; so they assisted him, and one of my midshipmen pretending to cook too, made them roast a piece of venison, and a piece of a kid or young goat, admirably well, and putting no garlic or onions into the sauce but their own juices, with a little wine, it pleased the Spaniard so well, that my man passed for an extraordinary cook, and had the favour asked of him to dress some more after the same manner when we came back to the Spaniard's house.

We had here several sorts of wild fowl which the Chilian had shot while we were gone; but I knew none of them by any of the kinds we have in England, except some teal. However, they were very good.

The day was very agreeable and pleasant here; but the night dreadful, as before, being all fire and flame; and though we understood both what it was, and where, yet I could not make it familiar to me for my life. The Chilian persuaded us to stay all the next day, and did his endeavour to divert us as much as possible. My two midshipmen went out with him a-hunting, as he called it, that is, a-shooting; but though he was a man of fifty years of age he would have killed ten of them at his sport, running up the hills, and leaping from rock to rock like a boy of seventeen. At his gun he was so sure a marksman that he seldom missed anything he shot at, whether running, flying, or sitting.

They brought home with them several fowls, two fawns, and full grown deer, and we had nothing but boiling, stewing, and broiling all that evening. In the afternoon we walked out to view the hills and to see the stupendous precipices which surrounded us. As for looking for gold, we saw the places where there was enough to be had, but that was become now so familiar to us that we troubled not ourselves about it, as a thing not much worth while; but our two midshipmen I think got about the quantity of five or six ounces a-piece while we were chatting, or reposing in the Chilian's house.

Here it was that I entered into a confidence with my patron the Spaniard, concerning my grand design. I told him, in the first place, that my view of the open country beyond these hills, and the particular account he had given me of it also, had raised a curiosity in me that I could scarce withstand; and that I had thereupon formed a design which, if he would further me with his assistance, I had a very great mind to put in practice, and that, though I was to perish in the attempt.

He told me very readily nothing should be wanting on his part to give me any assistance he could, either by himself or any of his servants; but smiling, and with abundance of good humour, "Seignior," says he, "I believe I guess at the design you speak of; you are fired now with a desire to traverse this great country to the Coasta Deserta and the North Seas. That is a very great undertaking, and you will be well advised before you undertake it."

"Truly, seignior," said I, "you have guessed my design, and were it not that I have two ships under my care and some cargo of value on board, I would bring my whole ship's company on shore and make the adventure, and perhaps we might be strong enough to defend ourselves against whatever might happen by the way."

"As to that, seignior," says he, "you would be in no danger that would require so many men, for you will find but few inhabitants anywhere, and those not in numbers sufficient to give you any trouble. Fifty men would be as many as you would either want or desire, and perhaps as you would find provisions for; and for fifty men we might be able to carry provisions with us to keep them from distress; but if you will accept of my advice as well as assistance, seignior," says he, "choose a faithful strong fellow out of your ship on whom you can depend, and give him fifty men with him, or thereabouts, and such instructions as you may find needful as to the place on the coast where you would have them fix their stay, and let them take the first hazards of the adventure, and as you are going round by sea you will, if success follows, meet them on the shore; and if the account they give of their journey encourage you, you may come afterwards yourself up to these very mountains, and take a further view. In which case," he added, with a solemn protestation, "cost what it will, I will come and meet you one hundred miles beyond the hills, with supplies of provisions and mules for your assistance."

This was such wholesome and friendly advice, and he offered it so sincerely, that though it was very little differing from my own design, yet I would not be seen so to lessen his prudence in the measures of his friendship in advising it, as to say that I had resolved to do so. But making all possible acknowledgment to him for his kind offers, I told him I would take his advice, and that I would act just according to the measures he had prescribed; and at the same time I assured him that if I found a convenient port to settle and fortify in, I would not fail to come again from France (for we passed always as acting from France, whatever nation we were of) to relieve and supply them; and that if ever I returned safe I would not fail to correspond with him by the passages of the mountains, and make a better acknowledgment for his kindness than I had been able to do yet."

He was going to break off the discourse upon the occasion of the Chilian's returning, who was just come in from his hunting, telling me we would talk farther of it by the way; but I told him I could not quite dismiss the subject, because I must bespeak him to make some mention of it to the Chilian, that he might on his account be an assistant to our men, as we saw he was capable of being, in their passing by those difficult ways, and for their supply of provision, &c. "Trouble not yourself with that, seignior," said he, "for when your men come the care shall be mine. I'll come myself as far as this wealthy Chilian's and procure them all the assistance this place can afford them, and do anything that offers to forward them in the undertaking."

This was so generous and so extraordinary that I had nothing to say more, but to please myself with the apparent success of my attempt, and acknowledge the happiness of having an opportunity to oblige so generous a spirited and grateful a person.

I would, however, have made some farther acknowledgment to our Chilian benefactor; but I had nothing left except a couple of hats and three pair of English stockings, one pair silk and the other two worsted, and those I gave him, and made him a great many acknowledgments for the favours he had shown us, and the next morning came away.

We made little stay anywhere else in our return; but making much such stages back as we did forward we came the fourteenth day to our patron's house, having made the passage through in something less than sixteen days, and the like back in fifteen days, including our stay at the Chilian's one day. The length of the way, according to the best of my calculations, I reckoned to be about one hundred and seventy-five English miles, taking it with all its windings and turnings, which were not a few; but which had this conveniency with them, that they gave a more easy and agreeable passage, and made the English proverb abundantly good, namely, that the farthest way was the nearest way.

The civilities I received after this from my generous Spaniard were agreeable to the rest of his usage of me; but we, that had so great a charge upon us at the sea-side, could not spare long time in those ceremonies any more than I can do now for relating them; it is enough to mention, that he would not be excused at parting from going back with us quite to the ships, and when I would have excused it, he said, "Nay, seignior, give me leave to go and fetch my hostages." In short, there was no resisting him, so we went all together, having stayed two days more at his house, and came all safe to our ships, having been gone forty-six days from them.

We found the ships in very good condition, all safe on board and well, except that the men seemed to have contracted something of the scurvy; which our Spanish doctor, however, soon recovered them off.

Here we found the two Spanish youths, our patron's hostages, very well also, and very well pleased with their entertainment. One of our lieutenants had been teaching them navigation and something of the mathematics, and they had made very good improvement in those things, considering the time they had been there; and the Spaniard, their father, was so pleased with it, that having not gold enough to offer the lieutenant as an acknowledgment for his teaching them, he gave him a very good ring from his finger, having a fine large emerald in it of good value, and made him a long Spanish compliment for having nothing of better value to offer him.

We now made preparations for sailing, and our men in my absence had laid in a very considerable supply of provisions, particularly excellent pork, and pretty tolerable beef, and a great number of goats and hogs alive, as many as we could stow

But I had now my main undertaking to manage, I mean that of sending out my little army for discovery, and having communicated my design to the supercargo, and the person who I intrusted with him in the command of the ships, they unanimously approved of the thing. My next business was to resolve upon whom to confer the command of the expedition; and this by general consent fell upon the lieutenant of the Madagascar ship, who had taught the young Spaniards navigation; and this the rather, because he was naturally a bold, enterprising man, and also an excellent geographer: indeed, he was a general artist, and a man faithful and vigilant in whatever he undertook, nor was it a little consideration with me that he was so agreeable to the Spaniard and his sons, of whose aid we knew he would stand in so much need.

When I had communicated to him the design, and he had both approved the thing itself and accepted the command, we constituted him captain, and the two midshipmen we made lieutenants for the expedition, promising each of them five hundred pounds if they performed it. As for the captain, we came to a good agreement with him for his reward, for I engaged to give him one thousand pounds in gold as soon as we met, if the journey was performed effectually.

We then laid open the undertaking to the men, and left it to every one's choice to go, or not to go, as they pleased; but instead of wanting men to go volunteer we were fain to decide it by lot, among some of them, they were all so eager to undertake it.

Then I gave them articles and conditions, which they who ventured should engage themselves to comply with, and particularly that they should not mutiny, upon pain of being shot to death when we met, or upon the spot, if the captain thought it necessary; that they should not straggle from their company, nor be tempted by the view of picking up gold to stay behind, when the company beat to march; that all the gold they found in the way should be in common, should be put together in bulk every night, and be divided faithfully and equally at the end of the journey, allowing only five shares to each ship, to be divided as I should direct; besides which, upon condition that every man behaved himself faithfully and quietly, and did their duty, I promised, that besides the gold they might get by the way I would give them every man one hundred pounds at our meeting; and if any man was sick or maimed by the way, they were to engage not to forsake and leave him on any account whatsoever, death only excepted; and if any man died except by any violence from the rest, his share of the gold which was gotten should be faithfully kept for his family, if he had any; but his reward of one hundred pounds, which was not due because he did not live to demand it, should be divided among the rest; so that by this agreement the undertaking was not so dear to me as I had expected; for the pay of the men amounted to no more than the sum following, viz.

To the lieut. now made captain . . .	1,000
To the midshipmen, now made lieutenants, each 500 l	1,000
To fifty men, each 100 l	5,000
To the surgeon, 200 l ., and his servant, 100 l . over and above their 100 l . as being part of the fifty men . . .	300
	£7,300

Having pitched upon the men I landed them, and made them encamp on shore; but first of all I made them every one make wills or letters of attorney, or other dispositions of their effects, to such persons as they thought fit, with an account under their hands endorsed on the back of the said wills, &c., intimating what chests or cases or other things they had on board, and what was in them, and what pay was due to them; and those chests, &c. were sealed up before their faces with my seal, and writings signed by me, the contents unknown. Thus they were secure that all they had left in the ships, and all that was due to them, should be punctually and carefully kept and delivered as it was designed and directed by themselves, and this was greatly to their satisfaction.

As to the reward of one hundred pounds a man, and the articles about keeping together, obeying orders, gathering up gold, and the like, I did not read to them till they were all on shore, and till I was ready to leave them, because, if the rest of the men had heard it, I should have kept nobody with me to have sailed the ships.

There was as stout a company of bold, young brisk fellows of them as ever went upon any expedition, fifty-three in number, among them a surgeon and his mate, very skilful and honest men both of them; a trumpeter and a drummer, three ship carpenters, a cook, who was also a butcher by trade, and a barber; two shoemakers, who had been soldiers among the pirates; a smith, and a tailor, of the same; so that they wanted no mechanics, whatever might happen to them.

Give the fellows their due, they took but little baggage with them; but, however, what they had, I took care, with the assistance of my good patron, the Spaniard, should be as much carried for them as possible. I provided them three large tents, made of a cotton stuff, which I bought in the country, and which we made up on board, which tents were large enough to cover them all in case of rain or heat, but as for beds or bedding, they had only seven hammocks, in case any man was sick; for the rest, they were to shift as well as they could; the season was hot and the climate good, their way lay in the latitude of forty to fifty, and they set out in the latter end of the month of October, which, on that side of the line, is the same as our April, so that the covering was more to keep them from the heat than the cold.

It was needful, in order to their defence, to furnish them with arms and ammunition, so I gave to every man a musket or fusee, a pistol, and a sword, with cartouches and a good stock of ammunition, powder and shot, with three small barrels of fine powder for store, and lead in proportion; and these things were, indeed, the heaviest part of their baggage, excepting the carpenter's tools and the surgeon's box of medicines. As for carrying all these things, they might easily furnish themselves with mules or horses for carriage, while they had money to pay for them, and you may judge how that could be wanting by what has been said of the country.

We gave them, however, a good large pack of European goods, to make agreeable presents where they received favours, such as black baize, pieces of saye, serge, calamanco, drugget, hats and stockings, not forgetting another pack of hatchets, knives, scissars, beads, toys, and such things, to please the natives of the plain country if they should meet with any.

They desired a few hand grenades, and we gave them about a dozen but as they were heavy it would have been very troublesome to have carried more.

The Spaniard stayed till all this was done, and till the men were ready to march, and then told us privately that it would not be proper for him to march along with them or to appear openly to countenance the enterprise. That my two lieutenants knew the way perfectly well, and that he would go before to his own house, and they should hear of him by the way.

All the mules and horses which he had lent us to bring us back, he left with them to carry their baggage, and our new captain had bought six more privately in the country. The last instructions I gave to our men was, that they should make the best of their way over the country beyond the mountains; that they should take the exact distances of places, and keep a journal of their march, set up crosses and marks at all proper places, and that they should steer their course as near as they could between the latitude of forty (where they would enter the country,) and the latitude of forty-five S., so that they would go an E. S. E. course most of the way, and that wherever they made the shore they should seek for a creek or port where the ships might come to an anchor, and look out day and night for the ships; the signals also were agreed on, and they had two dozen of rockets to throw up if they discovered us at sea; they had all necessary instruments for observation also, and perspective glasses, pocket compasses, &c., and thus they set out on the 24th October 1715.

We stayed five days after they began their march, by agreement, that if any opposition had been offered them in the country, or any umbrage taken at their design, so that it could not be executed, we might have notice. But as the Spaniards in the country (who are the most supinely negligent people in the world) had not the least shadow of intelligence, and took them only to be French seamen belonging to the two French ships (such we passed for) who had lain there so long, they knew nothing when they went away, much less whither; but, no question, they believed that they were all gone on board again.

We stayed three days longer than we appointed, and hearing nothing amiss from them we were satisfied that all was right, so we put to sea, standing off to the west till we were out of sight of the shore, and then we stood away due south, with a fresh gale at N. W. by W. and fair weather, though the wind chopped about soon after, and we had calms and hot weather, that did us no good, but made our men sick and lazy.

The supposed journey of our travellers, their march, and the adventures they should meet with by the way, were indeed sufficient diversion, and employed us all with discourse, as well in the great cabin and roundhouse as before the mast, and wagers were very rife amongst us who should come first to the shore of Patagonia, for so we called it. As for the place, neither they nor we could make any guess at what part of the country they should make the sea; but as for us, we resolved to make the Port St Julian our first place to put in at, which is in the latitude of fifty degrees five minutes, and that then, as wind and water would permit, we would keep the coast as near as we could till we came to Punta de St Helena, where we would ride for some time, and, if possible, till we heard of them.

We had but a cross voyage to the mouth of the Straits of Magellan, having contrary winds, as I have said, and sometimes bad weather, so that it was the 13th of December when we made an observation, and found ourselves in the latitude of fifty-two degrees thirty minutes, which is just the height of Cape Victoria, at the mouth of the passage. Some of our officers were very much for passing the straits and not going about by Cape Horn; but the uncertainty of the winds in the passage, the danger of the currents, &c., made it by no means advisable, so we resolved to keep good sea-room.

The 25th of December we found ourselves in the latitude of sixty-two degrees thirty minutes, and being Christmas-day I feasted the men, and drank the health of our travellers. Our course was S. E. by S., the wind S. W., then we changed our course and went away E. for eight days, and having made fresh way, stood away without observation E. N. E., and in two days more made the land on E. of the Strait de la Mare, so that we were obliged to stand away E. S. E. to take more sea-room, when the wind veering to the S. E. a fresh gale, we stood boldly away due N., and running large soon found that we had entered the North Sea on Twelfth-day. For joy of which, and to celebrate the day, I gave every mess a piece of good English beef and a piece of Chilian pork, and made a great bowl of punch before the mast as well as in the great cabin, which made our men very cheerful, and, instead of a twelfth cake I gave the cook order to make every mess a good plumb-pudding, which pleased them all as well.

But while we were at our liquor and merry, the wind came about to the N. E. and blew very hard, threatening us with a storm, and as the shore lay on our leeward quarter, we were not without apprehensions of being driven on some dangerous places, and forced to ride upon life and death, where we could have no shelter; I therefore altered my course and ran away E. all night, to have as much sea-room as possible. The next day the wind abated, and hauling away to E. we stood N. again, and then N.W. in three days more, and we made land, which appeared to be the head island of Port St Julian, on the north side of the port where we ran in, and about an hour before sunset came to an anchor in eleven fathom good holding ground, latitude forty-nine degrees eighteen minutes.

We wanted fresh water, otherwise we would not have made any stay here at all, for we knew we were a little too far to the south; however, we were obliged to fill fresh water here for three days together, the watering-place being a good way up the river, and the swell of the sea running very high.

During this interval Captain Merlotte and I went on shore, with about thirty men, and marched up the country near twenty miles, getting up to the top of the hills, where we made fires, and at the farthest hill we encamped all night, and threw up five rockets, which was our signal; but we saw nothing to answer it, nor any sign either of English people or natives in all the country.

We saw a noble champaign country, the plains all smooth and covered with grass, like Salisbury Plain, very little wood to be seen anywhere, inasmuch that we could not get anything but grass to make a smoke with, which was another of our signals. We shot some fowls here, and five or six hares; the hares are as large as an English fox, and burrow in the earth like a rabbit. The fowls we shot were duck and mallard, teal and widgeon, the same as in England in shape and size, only the colour generally grey, with white in the breast and green heads, the flesh the same as ours, and very good.

We saw wild geese and wild swans, but shot none. We saw also guinacoes, or Peruvian sheep, as large as small mules, but could not come at them either, for as soon as we stepped towards them they would call to one another to give notice of us, and then troop altogether and be gone.

This is an excellent country for feeding and breeding of sheep and horses, the grass being short, but very sweet and good, on the plains, and very long and rich near the fresh rivers, and were it cultivated and stocked with cattle, would without doubt produce excellent kinds of all sorts of cattle; nor could it fail of producing excellent corn, as well wheat as barley and oats; and as for peas, they grow wild all over the country, and nourish an infinite number of birds like pigeons, which fly in flights so great that they seem in the air like clouds at a great distance.

As for the soil, that of the hills is gravel and some stony, but that of the plains is a light, black mould, and in some places a rich loam, and some marle, all of which are tokens of fruitfulness, such as indeed never fail.

The 14th of January (the weather being hot, and days long, for this was their July) we weighed and stood northerly along the shore, the coast running from Port St Julian N.N.E. till we arrived at the famous islands called Penguin islands, and here we came to an anchor again, in the same round bay which Sir John Narborough called Port Desire, it being the 17th of January.

Here we found a post or cross erected by Sir John Narborough, with a plate of copper nailed to it, and an inscription signifying that he had taken possession of that country in the name of King Charles II. Our men raised a shout for joy that they were in their king's own dominions, or, as they said, in their own country; and indeed, excepting that they were not inhabited by Englishmen, and cultivated, planted, and enclosed after the English manner, I never saw a country in the world so like England.

Here we victualled our ships with a new kind of food; for we loaded ourselves with seals, of which here are an infinite number, and which we salted and eat, and our men liked them wonderfully for a while; but they soon began to be weary of them: also the penguins are a very wholesome diet, and very pleasant, especially when a little salted; and as for salt, we could have loaded our ship with it, being very good and white, made by the sun, and found in standing ponds of salt water near the shore.

The penguins are so easily killed, and are found in such vast multitudes on that island (which, for that reason, is so called), that our men loaded the long boat with them twice in one day, and we reckoned there were no less than seven thousand in the boat each time.

Here we travelled up into the country in search of our men, and made our signals, but had no answer to them, nor heard any intelligence of them. We saw some people here at a distance, scattering about; but they were but few, nor would they be brought by any means to converse with us, or come near us.

We spread ourselves over the country far and wide; and here we shot hares and wild fowl again in abundance, the country being much the same as before, but something more bushy, and here and there a few trees, but they were a great way off. There is a large river which empties itself into this bay.

Finding no news here of our men, I ordered the Madagascar ship to weigh and stand farther north, keeping as near the shore as he might with safety, and causing his men to look out for the signals, which, if they discovered, they should give us notice by firing three guns.

They sailed the height of Cape Blanco, where the land falling back, makes a deep bay, and the sea receives into it a great river at several mouths, some of them twenty leagues from the other, all farther north. Here they stood into the bay till they made the land again; for at the first opening of the bay they could not see the bottom of it, the land lying very low.

The captain was doubtful what he should do upon the appearance of so large a bay, and was loth to stand farther in, lest the land, pushing out into the sea again afterwards, and a gale springing up from seaward, they might be shut into a bay where they had no knowledge of the ground; and upon this caution they resolved among themselves to come to an anchor for that evening, and to put farther out to sea the next morning.

Accordingly, the next morning he weighed and stood off to sea; but the weather being very fine, and the little wind that blew being S. W. by S., he ventured to stand in for the shore, where he found two or three small creeks and one large river; and, sending in his shallop to sound and find out a good place to ride in, upon their making the signal that they had found such a place, he stood in and came to an anchor in eleven fathom good ground, half a league from the shore, and well defended from the northerly and easterly winds, which were the winds we had any reason to fear.

Having thus brought his ship to an anchor, he sent his shallop along the shore to give me an account of it, and desire me to come up to him, which accordingly we did; and here we resolved to ride for some time in hopes to hear from our little army. We went on shore, some or other of us, every day, and especially when five of our men, going on shore on the north side of the river, had shot three Peruvian sheep and a black wild bull; for after that they ranged the country far and near to find more, but could never come within shot of them, except three bulls and a cow, which they killed after a long chase.

We lay here till the 16th of February without any news of our travellers, as I called them. All the hope we had was, that five of our men, asking my leave to travel, swore to me they would go quite up to the Andes but they would find them; nay, they would go to the Spanish gentleman himself if they did not hear of them, and obliged me to stay twenty days for them, and no longer. This I promised them, and giving them everything they asked and two of the Peruvian sheep to carry their ammunition, with two dozen of rockets for signals, a speaking-trumpet, and a good perspective glass, away they went; and from them we had yet heard no news, so that was our present hope.

They travelled, as they afterwards gave an account, one hundred and twenty miles up the country, till they were at last forced to resolve to kill one of their guinacos, or sheep, to satisfy their hunger, which was a great grief to them, for their luggage was heavy to carry; but, I say, they only resolved on it, for just as they were going to do it, one of them roused a deer with a fawn, and, by great good luck, shot them both; for, having killed the doe, the fawn stood still by her till he had loaded his piece again and shot that also.

This supplied them for four or five days plentifully, and the last day one of my men being by the bank of the river, for they kept as near the river as they could, in hopes to hear of them that way, saw something black come driving down the stream; he could not reach it, but calling one of his fellows, their curiosity was such that the other, being a good swimmer, stripped, and put off to it, and when he came to it he found it was a man's hat; this made them conclude their fellows were not far off, and that they were coming by water.

Upon this they made to the first rising ground they could come at, and there they encamped, and at night fired some rockets (they kept looking out you may be sure), and after the third rocket was fired they, to their great joy, saw two rockets rise up from the westward, and soon after that a third; and in two days more they all joyfully met, as you shall hear.

We had been here, as I have said, impatiently expecting them a great while; but at last the man at the main-top, who was ordered to look out, called aloud to us below that he saw a flash of fire, and immediately the men looking to landward, they saw two rockets rise up in the air at a great distance, which we answered by firing three rockets again, and they returned by one rocket, to signify that they saw our men's signal.

This was a joyful exchange of distant language to both sides, but I was not there; for being impatient, I had put out, and sailed about ten leagues farther; but our ship fired three guns to give me notice, which, however, we heard not, and yet we knew they fired too; for, it being in the night, our men, who were very attentive with their eyes, as well as ears, saw plainly the three flashes of the guns, though they could not hear the report, the wind being contrary. This was such certain intelligence to me, and I was so impatient to know how things went, that, having also a small gale of wind, I weighed immediately, and stood back again to our other ship; it was not, however, till the second day after we weighed that we came up to them, having little or no wind all the first day; the next day, in the morning, they spied us, and fired the three guns again, being the signal that they had got news of our friends.

Nothing could be more to my satisfaction than to hear that they had got news, and it was as much to their satisfaction as to ours, to be sure, I mean our little army; for if any disaster had happened to us they had been in a very odd condition; and though they might have found means to subsist, yet they would have been out of all hope of ever returning to their own country.

Upon the signal I stood into the bay, and came to an anchor at about a league to the northward of our other ship, and as far from the shore; and, as it were, in the mouth of the river, waiting for another signal from our men, by which we might judge which side of the river to go a-shore at, and might take some proper measures to come at them.

About five o'clock in the evening our eyes, being all up in the air, and towards the hills for the appointed signals, beheld, to our great surprise, a canoe come rowing to us out of the mouth of the river; immediately we went to work with our perspective glasses. One said it was one thing, and one said it was another, till I fetched out a large telescope out of the cabin, and with that I could easily see they were my own men, and it was to our inexpressible satisfaction that they soon after came directly on board.

It might very well take up another volume as large as this to give a farther account of the particulars of their journey, or rather their journey and voyage; how they got through the hills, and were entertained by the generous Spaniard, and afterwards by the wealthy Chilian; how the men, greedy for gold, were hardly brought away from the mountains; and how once they had much ado to persuade them not to rob the honest Chilian who had used them so well, till my lieutenant, then their captain, by a stratagem seized on all their weapons, and threatened to speak to the Spaniard to raise all the Chilians in the mountains, and have all their throats cut; and yet that even this did not suffice, till the two midshipmen, then their lieutenants, assured them that at the first opening of the hills, and in the rivers beyond, they would have plenty of gold; and one of the midshipmen told them that if he did not see them have so much gold that they would not stoop to take up any more, they should have all his share to be divided among them, and should leave him behind in the first desolate place they could find.

How this appeased them till they came to the outer edge of the mountains, where I had been, and where my patron the Spaniard left them, having supplied them with sixteen mules to carry their baggage, and some guinacoes, or sheep of Peru, which would carry burthens, and be good to eat also.

Also how here they mutinied again, and would not be drawn away, being insatiable in their thirst after the gold, till about twenty, more reasonable than the rest, were content to move forward; and after some time the rest followed, though not till they were assured that the picking up of gold continued all along the river, which began at the bottom of the mountains, and that it was likely to continue a great way farther.

How they worked their way down these streams with still an insatiable avarice and thirst after the gold to the lake called the Golden lake, and how here they were astonished at the quantity they found; how after this they had great difficulty to furnish themselves with provisions, and greater still in carrying it along with them till they found more.

I say all these accounts might suffice to make a volume as large as all the rest. How, at the farther end of this lake they found that it evacuated itself into a large river which, running away with a strong current to the S. S. E., and afterwards to the S. by E., encouraged them to build canoes, in which they embarked, and which river brought them down to the very bay where we found them; but that they met with many difficulties, sunk, and staved their canoes several times, by which they lost some of their baggage, and, in one disaster, lost a great parcel of their gold, to their great surprise and mortification. How, at one place, they split two of their canoes, where they could find no timber to build new ones; and the many hardships they were put to before they got other canoes; but I shall give a brief account of it all, and bring it into as narrow a compass as I can.

They set out, as I have said, with mules and horses to carry their baggage, and the Spaniard gave them a servant with them for a guide, who, carrying them by-ways, and unfrequented, so that they might give no alarm at the town of Villa Rica, or any where else, they came to the mouth of the entrance into the mountains, and there they pitched their tent.

N.B. The lieutenant who kept their journal, giving an account of this merrily in his sea language, expresses it thus:—"Being all come safe into the opening that is in the entrance of the mountains, and being there free from the observation of the country, we called it our first port, so we brought too, and came to an anchor.

Here the generous Spaniard, who, at his own request, was gone before, sent his gentleman and one of his sons to them, and sent them plenty of provisions, as also caused their mules to be changed for others that were fresh, and had not been fatigued with any of the other part of the journey.

These things being done, the Spaniard's gentleman caused them to decamp, and march two days farther into the mountains, and then they encamped again, where the Spaniard himself came incognito to them, and with the utmost kindness and generosity was their guide himself, and their purveyor also, though two or three times the fellows were so rude, so ungovernable, and unbounded in their hunting after gold, that the Spaniard was almost frightened at them, and told the captain of it. Nor indeed was it altogether without cause; for the dogs were so ungrateful that they robbed two of the houses of the Chilians, and took what gold they had, which was not much indeed, but it hazarded so much the alarming the country, and raising all the mountaineers upon them, that the Spaniard was upon the point of flying from them, in spite of all their fire-arms and courage.

But the captain begged him to stay one night more, and promised to have the fellows punished, and satisfaction to be made; and so he brought all his men together, and talked to them, and inquired who it was; but never was such a piece of work in the world. When the new captain came to talk of who did it, and of punishment, they cried, they all did it, and they did not value all the Spaniards and Indians in the country; they would have all the gold in the whole mountain, ay, that they would, by —, and swore to it, and if the Spaniard offered to speak a word to them they would whip his head off, and the like.

However, a little reasoning with them brought some of the men to their senses, and the captain, who was a man of sense and of a smooth tongue, managed so well that he brought about twenty-two of the men, and the two lieutenants and surgeons to declare for his opinion, and that they would act better for the future; and with these he clapt in between the other fellows, and separated about eighteen of them from their arms, for they had run scattering among the rocks to hunt for gold, and when they were called to this parley, had not their weapons with them. By this stratagem he seized eleven of the thieves and made them prisoners; and then he told the rest in so many words, that if they would not comply to keep order and obey the rules they were at first sworn to and had promised, he would force them to it, for he would deliver them, bound hand and foot, to the Spaniards, and they should do the poor Chilians justice upon them; for that, in short, he would not have the rest murdered for them; upon this he ordered his men to draw up, to show them he would be as good as his word, but they considered of it, and submitted.

But the Spaniard had taken a wiser course than this, or perhaps they had been all murdered for he ran to the two Chilian houses where the rogues had plundered, and where, in short, there was a kind of little hubbub about it, and with good words, promising to give them as much gold as they lost, and the price of some other things that were taken away, he appeased the people; and so our men were not ruined, as they would certainly have been, if the mountaineers had taken the alarm.

After this they grew a little more governable; but, in short, the sight of the gold, and the easy getting it, for they picked it up in abundance of places; I say, the sight of the gold made them stark mad; for now they were not as they were before, trafficking for the owners and for the voyage. But as I had promised the gold they got should be their own, and that they were now working for themselves, there was no getting them to go on, but, in short, they would dwell here; and this was as fatal a humour as the other.

But to bring this part of the voyage to an end, after eight days they came to the hospitable, wealthy Chilian's house, who I mentioned before; and here, as the Spaniard had contrived it, they found all kind of needful stores for provisions laid up, as it were, on purpose: and, in a word, here they were not fed only but feasted.

Here again the captain discovered a cursed conspiracy, which, had it taken effect, would, besides the baseness of the fact, have ended in their total destruction; in short, they had resolved to rob this Chilian who was so kind to them; but, as I said, one of the lieutenants discovered and detected this villanous contrivance, and quashed it, so as never to let the Spaniard know of it.

But, I say, to end this part. They were one-and-twenty days in this traverse, for they could not go on so easy and so fast now they were a little army, as we did, who were but six or seven. At length they came to the view of the open country, and, being all encamped at the edge of a descent, the generous Spaniard, with his three servants, took his leave, wishing them a good journey, and so went back, having the day before brought them some deer, five or six cows, and some sheep, for their subsisting at their entrance into and travel through the plain country.

And now they began to descend towards the plain, but they met with more difficulty here than they expected; for, as I observed, that the way for some miles went with an ascent towards the farthest part of the hill, that continued ascent had, by degrees, brought them to a very great, and in some places an unpassable, descent; so that, however my guide found his way down, when I was through, it was not so easy for them to do it, who were so many in number, and encumbered with mules and horses, and with their baggage, so that they knew not what to do; and if they had known that our ships were gone away, there had been some odds but, like the old Israelites, they would have murmured against their leader, and have all gone back to Egypt. In a word, they were at their wit's end, and knew not what course to take for two or three days, trying and essaying to get down here and there, and then frightened with precipices and rocks, and climbing up to get back again; the whole of the matter was, that they had missed a narrow way, where they should have turned off to the south-east, the marks which our men had made before, having not been so regular and exact just there as in other parts of the way, or some other turning being so very like the same, that they took one for the other; and thus going straight forward too far before they turned, they came to an opening indeed, and saw the plain country under them as they had done before, but the descent was not so practicable.

After they had puzzled themselves here, as I said, two or three days, one of the lieutenants and a man with him, seeing a hut or house of a Chilian at some distance, rode away towards it; but passing into a valley that lay between, he met with a river which he could by no means get over with the mules, so he came back again in despair. The captain then resolved to send back to the honest, rich Chilian, who had entertained them so well, for a guide, or to desire him to give them such directions as they might not mistake.

But as the person sent back was one of those who had taken the journal which I mentioned, and was therefore greatly vexed at missing his way in such a manner, so he had his eyes in every corner, and pulled out his pocket-book at every turning, to see how the marks of the places agreed; and at last, the very next morning after he set out, he espied the turning where they should all have gone in, to have come to the place which they were at before. This being so remarkable a discovery, he came back again directly without going to the Chilian's house, which was two days' journey further.

Our men were revived with this discovery, and all agreed to march back; so, having lost about six days in this false step, they got into the right way, and in four more came to the descent where I had been before.

Here the hill was still very high, and the passage down was steep and difficult enough; but still it was practicable, and our men could see the marks of cattle having passed there, as if they had gone in drifts or droves; also it was apparent that, by some help and labour of hands, the way might be led winding and turning on the slope of the hill, so as to make it much easier to get down than it was now.

It cost them no small labour, however, to get down, chiefly because of the mules, which very often fell down with their loads, and our men said they believed they could, with much more ease, have mounted up from the east side to the top than they came from the west side to the bottom.

They encamped one night on the declivity of the hill, but got up early and was at the bottom and on the plain ground by noon. As soon as they came there, they encamped and refreshed themselves, that is to say, went to dinner; but it being very hot there, the cool breezes of the mountains having now left them, they were more inclined to sleep than to eat; so the captain ordered the tent to be set up, and they made the whole day of it, calling a council in the morning to consider what course they should steer, and how they should go on.

Here they came to this resolution, that they should send a man or two a considerable way up the hill again, to take the strictest observation he could of the plain, with the largest glasses they had, and to mark which way the nearest river or water was to be seen, and they should direct their course, first to the water, and that if the course of it lay south, or any way to the east of the south, they would follow on the bank of it, and as soon as it was large enough to carry them, they would make them some canoes or shallops, or what they could do with the most ease, to carry them on by water; also they directed him to observe if he could see any cattle feeding at a distance, or the like.

The messenger returned, and brought them word that all the way to the east, and so on to south-east, they could discover nothing of water, but that they had seen a great lake or lough of water at a great distance, which looked like a sea, and lay from them to the northward of the east, about two points; adding, that they did not know but it might afterwards empty itself to the eastward, and it was their opinion to make the best of their way thither.

Accordingly the next morning they decamped and marched east-north-east very cheerfully, but found the way much longer than they expected, for, though from the mountains the country seemed to lie flat and plain, yet, when they came to measure it by their feet, they found a great many little hills. Little, I say, compared to the great mountains, but great to them who were to travel over them in the heat, and with but very indifferent support as to provisions; so that, in a word, the captain very prudently ordered that they should travel one three hours in the morning, and three hours in the evening, and encamp in the heat of the day, to refresh themselves as well as they could.

The best thing they met with in that part of the country was, that they had plenty of water, for though they were not yet come to any large, considerable river, yet every low piece of ground had a small rill of water in it, and the springs coming out from the rising grounds on the sides of the mountains being innumerable, made many such small brooks.

It cost them six days' travel, with two days' resting between, to advance to that river of water, which, from the height of the mountains, seemed to be but a little way off. They could not march, by their computation, above ten or twelve miles a day, and rest every third day too, for their luggage was heavy, and their mules but few; also some of their mules tired and jaded by their long march, or fell lame, and were good for nothing.

Besides all this, the days which I call days of rest were really not so to them, for those intervals were employed to range about and hunt for food, and it was for that more than for want of rest that they halted every third day.

In this exercise they did, however, meet with such success that they made shift to kill one sort of creature or another every day, sufficient to keep them from famishing; sometimes they met with some deer, other times with the guinacoes or Peruvian sheep, and sometimes with fowls of several kinds, so that they did pretty well for food. At length, viz. the seventh day, they came to a river, which was at first small, but having received another small river or two from the northern part of the country, began to seem large enough for their purpose, and as it ran east-south-east they concluded it would run into the lake, and that they might float down this river if they could make anything to carry them.

But their first discouragement was, the country was all open, with very little wood and no trees, or very few, to be found large enough to make canoes, or boats of any sort; but the skill of their carpenters, of which they had four, soon conquered this difficulty, for, coming to a low swampy ground on the side of the river, they found a tree something like a beech, very firm good sort of wood, and yet soft enough to work easy; and they went to work with this, and at first made them some rafts, which they thought might carry them along till the river was bigger.

While this was doing (which took up two or three days) the men straggled up and down; some with their guns to shoot fowls, some with contrivances to catch fish, some one thing, some another; when on a sudden one of their fishermen, not in the river, but in a little brook which afterwards runs into the river, found a little bit of shining stuff among the sand, or earth, in the bank, and one cried he had found a piece of gold. Now it seems all was not gold that glittered, for the lump had no gold in it, whatever it was; but the word being given out at first, it immediately set all our men a-rummaging the shores of every little rill of water they came at, to see if there was no gold; and they had not looked long but they found several little grains of gold, very small and fine, not only in this brook but in several others. So they spent their time the more cheerfully because they made some purchase.

All this while they saw no people, nor any signals of any, except once on the other side of the river, at a great distance, they thought they saw about thirty together, but whether men or women, or how many of each, they could not tell, nor would they come any nearer, only stood and gazed at our people at a distance.

They were now ready to quit their camp and embark, intending to lay all their baggage on the rafts, with three or four sick men, and so the rest to march by the river-side, and as many as could to ride upon the mules; when, on a sudden, all their navigation was put to a stop, and their new vessels, such as they were, suffered a wreck. The case was thus: they had observed a great many black clouds to hang over the tops of the mountains, and some of them even below the tops, and they did believe it rained among the hills; but in the plain where they lay, and all about them, it was fair and the weather fine.

But in the night the carpenters and their assistants, who had set up a little tent near the river-side, were alarmed with a great roaring noise (as they thought) in the river, though at a distance upwards; presently after they found the water begin to come into their tent, when, running out, they found the river was swelling over its banks, and all the low grounds on both sides of them.

To their great satisfaction it was just break of day, so that they could see enough to make their way from the water; and the land very happily rising a little to the south of the river, they immediately fled thither; two of them had so much presence of mind with them as to pick up their working tools, at least some of them, and carry off, and the water rising gradually, the other two carpenters ventured back to save the rest; but they were put to it to get back again with them; in a word, the water rose to such a height that it carried away their tent and everything that was in it, and, which was worse, their rafts (for they had almost finished four large rafts) were all lifted off from the place where they were framed, which was a kind of dry dock, and dashed all to pieces, and the timber, such as it was, all carried away; the smaller brooks also swelled in proportion to the larger river, so that, in a word, our men lay, as it were, surrounded with water, and began to be in a terrible consternation; for, though they lay in a hard dry piece of ground, too high for the land-flood to reach them, yet had the rains continued in the mountains they might have lain there till they had been obliged to eat one another, and so there had been an end of our new discovery.

But the weather cleared up among the hills the next day, which heartened them up again; and as the flood rose so soon, so the current, being furiously rapid, the waters ran off again as easily as they came on, and in two days the water was all gone again. But our little float was shipwrecked, as I have said, and the carpenters finding how dangerous such great unwieldy rafts would be, resolved to set to it and build one large float with sides to it like a punt or ferry-boat. They worked so hard at this, ten of the men always working with them to help, that in five days they had her finished. The only thing they wanted was pitch and tar to make her upper work keep out the water; and they made a shift to fetch a juice out of some of the wood they had cut, by help of fire, that answered the end tolerably well.

But that which made this disappointment less afflicting was, that our other men, hunting about the small streams where this water had come down so furiously, found that there was more gold, and the more for the late flood. This made them run straggling up the streams; and, as the captain said, he thought once they would run quite back to the mountains again.

But that was his ignorance too, for after awhile, and the nearer they came to the rising of the hills, the quantity abated; for where the streams were so furious the water washed it all away, and carried it down with it, so that by the end of five days the men found but little, and began to come back again.

But then they discovered that though there was less in the higher part of the rivers, there was more farther down, and they found it so well worth while, that they went fishing along for gold all the way towards the lake, and left their fellows and the boat to come after.

At last, when nothing else would do it, hunger called them off, and so, once more, they got all their company together again; and now they began to load the float, indeed it might be called a luggage-boat; however, it answered very well, and was a great relief to our men; but when they came to load it, they found it would not carry so much by a great deal as they had to put in it; besides, that they would be all obliged to march on foot by the shore, which had this particular inconvenience in it, that whenever they came to any small river or brook which runs into the other, as was very often the case, they would be forced to march up a great way to get over it, or unload the great float to make a ferry-boat of it to waft them over.

Upon this they resolved that the first place they came at where stuff was to be had for building, they would go to work again, and make two or three more floats not so big as the other, that so they might embark themselves and their stuff, and their provisions too, altogether, and take the full benefit of the river where it would afford them help, and not some sail on the water and some go on foot upon the land, which was very fatiguing.

Upon this, as soon as they found stuff, as I have said, and a convenient place, they went all hands to work to build more floats, or boats, call them as you will. While this was doing all the spare men, and all the men at spare hours, spent their time and pains in hunting about for gold in the brooks and small streams, as well those they had been at before as others; and that after they had, as it were, plundered them at the first discovery, for as they had found some gold after the hasty rain, they were loth to give it over, though they had been assured there was more to be found in the lake where they were yet to come than in the brooks.

All this while their making the floats went slowly on, for the men thought it a great hardship to keep chopping of blocks, as they called it, while their fellows were picking up of gold, though they knew they were to have their share of what they found, as much as if they had been all the while with them. But it seems there is a kind of satisfaction in the work of picking up gold, besides the mere gain.

However, at length the gold failing, they began to think of their more immediate work, which was going forward; and the carpenters having made three more floats like flat-bottomed barges, which they brought to be able to carry their baggage and themselves too, if they thought fit, they began to embark and fall down the river, but they grew sick of their navigation in a very few days; for before they got to the lake, which was but three days going, they run several times on ground, and were obliged to lighten them to get them off again, then load again, and lighten again, and so off and on, till they were so tired of them that they would much rather have carried all their baggage, and have travelled by land; and at last they were forced to cast off two of them, and put all their baggage on board the other two, which at best, though large, were but very poor crazy things.

At length they came in sight of their beloved lake, and the next day they entered into the open part or sea of it, which they found was very large, and in some places very deep.

Their floats, or what they might be called, were by no means fit to carry them upon this inland sea; for as, if the water had been stirred by the least gust of wind, it would presently have washed over them, and have spoiled, if not sunk, their baggage; so they had no way to steer or guide them whenever they came into deep water, where they could not reach the ground with their poles.

This obliged them, as soon as they came into the open lake, to keep close under one shore, that is to say, to the right hand, where the land falling away to the S., and the S. by E., seemed to carry them still forward on their way; the other side widening to the N. made the lake seem there to be really a sea, for they could not see over it unless they went on shore, and got up upon some rising ground.

Here, at first, they found the shore steep too, and a great depth of water close to the land, which made them very uneasy; for if the least gale of wind had disturbed the water, especially blowing from off the lake, they would have been shipwrecked close to the shore. However, after they had gone for two days along the side by the help of towing and setting as well as they could, they came to a flatter shore and a fairer strand, to their great joy and satisfaction.

But if the shore proved to their satisfaction for its safety, it was much more so on another account; for they had not long been here before they found the sands or shore infinitely rich in gold, beyond all they had seen, or thought of seeing before. They had no sooner made the discovery but they resolved to fall on, as upon a lasting spoil that was to enrich them all, and they went to work with such an avaricious rage that they seemed as if they were plundering an enemy's camp, and that there was an army at hand to drive them from the place; and, as it proved they were right to do so; for in this gust of their greedy appetite they considered not where they were, and upon what tender, ticklish terms their navigation stood. They had indeed drawn their two floats to the shore as well as they could, and with pieces of wood, like piles, stuck in on every side, brought them to ride easy, but had not taken the least thought about change of weather, though they knew they had neither anchor or cable, nor so much as a rope large enough to fasten them on the shore.

But they were taught more wit to their cost in two or three days, for the very second night they felt a little unusual rising of the water, as they thought, though without any wind, and the next morning they found the water of the lake was swelled about two feet perpendicular, and that their floats, by that means, lay a great way further from the shore than they did before, the water still increasing.

This made them at first imagine there was a tide in the lake, and that after a little time it would abate again, but they soon found their mistake, for after some time they perceived the water, which was perfectly fine and clear before, grew by degrees of a paler colour, thick, and whitish, till at last it was quite white and muddy, as is usual in land floods, and as it still continued rising, so they continued thrusting in their floats farther and farther towards the shore, till they had, in short, lost all the fine golden sands they were upon before, and found the lake overflowed the land so far beyond them, that in short they seemed to be in the middle of the lake, for they could scarce see to the end of the water, even on that very side where, but a few hours before, they were fast on shore.

You may easily judge that this put them into a great consternation, and they might well conclude that they should be all drowned and lost, for they were now as it were in the middle of the sea upon two open floats or rafts, fenced nowhere from the least surge or swell of the water, except by a kind of waste board about two feet high built up on the sides, without any caulking or pitching, or anything to keep out the water. They had neither mast or sail, anchor or cable, head or stern, no bows to fence off the waves or rudder to steer any course, or oars to give any motion, but, like a flat-bottomed punt, they thrust them along with such poles as they had, some of which were about eight or ten feet long, and which gave them a little way, but very slowly. All the remedy they had in this case, was to set on with their poles towards the shore and to observe by their pocket compasses which way it lay; and this they laboured hard at lest they should be lost in the night and not know which way to go.

Their carpenters in the mean time with some spare boards which they had, or rather made, raised their sides as well as they could to keep off the wash of the sea, if any wind should rise so as to make the water rough, and thus they fenced against every danger as well as they could, though all put together they were in but a very sorry condition.

Now they had time to reflect upon their voracious fury in ranging the shore to pick up gold, without considering where and in what condition they were, and without looking out on shore for a place of safety. Nay, they might now have reflected on the madness of venturing out into a lake or inland sea of that vast extent, in such pitiful bottoms as they had under them. Their business, doubtless, had been to have stopped within the mouth of the river and found a convenient place to land their goods and secure their lives; and when they had pitched their camp upon any safe high ground, where they might be sure they could neither be overflowed or surrounded with water, they might have searched the shores of the lake as far as they thought fit; but thus to launch out into an unknown water, and in such a condition as to their vessels as is described above, was most unaccountably inconsiderate.

Never was a crew of fifty men, all able and experienced sailors, so embarked, or drawn into such a snare, for they were surrounded with water for three or four miles in breadth on the nearest shore, and this all on a sudden, the country lying low and flat for such a breadth, all of which appeared dry land and green like the fields but the day before, and without question they were sufficiently surprised.

Now they would have given all the gold they had got, which was very considerable too, to have been on shore on the wildest and most barren part of the country, and would have trusted to their own diligence to get food; but here, besides the imminent danger of drowning they might also be in danger of starving; for had their floats grounded but upon any little hillock, they might have stuck there till they had starved and perished for hunger. Then they were in the utmost anxiety, too, for fear of wetting their powder, which, if it happened, they could never have made serviceable again, and without it they could not have killed anything for food if they had got to the shore.

They had in this exigence some comforts, however, which might a little uphold their spirits, and without which, indeed, their condition must have been deplorable and desperate. 1st—It was hot weather, so that, as they had no shelter against the cold if it had come, they had no cold to afflict them; but they rather wanted awnings to keep off the sun than houses to keep off the cold. 2nd—The water of the lake was all fresh and very good, even when it looked white and thick, yet it was very sweet and drank wholesome and good-tasted. Had it been salt water and they thus in the middle of it, they must have perished for thirst. 3rd—They being now floating over the drowned lands only, the water was not very deep, so that they could reach ground and set along their rafts with their poles; and this to be sure they failed not to do with the utmost diligence.

They had also the satisfaction to observe, though it was not without toiling in an inexpressible manner, that they did gain upon the shore, and there was a high land before them, which they did draw towards, though very slowly and at a very great distance.

But then they had another discouragement, namely, that they saw the day declined, and night came on apace, and, in short, that it was impossible they could reach the high land which they saw, by daylight, nor did they know what to do or how to go on in the night.

At length two bold fellows offered themselves to strip and go off, either to wade or swim to the shore, which they had yet daylight enough to do, being as they judged about three miles, though they found it about four miles; and from thence to find means to make a fire or light to guide them to the shore in the dark.

This was indeed a desperate attempt, but the two fellows being good swimmers, and willing to venture, it was not impracticable. They had light linen drawers on, open at the knees, and their shirts; and they took a little bottle each in their pockets with some gunpowder in them close stopped, with other materials for kindling a fire; weapons they had none, but each man a knife and a hatchet fastened round their waist in a little belt, and a light pole in their hands to help when they waded, which they expected to do most part of the way. They had no provisions with them but a bottle with some good brandy in their pockets.

When they went off you are to suppose the water about four feet to five feet deep, so they chose to swim rather than wade, and, as it was very seldom much deeper, they had often opportunity to stand on the firm ground to rest themselves.

In this posture they went on directly towards the land, and after they had by swimming and wading together advanced about a mile they found the water grew shallower, which was a signal to them that they should reach the hard ground in a little time, so they walked cheerfully on in about three feet water for near a mile more.

Their companions soon lost sight of them, for they being in white, and the water white too and the light declining, they could not see them at a mile's distance; after this they found the ground falling lower, so that they had deeper water for half a mile more all the way; after which, they came to flat ground again for near two miles more, and at length to the dry land, to their great satisfaction, though it was then quite night.

Their comrades had been near an hour in the dark, that is to say, with only a dusky light, and began to be greatly at a loss, not being able to see the compass; they had made shift to get over the half mile of deeper water pretty well; for though it was too deep for the men to wade as above, yet they could reach the bottom with their poles, and at that time they happened to feel a little breeze of wind fair in their way, which both refreshed them with its cool breath, and also gave them a kind of a jog on their way towards the shore.

At length, to their great joy, they saw a light; and it was the more to their joy because they saw it just before them, or as the seamen call it, right a head, by which they had the satisfaction to know they had not varied their course in the dark. It seems their two men had landed upon a fair rising ground, where they found some low bushes and trees, and where they had good hard dry standing, and they soon found means to pick out a few withered dry sticks, with which they made a blaze for the present, having struck fire with the tools they were furnished with, as above.

By the light of this blaze they gave the first notice to their comrades, as above, that they were landed; and they again, as was agreed beforehand, fired two guns as a signal that they saw it and were all safe; also by the light of this fire they gave themselves so much light as to find more dry wood, and afterwards their fire was so strong and good that they made the green wood burn as well as the dry.

Their companions were now come into the shoal water, in which, as I said, the men waded, but as their floats did not draw above a foot or eighteen inches water at most they went on still; but at length, being within about half a mile of the hillock where the two men were they found the water so shallow that their floats would not swim. Upon this more of the men went overboard with poles in their hands, sounding, as we may call it, for deeper water; and with long puddling about they found the ground fall off a little in one place, by which they got their floats about a quarter of a mile farther, but then the water was shallow again, not above a foot water. So, in a word, they were fain to be content, and running fast a-ground they immediately began, though dark and themselves very much fatigued, to unload their ships, and carry all on shore on their backs.

The first thing they took care to land was their ammunition, their gunpowder, and arms, not forgetting the ammunition de bouche, as the French call it, I mean their victuals, and with great joy they got to their two comrades; then they fetched their proper materials for their tent and set it up, and having refreshed themselves they went all to sleep, as they said, without so much as a sentinel placed for their guard; for, as they saw no inhabitants, so they feared no enemies; and it may be supposed they were weary enough to make them want rest, even in the extremest manner.

In the morning they had time enough to reflect upon the madness of such rash adventures, as you shall hear. Their floats, indeed, remained as they had left them, and the water was ebbd away from them above two miles, that is to say, almost to the deep half mile mentioned above; but they heard a surprising noise and roaring of the water on the lake itself, the body of which was now above seven miles from them.

They could not imagine what this roaring should mean, for they felt no wind, nor could they perceive any clouds at a distance that looked as if they brought any squalls of wind with them, as they are often observed to do, but when they came nearer the water they found it had a kind of swell, and that there was certainly some more violent motion at the farther distance; and in a little while looking behind them towards the shore where their comrades were, they found the water began to spread over the flat ground again, upon which they hastened back, but having a good way to go, they were obliged to go knee-deep before they reached to the hillock where their tent stood.

They had not been many hours on shore before they found the wind began to rise, and the roaring which before they heard at a distance grew louder and nearer, till at length the floats were lifted up and driven on shore by the wind, which increased to a storm; and the water swelled and grew rough, and as they were upon the lee shore the floats were soon broken in pieces, and went some one way and some another.

In the evening it overcast and grew cloudy, and about midnight they had their share of a violent rain, which yet they could see was more violent towards the mountains of the Andes and towards the course of the river which they came down in the floats.

The consequence of this was, naturally, that the third day the waters of the lake swelled again to a frightful height, that is to say, it would have been frightful to them if they had been upon it, for they suppose it rose about two fathoms perpendicular, and the wind continuing fresh the water was all a white foam of froth; so that had they had a good large boat under them she would scarce have lived there.

Their tent kept them dry, and as they were on dry land and too high to be reached by any inundation they had no concern upon them about their safety. But, to be sure, took this for sufficient notice not to come up the lake again in haste unless they were better provided with boats to ride out a storm.

Our men began now to think they had taken their leave of the Golden Lake, and yet they knew not how to think of leaving it so soon. They were now fourteen or fifteen leagues off of that fine golden shore where they took up so much, nor did they know the way to it by land, and as for going by water that they were unprovided for several ways, besides, the waters kept up to a considerable height, and the winds blew fresh for six or eight days together.

All these obstructions joined together put them upon considering of pursuing their march by land, in which, however, they resolved to coast the lake as near as they could to the eastward, till, if possible, they should find that the waters had some outlet, that is to say, that the lake emptied itself by some river towards the sea, as they concluded it certainly must.

They had not yet seen any inhabitants, or any sign of them, at least not near them; they did, or it is thought they fancied they did, see some on the other side of the river, but they would not come within reach of them on any account, so that it is doubtful whether they really saw them or no.

Before they decamped for a march, it was needful to get some provisions, if possible, and this made them the more desirous of finding out some conversable creatures, but it was in vain. They killed a wild cow and a deer, and this was all they could get for some time; and with this they set forward, taking their course east, and rather northerly, in order to come into the same latitude they set out in at their first embarking on the river.

After they had marched thus for about three days, keeping the lake on the north side of them, and always in view; at length, on the third day, in the evening, coming to a little hill which gave them the prospect of the country for some length N.E., they saw plainly a river issuing out of the lake, and running first east, then bending to the south, it was also easy to perceive that this river was at that time much broader than in its usual course, for that they could see a great many trees, which probably grew on the bank of the river, standing, as it were, in the middle of the water, the banks being overflowed both ways very considerably.

But as they mounted the hill which they stood on to a greater height, they discovered farther north, at the distance of five or six miles, according to their account, a much larger river, which looked, compared to the first river, rather like a sea than a river, which likewise issued out of the lake and run E. by S. towards the sea, which river they supposed to be in the same manner swelled with a land water, or fresh, as the lake was, to a prodigious degree.

This prospect brought them to a more serious consultation, as to the measures they should take to proceed on their journey; and, as they could easily see there was little or no use to be made of the rivers for their travelling, while the water was thus above the ordinary banks, so that they could not know the proper channels, and also that the currents were exceeding swift; so they resolved to stock themselves with provisions, if possible, and continue their journey by land.

To this purpose they first made it their business to catch some more guinacos, or large sheep, which they knew would not only feed them, but also carry their luggage, which was still heavy and very troublesome to them, and yet absolutely necessary too. But all their endeavour was in vain, for though they saw several, and found that the country was pretty full of them, and some they killed, yet they could not take one alive (which was the thing they chiefly wanted) by any means that they could contrive.

Among the rest of the creatures that they shot for food they very often found wild cows and bulls, and especially, as they found afterwards, on the north side of the river; but the most surprising thing to them that they had yet met with was still to come. They had descended from the hill, where they at first discovered the smaller river, and where they had set up their tent, resolving to march on the lower grounds, as near the river as they could, so as to be out of danger of the water, that they might find, if possible, some way over to come at the great river, which they judged to be the stream most proper for their business.

Here they found a rich pleasant country, level and fruitful; not so low as to be exposed to the overflowing of the river, and not so high as to be dry and barren. Several little brooks and streams of water, rising on the side of the hill they came from, ran winding this way and that, as if to find out the river, and near the river were some woods of very large trees.

The men, not forgetting the main chance, fell to washing and searching the sand and gravel in these brooks for gold: but the harvest of gold seemed to be over, for here they found none. They had also an occasion to discover, that till the land waters were abated, there was no stirring for them, no, not so much as to cross the first river; nor, if they did, could they find in their hearts to venture, not knowing but the waters might still rise higher, and that the two rivers might swell into one, and so they should be swallowed up, or if not, they might be surrounded on some island, where they should perish for want of provisions; so they resolved to fetch their baggage from the hill, as well as they could, and encamp in those pleasant plains, as near the river as they could, till the water should abate.

While they stayed here, they were so far from having hopes that the waters would abate, that it rained violently for almost three days and nights together; and one of those rainy mornings, looking out at their tent door (for they could not stir abroad for the rain) they were surprised when, looking towards the river, which was just below them, they saw a prodigious number of black creatures in the water, and swimming towards the shore where they were.

They at first imagined they were porpoises, but could not suggest anything of that kind at such a distance from the sea, when one of the men, looking at them through a glass, cried out, they were all black cattle, and that he could perceive their horns and their heads. Upon this, others looking with their glasses also, said the same. Immediately every man ran to his gun, and, notwithstanding it rained hard, away they marched down the river's side with all the speed they could make.

By that time they reached the river-bank, their wonder increased, for they found it was a vast multitude of black cattle, who, finding the waters rise between the two rivers, and by a natural sagacity, apprehensive of being swept away with the flood, had, one and all, took the waters, and were swimming over to this side for safety.

You may very well suppose the fellows, though they wanted a few such guests as these, yet were terrified with their multitude, and began to consider what course to take when the creatures should come to land, for there was a monstrous many of them. Upon the whole, after a short consultation, for the creatures came on apace, they resolved to get into a low ground, where they perceived they directed their course, and in which there were a great many trees, and that they would all get up into the trees, and so lie ready to shoot among them as they landed.

Accordingly they did so, except that five of them, cutting down some large boughs of a tree, got into a little thicket close to the water, which they so fortified with the boughs of the trees, that they thought themselves secure within, and there they posted themselves, resolving to expect them and take their hazard.

When the creatures came to land, it was wonderful to observe how they lowed and roared, as it were, to bid one another welcome on shore, and spreading themselves upon the neighbouring plain, immediately lay down, and rolling and stretching themselves, gave our people notice that, in short, they had swam a great way and were very much tired.

Our fellows, you may suppose, laid about them, and the five men that fixed themselves in the thicket had the fairest opportunity, for they killed eleven or twelve of them as soon as they set their foot on shore, and lamed as many.

And now they had a trial of skill, for as they killed as many as they knew what to do with, and had their choice of beef, if they killed a bull, they let him lie, as having no use for him, but chose the cows, as what they thought was only fit for eating.

But, I say, now they had a trial of skill, namely, to see if they could maim some of them, so as not to kill them, and might bring them to carry their luggage. This was a kind of a fruitless attempt, as we afterwards told them, to make a baggage-horse of a wild bull.

However, they brought it so far to pass that having wounded several young bulls very much, after they had run roaring about with the hurt, they lay down and bled so as that it was likely they would bleed to death, as several of them really did: but the surgeon observing two of them to be low enough that he might go to them, and do what he would with them, he soon stopped the bleeding, and, in a word, healed the wounds. All the while he was doing this, he caused food, that is to say, grass and boughs of trees, to be brought to them for food, and in four or five days the creatures were very well. Then he caused them to be hampered with ropes and tied together, so that they could neither fight with their heads or run away with their heels; and having thus brought them to a place just by their tent, he caused them to be kept so hungry, and almost starved, that when meat was carried them, they were so tame and thankful, that, at last, they would eat out of his hand, and stretch out their heads for it, and when they were let a little looser, would follow him about for a handful of grass, like a dog for a bone.

When he had brought them thus to hand, he by degrees loaded them, and taught them to carry; and if they were unruly, as they were at first, he would load them with more than they could well carry, and make them stand under that load two or three hours, and then come himself and bring them meat and take the load off; and thus in a few days they knew him so well that they would let him do anything with them.

When they came to decamp they tied them both together with such ropes as they had, and made them carry a very great weight. They tried the same experiment with two more but they failed, one died and the other proved untractable, sullen, and outrageous.

They had now lain here twelve days, having plenty of provisions, in which time the weather proving fair, the land waters run off and the rivers came to their old channels, clear and calm: the men would gladly have gone back to the sands and flat shore of the lake, or to some other part, to look for gold; but that was impracticable now, so they marched on, and in about two days they found the first river seemed to turn so much to the south, that they thought it would carry them too far out of their way, for their orders were to keep about the latitude of forty to fifty degrees, as is said before, so they resolved to get over the first river as soon as they could; they had not gone far, but they found the river so shallow that they easily forded it, bulls and all, and being safely landed they travelled cross the country directly to the great river, which they found also very low, though not like to be forded as the other was.

Now they thought they were in the way of their business, and here they resolved to see if a tree or two might be found, big enough to make a large canoe to carry them down this river, which, as it seemed large, so the current seemed to be less rapid and furious, the channel being deep and full.

They had not searched long but they found three trees, as they thought, large enough, and they immediately went to work with them, felled them and shaped them, and in four days' time they had three handsome canoes, one larger than the rest, and able to carry in all fifteen or sixteen men; but this was not enough, so they were forced to look out farther for two trees more, and this took them up more time. However in about a week they launched them all: as for days, they had lost their account of time; so that as they had sometimes no room to distinguish one day from another, so they, after some time, quite forgot the days and knew not a Sunday from a working day any more.

While these canoes were making, the men, according to the old trade, fell to rummaging the shores of this river, as they had done the other, for gold, nor did they wholly lose their labour, for in several places they found a pretty deal; and here it was that a certain number of them, taking one of the canoes that were first made, took a voyage of their own heads, not only without command but against command; and having made a little mast and sail to it, went up towards the lake, resolving to go quite into the lake to find another golden shore or gold coast, as they called it.

To give a particular account of this wild undertaking would be too long, nor would the rogues give much account of it themselves; only in short that they found a sand pretty rich in gold, worked upon it five days indefatigably, and got a good deal, sufficient, had they brought it back, to have tempted the rest to have gave all away to the same place: but at the end of the five days, some were for returning and others for staying longer, till the majority prevailed to come back, representing to the rest that their friends would be gone, and they should be left to starve in that wild country and should never get home; so they all got into the canoe again, but quarrelled when they were in, and that to such an unreasonable height that, in short, they fought, over-set the boat, lost all their gold and their arms, except three muskets, which were lashed under the thouts or benches of the canoe, spoiled their ammunition and provision, and drowned one of their company; so they came home to the rest by weeping cross, wet and almost famished.

This was a baulk to them, you may be sure, and put a damp to their new projects; and yet six of the same men were so bold afterwards as to demand to be dismissed and a canoe given them, and they would go back, they said, to the Golden Lake, where, they did not doubt, they should load the canoe with gold; and if they found when they came back we were gone, they would find their way back through the mountains and go to the rich Spaniard, who they did not doubt would get them license to go back to Europe with the galleons, and perhaps, they said, they might be in England before us.

But the captain quelled this mutiny, though there were four or five more come into it, and showing them the agreement they had made with me, their commander; the obligation they were under, and the madness of their other proposals, prevailed with them to go forward with the rest and pursue the voyage, which he now represented to be very easy, being as it were all the way down hill, that is to say with the stream, for they all knew the river they were in must go to the sea, and that in or near the latitude which they knew the ship had appointed to wait for them. However, to soften them a little and, in some measure, to please them, he promised that if they met with any success in the search after gold in the river they were in, as he did not question but they should, he would consent to any reasonable stop that they should propose, not exceeding five days in a place, and the places to be not less than five leagues off from one another.

Upon these terms they consented, and all embarked and came away, though extremely mortified for the loss of one of their companions, who was a brave stout fellow, very well beloved by all the company, but there was no remedy; so they came on in five canoes, and with a good stock of provisions, such as it was, viz. good fresh beef cured in the sun, and fifteen Peruvian sheep alive, for when they got into the country, between the two rivers, they found it easy to catch those creatures, who, before that, would not come near them.

And now they came down the river apace, till they came to another golden shore, where, finding some quantity of gold, they claimed their captain's promise, and accordingly they went all on shore to work, and pretty good success they had, picking up from among the sands a considerable quantity of gold; and having stayed four of the five days, they found they had cleared the place, which was not of a long extent, and so they cheerfully came on.

They came on now for eleven days together very willingly, but then found the channel of the river divided itself, and one went away to the left, and the other to the right; they could not judge which was the best to take; but not questioning but that they would meet again soon, they took the southernmost channel, as being most direct in their latitude; and thus they proceeded for three or four days more, when they were obliged to put into the mouth of a little river that fell into the other, and made a good harbour for their little fleet.

Here, I say, they were obliged to put in for want of provisions, for they had eat up all their guiancos, and their two tame bulls too, the last of which they soon repented, as you will see presently.

After they had been hunting, and shot a couple of deer and a cow, with a kind of hare as big as an English fox, they set forward again very merrily, and the more so because they had another little piece of a gold coast, where, for two days, they had very good luck again; but judge how they were surprised, and in what a consternation they were, when coming farther down the same river they heard a terrible noise in the river, as of a mighty cataract, or waterfall, which increased as they came forward till it grew so loud that they could not hear themselves speak, much less hear one another.

As they approached, it was the more frightful; so at length, lest they should be hurried into it before they were aware, they went all on shore, doing all by signs and dumb postures, for it was impossible to hear any sound.

Notwithstanding this, it was near six miles to the place, which, when they perceived, some of them went back to bring on the boats, and so brought them as near the place as they durst, and run them on shore into a little hollow part of the bank just large enough to hold them. When they had thus secured the boats they went to view the waterfall; but how was they astonished when they found that there were not one, but five waterfalls, at the distance of about two miles from one another, some more, some less; that the water fell a prodigious height, so that it was impossible any boat could bear to launch down the cataract and not be dashed in pieces.

They now saw there was no remedy, but that they must lose the benefit of their five canoes, which had been so comfortable to them, and by which they had come above four hundred miles in a little time with safety and pleasure.

These cataracts made the river perfectly useless to them for above twenty miles, and it was impossible to drag their canoes that length over land; so, in short, they unloaded them, and for their own satisfaction they turned one, the biggest of them, adrift, and let it go to the first cataract, placing themselves so beyond that they might see it come down, which they did, and had the pleasure of seeing it dashed in pieces on the rocks below.

Well, there was no remedy, but they must leave their boats behind them; and now, as I have said, they had time to repent killing their two tame bulls, who would have done them good service; but it was too late to look back upon what was done and over so many days before. They had now no remedy, if they would go forward, but to take up their baggage upon their shoulders and walk on foot. The only help they had was, that they had gotten five guinacos more, which, though they were hungry, and would fain have eaten, yet as they carried at least five hundred weight of their luggage, they chose to fast and walk rather than feast and work; so they went on as well as they could till they got past these falls, which, though not above twenty miles, cost them five days' labour.

Then they encamped again to refresh themselves, and consider of what was next to be done. They were thus long upon this short journey for many reasons:

1. Because they were obliged to employ the best part of two days in hunting for their food, in which time five of them, swimming over the river to shoot at some black cattle, extremely fatigued themselves in pursuing them, but did, however, shoot five cows and bulls; but then it was at such a distance that it was more pains to drag the flesh along to the river's side than it was worth to have it, only that they were indeed hunger-starved and must have it.

2. They found still some little quantity of gold in the water; that is to say, below the falls, where the water, after, by falling with such force it had made a pit or hole of a vast depth, as is usual at a mill-tail, had thrown up a shoal again at perhaps a mile distance; there they took up some gold whenever the water was low enough to come to the shoal.

3. The weight of their baggage made them travel heavy, and seldom above five or six miles a day.

Being now come to the open river, they thought of building more floats, but they were discouraged from this consideration; that they did not know but in a few days' march, there might be more waterfalls, and then all their labour would be lost; so they took up their tent and began to travel again.

But here, as they kept the river close on board, as the seamen call it, they were at a full stop, by the coming in of another river from the S.W. which, when it joined the river they went along by, was above a quarter of a mile broad, and how to get over it they knew not. They sent two men up the additional river some length, and he brought word that it was, indeed, narrower by much, but nowhere fordable, but deep and rapid.

At the same time they sent two more nimble fellows down the coast of the great river, to see if there were no more waterfalls, who brought them word, there were none for sixty miles.

While they lay here, at the point of the influx, expecting the return of their scouts, they used what diligence they could in getting provisions; and among the rest, they killed three cows and a bull on the other side of the biggest river; but not knowing how to bring them over, they concluded to go over, as many as could swim, which was the better half of them, and sit down by it, and roast and boil upon the spot, as much as they could eat, and then bring over as much as they could for their fellows.

They got boughs of trees, and bound them together, then wrapped the meat in the hides, and laid it on the wood, and made a hundred little contrivances to get it over; so that on one side or other, they got all the meat eaten or brought over. What they got on their own side the river they made better shift with.

On the return of their scouts, they found there was no remedy but to build some new vessels of one kind or another, to take in their baggage and provision, which they did, after the manner of their first floats, for they found no trees big enough to make canoes. When, therefore, they had made one great float, they resolved to make two small boats, like yauls or skiffs, with which they might tow their large float or barge; and as this they might do with small stuff, so they found means to line them within and without with the bull's hides, and that, so dexterously joined, and lapped or rolled one over another, that no water came through, or but very little.

With these two boats they ferried over the small rivers with ease, each boat carrying six men, besides two to row; and when they were over the small rivers, the two boats served to tow their great punt or barge close by the shore.

The greatest difficulty was for tow-lines to draw the boats by, and that they supplied by twisting a strong tough kind of flag or rush, which they found in the river, of which, with great application, they made a kind of rope-yarn, and then twisting it again, made it very strong.

This was the voiture with which they carried themselves down quite to the sea; and one of these boats it was, that we spied, as above, coming to us in the bay.

They had yet above four hundred and fifty miles to the sea, nor could they at any time tell or guess how far off it might be. They went on more or less every day, but it was but slowly, and not without great labour, both of rowing and towing. Their provisions also cost them much labour, and it was a great deal of difficulty that they were obliged, first to hunt and kill it, and then to bring it to the camp, which was always close to the river's side.

After they had travelled thus some time, following the course of the river, behold they came to a place, where of a sudden they could see no farther bank of the river, but it looked all water like the sea; they could not imagine what it must be so the next day they rowed towards it with one of their little boats, when they were surprised to find that it was the northern branch of the river which they had seen go off before they came at the waterfalls, which river being now increased with many other great waters, was now so great that the mouth of it might be said to be four or five miles over, and rather received this river which they were on into it than ran into this; but after this it contracted itself again, though still it was supposed to be a mile and a half over.

They were not glad of this conjunction of the waters at all, because the great water being thus joined, they found the stream or current more violent, and the water upon the least stirring of the wind much more turbulent than it was before; and as their great float drew but little water, and swam flat upon the surface, she was ready to founder upon every occasion. This obliged them almost every night to seek for some little cove or creek to run her into, as into a harbour to preserve her; for if the wind blew off shore, they had enough to do to keep her from driving off; if it blew off from the river, though it were otherwise little wind enough, yet it made a rippling or chopping of the waters that they had much difficulty to keep it from filling her.

All the country on the side of this river was a little higher ground than ordinary, which was its security from land-floods, and their security too; for sometimes the river was seen to rise, and that so as to overflow a great extent of land on the other side. Hence, perhaps, the other side might be esteemed the most fruitful, and, perhaps, might be the better land, if it had but half of the art and industry of an European nation to assist the natural fertility of the soil, by keeping the water in its bounds, banking and fencing the meadows from the inundations and freshes which were frequently sent down from the Andes, and from the country adjoining.

But as it now was, those lower lands lay great part of the year under water, whether it was the better or the worse for the soil, that no judgment can be made of till some people come to settle there, to whom it shall be worth while to make experiments of that kind.

This part of the country they were now in resembled, as they hinted, the county of Dorsetshire and the downs about Salisbury, only not lying so high from the surface of the water, and the soil being a good fruitful dark mould, not a chalky solid rock as in the county about Salisbury, &c.

Here they found a greater quantity of deer than they had seen in all their journey, which they often had the good luck to kill for their supply of food, the creatures not being so shy and wild as they had found farther within the country.

It may be noted here, and it is very observable, that in all this journey I do not learn, that they saw either wolf or fox, bear or lion, or indeed any other ravenous creature, which they had the least reason to be shy or afraid of, or which indeed were frightful to the deer; and this, perhaps, may be the reason why the number of those creatures is so great, which, as I have said, is greater there than at other places.

After they had feasted themselves here, as above, for some days, they resolved to begin their new kind of navigation, and see what they could make of it; but they went very heavily along, and every now and then, as I have said above, the water was too rough for them, and they were fain to put into harbour, and sometimes lie two and three days; however, they plied their time as well as they could, and sometimes the current setting over to their side and running strong by the shore, they would go at a great rate, inso-much, that one time they said they went above thirty miles in a day, having, besides the current, a little gale of wind right a-stern.

They reckoned that they went near two hundred miles in this manner, for they made the best of it; and at the end of this two hundred miles, it was by their reckoning that our five men who travelled into the country so far, found them, when they saw the hat swimming down the stream; which hat, it seems, one of them let fall over-board in the night.

They had, I say, travelled thus far with great difficulty, the river being so large; but as they observed it growing larger and larger, the farther they went, so they said they did not doubt but that in a little more they should come to the sea.

They also observed, that now as they found the waters larger, and the rivers wider, they killed more fowls than formerly, and particularly more of the duck-foot kind, though they could not perceive any sea-fowls, or such as they had been used to. They saw a great many wild swans and some geese, as also duck, and mallard, and teal; and these, I say, increased as they drew nearer the sea.

They could give very little account of the fish which the rivers produced, though they sometimes caught a few in the smaller river, but as they had neither fishing hook or nets, which was the only omission in my fitting them out, they had no opportunity to furnish themselves.

They had, likewise, no salt, neither was it possible to furnish them with salt, so they cured their meat in the sun, and seasoned it with that excellent sauce called hunger.

The account they gave of discovering our five men was thus, in short: They had been for two days pretty successful in their navigation, as I have described it, but were obliged to stop and put in at the mouth of a little river, which made them a good harbour; the reason of their stay was, they had no victuals, so by consent they all went hunting, and at night, having shot two guinacos and a deer, they came to supper together in their great tent, and having fed heartily, you may suppose, on such good provisions, they began to be merry; and the captain and officers having a little store left, though not much, they pulled out their bottles, and drank every one a dram to their good voyage, and to the merry meeting of their ships, and gave every man a sup.

But their mirth was increased beyond expressing when two of the men who were without the tent door cried out it lightened; one said he saw the flash, he was sure, and the other said he thought he saw it too; but, as it happened, their backs were towards the east, so that they did not see the occasion.

This lightning was certainly the first flash of one of our five men's rockets, or the breaking of it, and the stars that were at the end of it, up in the air.

When the captain heard the men say it lightened, he jumped off his seat, and called aloud to them to tell him which way; but they foolishly replied, to the N.W., which was the way their faces were when they saw it; but the word was no sooner spoken but the two fellows fell a hollowing and roaring, as if they were distracted, and said they saw a rocket rise up in the air to the eastward.

So nimble were the men at this word that they were all out of the tent in a moment, and saw the last bounce or flash of the rocket with the stars, which, spreading themselves in the air, shone with the usual bright light that it is known those things give.

This made them all set up a shout of joy, as if they imagined their fellows, who were yet many miles from them, should hear them; but the captain and officers, who knew what they were to do on this occasion, ran to their baggage, and took out their own rockets and other materials, and prepared to answer the signal.

They were on a low ground, but at less than a mile's distance the land went ascending to a round crown or knoll, pretty high. Away they ran thither, and set up a frame in an instant; but, as they were making these preparations, behold, to confirm their news, they saw a third rocket rise up in the air, in the same place as before.

It was near an hour from the first flash, as they called it, before they could get all things ready; but then they fired two rockets from the adjoining hill, soon after one another, and after that, at about ten minutes' distance of time, a third, which was just as by agreement, and was perfectly understood, the rockets performing very well.

Upon this, they saw another single rocket rise up, which was to let them know that their former was seen and understood.

This was, you will conclude, a very joyful night, and the next morning they went all hands to work at the boats, getting out of the creek early, and made the best of their way; however, with all they could do, they could not go above twelve miles that day, for the current, setting over to the other shore, had left them, and in some places they would have rather an eddy stream against them, and this discouraged them a little; but depending that they were near their port, and that their friends were not far off, they were very cheerful. At night they looked out again for rockets, which failed not to rejoice their hearts again, and with this addition, that it appeared their friends were not above four or five miles off. They answered the rockets punctually, and proceeding early the next day, they met in the morning, joyfully enough, as has been said.

We were overjoyed at meeting, you may be sure; but to see the pitiful boat, or periagua, they came on board in, a little surprised us, for indeed it was a wonder they should be able to make it swim under them, especially when they came out into the open sea.

As soon as we had the boat on board, we hauled it up into the ship for a relic, and taking two of the men with us, we manned out all our ships' boats to go and fetch the rest, for they were, as these men told us, about seventeen miles up the river still, and could not come any further, their boats being not able to bring them along, and the river growing very broad and dangerous. The eldest of my midshipmen came in this first boat, but the captain and the other stayed with the men, who were very unruly, and ever and anon quarrelling and wrangling about their wealth, which, indeed, was very considerable; but they were above twice as far up the river as the men told us, having halted after the boat left them.

When our boats came to them, and took them in. I ordered they should be set on shore, and their tents put up on the shore, until I had settled matters a little with them, having had an account how mutinous and fractious they had been; and I made them all stay there until I had fully adjusted everything with them about their treasure, which, indeed, was so much that they scarce knew how to govern themselves under the thought of it.

Here I proposed conditions to them at first; that all the gold should be shared before they went on board, and that it should be put on board the ship, as goods for every man's single account; that I would give them bills of lading for it; and I offered to swear to them to deliver it into every man's possession, separately, at the first port we should come to anchor at in England or France; and that, at that said port, they should every man have the one hundred pounds I had promised them, as above, for the undertaking this journey, delivered to them in money, that is to say, in gold dust; and that they alone should have full liberty to go on shore with it, and go whither they would, no man whatever but themselves, being allowed to set foot on shore in the same place, distress excepted. This they insisted on, because they had done some things, which, if I would, I might have pursued some of them for, perhaps to the gallows; but that I promised to forgive them, and to enquire no more after it.

In a word, there had been a scuffle among them, in which one of their canoes was upset, as was said, and one of their number drowned, at the same time when they lost a great part of their gold; and some were thought to have done it maliciously too.

However as I had no occasion to trouble them on that score, not being upon the spot when it was done; so having made this capitulation with them I performed it punctually, and set them all on shore, with their wealth, in the river of Garonne, in France: their gold, their one hundred pounds reward for their journey, their wages, and their share of pearl, and other advantages, made them very rich, for their cargo when cast up on shore might perhaps amount to about four hundred pounds a man. How they disposed of themselves or their money I never gave myself the trouble to enquire, and if I had it is none of my business to give an account of it here.

We dismissed also near fourscore more of our men afterwards, in a little creek, which was at their own request; for most of them having been of the Madagascar men, and by consequence pirates, they were willing to be easy, and I was as willing to make them so, and, therefore, cleared with as many of them as desired it. But I return to our ship.

Having thus made a long capitulation with our travellers, I took them all on board, and had leisure enough to have a long narration from them of their voyage, and from which account I take the liberty to recommend that part of America as the best and most advantageous part of the whole globe for an English colony, the climate, the soil, and, above all, the easy communication with the mountains of Chili, recommending it beyond any place that I ever saw or read of, as I shall further make appear by itself.

We had nothing now to do but to make the best of our way for England, and setting sail from the mouth of the river Camerones, so the Spaniards call it, the 18th of January, in which we had a more difficult and unpleasant voyage than in any other part of our way, chiefly, because being a rich ship, and not knowing how affairs stood in Europe, I kept to the northward, as far as the banks of Newfoundland, steering thence to the coast of Galitia, where we touched as above. After which we went through the channel, and arrived safe in Dunkirk-road the 12th of April; and from thence gave private notice of our good fortune to our merchants and owners; two of whom came over to us, and received at our hands such a treasure as gave them reason to be very well satisfied with their adventure. But, to my grief, my particular friend, the merchant, who put us upon all the curiosity and all the discovery you have heard of, was dead before our return; which if it had not happened, this new scheme of a trade round the world had, perhaps, never been made public till it had been put in practice, by a set of merchants designed to be concerned in it, from the new Austrian Netherlands.
